TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE PHILIP

Earle of Pembroke and Mountgomery:

Baron Herbert of Cardiffe and Sherland,

Lord Parr and Roſs of Kendall; Lord Fitz-Hugh, Marmyon, and Saint Quintin: Knight of the moſt noble Order of the Garter, and one of His Majeſties moſt Honourable Privie Councell:

And our Singular Good Lord.

My Lord,

THere is none among all the Names of Honour, that hath more encouraged the Legitimate Muſes of this latter Age, then that which is owing to your Familie; whoſe Coronet ſhines bright with the native luſter of its owne Jewels, which with the acceſſe of ſome Beames of Sydney, twiſted with their Flame preſents a Conſtellation, from whoſe Influence all good may be ſtill expected upon Witt and Learning.

At this Truth we rejoyce, but yet alooſe, and in our owne valley, for we dare not approach with any capacity in our ſelves to apply your Smile, ſince wee have only preſerved as Truſtees to the Aſhes of the Authors, what wee exhibit to your Honour, it being no more our owne, then thoſe Imperiall Crownes and Garlands were the Souldiers, who were honourably deſigned for their Conveyance before the Triumpher to the Capitol.

But directed by the example of ſome, who once ſteered in our qualitie, and ſo fortunately aſpired to chooſe your Honour, joyned with your (now glorified) Brother, Patrons to the flowing compoſitions of the then expired ſweet Swan of Avon Shakespeare; and ſince, more particularly bound to your Lordſhips

most constant and diffusive Goodnesse, from which, wee did for many calme yeares derive a subsistence to our selves, and Protection to the Scene (now withered, and condemn'd, as we feare, to a long Winter and sterilitie) we have presumed to offer to your Selfe, what before was never printed of these Authours.

Had they beene lesse then all the Treasure we had contracted in the whole Age of Poesie (some few Poemes of their owne excepted, which already published, command their entertainement, with all lovers of Art and Language) or were they not, the most justly admir'd, and belov'd Pieces of Witt and the World, wee should have taught our selves a lesse Ambition.

Be pleased to accept this humble tender of our duties, and till wee faile in our obedience to all your Commands, vouchsafe, we may be knowne by the Cognizance and Character of

MY LORD,

Your Honours most bounden

THE

TO THE READER.

POETRY is the Child of Nature, which regulated and made beautifull by Art, presenteth the most Harmonious of all other compositions; among which (if we rightly consider) the Dramaticall is the most absolute, in regard of those transcendent Abilities, which should waite upon the Composer; who must have more then the instruction of Libraries which of it selfe is but a cold contemplative knowledge) there being required in him a Soule miraculously knowing, and conversing with all mankind, inabling him to expresse not onely the Phlegme and folly of thick-skin'd men, but the strength and maturity of the wise, the Aire and insinuations of the Court, the discipline and Resolution of the Soldier, the Vertues and passions of every noble condition, nay the councells and characters of the greatest Princes.

This you will say is a vast comprehension, and hath not hapned in many Ages. Be it then remembred to the Glory of our owne, that all these are Demonstrative and met in Beaumont & Fletcher, whom but to mention is to throw a cloude upon all former names and benight Posterity; This Book being, without flattery, the greatest Monument of the Scene that Time and Humanity have produced, and must Live, not only the Crowne and sole Reputation of our owne, but the stayne of all other Nations and Languages, for it may be boldly averred, not one indiscretion hath branded this Paper in all the Lines, this being the Authentick witt that made Blackfriers an Academy, where the three howers spectacle while Beaumont and Fletcher were presented, were usually of more advantage to the hopefull young Heire, then a costly, dangerous, forraigne Travell, with the assistance of a governing Mounsieur, or Signior to boot; And it cannot be denied but that the young spirits of the Time, whose Birth & Quality made them impatient of the sowrer wayes of education, heve from the attentive hearing these pieces, got ground in point of wit and carriage of the most severely employed Students, while these Recreations were digested into Rules, and the very Pleasure did edifie. How many passable discoursing dining witts stand yet in good credit upon the bare stock of two or three of these single Scenes.

And now Reader in this Tragicall Age where the Theater hath been so much out-acted, congratulate thy owne happinesse, that in this silence of the Stage, thou hast a liberty to reade these inimitable Playes, to dwell and converse in these immortall Groves, which were only shewd our Fathers in a conjuring glasse, as suddenly removed as represented, the Landscrap is now brought home by this optick, and the Presse thought too pregnant before, shall be now look'd upon as greatest

Bene-

Benefactor to Englishmen, that must acknowledge all the felicity of witt and words to this Derivation.

You may here find passions raised to that excellent pitch and by such insinuating degrees that you shall not chuse but consent, & go along with them, finding your self at last grown insensibly the very same person you read, and then stand admiring the subtile Trackes of your engagement. Fall on a Scene of love and you will never believe the writers could have the least roome left in their soules for another passion, peruse a Scene of manly Rage, and you would sweare they cannot be expresst by the same hands, but both are so excellently wrought, you must confesse none, but the same hands, could worke them.

Would thy Melancholy have a cure? thou shalt laugh at Democritus himselfe, and but reading one piece of this Comick variety, finde thy exalted fancie in Elizium; And when thou art sick of this cure, (for the excesse of delight may too much dilate thy soule) thou shalt meete almost in every leafe a soft purling passion or spring of sorrow so powerfully wrought high by the teares of innocence, and wronged Lovers, it shall perswade thy eyes to weepe into the streame, and yet smile when they contribute to their owne ruines.

Infinitely more might be said of these rare Copies, but let the ingenuous Reader peruse them & he will finde them so able to speake their own worth, that they need not come into the world with a trumpet, since any one of these incomparable pieces well understood will prove a Preface to the rest, and if the Reader can tast the best wit ever trod our English Stage, he will be forced himselfe to become a breathing Panegerick to them all.

Not to detaine or prepare thee longer, be as capritious and sick-brain'd, as ignorance & malice can make thee, here thou art rectified, or be as healthfull as the inward calme of an honest Heart, Learning, and Temper can state thy disposition, yet this booke may be thy fortunate concernement and Companion.

It is not so remote in Time, but very many Gentlemen may remember these Authors & some familiar in their conversation deliver them upon every pleasant occasion so fluent, to talke a Comedy. He must be a bold man that dares undertake to write their Lives. What I have to say is, we have the precious Remaines, and as the wisest contemporaries acknowledge they Lived a Miracle, I am very confident this volume cannot die without one.

What more specially concerne these Authors and their workes is told thee by another hand in the following Epistle of the Stationer to the Readers.

Farwell, Reade, and feare not thine owne understanding, this Booke will create a cleare one in thee, and when thou hast considered thy purchase, thou wilt call the price of it a Charity to thy selfe, and at the same time forgive thy friend, and these Authors humble admirer,

JA. SHIRLEY.

The Stationer to the Readers.

Gentlemen,

BEfore you engage farther, be pleased to take notice of these Particulars. You have here a New Booke; I can speake it clearely; for of all this large Volume of Comedies and Tragedies, not one, till now, was ever printed before. A Collection of Playes is commonly but a new Impression, the scattered pieces which were printed single, being then onely Republished together: 'Tis otherwise here.

Next, as it is all New, so here is not any thing Spurious or impos'd; I had the Originalls from such as received them from the Authours themselves; by Those, and none other, I publish this Edition.

And as here's nothing but what is genuine and Theirs, so you will finde here are no Omissions; you have not onely All I could get, but All that you must ever expect. For (besides those which were formerly printed) there is not any Piece written by these Authours, either Joyntly or Severally, but what are now publish'd to the VVorld in this Volume. One only Play I must except (for I meane to deale openly) 'tis a COMEDY called the VVilde-goose Chase, which hath beene long lost, and I feare irrecoverable; for a Person of Quality borrowed it from the Actours many yeares since, and (by the negligence of a Servant) it was never return'd; therefore now I put up this Si quis, that whosoever hereafter happily meetes with it, shall be thankfully satisfied if he please to send it home.

Some Playes (you know) written by these Authors were heretofore Printed: I thought not convenient to mixe them with this Volume, which of it selfe is entirely New. And indeed it would have rendred the Booke so Voluminous, that Ladies and Gentlewomen would have found it scarce manageable; who in Workes of this nature must first be remembred. Besides, I considered those former Pieces had been so long printed and re-printed, that many Gentlemen were already furnished; and I would have none say, they pay twice for the same Booke.

One thing I must answer before it bee objected; 'tis this: VVhen these Comedies and Tragedies were presented on the Stage, the Actours omitted some Scenes and Passages (with the Authour's consent) as occasion led them; and when private friends desir'd a Copy, they then (and justly too) transcribed what they Acted. But now you have both All that was Acted, and all that was not; even the perfect full Originalls without the least mutilation; So that were the Authours living (and sure they can never dye) they themselves would challenge neither more nor lesse then what is here published; this Volume being now so compleate and finish'd, that the Reader must expect no future Alterations.

For

The Stationer to the Reader

For literall Errours committed by the Printer, 'tis the fashion to aske pardon, and as much in fashion to take no notice of him that asks it; but in this also I have done my endeavour. 'Twere vaine to mention the Chargeablenesse of this VVork; for those who own'd the Manuscripts, too well knew their value to make a cheap estimate of any of these Pieces, and though another joyn'd with me in the Purchase and Printing, yet the Care & Paine was wholly mine, which I found to be more then you'l easily imagine, unlesse you knew into how many hands the Originalls were dispersed. They are all now happily met in this Book, having escaped these Publike Troubles, free and unmangled. Heretofore when Gentlemen desired but a Copy of any of these Playes, the meanest piece here (if any may be called Meane where every one is Best) cost them more then foure times the price you pay for the whole Volume.

I should scarce have adventured in these slippery times on such a work as this, if knowing persons had not generally assured mee that these Authors were the most unquestionable VVits this Kingdome hath afforded. Mr. Beaumont was ever acknowledged a man of a most strong and searching braine; and (his yeares considered) the most Judicious VVit these later Ages have produced; he dyed young, for (which was an invaluable losse to this Nation) he left the world when hee was not full thirty yeares old. Mr. Fletcher survived, and lived till almost fifty; whereof the VVorld now enjoyes the benefit. It was once in my thoughts to have Printed Mr. Fletcher's workes by themselves, because single & alone he would make a Just Volume: But since never parted while they lived, I conceived it not equitable to seperate their ashes.

It becomes not me to say (though it be a knowne Truth) that these Authors had not only High unexpressible gifts of Nature, but also excellent acquired Parts, being furnished with Arts and Sciences by that liberall education they had at the University, which sure is the best place to make a great Wit understand it selfe; this their workes will soone make evident. I was very ambitious to have got Mr. Beaumonts picture; but could not possibly, though I spared no enquirie in those Noble Families whence he was descended, as also among those Gentlemen that were his acquaintance when he was of the Inner Temple: the best Pictures and those most like him you'l finde in this Volume. This figure of Mr. Fletcher was cut by severall Originall Pieces, which his friends lent me, but withall they tell me, that his unimitable Soule did shine through his countenance in such Ayre and Spirit, that the Painters confessed it, was not easie to expresse him: As much as could be, you have here, and the Graver hath done his part. What ever I have seene of Mr. Fletchers owne hand, is free from interlining; and his friends affirme he never writ any one thing twice: it seemes he had that rare felicity to prepare and perfect all first in his owne braine; to shape and attire his Notions, to adde or loppe off, before he committed one word to writing, and never touched pen till all was to stand as firme and immutable as if ingraven in Brasse or Marble. But I keepe you too long from those friends of his whom 'tis fitter for you to read; only accept of the honest endeavours of

One that is a Servant to you all

At the Princes Armes in

TEll the ſad World that now the lab'ring Preſſe
H'as brought forth ſafe a Child of happineſſe,
The Frontiſ-piece will ſatisfie the wiſe
And good ſo well, they will not grudge the price.
'Tis not all Kingdomes joyn'd in one could buy
(If priz'd aright) ſo true a Library
Of man: where we the characters may finde
Of ev'ry Nobler and each baſer minde.
Deſert has here reward in one good line
For all it loſt, for all it might repine:
Vile and ignobler things are open laid,
The truth of their falſe colours are diſplayd:
You'l ſay the Poet's both beſt Judge and Prieſt,
No guilty ſoule abides ſo ſharp a teſt
As their ſmooth Pen; for what theſe rare men writ
Commands the World, both Honeſty and Wit.

GRANDISON.

IN MEMORY OF Mr. IOHN FLETCHER.

MEe thought our Fletcher weary of this crowd,
Wherein so few have witt, yet all are loud,
Vnto Elyzium fled, where he alone
Might his own witt admire and ours bemoane;
But soone upon those Flowry Bankes, a throng
Worthy of those even numbers which he sung,
Appear'd, and though those Ancient Laureates strive
When dead themselves, whose raptures should survive,
For his Temples all their owne bayes allowes,
Not sham'd to see him crown'd with naked browes;
Homer his beautifull Achilles nam'd,
Vrging his braine with Joves might well be fam'd,
Since it brought forth one full of beauties charmes,
As was his Pallas, and as bold in Armes;
King and no King. But when he the brave Arbases saw, one
That saved his peoples dangers by his owne,
And saw Tigranes by his hand undon
Without the helpe of any Mirmydon,
He then confess'd when next hee'd Hector slay,
That he must borrow him from Fletchers Play;
This might have beene the shame, for which he bid
His Iliades in a Nut-shell should be hid:
Virgill of his Æneas next begun,
Whose God-like forme and tongue so soone had wonne;
That Queene of Carthage and of beauty too,
Two powers the whole world else were slaves unto,
Vrging that Prince for to repaire his faulte
On earth, boldly in hell his Mistresse sought;
The Maides Tragedy. But when he Amintor saw revenge that wrong,
For which the sad Aspatia sigh'd so long,
Vpon himselfe, to shades hasting away,
Not for to make a visit but to stay;
He then did modestly confesse how farr
Fletcher out-did him in a Character.
Now lastly for a refuge, Virgill shewes
The lines where Corydon Alexis woes;
But those in opposition quickly met
The faithfull Shepherdesse. The smooth tongu'd Perigot and Amoret:
A paire whom doubtlesse had the others seene,
They from their owne loves had Apostates beene;
Thus Fletcher did the fam'd laureat exceed,
Both when his Trumpet sounded and his reed;
Now if the Ancients yeeld that heretofore,
None worthyer then those ere Laurell wore;
The least our age can say now thou art gon,
Is that there never will be such a one:
And since t'expresse thy worth, our rimes too narrow be,
To help it wee'l be ample in our prophesie.

On Mr. John Fletcher, and his Workes, never before published.

TO flatter living fooles is eaſie ſlight:
But hard, to do the living-dead men right.
To praiſe a Landed Lord, is gainfull art:
But thankleſſe to pay Tribute to deſert.
This ſhould have been my taske: I had intent
To bring my rubbiſh to thy monument,
To ſtop ſome crannies there, but that I found
No need of leaſe repaire; all firme and ſound.
Thy well-built fame doth ſtill it ſelfe advance
Above the Worlds mad zeale and ignorance,
Though thou dyedſt not poſſeſt of that ſame pelfe
(Which Nobler ſoules call durt,) the City wealth:
Yet thou haſt left unto the times ſo great
A Legacy, a Treaſure ſo compleat,
That 'twill be hard I feare to prove thy Will:
Men will be wrangling, and in doubting ſtill
How ſo vaſt ſummes of wit were left behind,
And yet nor debts nor ſharers they can finde.
'Twas the kind providence of fate, to lock
Some of this Treaſure up; and keep a ſtock
For a reſerve untill theſe ſullen daies:
When ſcorne, and want, and danger, are the Baies
That Crown the head of merit. But now he
Who in thy Will hath part, is rich and free.
But there's a Caveat enter'd by command,
None ſhould pretend, but thoſe can underſtand.

ON

Mr Fletchers Works.

THough Poets have a licence which they use
As th'ancient priviledge of their free Muse;
Yet whether this be leave enough for me
To write, great Bard, an Eulogie for thee:
Or whether to commend thy Worke, will stand
Both with the Lawes of Verse and of the Land,
Were to put doubts might raise a discontent
Between the Muses and the———
I'le none of that. There's desperate wits that be
(As their immortall Lawrell) Thunder-free;
Whose personall vertues, 'bove the Lawes of Fate,
Supply the roome of personall estate:
And thus enfranchis'd, safely may rehearse,
Rapt in a lofty Straine, their own neck-verse.
For he that gives the Bayes to thee, must then
First take it from the Militarie Men;
He must untriumph conquests, bid 'em stand,
Question the strength of their victorious hand.
He must act new things, or go neer the sin,
Reader, as neer as you and I have been:
He must be that, which He that tryes will swear
It is not good being so another Teare.
And now that thy great name I've brought to this,
To do it honour is to do amisse,
What's to be done to those, that shall refuse
To celebrate, great Soule, thy noble Muse?
Shall the poore State of all those wandring things,
Thy Stage once rais'd to Emperors and Kings?
Shall rigid forfeitures (that reach our Heires)
Of things that only fill with cares and feares?
Shall the privation of a friendlesse life,
Made up of contradictions and strife?
Shall He be entitie, would antedate
His own poore name, and thine annihilate?
Shall these be judgements great enough for one
That dares not write thee an Encomion?

Then where am I? but now I've thought upon't,
I'le prayse thee more then all have ventur'd on's.
I'le take thy noble Work (and like the trade
Where for a heap of Salt pure Gold is layd)
I'le lay thy Volume, that Huge Tome of wit,
About in Ladies Closets, where they sit
Enthron'd in their own wills; and if shee bee
A Laick sister, shee'l straight flie to thee:
But if a holy Habit shee have on,
Or be some Novice, shee'l scarce looke upon
Thy Lines at first; but watch Her then a while,
And you shall see Her steale a gentle smile
Vpon thy Title, put thee neerer yet,
Breath on thy Lines a whisper, and then set
Her voyce up to the measures; then begin
To blesse the houre, and happy state shee's in.
Now shee layes by her Characters, and lookes
With a stern eye on all her pretty Bookes.
Shee's now thy Votaresse, and the just Crowne
She brings thee with it, is worth half the Towne.
I'le send thee to the Army, they that fight
Will read thy tragedies with some delight,
Be all thy Reformadoes, fancy scars,
And pay too, in thy speculative wars.
I'le send thy Comick scenes to some of those
That for a great while have plaid fast and loose;
New universalists, by changing shapes,
Have made with wit and fortune faire escapes.
Then shall the Countrie that poor Tennis-ball
Of angry fate, receive thy Pastorall,
And from it learn those melancholy straines
Fed the afflicted soules of Primitive swaines.
Thus the whole World to reverence will flock
Thy Tragick Buskin and thy Comick Stock:
And winged fame unto posterity
Transmit but onely two, this Age, and Thee.

Deceaſed Authour, Mr John Fletcher, his Plays; and eſpecially, The Mad Lover.

WHilſt his well organ'd body doth retreat,
To its firſt matter, and the formall heat
Triumphant ſits in judgement to approve
Pieces above our Candour and our love:
Such as dare boldly venter to appeare
Unto the curious eye, and Criticke eare:
Lo the Mad Lover in theſe various times
Is preſs'd to life, t'accuſe us of our crimes.
While Fletcher liv'd, who equall to him writ
Such laſting Monuments of naturall wit?
Others might draw their lines with ſweat, like thoſe
That (with much paines) a Garriſon incloſe;
Whilſt his ſweet fluent veine did gently runne
As uncontrold, and ſmoothly as the Sun.
After his death our Theatres did make
Him in his own unequald Language ſpeake:
And now when all the Muſes out of their
Approved modeſty ſilent appeare,
This Play of Fletchers braves the envious light
As wonder of our eares once, now our ſight.

And there (t'amaze the World) conſume his ſweate;
When our admired Fletcher vaunts not ought,
And ſlighted every thing he writ as naught:
While all our Engliſh wondring world (in's cauſe)
Made this great City eccho with applauſe.
Read him therefore all that can read, and thoſe
That cannot learne, if y' are not Learnings foes,
And wilfully reſolved to refuſe
The gentle Raptures of this happy Muſe.

But make us entertaine what thou haſt given.

So in theſe things there's muſicke in the cloſe:
And though they ſeem great Diſcords to our eares,
They are but ſo to theſe above the Spheares.
Granting theſe Muſicke, how much ſweeter's that

Since Heaven, and Earth, and Seas, and Ayre conſent
To make an Harmony (the Inſtruments,

To the memory of my most honoured kinsman, Mr. Francis Beaumont.

I'Le not pronounce how strong and eloquent thou writes,
Nor by what new found Rules thou took'st thy Flights;
Nor how much Greek and Latin some refine
Before they can make up six words of thine,
But this I'le say, thou strik'st our sense so deep,
At once thou mak'st us Blush, Rejoyce, and Weep.
Great Father Iohnson bow'd himself when hee
(Thou writ'st so nobly) vow'd he envy'd thee.
Were thy Mardonius arm'd, there would be more
Strife for his Sword then all Achilles wore,
Such wise just Rage, had Hee been Lastly try'd
My life on't Hee had been o'th' Better side,
And where hee found false odds (through Guile or Sloath)
There brave Mardonius would have hit at them Both.
Behold, here's FLETCHER too! the World ne're knew
Two Potent Witts co-operate till You;
For still your fancies are so knit and knit,
'Twas FRANCIS-FLETCHER, or IOHN BEAUMONT writ.
Yet neither borrow'd, nor were so put to't
To call poore Godds and Goddesses to do't;
Nor made Nine Girles your Muses (you suppose Women ne're write, save Love-Letters in prose)
But are your owne Inspirers, and have made
Such pow'rfull Sceanes, as when they please, invade.
Your Plot, Sence, Language, All's so pure and fit,
Hee's Bold, not Valiant, dare dispute your Wit.

On

On Mr. JOHN FLETCHER'S VVorkes.

SO shall we joy, when all whom Beasts and Wormes
Had turn'd to their owne substances and formes, whom Earth to Earth, or fire hath chang'd to fire,
Wee shall behold more then at first intire
As now we doe, to see all thine, thine owne
In this thy Muses Resurrection, whose scatter'd parts, from thy owne Race, more wounds
Hath suffer'd, then Acteon from his hounds;
which first their Braines, and then their Bellies fed,
And from their excrements new Poets bred.
But now thy Muse inraged from her urne
Like Ghosts of Murdred bodyes doth returne,
To accuse the Murderers, to right the Stage,
And undeceive the long abused Age,
which casts thy praise on them, to whom thy Wit
Gives not more Gold then they give drosse to it:
who not content like fellons to purloyne,
Adde Treason to it, and debase thy Coyne.
But whither am I strayd? I need not raise
Trophies to thee from other Mens dispraise;
Nor is thy fame on lesser Ruines built,
Nor needs thy juster title the foule guilt
Of Easterne Kings, who to secure their Raigne,
Must have their Brothers, Sonnes, and Kindred slaine.
Then was wits Empire at the fatall height,
when labouring and sinking with its weight,
From thence a thousand lesser Poets sprong
Like petty Princes from the fall of Rome.
When JOHNSON, SHAKESPEARE, and thy selfe did sit,
And sway'd in the Triumvirate of wit —
Yet what from JOHNSONS oyle and sweat did flow,
Or what more easie nature did bestow
On SHAKESPEARES gentler Muse, in thee full growne
Their Graces both appeare, yet so, that none
Can say here Nature ends, and Art begins
But mixt like th'Elements, and borne like twins,
So interweav'd, so like, so much the same,
None this meere Nature, that meere Art can name:
'Twas this the Ancients meant, Nature and Skill
Are the two topps of their Pernassus Hill.

I. DENHAM.

Vpon Mr. John Fletcher's Playes.

FLETCHER, to thee, wee doe not only owe
All these good Playes, but those of others too:
Thy wit repeated, does support the Stage,
Credits the last, and entertaines this age.
No Worthies form'd by any Muse but thine
Could purchase Robes to make themselves so fine:
What brave Commander is not proud to see
Thy brave Melantius in his Gallantry,
Our greatest Ladyes love to see their scorne
Out-done by Thine, in what themselves have worne:
Th'impatient Widow ere the yeare be done
Sees thy Aspasia weeping in her Gowne:
I never yet the Tragick straine assay'd
Deterr'd by that inimitable Maid:
And when I venture at the Comick stile
Thy Scornfull Lady seemes to mock my toile:
Thus has thy Muse, at once, improv'd and marr'd
Our sport in Playes, by rendring it too hard.
So when a sort of lusty Shepheards throw
The barre by turns, and none the rest outgoe
So farre, but that the best are measuring casts,
Their emulation and their pastime lasts;
But if some Brawny yeoman, of the guard
Step in and tosse the Axeltree a yard
Or more beyond the farthest Marke, the rest
Despairing stand, their sport is at the best.

To FLETCHER Reviv'd.

HOw have I been Religious? what ſtrange Good
Ha's ſcap'd me that I never underſtood?
Have I Hell-guarded Hæreſie o'rethrowne?
Heald wounded States? made Kings and Kingdomes owne?
That Fate ſhould be ſo merciſull to me,
To let me live t'have ſaid I have read thee.
Faire Star aſcend! the Ioy! the Life! the Light
Of this tempeſtuous Age, this darke worlds ſight!
Oh from thy Crowne of Glory dart one flame
May ſtrike a ſacred Reverence, whilſt thy Name
(Like holy Flamens to their God of Day)
We bowing, ſing; and whilſt we praiſe, we pray.
Bright Spirit! whoſe Æternall motion
Of Wit, like Time, ſtill in it ſelfe did runne;
Binding all others in it, and did giue
Commiſſion, how far this, or that ſhall liue:
Like Deſtinie of Poems, who, as ſhe
Signes death to all, her ſelfe can never dye.
And now thy purple-robed Tragoedie,
In her imbroider'd Buskins, calls mine eye,
Valentinian Where brave Aëtius we ſee betray'd,
T'obey his Death, whom thouſand lives obey'd;
Whilſt that the Mighty Foole his Scepter breakes,
And through his Gen'rals wounds his owne doome ſpeaks,
Weaving thus richly Valentinian
The coſtlieſt Monarch with the cheapeſt man.
Souldiers may here to their old glories adde,
The Mad Lover.] The Lover love, and be with reaſon mad:
Not as of old, Alcides furious,
Who wilder then his Bull did teare the houſe,
(Hurling his Language with the Canvas ſtone)
'Twas thought the Monſter roar'd the ſob'rer Tone.
But ah, when thou thy ſorrow didſt inſpire
Tragi-comedies. With Paſſions, blacke as is her darke attire,

Virgins

Virgins as Sufferers have wept to see
So white a Soule, so red a Cruelty;
That thou hast griev'd, and with unbought redresse,
Dri'd their wet eyes who now thy mercy blesse;
Yet loth to lose thy watry jewell, when
Joy wip't it off, Laughter straight sprung't again.
Now ruddy-cheeked Mirth with Rosie wings,
Fanns ev'ry brow with gladnesse, whilest she sings
Delight to all, and the whole Theatre
A Festivall in Heaven doth appeare:
Nothing but Pleasure, Love, and (like the Morne)
Each face a generall smiling doth adorne.
Heare ye fond Speakers, that pronounce the Aire
Of Stewes and Shores, I will informe you where
And how to cloathe aright your wanton wit,
Without her nasty Bawd attending it.
View here a loose thought said with such a grace,
Minerva might have spoke in Venus face;
So well disguis'd, that t'was conceiv'd by none
But Cupid had Diana's linnen on,
And all his naked parts so vail'd, th' expresse
The Shape with clowding the uncomlinesse;
That if this Reformation which we
Receiv'd, had not been buried with thee,
The Stage (as this work) might have liv'd and lov'd,
Her Lines, the austere Skarlet had approv'd,
And th' Actors wisely been from that offence
As cleare, as they are now from Audience.
Thus with thy Genius did the Scæne expire,
Wanting thy Active and inliv'ning fire,
That now (to spread a darknesse over all,)
Nothing remaines but Poesie to fall.
And though from these thy Embers we receive
Some warmth, so much as may be said, we live,
That we dare praise thee, blushlesse, in the head
Of the best piece Hermes to Love e're read,
That We rejoyce and glory in thy Wit,
And feast each other with remembring it,
That we dare speak thy thought, thy Acts recite:
Yet all men henceforth be afraid to write.

On Master FOHN FLETCHERS Dramaticall Poems.

GReat tutelary Spirit of the Stage!
FLETCHER! I can fix nothing but my rage
Before thy Workes, 'gainſt their officious crime
Who print thee now, in the worſt ſcæne of Time.
For me, uninterrupted hadſt thou ſlept
Among the holly ſhades and cloſe hadſt kept
The miſtery of thy lines, till men might bee
Taught how to reade, and then, how to reade thee.
But now thou art expos'd to th' common fate,
Revive then (mighty Soule!) and vindicate
From th' Ages rude affronts thy injured fame,
Inſtruct the Envious, with how chaſt a flame
Thou warmſt the Lover; how ſeverely juſt
Thou wert to puniſh, if he burnt to luſt.
With what a bluſh thou didſt the Maid adorne,
But tempted, with how innocent a ſcorne.
How Epidemick errors by thy Play
Were laught out of eſteeme, ſo purg'd away.
How to each ſence thou ſo didſt vertue fit,
That all grew vertuous to be thought t' have wit.
But this was much too narrow for thy art,
Thou diaſt frame governments, give Kings their part,
Teach them how neere to God, while juſt they be;
But how diſſolv'd, ſtretcht forth to Tyrannie.
How Kingdomes, in their channell, ſafely run,
But rudely overflowing are undone.
Though vulgar ſpirits Poets ſcorne or hate:
Man may beget, A Poet can create.

Vpon Master FLETCHERS Dramaticall Workes.

WHat? now the Stage is down, darst thou appeare
Bold FLETCER in this tottring Hemisphear?
Yes; Poets are like Palmes which the more weight
You cast upon them grow more strong & streight,
'Tis not love's Thunderbolt, nor Mars his Speare,
Or Neptune's angry Trident, Poets fear.
Had now grim BEN bin breathing, with what rage,
And high-swolne fury had Hee lash'd this age,
SHAKESPEARE with CHAPMAN had grown madd, and torn
Their gentle Sock, and lofty Buskins borne,
To make their Muse welter up to the chin
In blood; of faigned Scænes no need had bin,
England like Lucians Eagle with an Arrow
Of her owne Plumes piercing her heart quite thorow,
Had bin a Theater and subject fit
To exercise in real truth's their wit:
Yet none like high-wing'd FLETCHER had him found
This Eagles tragick-destiny to sound,
Rare FLETCHER's quill had soar'd up to the sky,
And drawn down Gods to see the tragedy:
Live famous Dramatist, let every spring
Make thy Bay flourish, and fresh Bourgeons bring:
And since we cannot have Thee trod o'th' stage,
Wee will applaud Thee in this silent Page.

On the Edition.

FLETCHER (whose Fame no Age can ever waste;
Envy of Ours, and glory of the last)
Is now alive againe; and with his flame
His sacred Ashes mak'd into a Plume;
Such as before did by a secret charme,
The wildest Beare subdue, the coldest warme,
And lend the Lady's eyes a power more bright,
Dispensing thus to either, Heat and Light.
He to a Sympathie those soules betrus'd
Whom Love or Beauty never could perswade;
And in each mov'd Spectatour could beget
A reall passion by a Counterfeit;
When first Bellario bled, what Lady there
Did not for every drop let fall a teare?
And when Aspasia wept, not any eye
But seem'd to weare the same sad livery;
By him insper'd the feign'd Lucina drew
More streams of melting sorrow then the true;
But then the Scornfull Lady did beguile
Their easie griefs, and teach them all to smile,
Thus he Affections could, or raise or lay;
Love, Griefe and Mirth thus did his Charmes obey:
He Nature taught her passions to out-doe,
How to refine the old, and create new;
Which such a happy likenesse seem'd to beare,
As if that Nature Art, Art Nature were.
Yet All had Nothing bin, obscurely kept
In the same Vrne wherein his Dust hath slept,
Nor had he ris' the Delphick wreath to claime,
Had not the dying sceane expir'd his Name;
Dispaire our joy hath doubled, he is come,
Thrice welcome by this Post-liminium.
His losse preserv'd him; They that silenc'd wit,
Are now the Authours to Eternize it;
Thus Poets are in spight of Fate reviv'd,
And Playes by Intermission longer liv'd.

On the Dramatick Poems of Mr JOHN FLETCHER.

Ovden's who's here? Fletcher, long buried
Revivd? 'Tis he! hee's risen from the Dead,
His winding sheet put off, walks above ground,
Shakes off his Fetters, and is better bound,
And may he not, if rightly understood,
Prove Playes are lawfull? he hath made them Good.
Is any Lover Mad? see here Loves Cure;
Vnmarried? to a Wife he may be sure
A rare one, For a Moneth; if she displease,
The Spanish Curate gives a Writ of ease.
Enquire The Custome of the Country, then
Shall the French Lawyer set you free againe.
If the two Faire Maids take it wondrous ill,
(One of the Inne, the other of the Mill,)
That th' Lovers Progresse stopt, and they defam'd;
Here's that makes Women Pleas'd, and Tamer tam'd.
But who then playes the Coxcombe, or will trie
His Wit at severall Weapons, or else die?
Nice Valour and he doubts not to engage
The Noble Gentl'man, in Loves Pilgrimage,
To take revenge on the False One, and run
The Honest mans Fortune, to be undone
Like Knight of Malta, or else Captaine be
Or th' Humerous Lieutenant: goe to Sea
(A Voyage for to starve) hee's very loath,
Till we are all at peace, to sweare an Oath,
That then the Loyall Subject may have leave
To lye from Beggers Bush, and undeceive
The Creditor, discharge his debts; Why so,
Since we can't pay to Fletcher what we owe.
Oh could his Propheteſſe but tell one Chance,
When that the Pilgrimes shall returne from France,
And once more make this Kingdome, as of late,
The Island Princesse, and we celebrate
A Double Marriage; every one to bring
To Fletchers memory his offering.
That thus at last unsequesters the Stage,
Brings backe the Silver, and the Golden Age.

To the Manes of the celebrated Poets and Fellow-writers, Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher, upon the Printing of their excellent Dramatick Poems.

DIsdaine not Gentle Shades, the lowly praiſe
Which here I tender your immortall Bayes.
Call it not folly, but my zeale, that I
Strive to eternize you that cannot dye.
And though no Language rightly can commend
What you have writ, ſave what your ſelves have penn'd
Yet let me wonder at thoſe curious ſtraines
(The rich Conceptions of your twin-like Braines)
Which drew the Gods attention; who admir'd
To ſee our Engliſh Stage by you inſpir'd.
Whoſe chiming Muſes never fail'd to ſing
A Soule-affecting Muſicke; raviſhing
Both Eare and Intellect, while you do each
Contend with other who ſhall higheſt reach
In rare Invention; Conflicts that beget
New ſtrange delight, ſo ſee two Fancies met,
That could receive no foile: two wits in growth
So juſt, as had one Soule informed both.
Thence (Learned Fletcher*) ſung the muſe alone,*
As both had done before, thy Beaumont gone.
In whom, as thou, had he outliv'd, ſo he (Snatch'd firſt away) ſurvived ſtill in thee.
What though diſtempers of the preſent Age
Have baniſh'd your ſmooth numbers from the Stage?
You ſhall be gainers by't; it ſhall conferr
To th' making the vaſt world your Theater.
The Preſſe ſhall give to every man his part,
And we will all be Actors; learne by heart
Thoſe Tragick Scenes and Comicke Straines you writ,
Vn-imitable both for Art and Wit;
And at each Exit, as your Fancies riſe,
Our hands ſhall clap deſerved Plaudities.

John Web.

To the desert of the Author in his most Ingenious Pieces.

THou art above their Censure, whose darke Spirits
Respects but shades of things, and seeming merits;
That have no soule, nor reason to their will,
But rime as ragged, as a Ganders Quill:
Where Pride blowes up the Error, and transfers
Their zeale in Tempests, that so wid'ly errs.
Like heat and Ayre compress, their blind desires
Mixe with their ends, as raging winds with fires.
Whose Ignorance and Passions, weare an eye
Squint to all parts of true Humanity.
All is Apocripha suits not their vaine:
For wit, oh fye! and Learning too; prophane!
But Fletcher hath done Miracles by wit,
And one Line of his may convert them yet.
Tempt them into the State of knowledge, and
Happinesse to read and understand.
The way is strow'd with Lawrell, and ev'ry Muse
Brings Incense to our Fletcher: whose Scenes infuse
Such noble kindlings from her pregnant fire,
As charmes her Criticke Poets in desire,
And who doth read him, that parts lesse indu'd,
Then with some heat of wit or Gratitude,
Some crowd to touch the Relique of his Bayes,
Some to cry up their owne wit in his praise,
And thinke they engage it by Comparatives,
When from himselfe, himselfe he best derives.
Let Shakespeare, Chapman, and applauded Ben,
Weare the Eternall merits of their Pen,
Here I am love-sicke: and were I to chuse,
A Mistris corrivall'd; 'tis Fletcher's Muse.

George Buck.

On Mr BEAVMONT.

(Written thirty yeares since, presently after his death.)

BEaumont lyes here; and where now shall we have
A Muse like his to sigh upon his grave?
Ah! none to weepe this with a worthy teare,
But he that cannot, Beaumont, that lies here.
Who now shall pay thy Tombe with such a Verse
As thou that Ladies didst, faire Rutlands Herse?
A Monument that will then lasting be,
When all her Marble is more dust than she.
In thee all's lost: a sudden dearth and want
Hath seiz'd on Wit, good Epitaphs are scant;
We dare not write thy Elegie, whilst each feares
He nere shall match that coppy of thy teares.
Scarce in an Age a Poet, and yet he
Scarce lives the third part of his age to see,
But quickly taken off and only known,
Is in a minute shut as soone as showne.
Why should weake Nature tire her selfe in vaine
In such a peice, to dash it straight againe?
Why should she take such worke beyond her skill,
Which when she cannot perfect, she must kill?
Alas, what is't to temper slime or mire?
But Nature's puzzled when she workes in fire:
Great Braines (like brightest glasse) crack straight, while those
Of Stone or Wood hold out, and feare not blowes.
And wee their Ancient hoary heads can see
Whose Wit was never their mortality:
Beaumont dies young, so Sidney did before,
There was not Poetry he could live to more,
He could not grow up higher, I scarce know
If th'art it selfe unto that pitch could grow,
Were't not in thee that hadst arriv'd the hight
Of all that wit could reach, or Nature might.
O when I read those excellent things of thine,
Such Strength, such sweetnesse couch't in every line,
Such life of Fancy, such high choise of braine,
Nought of the Vulgar wit or borrowed straine,
Such Passion, such expressions meet my eye,
Such Wit untainted with obscenity,
And these so unaffectedly exprest,
All in a language purely flowing drest,
And all so borne with in thy selfe, thine owne,
So new, so fresh, so nothing trod upon.
I grieve not now that old Menanders veine
Is ruin'd to survive in thee againe;

Such

Such in his time was he of the same peece,
The smooth, even naturall Wit, and Love of Greece.
Those few sententious fragments shew more worth,
Then all the Poets Athens ere brought forth;
And I am sorry we have lost those houres
On them, whose quickneſſe comes far short of ours,
And dwell not more on thee, whose every Page
May be a patterne for their Scene and Stage.
I will not geeld thy Workes so meane a Prayſe;
More pure, more chaſte, more sainted then are Playes,
Nor with that dull supineneſſe to be read,
To paſſe a fire, or laugh an houre in bed.
How doe the Muſes suffer every where,
Taken in such mouthes censure, in such eares,
That twixt a whiffe, a Line or two rehearſe,
And with their Rheume together ſpaule a Verſe?
This all a Poems leiſure after Play,
Drinke or Tabacco, it may keep the Day.
Whilſt even their very idleneſſe they thinke
Is loſt in theſe, that loſe their time in drinke.
Pity then dull we, we that better know,
Will a more serious houre on thee beſtow,
Why ſhould not Beaumont in the Morning pleaſe,
As well as Plautus, Ariſtophanes?
Who if my Pen may as my thoughts be free,
Were ſcurrill Wits and Buffons both to Thee;
Yet theſe our Learned of ſevereſt brow
Will deigne to looke on, and to note them too,
That will deſie our owne, tis Engliſh ſtuffe,
And th' Author is not rotten long enough.
Alas what ſtegme are they, compared to thee,
In thy Philaſter, and Maids-Tragedy?
Where's ſuch an humour as thy Beſſus drawne
Let them put all their Thraſoes in one Play,
He ſhall out-bid them; their conceit was poore,
All in a Circle of a Bawd or Whore;
A cozning dance, take the foole away,
And not a good jeſt extant in a Play.
Yet theſe are Wits, because they'r old, and now
Being Greeke and Latine, they are Learning too:
But thoſe their owne Times were content t' allow
A thirſty fame, and thine is loweſt now.
But thou ſhalt live, and when thy Name is growne
Six Ages older, ſhall be better knowne,
When th' art of Chaucers ſtanding in the Tombe,
Thou ſhalt not ſhare, but take up all his roome.

Joh. Earle.

UPON Mr FLETCHERS Incomparable Playes.

THe Poet lives; wonder not how or why
Fletcher revives, but that he er'e could dye:
Safe Mirth, full Language, flow in every Page,
At once he doth both heighten and aſswage;
All Innocence and Wit, pleaſant and cleare,
Nor Church nor Lawes were ever Libel'd here;
But faire deductions drawn from his great Braine,
Enough to conquer all that's Falſe or Vaine;
He ſcatters Wit, and Sence ſo freely flings
That very Citizens ſpeake handſome things,
Teaching their Wives ſuch unaffected grace,
Their Looks are now as handſome as their Face.
Nor is this violent, he ſteales upon
The yeilding Soule untill the Phrenſie's gone;
His very Launcings do the Patient pleaſe,
As when good Muſicke cures a Mad Diſeaſe.
Small Poets rifle Him, yet thinke it faire,
Becauſe they rob a man that well can ſpare;
They feed upon him, owe him every bit,
Th'are all but Sub-exciſemen of his Wit.

On the Workes of Beaumont and Fletcher, now at length printed.

GReat paire of Authors, whose one equall Starre
Begot so like in Genius, that you are
In Fame, as well as Writing, both so knit,
That no man knowes where to devide your wit;
Much lesse your praise; you, who had equall fire,
And did each other mutually inspire;
Whether one did contrive, the other write,
Or one fram'd the plot, the other did indite;
Whether one found the matter, th'other dresse,
Or the one disposed what th'other did expresse;
Where e're your parts betweene your selves lay, we,
In all things which you did but one thred see;
So evenly drawne out, so gently spunne,
That Art with Nature here did smoother runne.
Where shall I fixe my praise then? or what part
Of all your numerous Labours hath desert
More to be prais'd than other? shall I say,
I've met a lover so drawne in your Play,
So passionately written, so inflam'd,
So jealously inraged, then gently tam'd,
That I in reading have the Person seene,
And your Pen hath part Stage and Actor been?
Or shall I say, that I can scarce forbeare
To clap, when I a Captain do meet there,
So lively in his owne vaine humour dresse,
So braggingly, and like himself expresse,
That moderne Cowards, when they saw him plaid,
Saw, blusht, departed guilty, and betraid?
You wrote all parts right; whatsoe're the Stage
Had from you, was seene there as in the age,
And had their equall life: Vices which were
Manners abroad, did grow corrected there.
They who possest a Box, and halfe Crowne spent
To learne Obscenenes, returned innocent,
And thankt you for their coznage, whose chaste Scene
Taught Loves so noble, so reform'd, so cleane,
That they who brought fonde fires, and thither came
To bargaine, went thence with a holy flame.
Be't to your praise too, that your Stock and Veyne
Held both to Tragick and to Comick straine;
Where e're you lifted to be high and grave,
No Buskin shew'd more solemne, no quill gave
Such feeling objects to draw teares from eyes,
Spectators sate part in your Tragedies.
And where you lifted to be low, and free,
Mirth turn'd the whole house into Comedy;
So piercing (where you pleas'd) hitting a fault,
That humours from your pen issued all salt.
Nor were you thus in Workes and Poems knit,
As to be but two halfes, and make one wit;
But as some things we see, have double cause,
And yet the effect it selfe from both whole drawes;

So though you were thus twisted and combind
As two bodies, to have but one faire minde,
Yet if we praise you rightly, we must say
Both joyn'd, and both did wholly make the Play,
For that you could write singly, we may gueſſe
By the deuided peeces which the Preſſe
Hath ſeverally ſent forth, nor were gone ſo
(Like ſome our Moderne Authors) made to go
On meerely by the helpe of th'other, who
To purchaſe fame do come forth one of two;
Nor wrote you ſo, that ones part was to lick
The other into ſhape, nor did one ſtick
The others cold inventions with ſuch wit,
As ſerved like ſpice, to make them quick and fit;
Nor out of mutuall want, or emptineſſe,
Did you conſpire to go ſtill twins to th' Preſſe:
But what thus joyned you wrote, might have come forth
As good from each, and ſtored with the ſame worth
That thus united them, you did joyne ſenſe,
In you 'twas League, in others impotence;
And the Preſſe which both thus amongſt us ſends,
Sends us one Poet in a paire of friends.

Jaſper Maine.

Upon the report of the printing of the Dramaticall Poems of Maſter John Fletcher, collected before, and now ſet forth in one Volume.

THough when all Fletcher writ, and the entire
Man was indulged unto that ſacred fire,
His thoughts, and his thoughts dreſſe, appeared both ſuch,
That 'twas his happy fault to do too much;
Who therefore wiſely did ſubmit each birth
To knowing Beaumont e're it did come forth,
Working againe unt'ill he ſaid 'twas fit,
And made him the ſobriety of his wit;
Though thus be call'd his Judge into his fame,
And for that aid all ow'd him halfe the name,
'Tis knowne, that ſometimes he did ſtand alone,
That both the Spunge and Pencill were his owne;
That himſelfe judged himſelfe, could ſingly do,
And was at laſt Beaumont and Fletcher too;
Elſe we had loſt his Shepherdeſſe, a piece
Even and ſmooth, ſpun from a finer fleece,
Where ſoftneſſe raignes, where paſſions paſſions greet,
Gentle and high, as floods of Balſam meet.
Where dreſs'd in white expreſſions, ſit bright Loves,
Drawne, like their faireſt Queen, by milkie Doves;
A piece, which Johnſon in a rapture bid
Come up a glorifi'd Worke, and ſo it did.
Elſe had his Muſe ſet with his friend; the Stage
Had miſs'd thoſe Poems, which yet take the Age;
The world had loſt thoſe rich exemplars, where
Art, Language, Wit, ſit ruling in one Spheare,
Where the freſh matters ſoare above old Theames,
As Prophets Raptures do above our Dreames;
Where in a worthy ſcorne he dares refuſe
All other Gods, and makes the thing his Muſe;

Where

Where he calls passions up, and layes them so,
As spirits, aw'd by him to come and go;
Where the free Author did what e're he would,
And nothing will'd, but what a Poet should.
No vast uncivill bulke swells any Scene,
The strength's ingenious, and the vigour cleane;
None can prevent the Fancy, and see through
At the first opening; all stand wondring how
The thing will be untill it is; which thence
With fresh delight still cheats, still takes the sence:
The whole designe, the shadowes, the lights such
That none can say he shewes or hides too much:
Businesse growes up, ripened by just encrease;
And by as just degrees againe doth cease,
The heats and minutes of affaires are watcht,
And the nice points of time are met, and catcht;
Nought later then it should, nought comes before,
Chymists, and Calculators doe erre more:
Sex, age, degree, affections, country, place,
The inward substance, and the outward face,
All kept precisely, all exactly fit,
What he would write, he was before he writ.
'Twixt Johnsons grave, and Shakespeares lighter sound
His muse so steer'd that something still was found,
Nor this, nor that, nor both, but so his owne,
That 'twas his marke, and he was by it knowne.
Hence did he take true Judgements; hence did strike
All pallates some way, though not all alike;
The god of numbers might his numbers crowne,
And listning to them wish they were his owne.
Thus welcome forth, what ease, or wing, or wit
Durst yet produce, that is, what Fletcher writ.

Another.

FLetcher, though some call it thy fault, that wit
So overflow'd thy scenes, that ev'ry sit
To come upon the Stage, Beaumont was fain
To bid thee be more dull, that's write againe,
And bate some of thy fire, which from thee came
In a cleare, bright, full, but too large a flame;
And after all (finding thy Genius such)
That blunted, and allayed, 'twas yet too much;
Added his sober sponge, and did contract
Thy plenty to lesse wit to make't exact.
Yet we through his corrections could see
Much treasure in thy superfluity,
Which was so fil'd away, as when we doe
Cut Jewels, that that's lost is jewell too:
Or as men use to wash Gold, which we know
By losing makes the greatest shewes us richly grow.
They who doe on thy workes severely sit,
And call thy store the over-births of wit;
Say thy miscarriages were rare, and when
Thou wert superfluous, that thy fruitfull Pen
Had no fault but abundance, which did lay
Out in one Scene what might well serve a Play;
And hence doe grant, that were it they cut excesse
Was to be reckon'd as thy happinesse,
From whom wit issued in a full spring-tide;
Much did inrich the Stage, much slow'd beside,
For that thou couldst thine owne free fancy binde
In stricter numbers, and run so confin'd

As to observe the rules of Art, which sway
In the contrivance of a true borne Play?
These workes proclaime which thou didst write retrieved
From Beaumont, by none but thy selfe inspired;
Where we see 'twas not chance that made them fit,
Nor were thy Playes the Lotteries of wit,
But like to Durers Pencill, which first knew
The lawes of faces, and then faces drew:
Thou knewst the aire, the colour, and the place,
The simetry, which gives a Poem grace:
Parts are so fitted unto parts, as the
Shew thou hadst wit, and that mathematicks too:
Knewst where by line to spare, where to dispence,
And didst beget just Comedies from thence:
Things unto which thou didst such life bequeath,
That they (their owne Black-Friers) smelled breath.
Johnson hath writ things lasting, and divine,
Yet his Love-Scenes, Fletcher, compar'd to thine,
Are cold and frosty, and expresse love so,
As heat with Ice, or warme fires mixt with Snow;
Thou, as if struck with the same generous darts,
Which burne, and reigne in noble lovers hearts,
Hast cloath'd affections in such native fires,
And so describ'd them in their owne true fires;
Such moving sighes, such undissembled teares,
Such charmes of Language, such hopes mixt with feares,
Such grants after denialls, such pursuits
After despaire, such amorous recruits,
That some who sate spectators, have confest
Themselves transform'd to what they saw expresst,
And felt such shafts strike through their calm'd brests,
As made them rise Poets, and quit Lovers thence.
Nor was thy stile wholly compos'd of Graves,
Or the soft straines of Shepheards and their Loves;
When thou wouldst Comick be, such quibling wits
In that kinde, came like the world all mirth,
All point, all edge, all sharpnesse; we did sit
Sometimes five Acts out in pure sprightfull wit,
Which flowed in such true sale, that we did doubt
In which Scene we laught most two shillings out.
Shakespeare to thee was dull, whose best jest lyes
I'th Ladies questions, and the Fooles replyes;
Old fashion'd wit, which walkt from town to town
In turn'd Hose, which our fathers call'd the Clown;
Whose wit our nice times would obscenesse call,
And which made Bawdry passe for Comicall:
Nature was all his Art, thy veine was free
As his, but without his scurility;
From whom mirth came unsought, no jest perplext,
But without labour cleane, chast, and unvext.
Thou wert not like some, our small Poets who Could not be Poets, were not we Poets too;
Whose wit is pilfring, and whose veine and wealth
In Poetry lyes meerely in their stealth;
Nor didst thou feele their drought, their pangs, their qualmes,
Their rack in writing, who do write for almes,
Whose wretched Genius, and dependent fires,
But to their Benefactors dole aspires.
Nor hadst thou the sly trick, thy selfe to praise
Under thy friends names, or to purchase bayes
Didst write stale commendations to thy owne,
Which we for Beaumonts or Ben. Johnsons took:
That debt thou left'st to us, which none but he
Can truly pay, Fletcher, who writes like thee.

William Cartwright.

On Mr Francis Beaumont
(then newly dead.)

He that hath such acuteneſſe, and such witt,
As would aske ten good heads to bath and it;
He that can write ſo well that no man dare
Refuſe it for the beſt, let him beware:
Beaumont is dead, by whoſe ſole death appeares,
Witt's a Diſeaſe conſumes men in few yeares.

Rich. Corbet. D. D.

To Mr Francis Beaumont
(then living.)

How I doe love thee Beaumont, and thy Muſe,
That unto me do'ſt ſuch religion uſe!
How I doe feare my ſelfe, that am not worth
The leaſt indulgent thought thy pen drops forth!
At once thou mak'ſt me happie, and unmak'ſt;
And giving largely to me, more thou tak'ſt.
What fate is mine, that ſo it ſelfe bereaves?
What art is thine, that ſo thy friend deceives?
When even there where moſt thou praiſeſt me,
For writing better, I muſt envy thee.

Ben: Johnson.

Upon Maſter Fletchers Incomparable Playes.

Apollo ſings, his harpe reſounds; give roome,
For now behold the golden Pompe is come,
Thy Pompe of Playes which thouſands come to ſee,
With admiration both of them and thee,
O Volume worthy leaſe, by leaſe and cover
To be with juice of Cedar waſht all over;
Here's words with lines, and lines with ſenſes conſent,
To raiſe an Act to full aſtoniſhment,
Here melting numbers, words of power to move
Young men to ſwoone, and Maides to dye for love.
Love lyes a bleeding here, Evadne there
Swells with brave rage, yet comely every where,
Here's a mad lover, there that high deſigne
Of King and no King (and the rare Plott thine)
So that when 'ere wee circumvolve our Eyes,
Such rich, ſuch freſh, ſuch ſweet varieties,
Raviſh our ſpirits, that entirely wee
None writes lov's paſſion in the world, like Thee.

Rob. Herrick.

On the happy Collection of Master FLETCHER'S Works, never before PRINTED.

FLETCHER arise, Usurpers share thy Bayes,
They Canton thy vast Wit to build small Playes:
He comes! his Volume breaks through clowds and dust,
Downe, little Witts, Ye must refund, Ye must.
Nor comes he private, here's great BEAUMONT too,
How could one single World encompasse Two?
For these Co-heirs had equall power to teach
All that all Witts both can and cannot reach.
Shakespear was early up, and went so drest
As for those dawning houres he knew was best;
But when the Sun shone forth, You Two thought fit
To weare just Robes, and leave off Trunk-hose-Wit.
Now, now 'twas Perfect; None must looke for New,
Manners and Scenes may alter, but not You;
For Yours are not meere Humours, gilded straines;
The Fashion lost, Your massy Sense remaines.
Some thinke Your Witts of two Complexions fram'd,
That One the Sock, th'Other the Buskin claim'd;
That should the Stage embattaile all it's Force,
FLETCHER would lead the Foot, BEAUMONT the Horse.
But, you were Both for Both; not Semi-witts,
Each Piece is wholly Two, yet never splits:
Y'are not Two Faculties (and one Soule still)
He th' Understanding, Thou the quick free Will;
But, as two Voyces in one Song embrace,
(FLETCHER'S keen Trebble, and deep BEAUMONTS Base)
Two, full, congeniall soules; still Both prevail'd;
His Muse and Thine were Quarter'd, not Impal'd:
Both brought Your Ingots, Both toil'd at the Mint,
Beat, melted, sifted, till no drosse stuck in't,
Then in each Others scales weigh'd every graine,
Then smooth'd and burnish'd, then weigh'd all againe,
Stampt Both your Names upon't at one bold Hit,
Then, then 'twas Coyne, as well as Bullion-Wit.

Thus Twinns: But as when Fate one Eye deprives,
That other strives to double which survives:
So-BEAUMONT dy'd: yet left in Legacy
His Rules and Standard-wit (FLETCHER) to Thee.
Still the same Planet, though not fill'd so soon,
A Two-horn'd Crescent then, now one Full-moon.

Joyne

Joynt Love before, now Honour doth provoke;
*So th' old Twin-*Giants forcing a huge Oake
One slipp'd his footing, th' Other sees him fall,
Grasp'd the whole Tree: and single held up all.
Imperiall FLETCHER! here begins thy Raigne,
Scenes flow like Sun-beams from thy glorious Brain;
Thy swift dispatching Soule no more doth stay
Then He that built two Cities in one day;
Ever brim full, and sometimes running o're
To feede poore languid Witts that waite at doore,
Who creep and creep, yet ne're above-ground stood,
(For Creatures have most Feet which have least Blood)
But thou art still that Bird of Paradise
Which hath no feet and ever nobly flies:
Rich, lusty Sence, such as the Poet ought,
For Poems if not Excellent, are Naught;
Low wit in Scenes? in state a Peasant goes;
If meane and flat, let it foot Yeoman Prose,
That such may spell as are not Readers grown,
To whom He that writes Wit, shews he hath none.
Brave Shakespeare flow'd, yet had his Ebbings too,
Often above Himselfe, sometimes below;
Thou Alwayes Best; if ought seem'd to decline,
'Twas the unjudging Rout's mistake, not Thine:
Thus thy faire SHEPHEARDESSE, which the bold Heape,
(False to Themselves and Thee) did prize so cheap,
Was found (when understood) fit to be Crown'd,
At worst 'twas worth two hundred thousand pound.
Some blast thy Works lest we should track their Walke
Where they steale all those few good things they talke;
Wit-Burglary must chide those it feeds on,
For Plunder'd folkes ought to be rail'd upon;
But (as stoln goods goe off at halfe their worth)
Thy strong Sence pall's when they purloine it forth!
When did'st Thou borrow? where's the Man e're read
Ought begg'd by Thee from those Alive or Dead?
Or from dry Goddesses, as some who when
They stuffe their page with Godds, write worse then Men.
Thou was't thine owne Muse, and hadst such vast odds
Thou out-writ'st him whose verse made all those Godds:
Surpassing those our Dwarfish Age up reares,
As much as Greeks or Latines thee in yeares:
Thy Ocean Fancy knew nor Bankes nor Damms,
*We ebbe downe dry to pebble-*Anagrams;
Dead and insipid, all despairing sit
Lost to behold this great Relapse of Wit:
What strength remaines, is like that (wilde and fierce)
Till Iohnson made good Poets and right Verse.

Such

Such boyst'rous Trifles Thy Muse would not brooke,
Save when she'd show how scurvily they looke;
No savage Metaphors (things rudely Great)
Thou dost display, not butcher a Conceit;
Thy Nerves have Beauty, which Invades and Charms;
Lookes like a Princesse harnest'd in bright Armes.
Nor art Thou Loud and Cloudy; those that do
Thunder so much, do't without Lightning too;
Tearing themselves, and almost split their braine
To render harsh what thou speak'st free and cleane;
Such gloomy Sense may passe for High and Proud,
But true-born Wit still flies above the Cloud;
Thou knewst 'twas Impotence what they call Height;
Who blusters strong i'th Darke, but creeps i'th Light.
And as thy thoughts were cleare, so, Innocent,
Thy Phancy gave no unswept Language vent,
Slaunderst not Lawes, prophanst no holy Page,
(As if thy Fathers Crosier aw'd the Stage;)
High Crimes were still arraign'd, though they made shift
To prosper out foure Acts, were plagu'd i'th Fift;
All's safe, and wise; no stiffe-affected Scene,
Nor swoln, nor flat, a True Full Naturall prime;
Thy Sence (like well-drest Ladies) cloath'd as skinn'd,
Not all unlac'd, nor City-startcht and pinn'd:
Thou hadst no Sloath, no Rage, no sullen Fit,
But Strengh and Mirth, FLETCHER'S a Sanguin Wit.

Thus, two great Consul-Poets all things swayd,
Till all was English Borne or English Made:
Miter and Coyfe here into One Piece spun,
BEAVMONT a Judge's, This a Prelat's sonne.
What strange Production is at last displaid,
(Got by Two Fathers, without Female aide)
Behold, two Masculines espous'd each other,
Wit and the World were born without a Mother.

I. BERKENHEAD.

To the memorie of Master FLETCHER.

THere's nothing gain'd by being witty: Fame
Gathers but winde to blather up a name.
Orpheus must leave his lyre, or if it be
In heav'n, 'tis there a ſigne, no harmony;
And ſtones, that follow'd him, may now become
Now ſtones againe, and ſerve him for his Tomb.
The Theban Linus, that was ably ſkil'd
In Muſe and Muſicke, was by Phœbus kill'd,
Though Phœbus did beget him: ſure his Art
Had merited his balſame, not his dart.
But here Apollo's jealouſie is ſeene,
The god of Phyſicks troubled with the ſpleene;
Like timerous Kings he puts a period
To high grown parts leſt he ſhouldbe no God.
Hence thoſe great Maſter-wits of Greece that gave
Life to the world, could not avoid a grave.
Hence the inſpired Prophets of old Rome
Too great for earth fled to Elizium.
But the ſame Oſtraciſme benighted one,
To whom all theſe were but illuſions,
It tooke our FLETCHER hence, Fletcher, whoſe wit
Was not an accident to th' ſoule, but It;
Onely diffus'd. (Thus wee the ſame Sun call,
Moving it'h Sphære, and ſhining on a wall.)
Wit, ſo high plac'd at firſt, it could not climbe,
Wit, that ne're grew, but only ſhow'd by time.
No fier-worke of ſacke, no ſeldome ſhew'n
Poeticke rage, but ſtill in motion:
And with far more then Sphæricke excellence
It mov'd, for 'twas its owne Intelligence.
And yet ſo obvious to ſenſe, ſo plaine,
You'd ſcarcely thinke't ally'd unto the braine:
So ſweete, it gain'd more ground upon the Stage
Then Johnſon with his ſelfe-admiring rage
Ere loſt: and then ſo naturally it fell,
That fooles would think, that they could doe as well.
This is our loſſe: yet ſpight of Phœbus, we
Will keepe our FLETCHER, for his wit is He.

EDW. POWELL.

Vpon the ever to be admired Mr. JOHN FLETCHER and His PLAYES.

WHat's all this preparation for? or why
Such ſuddain Triumphs? FLETCHER the people cry!
Juſt ſo, when Kings approach, our Conduits run
Claret, as here the ſpouts flow Helicon;
See, every ſprightfull Muſe dreſs'd trim and gay
Strews bearbs and ſcatters roſes in his way.
Thus th'outward yard ſet round with bayes w'have ſeene,
Which from the garden hath tranſplanted been:
Thus, at the Prætor's feaſt, with needleſſe coſts
Some muſt b'employd in painting of the poſts:
And ſome as diſhes made for ſight, not taſte,
Stand here as things for ſhew to FLETCHERS feaſt.
Oh what an honour! what a Grace 'thad beene
T'have had his Cooke in Rollo ſerv'd them in!
FLETCHER the King of Poets! ſuch was he,
That earn'd all tribute, claim'd all ſoveraignty;
And may he that denye's it, learn to bluſh
At's loyall Subject, ſtarve at's Beggars buſh;
And if not drawn by example, ſhame, not Grace,
Turne ore to's Coxcomb, and the Wild-goose Chaſe.
Monarch of Wit! great Magazine of wealth!
From whoſe rich Banke, by a Promethean ſtealth,
Our leſſer flames doe blaze! His the true fire,
When they like Glo-worms, being touch'd, expire.
'Twas firſt beleev'd, becauſe he alwayes was;
The Ipſe dixit, and Pythagoras
To our Diſciple-wits; His ſoule might run
(By the ſame-dream't-of Tranſmigration)
Into their rude and indigeſted braine,
And ſo informe their Chaos-lumpe againe;
For many ſpecious brats of this laſt age
Spoke FLETCHER perfectly in every Page.
This rowz'd his Rage to be abuſed thus:
Mades Lover mad, Lieutenant humerous.
Thus Ends of Gold and Silver-men are made
(As th'uſe to ſay) Goldſmiths of his owne trade;
Thus Rag-men from the dung-hill often boy,
And publiſh forth by chance a Brokers ſhop:
But by his owne light, now, we have deſcri'd
The droſſe, from that hath beene ſo purely tri'd.
Proteus of witt! who reads him doth not ſee
The manners of each ſex of each degree?
His full ſtor'd fancy doth all humours fill
*From th'*Queen of Corinth to the maid o'th mill;
His Curate, Lawyer, Captain, Propheteſſe
Shew he was all and every one of theſe;
Hee taught (ſo ſubtly were their fancies ſeiz'd)
To Rule a Wife, and yet the Women pleas'd.
Parnaſſus is thine owne, Claime't as merit;
Law makes the Elder Brother to inherit.

IN HONOUR OF Mr John Fletcher.

SO FLETCHER now presents to fame
His alone selfe and unpropt name,
As Rivers Rivers entertaine,
But still fall single into th'maine,
So doth the Moone in Consort shine
Yet flowes alone into its mine,
And though her light be joyntly throwne,
When she makes silver tis her owne:
Perhaps his quill flew stronger, when
Twas weaved with his Beaumont's pen;
And might with deeper wonder hit,
It could not shew more his, more wit;
So Hercules came by sexe and Love,
When Pallas sprang from single Jove;
He tooke his BEAUMONT for Embrace,
Not to grow by him, and increase,
Nor for support did with him twine,
He was his friends friend, not his vine.
His witt with witt he did not twist
To be Assisted, but t' Assist.
And who could succour him, whose quill
Did both Run sense and sense Distill?
Had Time and Art in't, and the while
Slid even as theirs wh are only style,
Whether his chance did cast it so
Or that it did like Rivers flow
Because it must, or whether twere
A smoothnesse from his file and eare,
Not the most strict enquiring nayle
Cou'd e're finde where his piece did faile
Of entyre oneneſſe: so the frame,
Was Composition, yet the same.
How does he breede his Brothers and
Make wealth and estate understand
Sutes Land to wit, makes Lucke match merit?
And makes an Eldest fitly inherit?
How was he Ben, when Ben did write
Toth stage, not to his judge endite?
How did he doe what Johnson did,
And Earne what Johnson wou'd have s'ed?

Maſter John Fletcher his dramaticall Workes now at laſt printed.

I Could prayſe Heywood now : or tell how long,
Falſtaffe from cracking Nuts hath kept the throng :
But for a Fletcher, I muſt take an Age,
And ſcarce invent the Title for one Page.
Gods muſt create new Spheares, that ſhould expreſſe
The ſev'rall Accents, Fletcher, of thy Dreſſe :
The Penne of Fates ſhould only write thy Praiſe :
And all Elizium for thee turne to Bayes.
Thou feltſt no pangs of Poetry, ſuch as they,
Who the Heav'ns quarter ſtill before a Play,
And ſearch the Ephemerides to finde,
When the Aſpect for Poets will be kinde.
Thy Poems (ſacred Spring) did from thee flow,
With as much pleaſure, as we reade them now.
Nor needs we only take them up by fits,
When love or Phyſicke hath diſeas'd our Wits ;
Or conſtr'e Engliſh to untye a knot,
Hid in a line, farre ſubtler then the Plot.
With Thee the Page may cloſe his Ladies eyes,
And yet with thee the ſerious Student Riſe :
The Eye at ſev'rall angles darting rayes,
Makes, and then ſees, new Colours ; ſo thy Playes
To ev'ry underſtanding ſtill appeare,
As if thou only meant'ſt to take that Eare ;
The Phraſe ſo terſe and free of a juſt Poiſe,
Where ev'ry word ha's weight and yet no Noiſe,
The matter too ſo nobly fit, no leſſe
Then ſuch as onely could deſerve thy Dreſſe :
Witneſſe thy Comedies, Pieces of ſuch worth,
All Ages ſhall ſtill like, but ne're bring forth.
Other in ſeaſon laſt ſcarce ſo long time,
As coſt the Poet but to make the Rime :
Where, if a Lord a new way do's but ſpit,
Or change his ſhrugge this antiquates the Wit.
That thou didſt live before, nothing would tell
Poſterity, could they but write ſo well.
Thy Catholick Fancy will acceptance finde,
Not whilſt an humour's living, but Man-kinde.
Thou, like thy Writings, Innocent and Cleane,
Ne're practis'd a new Vice, to make one Sceane,
None of thy Inke had gall, and Ladies can,
Securely beare thee ſport without a Fanne.

But when Thy Tragicke Muſe would pleaſe to riſe
In Majeſtie, and call Tribute from our Eyes ;
Like Scenes, we ſhifted Paſſions, and that ſo,
Who only came to ſee, turn'd Actors too.
How didſt thou ſway the Theatre ! make us feele
The Players wounds were true, and their ſwords, ſteele !
Nay, ſtranger yet, how often did I know
When the Spectators ran to ſave the blow ?
Frozen with griefe we could not ſtir away
Vntill the Epilogue told us 'twas a Play.
What ſhall I doe ? all Commendations end,
In ſaying only thou wert BEAUMONT's Friend.
Give me thy ſpirit quickely, for I ſwell,
And like a raveing Prophetеſſe cannot tell
How to receive thy Genius in my breaſt :
Oh ! I muſt ſleepe, and then I'le ſing the reſt.

My skipping ſoule ſurfets with ſo much good,
To ſee my hopes into fruition budd.
A happy Chimiſtry! bleſt viper, joy!
That through thy mothers bowels gnawſt thy way!
Witts flock in ſholes, and clubb to re-erect
In ſpight of Ignorance the Architect
Of Occidentall Poeſye; and turne
Godds, to recall witts aſhes from their urne.
Like huge Colloſſes they've together mett
Their ſhoulders, to ſupport a world of Witt.
The tale of Atlas (though of truth it miſſe)
We plainely read Mythologiz'd in this;
Orpheus and Amphion whoſe undying ſtories
Made Athens famous, are but Allegories.
Tis Poetry has pow'r to civilize
Men, worſe then ſtones, more blockiſh then the Trees
I cannot chuſe but thinke (now things ſo fall)
That witt is paſt its Climacterica11;
And though the Muſes have beene dead and gone
I know they'll finde a Reſurrection.
Tis vaine to prayſe; they're to themſelves a glory,
And ſilence is our ſweeteſt Oratory.
For he that names but FLETCHER muſt needs be
Found guilty of a loud hyperbole.
His fancy ſo tranſcendently aſpires,
He ſhowes himſelfe a witt, who but admires.
Here are no volumes ſtuft with cheverle ſence,
The very Anagrams of Eloquence,
Nor long-long-winded ſentences that be,
Being rightly ſpelld, but Witts Stenographie.
Nor words, as voyd of Reaſon, as of Rithme,
Only cæſura'd to ſpin out the time.
But heer's a Magazine of pureſt ſence
Cloath'd in the neweſt Garbe of Eloquence.
Scænes that are quick and ſprightly, in whoſe veines
Bubbles the quinteſſence of ſweet-high ſtraines.
Lines like their Authours, and each word of it
Does ſay twas writ b' a Gemini of Witt.
How happie is our age! how bleſt our men!
When ſuch rare ſoules live themſelves o're agen.
We erre, that thinke a Poet dyes; for this,
Shewes that tis but a Metempſychoſis.
BEAUMONT and FLETCHER here at laſt we ſee
Above the reach of dull mortalities,
Or pow'r of fate: & thus the proverbe hitts
(That's ſo much croſt) Theſe men live by their witts.

ALEX. BROME.

On the Death and workes of Mr John Fletcher.

MY name, so far from great, that tis not knowne,
Can lend no praise but what thou'dst blush to owne;
And no rude hand, or feeble wit should dare
To vex thy Shrine with an unlearned teare.
I'de have a State of Wit convok'd, which hath
A power to take up on common Faith;
That when the stocke of the whole Kingdome's spent
In but preparatiue to thy Monument,
The prudent Conncell may inuent fresh wayes
To get new contribution to thy prayse,
And reare it high, and equall to thy Wit
Which must give life and Monument to it.
So when late ESSEX dy'd, the Publicke face
Wore sorrow in't, and to add mournefull Grace
To the sad pomp of his lamented fall,
The Common wealth serv'd at his Funerall
And by a Solemne Order built his Hearse.
But not like thine, built by thy selfe, in Verse,
Where thy advanced Image safely stands
Above the reach of Sacrilegious hands.
Base hands how impotently you disclose
Your rage 'gainst Camdens learned ashes, whose
Defaced Statua and Martyrd booke,
Like an Antiquitie and Fragment looke.
Nonnulla desunt's legibly appeare,
So truly now Camdens Remaines lye there.
Vaine Malice! how he mocks thy rage, while breath
Of fame shall speake his great Elizabeth!
'Gainst time and thee he well provided hath,
Brittannia is the Tombe and Epitaph.
Thus Princes honours; but Witt only gives
A name which to succeeding ages lives.
Singly we now consult our selues and fame,
Ambitious to twist ours with thy great name.
Hence we thus bold to praise. For as a Vine
With subtle wreath, and close embraces doth twine
A friendly Elme, by whose tall trunke it shoots
And gathers growth and moysture from its roots;
About its armes the thankfull clusters cling
Like Bracelets, and with purple enamelling
The blew-cheek'd grape stuck in its verinent hairy
Hangs like rich jewells in a beauteous eare.

So grow our Prayses by thy Witt; we doe
Borrow support and strength and lend but show.
And but thy Male wit like the youthfull Sun
Strongly begets upon our passion.
Making our sorrow teeme with Elegie,
Thou yet unwep'd, and yet unprais'd might'st be.
But th' are imperfect births; and such are all
Produc'd by causes not univocall,
The shapes of Nature, Passives being unfit,
And hence our verse speakes only Mother wit.
Oh for a fit o'th Father! for a Spirit
That might but parcell of thy worth inherit;
For but a sparke of that diviner fire
Which thy full breast did animate and inspire;
That Soules could bee dividad, thou traduce
But a small particle of thine to us!
Of thine; which we admir'd when thou didst sit
But as a joynt-Commissioner in Witt;
When it had plummets hung on to suppresse
It's too luxuriant growing mightinesse.
Till as that tree which scornes to bee kept downe,
Thou grewst to govern the whole Stage alone.
In which orbe thy throng'd light did make the starr,
Thou wert th' Intelligence did move that sphære.
Thy Fury was compos'd; Rapture no fit
That hung on thee; nor thou for gone in witt
As men in a disease; thy Phansie cleare,
Muse chast, as those frames whence they tooke their fire;
No spurious composures amongst thine
Got in adultery 'twixt Witt and Wine.
And as th' Hermeticall Physitians draw
From things that curse of the first-broken Law,
That Ens Venenum, which extracted thence
Leaves nought but primitive Good and Innocence:
So was thy Spirit calcin'd; no Mixtures there
But perfect, such as next to Simples are.
Not like those Metear-wits which mildly flye
In storme and thunder through th' amazed skie;
Speaking but th' Ills and Villanies in a State,
Which fooles admire, and wise men tremble at,
Full of portent and prodigie, whose Gall
Oft scapes the Vice, and on the man doth fall.
Nature us'd all her skill, when thee she meant
A Wit at once both Great and Innocent.
Yet thou hadst Tooth; but 'twas thy judgement, not
For mending one word, a whole sheet to blot.
Thou couldst anatomize with ready art
And skilfull hand crimes lockt close up i'th heart.
Thou couldst unfold darke Plots, and shew that path
By which Ambition climb'd to Greatnesse hath.
Thou couldst the rises, turnes, and falls of States,
How neare they were their Periods and Dates;
Couldst mad the Subject into popular rage,
And the grown seas of that great storme asswage,
Dethrone usurping Tyrants, and place there
The lawfull Prince and true Inheriter;
Knewst all darke turnings in the Labyrinth
Of policie, which who but knowes he sinn'th,

Save

Save thee, who un-infected didst walke in't
As the great Genius of Government.
And when thou laidst thy tragicke buskin by
To Court the Stage with gentle Comedie,
How new, how proper th' humours, how expres'd
In rich variety, how neatly dres'd
In language, how rare Plots, what strength of Wit
Shin'd in the face and every limb of it!
The Stage grew narrow while thou grewst to be
In thy whole life an Exc'llent Comedie.
To these a Virgin-modesty which first met
Applause with blush and feare, as if he yet
Had not deserv'd; till bold with constant praise
His browes admitted the unsought for Bayes.
Nor would he ravish fame; but left men free
To their owne Vote and Ingenuity.
When His faire Shepherdesse on the guilty Stage,
Was martir'd betweene Ignorance and Rage;
At which the impatient Vertues of these few
Could judge, grew high, cri'd Murther: though he knew
The innocence and beauty of his Childe,
Hee only, as if unconcerned, smil'd.
Princes have gather'd since each scattered grace,
Each line and beauty of that injur'd face;
And on th'united parts breath'd such a fire
As spight of Malice she shall ne're expire.
Attending, not affecting, thus the crowne
Till every hand did help to set it on,
Hee came to be sole Monarch, and did raign
In Wits great Empire, abs'lute Soveraign.

JOHN HARRIS.

On Mr. JOHN FLETCER's ever to be admired Dramaticall Works.

I'Ve thought upon't; and thus I may gaine bayes,
I will commend thee Fletcher, and thy Playes.
But none but Witts can do't, how then can I
Come in amongst them, that cou'd ne're come nigh?
There is no other way, Ple throng to sit
And passe it'h Croud amongst them for a Wit.
Apollo knows me not, nor I the Nine,
All my pretence to verse is Love and Wine.
By your leave Gentlemen. You Wits o'th' age,
You that both furnisht have, and judg'd the Stage.
You, who the Poet and the Actors fright,
Least that your Censure thin the second night:
Pray tell me, gallant Wits, could Criticks think
There ere was solœcisme in FLETCHERS Inke?
Or Lapse of Plot, or fancy in his pen?
A happinesse not still alow'd to Ben!
After of Time and Wit h'ad been at cost
He of his owne New-Inne was but an Hoste.
Inspir'd, FLETCHER! here's no vaine-glorious words:
How ev'n thy lines, how smooth thy sense accords.
Thy Language so insinuates, each one
Of thy spectators has thy passion.
Men seeing, valiant; Ladies amorous prove;
Thus owe to thee their valour and their Love:
Scenes! chaste yet satisfying! Ladies can't say
Though Stephen miscarri'd that so did the play:
Judgement could ne're to this opinion leane
That Lowen, Tailor, ere could grace thy Scene:
'Tis richly good unacted, and to me
Thy very Farse appears a Comedy.
Thy drollery is designe, each looser part
Stuffs not thy Playes, but makes 'em up an Art
The Stage has seldome seen; how often vice
Is smartly scourg'd to checke us? to intice,
How well encourag'd vertue is? how guarded,
And, that which makes us love her, how rewarded?
Some, I dare say, that did with loose thoughts sit,
Reclaim'd by thee, came converts from the pit.
And many a she that to be tane up came,

HENRY HARINGTON.

To the memory of the deceased but ever-living Author in these his Poems, Mr. JOHN FLETCHER.

ON the large traine of Fletchers friends let me
(Retaining still my wonted modesty,)
Become a Waiter in my ragged verse,
As Follower to the Muses Servant.
Many here are of Noble ranke and worth,
That have, by strength of Art, set Fletcher forth
In true and lively colours, as they saw him,
And had the best abilities to draw him;
Many more are abroad, that write, and looke
To have their lines set before Fletchers Booke;
Some, that have known him too; some more, some lesse;
Some onely but by Heare-say, some by Guesse,
And some, for fashion-sake, would take the hint
To try how well their Wits would shew in Print.
You, that are here before me Gentlemen,
And Princes of Parnassus by the Penne
And your just Judgements of his worth, that have
Preserv'd this Authours memory from the Grave,
And made it glorious; let me, at your gate,
Porter it here, 'gainst those that come too late,
And are unfit to enter. Something I
Will deserve here: For where you versifie
In flowing numbers, lawfull Weight, and Time,
I'll write, though not rich Verses, honest Rime.
I am admitted. Now, have at the Rowt
Of those that would crowd in, but must keepe out.
Beare back, my Masters; Pray keepe backe; Forbeare:
You cannot, at this time, have entrance here.
You, that are worthy, may, by intercession,
Finde entertainment at the next Impression.
But let none then attempt it, that not know
The reverence due, which to this shrine they owe:
All such must be excluded; and the sort,
That onely upon trust, or by report
Have taken Fletcher up, and thinke it trim
To have their Verses planted before Him:
Let them read first his Works, and learne to know him,
And offer, then, the Sacrifice they owe him.
But farre from hence be such, as would proclaim
Their knowledge of this Authour, not his Fame;
And such, as would pretend, of all the rest,
To be the best Wits that have known him best.
Depart hence all such Writers, and, before
Inferiour ones, thrust in, by many a score,
As formerly, before Tom Coryate,
Whose Worke before his Praysers had the Fate
To perish: For the nasty Coppies tooke
Of his Encomiums made themselves a Booke.
Here's no such subject for you to out-doe,
Out-shine, out-live (though well you may doe too
In other Spheres:) For Fletchers flourishing Bayes
Must never fade while Phœbus weares his Rayes.
Therefore forbeare to presse upon him thus.
Why, what are you (cry some) that prate to us?
Doe not we know you for a flashy Meteor?
And stil'd (at best) the Muses Serving-creature?
Doe you comptroll? T'have had your Jere: Sirs, no;
But, in an humble manner, let you know
Old Serving-creatures oftentimes are fit
T'informe young Masters, as in Land, in Wit,
What they inherit; and how well their Dads
Left one, and wish'd the other to their Lads.
And from departed Poets I can gueesse
Who hat a greater share of Wit, who lesse.
'Way Foole, another says. I, let him raile,
And 'bout his own eares flourish his Wit-flayle,
Till with his Swingle he his Noddle breake;
While this of Fletcher and his Works I speake:
His Works (says Momus) nay, his Plays you'd say:
Thou hast said right, for that to him was Play
Which was to others braines a toyle: with ease
He playd on Waves which were Their troubled Seas.
His nimble Births have longer liv'd then theirs
That have, with strongest Labour, divers yeeres
Been sending forth the issues of their Braines
Upon the Stage; and shall to th' Stationers gaines
Life after life take, till some After-age
Shall put down Printing, as this doth the Stage;
Which nothing now presents unto the Eye,
But in Dumb-shews her own sad Tragedy.
Would there had been no sadder Works abroad,
Since her decay, acted in Fields of Blood.
But to the Man againe, of whom we write,
The Writer that made Writing his Delight,
Rather then Worke. He did not pumpe, nor drudge,
To beget Wit, or manage it; nor trudge
To Wit-conventions with Note-booke, to gleane
Or steale some Jests to foist into a Scene:
He scorn'd those shifts. You, that have known him, know
The common talke that from his Lips did flow;
And such as waste, did savour more of Wit,
Then any of his time, or since have writ,
(But few excepted) in the Stager way:
His Scenes were Acts, and every Act a Play.
I knew him in his strength; even then, when He
That was the Master of his Art and Me
Most knowing Johnson (proud to call him Sonne)
In friendly Envy swore, He had out-done
His very Selfe. I knew him till he dyed;
And, at his dissolution, what a Tide
Of sorrow overwhelm'd the Stage; which gave
Volleys of sighes to send him to his grave.
And grew distracted in most violent Fits
(For She had lost the best part of her Wits.)
In the first yeere, our famous Fletcher fell,
Of good King Charles who grac'd these Poems well,
Being then in life of Action: But they dyed
Since the Kings absence, or were layd aside,
As is their Poet. Now at the Report
Of the Kings second comming to his Court,
The Bookes creepe from the Presse to Life not Action,
Crying unto the World, that no protraction
May hinder Sacred Majesty to give
Fletcher, in them, leave on the Stage to live.
Others may more in lofty Verses move;
I onely, thus, expresse my Truth and Love.

RIC. BROME.

Upon the Printing of
Mr. IOHN FLETCHERS workes.

WHat meanes this numerous Guard? or do we come
To file our Names or Verſe upon the Tombe
Of Fletcher, and by boldly making knowne
His Wit, betray the Nothing of our Owne?
For if we grant him dead, it is as true
Againſt our ſelves, No Wit, no Poet now;
Or if he be returnd from his coole ſhade,
To us, this Booke his Reſurrection's made,
We bleed our ſelves to death, and but contrive
By our owne Epitaphs to ſhew him alive.
But let him live and let me propheſie,
As I goe Swan-like out, Our Peace is nigh;
A Balme unto the wounded Age I ſing,
And nothing now is wanting but the King.

THE STATIONER.

AS after th'Epilogue there comes some one
To tell Spectators what shall next be shown;
So here, am I; but though I've toyld and vext,
'Cannot devise what to present 'ye next;
For, since ye saw no Playes this Cloudy weather,
Here we have brought Ye our whole Stock together.
'Tis new, and all these Gentlemen attest
Under their hands 'tis Right, and of the Best;
Thirty foure Witnesses (without my taske)
Y'have just so many Playes (besides a Maske)
All good (I'me told) as have been Read or Playd;
If this Booke faile, tis time to quit the Trade.

H. MOSELEY.

POSTCRIPT.

WE forgot to tell the Reader, that some Prologues and Epilogues (here inserted) were not written by the Authours of this Volume; but made by others on the Revivall of severall Playes. After the Comedies and Tragedies were wrought off, we were forced (for expedition) to send the Gentlemens Verses to severall Printers, which was the occasion of their different Character; but the Worke it selfe is one continued Letter, which (though very legible) is none of the biggest, because (as much as possible) we would lessen the Bulke of the Volume.

THE MAD LOVER.

Actus primus. Scena prima.

Flourish. Enter Agesilaus King of Paphos, his Sister Calis, traine, and Cleanthe, Lucippe Gentlewomen at one doore; At the other Enter a Souldier.

Eumen.

Health to my Soveraigne.

King. Eumenes, welcome:
Welcome to Paphos souldier to our love,
And that faire health ye wish us through the (Campe
May it disperse it selfe, and make all happy;
How does the Generall, the valiant Memnon,
And how his wars, Eumenes?

Eume. The Gods have giv'n you (royall Sir) a Souldier
Better ne're sought a danger, more approv'd
In way of war, more master of his fortunes,
Expert in leading 'em; in doing valiant,
In following all his deeds to Victories,
And holding fortune certaine there.

King. O Souldier,
Thou speak'st a man indeed; a Generall Generall,
A soule conceiv'd a Souldier.

Eumen. Ten set Battells
Against the strong usurper Diocles
Whom long experience had begot a Leader
Ambition rais'd too mighty: hath your Memnon
Won, and won gloriously, distrest and shooke him
Even from the head of all his hopes to nothing:
In three he beat the thunder-bolt his brother
Forc'd him to wall himselfe up: there not safe,
Shooke him with warlike Engines like an earthquake,
Till like a snaile he left his shell and crawl'd
By night, and hidious darkenesse to destruction:
Disarm'd for ever rising more; twelve Castles,
Some though impregnable; Townes twice as many Countries that like the wind knew no command
But savage wildnesse; hath this Generall
With losse of blood & youth, through storms & tempests
Cal'd to your faire obedience. Drum within.

King. O my Souldier
That thou wert now within my arms; what drums Drum
Are those that beat Eumenes?

Eumen. His my Soveraigne;
Himselfe i'th' head of conquest drawing home,
An old man now to offer up his glories,
And endlesse conquest at your shrine,

King. Goe all,
And entertaine him with all Ceremonie,
Wee'le keep him now a Courtier.

Eumen. Sir, a strange one,
Pray God his language beare it; by my life, Sir
He knowes no complement, nor curious casting
Of words into fit places ere he speak 'em,
He can say, fight well fellow, and i'le thanke thee:
He that must eat, must sweat; bring up the reare there,
Or charge that wing of horse home. Florish.

King. Goe too, goe too. But Memnon and a traine of Courtiers & souldiers, two Captains, Chilax,

Valiant and wise are twins Sir: welcome, welcome,
Welcome my fortunate and famous Generall,
High in thy Princes favour as in fame,
Welcome to Peace and Paphos.

Mem. Thanke your Grace,
And would to God my dull tongue had that sweetnesse
To thanke you as I should; but pardon me,
My sword and I speake roughly Sir: your battells
I dare well say, I have fought well; for I bring ye
That lazie end you wish for Peace, so fully,
That no more name of war is: who now thinkes
Sooner or safer these might have bin ended,
Begin 'em if ye dare againe; I'le thanke him,
Souldier and Souldiers Mate these twenty five yeares,
At length your Generall, (as one whose merit
Durst looke upon no lesse,) I have waded through Dangers would damp't these soft soules, but to beare of
The maidenheads of thousand lives hangs here Sir,
Since which time, Prince, I know no Court but Marshall,
No oylie language, but the shock of Armes,
No dalliance but with death; No lofty measures
But weary and sad marches, cold and hunger,
Larums at midnight, Valours selfe would shake at,
Yet I ne're shrunke. Balls of consuming Wildfire,
That lickt men up like lightning, have I laught at,
And tost 'em back againe like childrens trifles
Upon the edges of my Enemies swords sting,
I have marcht like whirle-windes fury at this hand wai-
Death at my right; Fortune my forlorne hope,
When I have grapled with destruction,
And tug'd with pale fac'd Ruine, Night and Mischiefe,
Frighted to see a new day breake in blood,
And every where I conquer'd; and for you sir,
Mothers have wanted wombes to make me famous,
And blowne ambition dangers; Those that griev'd ye,
I have taken order for i'th' earth: those fooles
That shall hereafter.

K. No more wars my souldier: K. takes Mem. aside
We must now treat of peace sir: and talkes with him.

Clean. How he talkes,
How gloriously!

Cal. A goodly timber'd fellow,
Valiant no doubt.

Cle. If valour dwell in vaunting;
In what a phrase he speakes as if his actions
Could be set of in nothing but a noise,
Sure has a drum in's mouth.

Cal. I wonder wenches
How he would speake to us.

Clean. Nothing but larum
Tell us whose throat he cut, shew us his sword,
And blesse it for fire biting,

Lucippe. And like your Grace,
I doe not thinke he knowes us what we are,
Or to what end; for I have heard his followers
Affirme he never saw a woman that exceeded

A Sutlers wife yet, or in execution
Old bedrid Beldames without teeth or tongues,
That would not flie his furie? how he lookes.
Clean. This way devoutly.
Cal Sure his Lordſhip's viewing
Our Fortifications.
Lucip. If he mount at me,
I may chance choake his Battery.
Cal. Still his eye
Keeps quarter this way: Venus grant his valour
Be not in love.
Clean. If he be, preſently
Expect a Herrald and a Trompet with ye
To bid ye render; we two Perdu's pay for't elſe.
King. I'le leave ye to my ſiſter, and theſe Ladies
To make your welcome fuller: my good ſouldier
We muſt now turne your ſternneſſe into Courtſhip
When ye have done there; to your fair repoſe ſir: Floriſh.
I know you need it Memnon, welcome gentlemen. Ex. Kt.
Luci. Now he begins to march: Madam the Van's yours,
Keep your ground ſure; 'tis for your ſpurrs.
Mem. O Venus, He kneeles amaz'd and
Cal. How he ſtares on me. forgets to ſpeake.
Clean. Knight him Madam, knight him
He will grow tooth' ground els.
Enmenes. Speake ſir, 'tis the Princeſſe.
1 Capt. Ye ſhame your ſelfe, ſpeake to her
Cal. Riſe and ſpeake ſir.
Ye are welcome to the Court, to me, to all ſir,
Lucip. Is he not deafe?
Cal. The Gentleman's not well.
Enmen. Fie noble Generall,
Lucip. Give him freſh aire his colour goes, how do ye?
The Princeſſe will be glad ſir.
Mem. Peace, and heare me.
Clean. Command a ſilence there.
Mem. I love thee Lady.
Cal. I thank your Lordſhip heartily: proceed ſir.
Lucip. Lord how it ſtuck in's ſtomack like a ſurfet.
Clean. It breaks apace now from him, God be thanked,
What a fine ſpoken man he is.
Lucip. A choice one of ſingular variety in carriage.
Clean. Yes and I warrant you he knows his diſtance.
Mem. With all my heart I love thee.
Cal. A hearty gentleman,
And I were eene an arrand beaſt, my Lord,
But I lov'd you againe.
Mem. Good Lady kiſſe me.
Clean. I marry, Mars, there thou cam'ſt cloſe up to her.
Cal. Kiſs you at firſt my Lord, 'tis no faire faſhion,
Our lips are like Roſe buds, blowne with mens breaths,
They looſe both ſap and ſavour; there's my hand ſir.
Enmen. Fie, fie, my Lord, this is too rude.
Mem. Unhand me,
Conſume me if I hurt her; good ſweet Lady
Let me but looke upon thee.
Cal. Doe.
Mem. Yet.
Cal. Well ſir.
Take your full view.
Lucip. Bleſſe your eyes ſir.
Cal. Mercie,
Is this the man they talkt of for a ſouldier,
So abſolute and Excellent: O the Gods,
If I were given to that vanitie
Of making ſport with men for ignorance,
What a moſt precious ſubject had I purchas'd?
Speake for him gentlemen: ſome one that knowes,
What the man ailes; and can ſpeake ſenſe.
Clean. Sure Madam,
This fellow has been a rare Hare finder
See how his eyes are ſet.
Cal. Some one goe with me,
I'le ſend him ſomething for his head, poore gentleman,
Is troubled with the ſtaggers.
Lucip. Keep him darke,
He will run March mad elſe, the fumes of Battell's
Aſcend into his braines,
Clean. Clap to his feet
An old Drum head, to draw the thunder downwards.
Cal. Look to him gentlemen: farwell, Lord I am ſorry
We cannot kiſſe at this time, but believe it
Wee'le find an houre for all: God keep my children,
From being ſuch ſweet Souldiers; Softly wenches,
Leſt we diſturbe his dreame. Exit Calis & Ladies.
Enmen. Why this is Monſtrous.
1 Capt. A ſtrange forgetfulneſſe, yet ſtill he holds it.
2 Capt. Though he ne're ſaw a woman of great faſhion
Before this day, yet my thinks 'tis poſſible
He might imagine what they are, and what
Belongs unto 'em; meere report of others.
Enmen. Piſh, his head had other whimſies in't: my Lord,
Death I think y'are ſtrook dumb; my good Lord Generall
1 Capt. Sir.
Mem. That I doe love ye Madam; and ſo love ye
An't like your grace.
2 Cap. He has bin ſtudying this ſpeech.
Enmen. Who doe ye ſpeake to ſir.
Mem. Why where's the Lady
The woman, the faire woman.
1 Cap. Who?
Mem. The Princeſſe,
Give me the Princeſſe.
Enmen. Give yee counſell rather
To uſe her like a Princeſſe: Fy my Lord,
How have you borne your ſelfe, how nakedly
Laid your ſoule open: and your ignorance
To be a ſport to all; report and honour;
Drew her to doe you favours, and you bluntly,
Without conſideration what, or how ſhe was
Neither collecting reaſon, nor diſtinction.
Mem. Why, what did I my maſters?
Enmen. All that ſhewes
A man unhandſome, undigeſted done.
Mem. Did not I knee le unto her?
Enmen. Dumbe and ſenſleſſe,
As though ye had bin cut out for your fathers toombe,
Or ſtuck a land-marke; when ſhe ſpoke unto you,
Being the excellence of all our Iſland,
Ye ſtar'd upon her, as ye had ſeene a monſter
Mem. Was I ſo fooliſh; I confeſſe Enmenes,
I never ſaw before ſo brave an outſide
But did I kneele ſo long
Enmen. Till they langht at ye,
And when you ſpoke, I am aſham'd to tell ye
What 'twas my Lord; how farre from order;
Bleſſe me, is't poſſible the wild noiſe of a warre
And what ſhe only teaches ſhould poſſeſſe ye,
Knowledge to treat with her, and full diſcretion
Being at flood ſtill in ye, and in peace,
And manly converſation ſmooth and civill,
Where gracefulneſſe and glory twyn together

Thruſt

Thruſt your ſelfe out an exile?
Doe you know ſir, what ſtate ſhe carries?
What great obedience waits at her backe continually?
Mem. She ne're commanded
A hundred thouſand men, as I have done,
Nor ne're won battell; Say I would have kiſt her.
Enme. There was a dainty offer too, a rare one.
Mem. Why, ſhe is a woman, is ſhe not?
Enme. She is ſo.
Mem. Why, very well; what was ſhe made for then?
Is ſhe not young and handſome breed to breed?
Doe not men kiſſe faire women? if they doe,
If lips be not unlawfull ware; Why a Princeſſe
Is got the ſame way that we get a begger,
Or I am coſen'd; and the ſelfe-ſame way
Shee muſt be handled e're ſhe get another,
That's rudeneſſe is it not?
2. Cap. To her 'tis held ſo, & rudnes in that high degree.
Mem. 'Tis reaſon,
But I will be more punctuall; pray what thought ſhe?
Enme. Her thoughts were mercifull but ſhe laught at ye,
Pittying the pooreneſſe of your complement,
And ſo ſhe left ye, good ſir ſhape your ſelfe
To underſtand the place, and noble perſons
You live with now.
1. Cap. Let not thoſe great deſerts
The King hath layd up of ye, and the people,
Be blaſted with ill bearing.
Enme. The whole name of ſouldier, then will ſuffer.
Mem. Shee's a ſweet one,
And good ſirs leave your exhortations.
They come untimely to me, I have braines
That beate above your reaches: Shee's a Princeſſe,
That's all: I have killed a King, that's greater.
Come let's to dinner, if the Wine be good,
You ſhall perceive ſtrange wiſdome in my blood.
Exeunt all but Chilax.

Chil. Well, would thou wert i'the wars again
Old Memnon, there thou wouldſt talke toth' purpoſe,
And the proudeſt of all theſe Court Camelions
Would be glad to find it ſenſe too: plague of this
Dead peace, this baſtard breeding lowzie lazie idleneſſe,
Now we muſt learne to pipe, and pick our livings
Out of old rotten ends: theſe twenty five yeares
I have ſerv'd my Countrie, loſt my youth and bloud,
Expos'd my life to dangers more then dayes.
Yet let me tell my wants, I know their anſwers,
The King is bound to right me, they good people
Haye but from hand to mouth, looke to your wives
Your yong trim wives, your high-day wives, your march-paines,
For if the ſouldiers find not recompence,
As yet there's none a hatching; I beleeve
You men of wars, the men of wars will nick ye,
For ſterve nor beg they muſt not, my ſmall meanes
Are gone in fumo: here to raiſe a better
Unleſſe it be with lying, or dog flattering,
At which our Nations excellent; obſerving dog-dayes,
When this good Lady broyles, and would be baſted
By that good Lord or ſuch like morall learnings,
Is here impoſſible; Well, I will rub among 'em
If any thing for honeſtie be gotten,
Thou't be but bread and cheeſe I can be ſatisfied,
If otherwiſe the wind blow, ſtiffe as I am
Yet I ſhall learne to ſhuffle: There's an old Laſſe
That ſhall be nameleſſe yet alive, my laſt hope,
Has often got me my pocket full of crownes
If all faile, Jack-Dawes, are y u alive ſtill?
Then I ſee the coaſt cleare, when fooles and boyes can proſper.
Enter Foole and Page.
Pag. Brave Lievtenant
Foole. Haile to the man of worſhip.
Chi. You are fine ſirs,
Moſt paſſing fine at all points.
Fool. As ye ſee ſir,
Home-bred and handſome, we cut not out our clothes ſir
At halfe ſword as your Taylors doe, and pinck 'em
With Pikes and Partizans, we live retir'd ſir
Gentlemen like, and jealous of our honours.
Chi. Very fine Foole, and fine Boy, Peace playes with you
As the wind playes with feathers, dances ye
You grind with all guſts gallants.
Page. We can bounce ſir,
When you Soldados bend i'th' hams, and friſk too. (pets,
Fool. When twenty of your trip-coats turn their tip-
And your cold fallets without ſalt or vineger
By wambling in your ſtomacks, hemp and hobnailes
Will beare no price now, hanging and old harneis
Are like to over-run us. Pa. Whotes and hot houſes.
Foole. Surgeons and Sirenges ring out your ſance-bells.
Page. Your Jubile, your Jubile.
Foole. Prob Deum.
How our St. Georges will beſtride the Dragons
The red and ramping Dragons.
Page. Advanc't foole.
Foole. But then the ſting i'th' taile boy.
Page. Tanto melior,
For ſo much the more danger, the more honour.
Chi. You'r very pleaſant with our occupation Gent,
Which very like amongſt theſe fierie Serpents
May light upon a Blind-worme of your blood,
A Mother or a Siſter.
Foole. Mine's paſt ſaddle
You ſhould be ſure of her elſe: but ſay Sir Hugo
Now the Drums doubbes, & the ſticks turn'd bed-ſtaves,
All the old Foxes hunted to their holes,
The Iron age return'd to Eribus,
And Honorificabilitudinitatibus
Thruſt our o'th' Kingdome by the head and ſhoulders,
What trade doe you meane to follow.
Chi. That's a queſtion.
Foole. Yes, and a learned queſtion if ye marke it,
Conſider and ſay on.
Chi. Fooling as thou doſt, that's the beſt trade I take it,
Foole. Take it ſtrait then
For feare your fellowes be before ye, harke ye Lievtenant
Fooolings the thing, the thing worth all your fightings,
When all's done ye muſt foole ſir.
Chi. Well, I muſt then.
Foole. But doe you know what fooling is; true fooling
The circumſtances that belong unto it,
For every idle knave that ſhowes his teeth
Wants and would live can Juggle, tumble, fiddle,
Make a dog face, or can abuſe his fellow,
Is not a foole at firſt daſh, you ſhall find ſir
Strange turnings in this trade; to foole is nothing
As fooling has bin, but to foole the faire way,
The new way, as the beſt men foole their friends,
For all men get by fooling meerely fooling,
Deſert does nothing, valiant, wiſe, vertuous,
Are things that walke by without bread or breeches,
Chi. I partly credit that,
Foole. Fine wits, fine wits ſir,

There's the young Boy, he does well in his way too,
He could not live one in his Masters absence;
He tyes a Ladyes garters so, so, prettily,
Say his hand slip, but say so.
Chi. Why let it slip then.
Foole. 'Tis ten to one the body shall come after,
And he that workes deserves his wages.
Chi. That's true.
Foole. Hee riddles finely to a waiting Gentlewoman
Expounds dreames like a Prophet, dreames himselfe too,
And wishes all dreames true; they cry Amen,
And there's a Memorandum: he can sing too
Bawdy enough to please old Ladies: he lies rarely,
Pawnes ye a sute of clothes at all points, fully,
Can pick a pocket if ye please, or easilier;
Lisps when he lists to catch a Chamber-maid,
And calls his Hostesse mother, these are things now,
If a man meane to live, to fight and swagger,
Beaten about the Eares with bawling sheepskins,
Cut to the soule for Sumner: here an arme lost,
And there a leg; his honourable head
Seal'd up in salves and sear-clothes, like a packet,
And so sent over to an Hospitall, stand there, charge there,
Sweare there, whore there, dead there,
And all this sport for cheese, and chines of hog-flesh,
And money when two wednesdayes meet together,
Where to be lowzie is a Gentleman,
And he that weares a cleane shirt has his Shrowd on.
Chi. I'le be your scholler, come if I like fooling,
Foole. You cannot choose but like it, fight you one day
I'le foole another, when your Surgeons paid,
And all your leakes stope, see whose slops are heaviest,
I'le have a shilling for a can of wine,
When you shall have two Sergeants for a counter.
Boy. Come learn of us Lievtenant, hang your Iron up,
Wee'le find you cooler warre.
Chi. Come let's together,
I'le see your tricks, and as I like 'em. —— Exeunt.

Enter Memnon, Eumenes, and Captaines.

Mem. Why was there not such women in the camp then
Prepar'd to make me know 'em.
Eum. 'Twas no place fit. (nures
1. Capt. Why should they live in Tumults: they are trea-
Soft and of sober natures.
Mem. Cou'd not your wives,
Your mothers, or your sisters have been sent for
To exercise upon.
Eume. We thanke your Lordship.
2. Cap. But doe you meane?
Mem. I doe meane.
2 Cap. What sir?
Mem. To see her,
And see thee hang'd too, and thou anger'st me,
And thousands of your throats cut, get ye from me
Ye keepe a prating of your points of manners,
And fill my head with lowzie circumstances.
Better have Ballets in't, your courtly worships,
How to put off my hat, you how to turne me,
And you forsooth to blow my nose discreetly;
Let me alone, for I will love her, see her,
Talke to her, and mine owne way.
Eume. Shee's the Princesse.
Mem. Why let her be the devill, I have spoke,
When Thunder durst not check me, I must love,
I know she was a thing kept for me.
Eume. And I know sir,
Though she were born yours, yet your strange behaviour
And wam.
Mem. Thou liest.
Eum. I doe not.
Mem. Ha!
Eume. I doe not lye sir,
I say you want fine language, nay 'tis certaine
You cannot say good morrow.
Mem. Ye Dog-whelpes,
The proudest of your prating tongues.
Eume. Doe kill us,
Kill us for telling truth, for my part Generall
I would not live to see men make a may-game
Of him I have made a Master, kill us quickly,
Then ye may.
Mem. What?
Eume. Doe what you list, draw your sword childishly
Upon your servants that are bound to tell ye
I am weary of my life.
1 Capt. And I.
2 Capt. And all sir.
Eume. Goe to the Princesse make her sport, cry to her
I am the glorious man of warre.
Mem. Pray ye leave me,
I am sorry I was angry, I'le thinke better,
Pray no more words.
Eume. Good sir.
Mem. Nay then.
2 Capt. We are gone sir. Exeunt Eume. & Captains.

Ent. Princesse Calist. Lucippe, Cleantho.

Calist. How came he hither, see for heavens sake wenches,
What faces, and what postures he puts on, Mem. walks
I doe not thinke he is perfect. aside full of
Cle. If your love strange gestures.
Have not betrayd his little wits, he's well enough,
As well as he will be.
Cal. Marke how he Muses.
Lucip. Has a Batalia now in's braines, he drawes one now
Have at ye Harpers.
Cle. See, see, there the fire failes.
Lucip. Look what an Alphabet of faces he runs through,
Cle. O love, love, how amorously thou look'st
In an old rusty armour.
Cal. I'le away, for by my troth I feare him.
Lucip. Feare the gods Madam,
And never care what man can doe, this fellow
Withall his frights about him and his furies,
His Lacuns and his Launces, Swords and Targets,
Nay cast him up in armour Cap-a-pe,
Yet durst I undertake within two houres,
If he durst charge to give him such a shake
Should shake his valour off, and make his shankes too
Cle. For shame no more.
Calist. Hee muses still.
Cle. The Devill.
Why should this old dri'ed timber chopt with thunder.
Cal. Old wood burnes quickest.
Lucip. Out you would fly Madam,
Give me a green stick that may hold me heat
And smoke me soundly too: autumes, and fees ye.
Cle. There's no avoiding now, have at ye. Memnon
Mem. Lady, comes to her.
The more I looke upon ye. Stayes her.
Cle. The more you may lie.
Cal. Let him alone.

Mem. I

Mem. I would desire your patience
The more I say I looke, the more Stops her.
Lucip. My Fortune
'Tis very apt Sir
Mem. Women let my fortune
And me alone I wish ye, pray come this way
And stand you still there Ladie
Cal. Leave the words Sir, and leap into the meaning
Mem. Then againe.
I tell you I doe love ye
Cal. Why
Mem. No questions: pray no more questions.
I doe love you. Infinitely, why doe you smile.
Am I ridiculous
Cal. I am monstrous fearefull, no I joye you love me
Mem. Joye on then and be proud on't, I doe love ye,
Stand still doe not trouble me you Women.
He loves you Ladie at whose feete has kneeld
Princes to beg their freedomes, he whose valour
Has over run whole Kingdomes
Cal. That makes me doubt Sir
'Twill over run me so
Mem. He whose Sword
Cle. Talke not so big Sir, you will fright the Princesse.
Mem. Ha. Lucip. No forsooth
Cal. I know ye have done wonders.
Mem. I have and will doe more and greater, braver.
And for your beautie miracles, name that kingdome
And talke your choice:
Cal. Sir I am not ambitious
Mem. Ye shalbe, 'tis the child of glory: she that I love
Whom my desires shall magnifie since stories
And all the Empire of the Earth:
Cle. I would faine aske him.
Lucip. Prethee be quiet, he will beate us both els.
Cle. What will ye make me then Sir
Mem. I will make thee
Stand still and hold thy peace, I have a heart Ladie
Cal. Ye were a monster els
Mem. A loving heart
A truly loving heart:
Cal. Alas how came it
Mem. I would you had it in your hand sweet Ladie
To see the truth it beares ye:
Cal. Doe you give it
Lucip. That was well thought upon:
Cle. 'Twill put him too't wench;
Cal. And you shall see I dare accept it Sir
Tak't in my hand and view it: if I finde it
A loving and a sweet heart as you call it
I am bound, I am
Mem. No more, Ile send it so ye
As I have honour in me you shall have it
Cle. Handsomlye done Sir, and perfum'd by all meanes
The weathers warme Sir
Mem. With all circumstance
Lucip. A napkin wrought most curiouslie;
Mem. Divinely
Cle. Put in a goblet of pure gold
Mem. Yes in Iacynth
That she may see the spirits through
Lucip. Ye have greas'd him
For chewing love again in hast
Cle. If he should doe it (at
Cal. If Heaven should fall we should have larkes, he doe
Cle. See how he thinkes upon't
Cal. He will thinke these three yeares
Ere he prove such an asse, I like his offer
There was no other way to put him of els.
Mem. I will doe it
Ladie expect my heart
Cal. I doe Sir:
Mem. Love it and so I leave ye. Ex. Mem.
Cle. Either he is starke mad
Or els I thinke he meanes it
Cal. He must be starke mad
Or he will never doe it, 'tis vaine glory
And want of judgement that provokes this in him
Sleepe and societie cures all his heart
No no good Gentleman ther's more belongs too't
Hearts are at higher prizes, lets goe in
And there examine him a little better.
Shut all the doores behind for feare he follow
I hope I have lost a lover, and am glad on't. Exit Lady.

Finis Actus Primi.

Actus Secundus. Scæna Prima.

Enter Memnon alone.

Mem. 'Tis but to die, dogs doe it, ducks with dabling,
Birds sing away their soules, and babyes sleep 'em,
Why doe I talke of that is treble vantage,
For in the other world she is bound so have me,
Her Princely word is past: my great desert too
Will draw her to come after presently
'Tis justice, and the gods must see it done too
Besides no Brother, Father, kindred there
Can hinder us, all languages are alike
There love is everlasting, ever young
Free from diseases, ages, jealousies.
Bawdes, beldames, painters, purgers, die, 'tis nothing
Men drowne themselves for joye to draw in Juleps
When they are hot with wine, In dreames we doe it,
And many a handsome wench that loves the most well
Gives up her soule so in her lovers bosome,
But I must be inciside first, cut and open'd
My heart and handsome elle taine from me, stay there
Dead once, stay, let me thinke agen, who doe I know there
For els to wander up and downe unwaited on
And unregarded in my place and project
Is for a fowlers soule, not an old Souldiers.
My brave old Regiments: I there it goes
That have bin killd before me, right,

Enter Chilax.

Chil. Is here, and I must trouble him.
Mem. Then those I have conquer'd
To make my traine full:
Chi. Sir
Mem. My Captaines then:
Chi. Sir I beseech ye
Mem. For to meete her there
Being a Princesse, and a Kings sole Sister
With great accommodacion must be cured for
Chi. Weigh but the Souldiers povertie
Mem. Mine owne troope first
For they shall die:
Chi. How whats this
Mem. Next:
Chi. Shall I speake louder Sir

Mem.

Mem. A ſquare Battalia:
hi. You doe not thinke of us.
Mem. Their Armours guilded:
Chi. Good noble Sir
Mem. And round about ſuch Engines
Shall make hell ſhake:
Chi. Ye doe not mock me
Mem. For Sir
I will be ſtrange as brave
Chi. Ye may conſider
You know we have ſerv'd you long enough
Mem. No Souldier
That ever landed on the bleſt Elizium
Did, or ſhall march, as I will
Chi. Would ye would march Sir
Up to the King and get us
Mem. King nor Keiſer
Shall equall me in that world
Chi. What a devill ayles he
Mem. Next the rare beauties of thoſe townes I fir'd
Chi. I ſpeake of mony Sir:
Mem. Ten thouſand Coaches
Chi. O pounds Sir, pounds I beſeech your Lordſhip
Let Coaches run out of your remembrance
Mem. In which the wanton Cupids; and the graces
Drawne with the Weſterne winds kindling deſires,
And then our Poets.
Chi. Then our pay (Princeſſe
Mem. For Chilax when the triumph comes; the Then for I will have a Heaven made
Chi. Bleſſe your Lordſhip!
Stand ſtill Sir
Mem. So I doe and in it
Chi. Death Sir
You talke you know not what
Mem. Such rare deviſes:
Make me I ſay a Heaven
Chi. I ſay ſo too Sir
Mem. For here ſhall run a Conſtellation
Chi. And there a piſſing Conduit
Mem. Ha!
Chi. With wine Sir
Mem. A Sun there in his hight, there ſuch a planet
Chi. But wher's our mony where runs that
Mem. Ha?
Chi. Money
Money ant like your Lordſhip (ſtuff
Mem. Why all the carriage, ſhall come behind the Rich hangings, treaſure
Or ſay we have none
Chi. I may ſay ſo truly
For hang me if I have a groat: I have ſerv'd well
And like an honeſt man: I ſee no reaſon
Mem. Thou muſt needs die good Chilax
Chi. Very well Sir
Mem. I will have honeſt, valiant ſoules about me
I cannot miſſe thee
Chi. Dye?
Mem. Yes die, and Pelius
Eumenes and Polibius: I ſhall thinke
Of more within theſe two howres
Chi. Die Sir?
Mem. I Sir
And ye ſhall die
Chi. When I beſeech your Lordſhip
Mem. To morrow ſee ye doe die
Chi. A ſhort warning,
Troth Sir I am ill prepar'd
Mem. I die my ſelfe then
Beſide ther's reaſon
Chi. Oh!
Mem. I pray thee tell me
For thou art a great dreamer
Chi. I can dreame Sir
If I eate well and ſleep well
Mem. Was it never
By dreame or apparition open'd to thee?
Chi. Hees mad
Mem. What the other world was, or Elizium?
Didſt never travell in thy ſleepe?
Chi. To Tavernt
When I was drunke ore night: or to a wench
Ther's an Elizium for yee, a young Ladie
Wrapt round about ye like a ſnake: is that it?
Or if that ſtrange Elizium that you talke of
Be where the Devill is, I have dream't of him
And that I have had him by the hornes, and rid him
He trotts the Dagger out oth ſheath
Mem. Elizium,
The bleſſed fields, man
Chi. I know no fields bleſſed, but thoſe I have gain'd by
I have dreamp't I have bin in Heaven too
Mem. There, handle that place; that's Elizium
Chi. Brave ſinging, and brave dancing
And rare things
Mem. All full of flowers
Chi. And Pot hearbes
Mem. Bowers for lovers
And everlaſting ages of delight
Chi. I ſlept not ſo far
Mem. Meet me on thoſe bancks
Some two dayes hence
Chi. In dreame Sir
Mem. No in death Sir
And there I muſter all, and pay the Souldier
Away, no more, no more
Chi. God keepe your Lordſhip
This is fine dancing for us

Enter Siphax.

Siphax. Wher's the Generall
Chi. Ther's the old ſigne of Memnon, where the ſoule is
You may goe looke as I have
Si. What's the matter
Chi. Why queſtion him and ſee; he talkes of Devills
Hells, Heavens, Princes, powers, and Potentates,
You muſt to'th pot too
Si. How? (chaſe of
Chi. Do you know Elizium a tale he talkes the wild gooſe
Si. Elizium? I have red of ſuch a place.
Chi. Then get he to him
Ye are as fine company as can be fitted. Exit Chilax.
Your worſhips fairelie met
Si. Mercy upon us,
What ailes this Gentleman?
Mem. Proviſion
Si. How his head workes.
Mem. Betweene two ribbes
If he cut ſhort or mangle me; Ile take him
And twirle his neck about
Si. Now Gods defend us
Mem. In a pure cup tranſparant with a writing
To ſignifie

Si.

Si. I never knew him thus
Sure is bewitcht, or poyſond;
Mem. Whoſe there
Si. I Sir
Mem. Come hither Siphax
Si. Yes; how does your Lordſhip
Mem. Well God a mercy Souldier, very well
But prithee tell me
Si. Any thing I can Sir.
Mem. What durſt thou doe to gaine the rareſt beautie
The VVorld has
Si. That the world has? 'tis worth doing
Mem. Is it ſo? but what doing beares it?
Si. Why any thing, all dangers it appeares to
Mem. Name ſome of thoſe things; doe
Si. I would undertake Sir
A voyage round about the VVorld
Mem. Short Siphax,
A merchant does it to ſpice potts of ale
Si. I woo'd ſwim in armour
Mem. Short ſtill: a poore Jade
Loden will take a ſtreame and ſtem it ſtrongly
To leap a Mare
Si. The plague I durſt
Mem. Still ſhorter
Ile cure it with an Onyon
Si. Surfeits
Mem. Short ſtill
They are often Phyſicks for our healths and help us.
Si. I woo'd ſtand a breach
Mem. Thine honour bids thee Souldier
'Tis ſhame to fight a ſecond cauſe
Si. I durſt Sir
Fight with the felleſt Monſter
Mem. That's the pooreſt,
Man was ordained their Maſter; durſt ye die Sir?
Si. How? die my Lord!
Mem. Die Siphax: take thy ſword
And come by that doore to her; ther's a prize
To buy a luſtie love at
Si. I am well content Sir
To proove no purchaſer
Mem. Away thou world worme,
Thou win a matchles beautie?
Si. 'Tis to loſe't Sir
For being dead wher's the reward I reach at,
The love I labour for?
Mem. There it begins foole
Thou art meerly cozend; for the loves wee now know
Are but the heats of half an houre; and hated
Deſires ſtir'd up by nature to increaſe her
Licking of one another to a luſt;
Courſe and baſe appetites earths meere inheritours
And heires of Idleneſs and blood; Pure Love
That that the ſoule affects and cannot purchaſe
VVhile ſhe is loden with our fleſh, that love Sir
VVhich is the price of honour dwells not here,
Your Ladies eyes are lampleſſe to that vertue,
That beautie ſmiles not on a cheeke waſht over,
Nor ſents the ſweets of Ambers; below, Siphax
Below us, in the other VVord, Elizium,
VVher's no more dying, no deſpairing, mourning,
VVhere all deſires are full, deſerts downe loden,
There Siphax, there, where loves are ever living,
Si. VVhy doe we love in this VVorld then?
Mem. To preſerve it,
The maker loſt his worke els: but marke Siphax,
VVhat iſſues that love beares.
Si. VVhy Children Sir;
I never heard him talke thus; thus divinelie
And ſenſible before
Mem. It does ſo, Siphax,
Things like our ſelves, as ſenſuall vaine unvented
Bubles and breath of ayres, got with an itching
As bliſters are; and bred, as much corruption ('em
Flowes from their lives, ſorrow conceives and ſhapes
And oftentimes the deaths of thoſe we love moſt
The breeders bring them to the VVorld to curſe 'em,
Crying they weepe amongſt us like young Catts,
Cares and continuall croſſes keeping with 'em,
They make time old to tend them and experience
An aſſe they alter ſo; they grow and goodlie
'Ere we can turne our thoughts, like dropps of water
They fall into the maine, and knowne no more;
This is the love of this world: I muſt tell thee
For thou art underſtanding
Si. What you pleaſe Sir
Mem. And as a faithfull man
Nay I dare truſt thee
I love the Princeſſe
Si. There 'tis that has fired him
I knew he had ſome inſpiration
But does ſhe know it Sir?
Mem. Yes marry does ſhe
I have given my heart unto her
Si. If ye love her
Mem. Nay underſtand me, my heart taken from me
Out of my body man and ſo brought to her
How lik'ſt thou that braue offer? ther's the love
I told thee of; and after death the living;
She muſt in juſtice, come boye, ha?
Si. Your heart Sir?
Mem. I, ſo by all meanes Siphax
Si. He loves roſt well
That eates the ſpitt
Mem. And ſince thou art come thus fitlie
Ile doe it preſentlie and thou ſhall carrie it
For thou canſt tell a ſtorie and diſcribe it
And I coniure thee Siphax by thy gentrie
Next by the glorious battells we have fought in
By all the dangers, wounds, heats, colds, diſtreſſes,
Thy love next and obedience, nay thy life
Si. But one thing firſt Sir, if ſhe pleas'd to grant it
Could ye not love her here and live, conſider
Mem. Ha? yes I thinke I could
Si. 'Twoul'd be far neerer
Beſides the ſweets here, would induce the laſt love
And linck it in
Mem. Thou ſayeſt right, but our rancks heere
And bloods are barrs between us, ſhe muſt ſtand off too
As I perceive ſhe does
Si. Deſert and dutie
Makes even all Sir
Mem. Then the King, though I
Have merited as much as man can; muſt not let her,
So many Princes covetous of beautie;
I woo'd with all my heart but 'tis impoſſible
Si. Why ſay ſhe marry after
Mem. No ſhe dare not
The Gods dare not doe ill: come
Si. Doe you meane it
Mem. Lend me thy knife, and helpe me of

Si. For heav'n ſake
Be not ſo ſtupid mad deare Generall.
Mem. Diſpatch, I ſay.
Si. As ye love that ye looke for
Heaven and the bleſſed life.
Mem. Hell take thee Coxcombe,
Why doſt thou keepe me from it; thy knife, I ſay.
Si. Doe but this one thing, on my knees I beg it,
Stay but two houres till I returne againe,
For I will to her, tell her all your merits,
Your moſt unvalu'd love, and laſt your danger;
If ſhee relent, then live ſtill, and live loving,
Happy, and high in favour: if ſhe frowne;
Mem. Shall I be ſure to know it.
Si. As I live Sir,
My quick returne ſhall either bring ye fortune,
Or leave you to your owne fate.
Mem. Two houres?
Si. Yes, Sir.
Mem. Let it be kept, away, I will expect it. Exeunt Memnon Siphax.

Enter Chilax, Foole and Page.

Chi. You dainty wits two, an ye to a Cater,
To cheat him of a dinner.
Boy. Ten at Court ſir
Are few enough, they are as wiſe as we are.
Chi. Hang ye, I'le eat at any time: and any where
I never make that part of want, preach to me
What ye can doe, and when ye liſt.
Foole. Your patience,
'Tis a hard day at Court, a fiſh day.
Chi. So it ſeemes ſir,
The finns grow out of thy face.
Foole. And to purchaſe
This day the company of one deare Cuſtard,
Or a meſſe of Rice ap Thomas, needs a maine wit;
Beefe we can beare before us linde with Brewes
And tubs of Porke; vociferating Veales,
And tongues that ne're told lye yet.
Chi. Line thy mouth with 'em
Foole. Thou haſt need, and great need,
For theſe finny fiſh-dayes,
The Officers underſtandings are ſo flegmatick,
They cannot apprehend us.
Chi. That's great pitty,
For you deſerve it, and being apprehended
The whip to boot; Boy what doe you ſo neare me,
I dare not truſt your touch boy.

Enter Stremon and his Boy Ed. Hor.

Boy. As I am vertuous
What, theeves among our ſelves?
Chy. Stremon.
Stre. Lievtenant.
Chi. Welcome aſhore, aſhore.
Foole. What Monſieur, Muſicke?
Stre. My fine Foole.
Boy. Fellow Cracke, why what a conſort
Are we now bleſt withall?
Foole. Fooling and fidling
Nay and we live not now boyes; what new ſongs ſirra.
Stre. A thouſand man, a thouſand.
Foole. Itching ayres
Alluding to the old ſport.
Stre. Of all ſizes. (on't.
Fool. And how does ſmall Tym Treble here; the heart
Boy. 2. To doe you ſervice.
Fool. O Tym the times, the times Tym.
Stre. How does the Generall,
And next what moneys ſtirring?
Chy. For the Generall
Is here, but ſuch a Generall
The times chang'd Stremon,
He was the liberall Generall, and the loving,
The feeder of a Souldier, and the father,
But now become the ſtupid'ſt.
Stre. Why, what ailes he.
Chi. Nay, if a horſe knew, and his head's big enough
I'le hang for't; did'ſt thou ever ſee a dog
Run mad o'th' tooth-ache, ſuch another toy
Is he now ſo, a glotes and grins, and bites.
Fool. Why hang him quickly,
And then he cannot hurt folkes.
Chi. One houre raving,
Another ſmiling, not a word the third houre,
I tell thee Stremon has a ſtirring ſoule,
What ever it attempts or labours at
Would weare out twenty bodies in another.
Fool. I'le keep it out of me, for mine's but buckeram,
Hee would bownce that out in two houres.
Chi. Then he talkes
The ſtrangeſt and the maddeſt ſtuffe from reaſon,
Or any thing ye offer; ſtand thou there,
I'le ſhow thee how he is, for I'le play Memnon
The ſtrangeſt Generall that ere thou heardſt of Stremon.
Stre. My Lord.
Chi. Goe preſently and find me
A black horſe with a blew taile; bid the blank Corſiet
Charge through the Sea, and ſinke the Navy: ſoftly,
Our ſoules are things not to be waken'd in us
With larums, and lowd bawlings, for in Elizium
Stilneſſe and quietneſſe, and ſweetneſſe, ſirra,
I will have, for it much concernes mine honour,
Such a ſtrong reputation for my welcome
As all the world ſhall ſay: for in the forefront
So many on white Unicornes, next them
My gentlemen, my Cavaliers and Captaines,
Ten deep and trapt with tenter-hookes to take hold
Of all occaſions: for Friday cannot fiſh out
The end I aime at; tell me of Diocles,
And what he dare doe, dare he meet me naked
Thunder in this hand, in his left? Foole?
Foole. Yes Sir.
Chi. Foole, I would have thee fly i'th' ayre, fly ſwiftly
To that place where the Sun ſets, there deliver.
Foole. Deliver? what ſir?
Chi. This ſir, this ye ſlave ſir, All laugh.
Death ye rude rogues, ye Scarrubbs.
Foole. Hold for Heav'ns ſake Lievtenant, ſweet Lievte-
Chi. I have done ſir. (nant.
Boy. You have wrung his neck off.
Chi. No Boy, 'tis the nature
Of this ſtrange paſſion when't hits to hale people
Along by th'haire, to kick 'em, breake their heads:
Foole. Do ye call this Acting, was your part to beat me.
Chi. Yes, I muſt act all that he does.
Foole. Plague act yee,
I'le act no more.
Stre. 'Tis but to ſhew man.
Foole. Then man
Hee ſhould have ſhew'd it only, and not done it,
I am ſure he beat me beyond Action,
Gowts a your heavy fiſt.

Chi.

Chi. Ile have thee to him,
Thou haſt a fine wit, fine foole, and canſt play rarely.
Hele hug thee, boy, and ſtroke thee,
Foole. Ile to the ſtockes firſt,
'Ere I be ſtrokt thus.
Strem. But how came he Chilax?
Chi. I know not that,
Strem. Ile to him
Chi. He loves thee well,
And much delights to here thee ſing; much taken
He has bin with thy battell ſongs.
Strem. If Muſique,
Can find his madnes; ile ſo fiddle him,
That out it ſhall by'th ſhoulders,
Chi. My fine fidler, (ſport
Hele firke you and ye take not heed too: t'will be rare
To ſee his owne trade triumph over him;
His Lute lac'd to his head, for creeping hedges;
For mony ther's none ſtirring; try good Stremon
Now what your ſilver ſound can doe; our voices
Are but vaine Ecchoes,
Strem. Something ſhall be done
Shall make him underſtand all; lets to'th Taverne,
I have ſome few Crownes left yet: my whiſtle wet once
Ile pipe him ſuch a Paven -
Chi. Hold thy head up,
I e cure it with a quart of wine; Come Coxcombe;
Come boye take heed of napkins.
Foole. Youl'd no more acting?
Chi. No more Chicken;
Foole. Goe then.

Exeunt omnes.

Clean. Gentle Ladie,
Ye need not feare, the walkes are viewed and emptie,
But my thinkes Madam this kind heart of his —
Lucip. Is ſlow a coming,
Si. Keepe me ye bleſt Angells,
What killing power is this?
Cal. Why doſt thou looke for't?
Doſt thinke he ſpoke in earneſt?
Lucip. My thinkes Madam,
A Gentleman ſhould keepe his word; and to a Ladie
A Ladie of your excellencies;
Cal. Out foole!
Send me his heart? what ſhould we doe wo't? dance it?
Lucip. Drie it and drinke it for the wormes.
Calis. Whoſe that?
What man ſtands there?
Clean. Where?
Cal. There.
Clean. A Gentleman,
Which I beſeech your grace to honour ſo much,
As know him for your ſervants brother.
Cal. Siphax? (here?
Clean. The ſame an't plea e your grace; what does he

Cal. Hee's growne a handſome Gentleman; good
Yar wel-come from the warres; would ye with us ſir?
Pray ſpeake your will: a bluſhes, be not fearefull,

Calis. Tongue-tyde,

Clean. Speake, for ſhame ſpeake.
Lucip. A man would ſpeake -
Cal. Theſe Souldiers,
Are all dumb Saints: Conſider and take time ſir,
Lets forward wenches, come, his pallats downe.
Lucip. Dare theſe men charge it'h face of fire and bullets?
And hang there heads downe at a handſome Woman?
Good maiſter Mars that's a ſoule fault.

Exit Princeſs, Lucippe.

Clean. Fye beaſt,

Was it the Princeſs that thou ſed'ſt?
Si. The Princeſs,
Clean. Thou doeſt not love her ſure, thou darſt not.
Si. Yes by heaven,
Clean. Yes by Heaven? I know thou darſt not,
The Princeſs? 'tis thy life the knowledge of it,
Preſumption that will draw into it all thy kinred,
And leave 'em ſlaves and ſuccourleſs; the Princeſs?
Why ſhee's a ſacred thing to ſee and worſhip,
Fixt from us as the Sun is high and glorious,
To be ador'd not doated on; deſire things poſſible,
Thou fooliſh young man, nouriſh not a hope,
Will haile thy heart out.
Si. 'Tis my deſtinie,
And I know both diſgrace and death will quit it,

If it be knowne
Clean. Purſue it not then Syphax
Get thee good wholeſome thoughts may nourish thee.
Goe home and pray
Sy. I cannot
Clean. Sleep then Syphax,
And dreame away thy doting.

When I ſhall find a fit time.
Pr. If by my meanes
Your buſines may be ſpeed; ye know me,
And how I am tyed unto you; be bold daughter

Pr. Ile keep it for ye; when?
Clean. To morrow morning
Ile viſit ye agen; and when occaſion
Offers it ſelfe -
Pr. Inſtruct me, and have at ye -
Clean. Farewell till then; be ſure.
Pr. As your owne thoughts, Laſſie.
Clean. 'Tis a maine worke and full of feare.
Pr. Fooles only Exit Cle.
Make their effects ſeeme fearefull: farewell daughter.
This gold was well got for my old ruſt Souldier
Now I ſhall be his ſweet agen; what buſines
Is this ſhe has a foote? ſome luſtie lover
Beyond her line, the young wench would faine piddle
A little to revive her, muſt be thought of,
'Tis even ſo; ſhe muſt have it; but how by my meanes
A devill can ſhe drive it? I that wait ſtill
Before the Goddeſſe giving Oracle
How can I profit her? 'tis her owne project,
And if ſhe caſt it falſe her owne fault be it. Exit Prieſt.

Pol. Why this is meere madnes
Enmen. Thus it is Sir
Pol. Only the Princeſſe ſight?

Enmen. not yet ſir
That we can heare of
Pol. Noble Gentlemen,

Strem. A little buſie Sir?
Pol. Is the foole and boye here.
Strem. They are Sir,

Enter Memnon.

Pol. Let 'em be ſtill ſo; and as they find his humors
Enmen. Now ye may behold him
Pol. ſtand cloſe and worke no noyſe;
By his eyes now Gentlemen,
I gueſſe him full of anger
Enmen. Be not ſeene there
Mem. The houre's paſt long agoe, hees falſe and fearefull,
Coward goe with thy eatine ſoule, thou cur dog.
Thou cold clod, wilde fire warme thee, monſtrous fearful,
I know the ſlave ſhakes but to think on't.
Pol. VVhoſe that?
Enmen. I know not Sir.
Mem. But I ſhall catch yee raſcall,
Your mangie ſoule is not immortall here, Sir,
Ye muſt die, and we ſhall meet, we muſt, maggot,
Be ſure we muſt, for not a monke of hell,
Not the moſt horrid pit ſhall harbour thee.
The Devills taile ſhall hide thee, but ile have thee,
And how ile uſe thee, whips and firebrands
Toſting thy eaſie againſt a flame of wilde fire,
And baſting it with brimſtone, ſhall be nothing,
Nothing at all; ile teach ye to be trouble ſome;
Was never ſlave ſo living'd ſince hell was hell
As I will ſwinge thy ſlaves ſoule and be ſure on't.
Pol. Is this imagination, or ſome circumſtance
For 'tis extreame ſtrange.
Enmen. So is all he does Sir Exit Surgeon.
Mem. Till then ile leave ye? where's thoſe? where's the

And waite you too. Exeunt Servants.
Poli. What wood ye with a Surgeon
Enme. Things working in his head, praymarke
Mem. Come hither.

Have

Have you brought your Instruments.
Sur. They are within Sir,
Mem. Put to the doores a while there; ye can incise
No haires bredth without defacing;
Sur. Yes sir.
Mem. And take out fairely from the flesh;
Sur. The least thing.
Mem. Well, come hither then; take off my doublet,
Not looke ye Surgeon, I must have ye cut
My Heart out here, and handsomly: Nay, stare not,
Nor doe not start; I'le cut your throat else Surgeon,
Come sweare to doe it.
Surg. Good sir—
Mem. Sirra, hold him,
I'le have but one blow at his head.
Sur. I'le doe it,
Why what should we doe living after you sir?
Wee'le die before if yee please.
Mem. No, No.
Surg. Living? hang living,
Is there ne're a Cat hole where I may creep through?
Woo'd I were in the Indies.
Mem. Sweare then, and after my death presently
To kill your selves and follow, as ye are honest,
As ye have faiths and loves to me.
Dema. Wee'l doe it.
Eumen. Pray doe not stir yet, we are neare enough
To run between all dangers.
Mem. Here I am sir;
Come looke upon me, view the best way boldly,
Feare nothing, but cut home; if your hand shake sirra,
Or any way deface my heart i'th' cutting,
Make the least scratch upon it, but draw it whole,
Excellent faire, shewing at all points, Surgeon,
The honour and the valour of the owner,
Mixt with the most immaculate love I send it,
Looke too't, I'le slice thee to the soule.
Sur. Ne're feare sir,
I'le doe it daintily; would I were out once.
Mem. I will not have ye smile sirra when ye do it,
As though ye cut a Ladies corne; tis scurvie;
Doe me it as thou dost thy praiers, seriously.
Sur. I'le doe it in a dump sir.
Mem. In a dog sir,
I'le have no dumps, nor dumplins: fetch your tooles,
And then I'le tell ye more.
Sur. If I returne
To hear more I'le be hang'd for't.
Mem. Quick, quick.
Dema. Yes sir, (run.
With all the heeles we have, Exeunt Surgeon. Demago-
Eumen. Yet stand.
Poli. Hee'le doe it.
Eumen. He cannot and we here.
Mem. Why when ye rascalls,
Ye dull slaves: will ye come sir? Surgeon, Serring,
Dogleach, shall I come fetch ye?
Poli. Now i'le to him,
God save ye honour'd brother
Mem. My deare Polidor,
Welcome from travell, welcome; and how doe ye?
Pol. Well sir, would you were so.
Mem. I am, I thanke ye,
You are a better'd man much, I the same still,
An old rude Souldier, sir.
Pol. Pray be plaine brother,
And tell me but the meaning of this vision,
For to me it appeares no more: so farre
From common course and reason.
Mem. Thanke thee Fortune,
At length I have found the man: the man must do it,
The man in honour bound.
Pol. To doe what?
Mem. Harke, for I will blesse ye with the circumstance
Of that weak shaddow that appear'd.
Pol. Speake on sir. Walkes with him.
Mem. It is no storie for all eares.
Pol. The Princesse?
Mem. Peace and heare all: how:
Eumen. Sure 'tis dangerous
He starts so at it,
Pol. Your heart, doe ye know sir?
Mem. Yes, pray thee be softer.
Pol. Me to doe it?
Mem. Only Reserv'd, and dedicated.
Pol. For shame brother
Know, what ye are, a man.
Mem. None of your Athens
Good sweet sir, no Philosophy, thou feel'st not
The honourable end, foole:
Pol. I am sure I feele
The shame & scorn that follows; have ye serv'd thus long
The glory of your Country, in your Conquests,
The envy of your neighbours, in your vertues,
Rul'd Armies of your owne, given Lawes to Nations,
Belov'd and fear'd as far as Fame has travel'd,
Call'd the most fortunate and happy Memnon,
To loose all here at home, poorely to loose it,
Poorely and pettishly, ridiculously
To fling away your fortune? where's your wisdome?
Where's that you govern'd others by, discretion?
Do's your Rule lastly hold upon your selfe? fie brother,
How are ye falne? get up into your honour
The top branch of your bravery, and from thence
Looke and lament how little Memnon seemes now.
Mem. Hum! tis well spoken; but do'st thou think, young
The tongues of Angels from my happinesse (scholler
Could turne the end I aime at? no: they cannot;
This is no booke case brother: will ye doe it?
Use no more art, I am resolv'd.
Pol. Ye may, sir
Command me to doe any thing that's honest,
And for your noble end: but this it carries.
Mem. Ye shall not be so honour'd; live an Asse still,
And learne to spell for profit: goe, goe studie.
Eumen. Ye must not hold him up so, he is lost then.
Mem. Get thee to schoole agen, and talke of turnips,
And find the naturall cause out, why a dog
Turnes thrice about e're he ly downe: there's learning.
Pol. Come, I will doe it now; 'tis brave, I find it,
And now allow the reason.
Mem. O doe ye so sir,
Doe ye find it currant?
Pol. Yes, yes, excellent.
Mem. I told ye.
Pol. I was foolish: I have here too
The rarest way to find the truth out; hark ye,
Ye shall be rul'd by me.
Mem. I will be: but—
Po. I reach it,
If the worst fall, have at the worst: wee'le both goe
But two dayes, and 'tis thus; ha?

Mem. 'Twill doe well ſo
Pol. Then if not excellent, doe ye conceive it
Mem. 'Twill worke for certaine A bowle ready.
Pol. O 'twill tickle her
And you ſhall know then by a line
Mem. I like it
But let me not be fool'd againe
Pol. Doubt nothing
You doe me wrong then, get ye in there privat
As I have taught ye; Baſta
Mem. Worke (Exit Memnon.)
Pol. I will doe
Eumen. Have ye found the cauſe
Pol. Yes, and the ſtraingeſt, Gentlemen,
That ere I heard of, anon ile tell ye; Stremon
Be you ſtill neere him to affect his fancie
And keepe his thoughts off: Let the Foole and Boy
Stay him, they may doe ſome pleaſure too; Eumenes
VVhat if he had a wench, an handſome whore brought Rarely dreſt up, and taught to ſtare it?
Eumen. VVell Sir
Pol. His cauſe is meerly heat: and made beleeve
It were the Princeſſe mad for him,
Eumen. I thinke
'Twere not amiſſe.
1 Cap. And let him kiſſe her
Pol. VVhat els? (ſome
2 Cap. Ile be his bawde ant pleaſe you, young and hole-
I can aſſure ye he ſhall have
Eumen. Faith let him
Pol. A ſhall, I hope 'twill helpe him, walke a little
Ile tell you how his caſe ſtands, and my project
In which you muſt be mourners, but by all meanes
Stir not you from him: Stremon.
Strem. On our Lives Sir Exeunt.

See now a weepes, they all weep; a ſweeter ſorrow
I never look't upon, nor one that braver
Became his griefe; your will with ye.
Pol. Great Ladie Plucks out the Cup.
Excellent beauty
Cal. He ſpeakes handſomelie
What a rare rhetorician his griefe makes,
That ſtop was admirable
Pol. See ſee thou Princeſſe
Thou great commander of all hearts
Cal. I have found it,
Oh how my ſoule ſhakes:
Pol. See, ſee the noble hart
Of him that was the nobleſt: ſee and glory
Like the proud God himſelfe in what thou haſt put this'd
Behold the heart of Memnon: does it ſtart ye?

Cal.

Cal. Good gods, what has his wildenes done?
Pol. Looke boldlie
You boldlie sed you durst looke wretched woman,
Nay flie not back faire follie, 'tis too late now
Vertue and blooming honour bleed to death here,
Take it the Legacie of Love bequeath'd ye,
Of cruell Love, a cruell Legacie;
What was the will that wrought it? then can ye weepe?
Imbalme it in your truest teares?
If Women can weepe a truth, or ever sorrow sunck yet
Into the soule of your sex, for 'tis a Jewell
The VVorlds worth cannot weigh downe, (sorrowes
Take it Ladie; And with it all (I dare not curse) my
And may they turne to Serpents.
Eumen. How she lookes
Still upon him: see now a teare steales from her
2. Cap. But still she keepes her ey firme
Pol. Next read this,
But since I see your spirit somewhat troubled
Ile doe it for ye
2. Capt. Still she eyes him mainlie

Goe happy heart for thou shalt by
Intomb'd in her for whome I dy
Exemple of her cruelty.

Tell her if she chance to chide
Me for flowers in her pride
That it was for her I died.

If a teare escape her eye
'Tis not for my memory.
But thy rights of obsequy

The Altar was my loving breast
My heart the sacrificed beast
And I was my selfe she Preist

Your body was the sacred shrine
Your cruell mind the power divine
Pleas'd with hearts of men not kine

Eumen. Now it poures downe
Pol. I like it rarelie Ladie
Eumen. How greedily she swallowes up his language?
2. Cap. Her eye inhabits on him
Pol. Cruell Ladie,
Great as your beautie scornefull; had your power
But equall poise on all hearts; all hearts perish't;
But Cupid has more shafts then one, more flames too
And now he must be open ey'd, 'tis Justice:
Live to injoye your longing; live and laugh at
The losses and the miseries we suffer;
Live to be spoken when your crueltie
Has cut of all the vertue from this Kingdome
Turned honour into earth, and faithfull service
Cal. I sweare his angers excellent
Pol. Truth and most tried love
Into disdaine and downefall,
Calis. Still more pleasing,
Pol. Live then I say famous for civill slaughters,
Live and lay out your triumphs, guild your glories
Live and be spoken this is she this Ladie,
This goodly Ladie, yet most killing beautie;
This with the two edg'd eyes, the heart for hardnes
Out doing rockes; and coldnes, rockes of Christall
This with the swelling soule, more coye of Courtship
Then the proud sea is when the shores embrace him
Live till the mothers find ye, read your story
And sowe their barren curses on your beauty,
Till those that have enjoy'd their loves despise ye,
Till Virgins pray against ye, old age find ye
And even as wasted coales glow in their dying
So may the Gods reward ye, in your ashes:
But y'ar the Sister of my King; more prophecies
Els I should utter of ye true loves and loyall
Blesse themselves ever from ye: so I leave ye
Calis. Prithee be angry still young man: good faire Sir
Chide me againe, what woo'd this man doe pleas'd,
That in his passions can bewitch soules stay,
Eumen. Upon my life she loves him
Calis. Pray stay
Po. No
Cal. I doe command ye
Po. No, ye cannot Ladie
I have a spell against yee, Faith and Reason,
Yee are to weak to reach me: I have a heart too,
But not for hawkes meat, Ladie
Cal. Even for Charity
Leave me not thus afflicted: you can teach me
Po. How can you Preach that Charitie to others
That in your owne soule are an Athiest
Beleeving neither power nor feare: I trouble ye,
The Gods be good unto ye,
Cal. Amen.
Lucip. Ladie, She Swownes
Cle. O royall Madam, Gentlemen for heav'n sake, They
Po. Give her fresh air she comes again: away sirs come
And here stand close till we perceive the working back,
Eumen. Ye have undone all
Pol. So I feare
2. Cap. She loves ye
Eumen. And then all hopes lost this way
Pol. Peace she rises
Clean. Now for my purpose Fortune
Calis. Wher's the Gentleman
Lucip. Gone Madam
Cal. Why gone?
Lucip. Has dispatch't his business
Cal. A came to speake with me
A did,

Cal. For I had many questions
Lucip. On my Faith Madam, he
Talk't a great while to ye
Cal. Thou conceiv'st not.
He talk't not as he should doe; o my heart
Away with that sad sight; didst thou ere love me?
Lucip. Why doe you make that question?
Cal. If thou didst
Run, run wench, run: nay see how thou stir'st
Lucip. Whither?
Cal. If 'twer for any thing to please thy selfe
Thou wood'st run to th devill: but I am growne
Clean. Fie Ladie
Cal. I aske richie of your fortunes, nor your loves
None of your bent desires I lack, ye are not
In love with all men, are ye? one for shame
You will leave your honour'd mistris? why doe ye stare so
What is that ye see about mee, tell me;

Clean. Now for my fortune Exeunt Calis and

Though her bright beauty would entice an Angell

And let ſome letters to that end be fain'd too

Like the cold ſtubborne banks ſhe lies and hearkens
My words worſe: my ſame only and activitie hunts
Which were my ſtrength, my blinde, my youth, my faſhion,
Muſt woe her, win her, wed her; chaſtitie winds
And Women are not brought to bed with ſhadowes:
I doe her wrong, much wrong; ſhe is young and bleſſed,
Sweet as the ſpring, and as his bloſſomes gentler,
And I a nipping northwind, my thin haire hung
With hailes, and froſtie Iſicles: are the ſoules ſo too
When they depart hence, lame and old, and loveleſs?
No ſure, 'tis ever youth there; Time and Death
Follow our fleſh no more: and that ſtor'd opinion
That Spirits have no ſexes, I beleive not.

Enter Stremon like Orpheus.

There muſt be love, there is love: what not thou.

SONG.

Stre. Orpheus, I am come from the deep's below,
To thee fond man the plaguiſt of love ſo true:
To the faire fields where loves eternall dwell
Ther's none that ſinne, but ſir ſtrikes through hell.
Hailes and hearts, muſt ſir thou haſt loved ever,
Beleeve againe, thou ſhalt for theſe forgive ever.

Hark how they groane that dyed deſpairing,
O take heed thou
Hark how they houle for ever daring
Alleboſt woes mee.

They that be fooles, and dye for ſome
They die in their owne;
And they that bleed
Harke how they ſpeed.

Now in cold froſts and ſowthing ſires,
They ſit and curſe their laſt deſires:
Nor ſhall theſe ſoules be free from paines and feares,
Till women waſt them over in their teares.

Mem. How ſhould I know my paſſage is deni'de me
Or which of all the Devills dare
Eumen. This Song
Was rarely formed to fit him.

SONG.

Orph. Charon o Charon
Thou waſter of the ſoules to bliſſe or bane
Cha. Who calls the Fary man of Hell?
Or. Come neer
And ſay who lives in joye, and whom in feare.

Sternes of deſpaire, and gaſtly blaſt will blowe.
Orph. Shall time reſt as before?
Cha. No, no, no no.
Nor time nor death ſhe alter us, nor prayer;
My boate is darkneſſe, and whom ſhe receives
But thoſe againſt will come aboard to leave ſtill,
And ever by reaſon more ſick and ill.
Or. And when thy Miſtris ſhall cloſe up thine eyes?
Cha. Then come aboard and paſſe,
Or. Till when be wiſe.
Cha. Till when be wiſe.

This Lion was a man of Warres that died,
As thou wouldſt doe to guild her Ladies pride
This Dog a foole that hung himſelfe for love:
This Ape with daily hugging of a glove,
Forgot to eat and died. This goodly tree,
An uſher that till grew before his Ladie,
Wither'd at noone: This, for he could not woe,
A grumbling Lawyer: This good Bird a page,
That melted out becauſe he wanted age.
Still theſe lye houling on the Stygian ſhore,
O love no more, o love no more.

Exit Maskers.

Among the corne, they eat up all the Souldiers,
Clo. Are they so hungry? yet by their leave Chilax,

Chi. Dost thou love him still wench?
Clo. Why should I not? he had my Maiden head
And all my youth.

Or I shall loose my self,
Clo. My Husband sed ye?
Chi. Sed I? and will say Clo: nay and doe it
And doe it home too; Peg thee as close to him
As birdes are with a pinne to one another;

And heel be hanged unles he marry thee
Ere he maintaine thee: nowhe has Ladies, Courtiers

Chi. Come then, and lets dispatch this modicum
For I have but an howre to stay, a short one
Besides more water for another mill
An old weake over shot I must provide for,
Ther's an old Nunnerie at hand.

Clo. A pox consume it

Enter Cleanthe and Siphax.

Clean. A Souldier and so fearefull?
Si. Can ye blame me;
When such a waite lies on me?
Cle. Fye upon ye
I tell ye, ye shall have her: have her safelie,
And for your wife with her owne will,
Si. Good Sister-
Cle. What a distrustfull man are you? to morrow,
To morrow morning -
Si. Is it possible?
Can there be such a happines?
Cle. Why hang me
If then ye be not married: if to morrow night,
Ye doe not -
Si. O deare Sister -
Cle. What ye woo'd doe
What ye desire to doe, lie with her: Devill,
What a dull man are you?
Si. Nay I believe now,
And shall she love me?
Cle. As her life and stroke ye,
Si. O I will be her servant,
Cle. 'Tis your dutie,
Si. And she shall have her whole will,
Cle. Yes 'tis reason,
She is a Princes, and by that rule boundles
Si. What wood' you be, for I woo'd have ye Sister
Chuse some great place about us: as her woman
Is not so fit,
Cle. No, no, I shall find places:
Si. And yet to be a Ladie of her bedchamber,
I hold not so fit neither,
Some great title, beleeve it shall be look't out.
Clean. Ye may a Dutchesse
Or such a toye, a small thing pleases me Sir
Si. What you will Sister: if a neighbour Prince,
When we shall come to raigne -
Cle. We shall thinke on't,
Be ready at the time and in that place too,
And let me worke the rest, within this half houre,
The Princes will be going, 'tis almost morning
Away and mind your busines,
Si. Fortune blesse us. Exeunt.

Enter King, Polidor and Lords.

Pol. I doe beseech your grace to banish me.
King. Why Gentleman is she not worthy marriage?
Po. Most worthy, Sir, where worth againe shall meet her,
But I like thicke clouds sailing slow and heavy,
Although by her drawne higher, yet shall hide her
I dare not be a traitor; and 'tis treason,
But to imagin: as you love your honour -
King. 'Tis her first maiden doting and if crost,
I know it kills her.
1 Lord. How knowes your grace she loves him?
King. Her woman told me all; beside his story
Her maid Lucippe, on what reason to,
And tis beyond all but enjoying.
Po. Sir.
Even by your wisedome; by that great discretion
Ye owe to rule and order -
2 Lord. This man's mad sure,
To plead against his fortune -
1 Lord. And the King too,
Willing to have it so?
Po. By those dead Princes
From whose descents ye stand a starre admired at,
Lay not so base a lay upon your vertues
Take heed for honours sake take heed: the bramble
No wise man ever planted by the rose,
It canckers all her beauty; nor the vine
When her full blushes courts the sun dares any

Choake

Choke up with wanton Ivy? good my Lords,
Who builds a monument, the Basis Jasper,
And the maine body Brick?
2 Lord. Ye wrong your worth,
Ye are a Gentleman descended nobly.
1 Lord. In both bloods truly noble.
King. Say ye were not,
My will can make ye so.
Po. No, never, never;
'Tis not descent, nor will of Princes does it,
'Tis Vertue which I want, 'tis Temperance,
Man, honest man is't for your Majesty
Should call my drunkennesse, my rashnesse brother?
Or such a blessed Maid my breach of faith,
For I am most lacivious; and fell angers
In which I am also mischievous, her husband?
O Gods preserve her! I am wild as Winter,
Ambitious as the Devill: out upon me,
I hate my selfe, sir, if ye dare bestow her
Upon a Subject ye have one deserves her.
King. But him she does not love: I know your meaning.
This young mans love unto his noble brother,
Appeares a mirrour; what must now be done Lords?
For I am gravel'd, if she have not him:
She dies for certaine, if his brother misse her,
Farewell to him, and all our honours.
1 Lord. He is dead, sir,
Your Grace has heard of that, and strangely.
King. No,
I can assure ye no, there was a trick in't,
Read that, and then know all; what ailes the gentleman?
Hold him; how doe ye sir? Polidor is sick ath' sudden.
Pol. Sick ath' the sudden,
Extreamly ill, wondrous ill.
King. Where did it take ye?
Pol. Here in my head sir, and my heart, for heaven sake.
King. Conduct him to his chamber presently,
And bid my Doctors——
Po. No I shall be well sir,
I doe beseech your Grace, even for the Gods sake
Remember my poore brother, I shall pray then.
King. Away, he growes more weaker still: I will do it,
Or heaven for get me ever. Now your Counsells, Exit.
For I am at my wits end; what with you sir? Polidor.

Enter Messenger with a Letter.

Mess. Letters from warlike Pelius.
King. Yet more troubles?
The Spartans are in Armes, and like to win all:
Supplies are sent for and the Generall;
This is more crosse then tother; come let's to him,
For he must have her, 'tis necessitie,
Or we must lose our honours, let's plead all.
For more then all is needfull, shew all reason
If love can heare a that side, if she yeild
We have fought best and won the noblest field. Exeunt.

Enter Eumenes, Captaines, Stremon.

1 Cap. I have brought the wench, a lusty wench,
And somewhat like the Princesse.
Eumen. 'Tis the better, let's see her,
And goe you in and tell him, that her Grace
Is come to visit him? how sleeps he Stremon?
Strem. He cannot, only thinkes, and calls on Polidor,
Sweares a will not be fool'd; sometimes he rages,
And sometimes sits and muses. Exit. Stre.

Enter Whore, Captaine.

Eume. He's past all helpe sure:
How doe ye like her?
2 Cap. Byth' masse a good round Virgin,
And at first sight resembling, she is well cloth'd too.
Eume. But is she sound?
2 Cap. Of wind and limbe, I warrant her.
Eume. You are instructed Lady?
Who. Yes, and know sir
How to behave my selfe; ne're feare.
Eume. Polibius, o
Where did he get this Vermin?
1 Cap. Hang him Badger, (mates,
There's not a hole free from him, whores and whores
Doe all pay him obedience.
Eume. Indeed i'th' war,
His quarter was all whore, whore upon whore,
And linde with a whore, beshrew me 'tis a faire whore.
1 Cap. She has smockt away her blood; but fair or foule,
Or blind or lame, that can but lift her leg up
Comes not amisse to him, he rides like a night mare,
All ages, all Religions.
Eume. Can ye state it?
Who. I'le make a shift.
Eume. He must lie with ye, Lady.
Who. Let him, he's not the first man I have lain with,
Nor shall not be the last.

Enter Memnon.

2 Cap. A comes, no more words,
She has her lesson throughly; how he views her?
Eumen. Goe forward now, so, bravely, stand!
Mem. Great Lady,
How humbly I am bound——
Who. You shall not kneele sir,
Come, I have done you wrong; stand up my Souldier,
And thus I make amends—— Kisses him.
Eumen. A plague confound ye,
Is this your state?
2 Cap. 'Tis well enough.
Mem. O Lady,
Your royall hand, your hand my dearest beauty
Is more then I must purchase: here divine one,
I dare revenge my wrongs: ha?
1 Cap. A dam'd foule one.
Eum. The Lees of baudie prewnes mourning gloves?
All spoyl'd by heaven.
Mem. Ha! who art thou?
2 Cap. A shame on ye,
Ye clawing scabby whore.
Mem. I say, who art thou?
Eumen. Why 'tis the Princesse sir.
Mem. The divell sir,
'Tis some rogue thing.
Who. If this abuse be love sir,
Or I that laid aside my modesty——
Eum. So far thou't never find it.
Mem. Doe not weepe,
For if ye be the Princesse, I will love ye,
Indeed I will, and honour ye, fight for ye,
Come wipe your eyes; by heaven she stinkes; who art ta?
Stinkes like a poyson'd Ratt behind a hanging?
Woman, who art ta? like a rotten Cabbage.
2 Cap. Y'ar much to blame sir, 'tis the Princesse.
Mem. How?
Shee the Princesse?

Eumen. And the loving Princesse.
1. Capt. Indeed the doting Princesse.
Mem. Come hither once more,
The Princesse smells like mornings breath, pure Amber,
Beyond the coasted Indies in her spices,
Still a dead rat by heaven; thou art a Princesse.
Eumen. What a dull whore is this?
Mem. I'le tell ye presently,
For if she be a Princesse, as she may be
And yet stink too, and strongly, I shall find her;
Fetch the Numidian Lyon I brought over,
If she be sprung from royall blood, the Lyon
He'l doe ye reverence, els
Who. I beseech your Lordship?
Eumen. He'l teare her all to pieces.
Who. I am no Princesse, sir.
Mem. Who brought thee hither?
2. Capt. If ye confesse, wee'll hang ye.
Who. Good my Lord;
Mem. Who art thou then?
Who. A poore retaining whore, sir,
To one of your Lordships Captaines.
Mem. Alas poore whore,
Go, be a whore still, and stinke worse: Ha, ha ha Ex. Clot
What fooles are these, and coxcombes? Exit. Memnon.
Eumen. I am right glad yet,
He takes it with such lightnesse.
1. Cap. Me thinkes his face too,
Is not so clouded as it was; how he lookes?
Eumen. Where's your dead Rat?
2. Cap. The divell dine upon her
Lyons, why what a medicine had he gotten
To try a whore?

Enter Stremon.

Stre. Here's one from Polidor staies to speak with ye.
Eumen. With whom?
Stre. With all; where has the Generall bin?
Hee's laughing to himselfe extreamly.
Eumen. Come,
I'le tell thee how: I am glad yet he's so merry. Exeunt.

Finis Actus Quarti.

Actus Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Chilax and Priest, Calis, Lady and Nun.

Chi. What lights are those that enter there, still neerer?
Plague a your rotten itch, do you draw me hither
Into the Temple to betray me? was there no place
To satisfie your sin in? Gods forgive me,
Still they come forward;
Priest. Peace ye foole, I have found it,
'Tis the young Princesse Calis.
Chi. 'Tis the divell
To claw us for our catterwawling.
Pri. Retire softly,
I did not looke for you these two houres, Lady,
Beshrew your hast: that way,
Chi. That goes to th'Altar?
Ye old blind Beast.
Pr. I know not any way;
Still they come nearer,
I'le in to th'Oracle;
Chi. That's well remembred Ile in with ye;
Pr. Doe. Exeunt Priest & Chilax.

Enter Calis and her Traine with lights singing; Lucippe, Clarette.

SONG.

O faire sweet Goddesse, Queene of Loves,
Soft and gentle, as thy Doves,
Humble ey'd, and ever ruing
Those poore hearts, their Loves pursuing:
O thou mother of delights,
Crowner of all happy nights,
Starr of dearest content, and pleasure
Of mutuall loves the endlesse threasure,
Accept this sacrifice we bring
Thou eaternall youth and Spring.
Grant this Lady her desires,
And every hower, we'll crowne thy fires.

Exeunt a Nun.

Nun. You about her all prayre,
Whilst the Princesse feedes the fire,
When your Devotions ended be
To the Oracle I will attend ye. Exit. Nun & draws the Curten close to Calis.

Enter Stremon and Eumenes.

Strem. Hee will abroad.
Eumen. How does his humour hold him? (too,
Strem. He is now growne wondrous sad, weeps often
Talkes of his brother to himselfe, starts strangely.
Eum. Does he not curse?
Stre. No.
Eum. Nor breake out in furie,
Offering some new attempt?
Stre. Neither, toth' Temple
Is all we heare of now: what there he will doe;
Eumen. I hope repent his folly, let's be neare him.
Strem. Where are the rest?
Eumen. About a businesse
Concernes him mainly, if heav'n cure this madnesse,
He's man for ever Stremon.
Strem. Does the King know it?
Eumen. Yes, and much troubled with it, is now gone
To seeke his sister out.
Come let's away then. Exeunt Eumen. Stremon, Calis.

Enter Nun, she opens the Curtain to Calis. Calis at the Oracle, Arras.

Nun. Peace to your praiers Lady, will it please ye
To passe on to the Oracle.
Calis. Most humblie. Chilax & Priest in the Oracle.
Chi. Doe ye heare that?
Pr. Yes, lie close.
Chi. A wildfire take ye,
What shall become of me? I shall be hang'd now.
Is this a time to shake? a halter shake ye,
Come up and juggle, come.
Pr. I am monstrous fearfull.
Chi. Up ye old gaping Oyster, up and answer,
A mouldie mange upon your chops, ye told me
I was safe here till the Bell rung.
Pr. I was prevented,
And did not looke these three houres for the Princesse.
Chi. Shall we be taken?
Pr. Speake for loves sake Chilax?
I can not, nor I dare not. (that
Chi. I'le speake treason, for I had as lieve be hang'd for Pr. Good Chilax.

Chi.

Chi. Muſt it be ſung or ſed? what ſhall I tell 'em?
They are here? here now preparing.
Pr. O, my conſcience! (now?
Chi. Plague a your ſpurgall'd conſcience, does it tyre
Now when it ſhould be tuffeſt? I could make thee——
Pr. Save us, wee are both undone elſe.
Chi. Downe ye dog then,
Be quiet, and be ſtanch to no inundations.
Nun. Here kneele againe, and Venus grant your wiſhes.

Calis. O Divine ſtarre of Heaven,
Thou in power above the ſeven:
Thou ſweet kindler of deſires,
Till they grow to mutuall fires:
Thou, O gentle Queen that art,
Curer of each wounded heart.
Thou the fuell and the flame;
Thou in heaven, and here the ſame:
Thou the moore, and the wood:
Thou the hunger, and the food:
Thou the prayer, and the reward;
Thou what is, or ſhall be ſaid:
Thou ſtill young, and golden treſſed,
Make me by thy Anſwer bleſſed.

Chi. When?
Pr. Now ſpeake handſomly, and ſmall by all meanes,
I have told ye what. Thunder.
Chi. But I'le tell you a new tale
Now for my necke verſe; I have heard thy prayers,
And marke me well.

Muſicke. Venus deſcends.

Nun. The Goddeſſe is diſpleaſed much,
The Temple ſhakes and totters: ſhe appeares,
Bow, Lady, bow.

Venus. Purge me the Temple round,
And live by this example henceforth ſound
Virgin, I have ſeene thy teares,
Heard thy wiſhes and thy feares,
Thy holy Incence flew above
Harke therefore, thy doome is love,
Had thy heart bin ſoft at firſt,
Now thou had'ſt alayd thy thirſt:
Had thy ſtubborne will but bended,
All thy ſorrows here had ended;
Therefore be juſt in love,
And ſtrange fortune thou muſt prove,
And, for thou haſt bin ſterne and coy,
A dead love thou ſhalt enjoy.

Calis. O gentle goddeſſe!
Venus. Riſe, thy doome is ſed,
And feare not; I ſhall pleaſe thee with the dead. Venus
Nun. Goe up into the Temple and there end aſcends.
Your holy rites, the Goddeſſe ſmiles upon ye.
Exeunt Cal. & Nun.

Enter Chilax in his Robe.

Chi. I'le no more Oracles, nor Miracles,
Nor no more Church worke, Ile be drawn & hang'd firſt:
Am not I torne a pieces with the thunder?
Death, I can ſcarce believe I live yet,
It gave me on the buttocks, a cruell, a huge bang,
I had as lieve a had 'em ſcratcht with dog-whips;
Be quiet henceforth, now ye feele the end on't,
I would adviſe ye my old friends the good gentlewoman
Is ſtrucken dumbe, and there her grace ſits mumping
Like an old Ape eating a Brawn: ſure the good Goddeſſe
Knew my intent was honeſt, to ſave the Princeſſe.
And how we young men are entic'd to wickednеſſe
By theſe lewd women, I had paid for't els aboard
I am monſtrous holy now, and cruel fearefull,
O! 'twas a plaguy thump, charg'd with a vengeance.

Enter Siphax, walkes ſoftly over the Stage, and goes in.

Woo'd I were well at home, the beſt is 'tis por day:
Who's that? ha? Siphax? Ile be with you anon ſir,
Ye ſhall be Oracled I warrant ye,
And thunderd too as well as is your Lordſhip.

Enter Memnon, Eumenes, Strenon, and two carrying Torches.

Muſt needs enjoy the Princeſſe, yes, ha! torches?
And Memnon comming this way, he's dog mad,
And ten to one appearing thus unto him,
Hee worries me, I muſt goe by him.
Eumen. Sir?
Mem. Aske me no further queſtions; what art thou?
How doſt thou ſtare? ſtand off; nay looke upon me,
I doe not ſhake, nor feare thee. —— Draws his ſword.
Chi. A will kill me,
This is for Church worke.
Mem. Why doſt thou appeare now?
Thou wert fairly ſlain: I know thee Dioclas,
And know thine envie to mine honour: but——
Chi. Stay Memnon,
I am a Spirit, and thou canſt not hurt me.
Eumen. This is the voyce of Chilax.
Strem. What makes he thus?
Chi. 'Tis true that I was ſlaine in field, but fowly
By multitudes not manhood: therefore marke me,
I doe appeare againe to quit mine honour,
And on thee ſingle. ——
Mem. I accept the challenge.
Where?
Chi. On the Stigian banks
Mem. When?
Chi. Four dayes hence.
Mem. Goe noble Ghoſt, I will attend.
Chi. I thanke ye.
Strem. Ye have ſav'd your throat and handſomly:
Farwell ſir. Exi. Chi.
Mem. Sing me the Battell of Peluſium,
In which this Worthie died.
Eumen. This will ſpoile all, and make him worſe
Then ere he was, ſitt downe ſir,
And give your ſelfe to reſt.

Song.

Arme, arme, arme, arme, the Scouts are all come in
Keepe your rankes cloſe, and now your honours win.
Behold from yonder hill, the foe appeares,
Bowes, bills, glaves, arrowes ſhields, and Speares,
Like a darke wood he comes, or tempeſt powring,
O view the wings of horſe, the meadows ſcowring,
The vant-guard marches bravely, hark the Drums——dub,
They meet, they meet, now the Battell comes, (dub,
See how the Arrowes fly
That darken all the skie,
Harke how the Trumpets ſound,
Hark how the hills rebound, —— Tara-tara-tara.

Hark how the horſes chargein hotes in hotes ſu- tara, tara,
The Battell ſtaggers, now the wounds begin,
O how they cry,
O how they dy.
Roome for the valiant Memnon, arm'd with thunder,
See how he breakes the rankes aſunder:
They fly, they flie, Eumenes has the Chace,
And brave Polibius, makes good his place.
To the plaines, to the Woods,
To the Rocks, to the floods,
They fly for ſuccour: Follow, follow, follow, Hey, hey.
Harke how the Souldiers hollow
Brave Diocles is dead,
And all his Souldiers fled,
The battell's won, and loſt,
That many a life hath coſt.

Mem. Now forward to the Temple. Exeunt.

Enter Chilax.

Chi. Are ye gone?
How have I ſcapt this morning? by what miracle?
Sure I am ordain'd for ſome brave end.

Enter Cloe.

Cloe. How is it?
Chi. Come, 'tis as well as can be.
Cloe. But is it poſſible
This ſhould be true you tell me?
Chi. 'Tis moſt certaine.
Cloe. Such a groſſe Aſſe to love the Princeſſe?
Chi. Peace,
Pull your robe cloſe about ye: you are perfect
In all I taught ye.
Cloe. Sure.
Chi. Gods give thee good luck,
'Tis ſtrange my braines ſhould ſtill be beating knaverie
For all theſe dangers: but they are needfull miſchiefes,
And ſuch are Nuts to me, and I muſt doe 'em;
You will remember me——
Cloe. By this kiſſe Chilax.
Chilax. No more of that, I feare another Thunder.
Cloe. We are not i'th' Temple man.

Enter Siphax.

Chi. Peace, here he comes, (and Cloe.
Now to our buſineſſe handſomely: away now. Exi. Chilax
Siph. 'Twas ſure the Princeſſe, for he kneel'd unto her,
And ſhe lookt every way: I hope the Oracle
Has made me happy: me I hope ſhe lookt for.

Enter Chilax and Cloe at the other doore.

Fortune, I will ſo honour thee, Love ſo adore thee,
She is here againe lookes round about againe too,
'Tis done, I know 'tis done; 'tis Chilax with her,
And I ſhall know of him; whoſe that?
Chi. Speake ſoftly,
The Princeſſe from the Oracle.
Siph. She views me,
By heav'n ſhe beckens me.
Chi. Come neare, ſhe woo'd have ye.
Si. O royall Lady. Kiſſes her hand. (lence
Chi. She wills ye read that, for belike ſhe's bound to ſi-
For ſuch a time; ſhe is wondrous gracious to ye.
Si. Heav'n make me thankfull.
Chi. She woo'd have ye read it. He Reads.
Si. Siphax, the will of Heaven hath caſt me on thee
To be thy wife, whoſe will muſt be obay'd:
Uſe me with honour, I ſhall love thee dearly,
And make thee underſtand thy worths hereafter;
Convey me to a ſecret Ceremony,
That both our hearts and loves may be united,
And uſe no language, till before my brother
We both appeare, where I will ſhew the Oracle,
For till that time I am bound, I muſt not anſwer.
Siph. O happy I!
Chi. Ye are a made man.
Siph. But Chilax
Where are her women?
Chi. None but your Graces Siſter,
Becauſe ſhe would have it privat to the world yet,
Knowes of this buſineſſe.
Siph. I ſhall thanke the Chilax,
Thou art a carefull man.
Chi. Your Graces ſervant.
Siph. I'le find a fit place for thee.
Chi. If you will not,
There's a good Lady yo[u]. ſhe points yee forward,
Away and take your fortune; not a word ſir,
So, you are greas'd I hope. Exi. Siph. & Cloe. manet Chi.

Enter Stremon, Foole and Boy.

Chi. Stremon, Foole, Picus.
Where have you left your Lord?
Strem. I'th' Temple Chilax.
Chi. Why are ye from him?
Strem. Why the King is with him,
And all the Lords.
Chi. Is not the Princeſſe there too.
Strem. Yes,
And the ſtrangeſt coile amongſt 'em: She weeps bitterly,
The King entreats, and frownes, my Lord like Autumne
Drops off his hopes by handfulls, all the Temple
Sweats with this Agonie.
Chi. Where's young Polidor?
Strem. Dead as they ſaid o'th' ſudden.
Chi. Dead?
Strem. For certaine,
But not yet knowne abroad.
Chi. There's a new trouble,
A brave young man he was; but we muſt all die.
Strem. Did not the Generall meet you this morning
Like a tall ſtallion Nun?
Chi. No more a that Boy.
Strem. You had been terreting.
Chi. That's all one, Foole;
My Maſter foole that taught my wits to trafique,
What has your wiſdome done? how have you profited?
Out with your Audit, come; you are not emptie,
Put out mine eye with twelve pence? do you ſhaker?,
What thinke you of this ſhaking? here's wit coxcombe
Ha boyes? ha my fine raſcalls, here's a Ring, Pulls out a
How right they goe? (Purſe.
Foole. O let me ring the fore-bell.
Chi. And here are thumpers, Chickens, golden rogues,
Sit, wit ye raſcalls.
Foole. I have a Sty here Chilax.
Chi. I have no gold to cure it, not a penny,
Not one groſſe Cavalier; we are dull Souldiers,
Groſſe, heavy-headed fellowes; fight for victualls?
Foole. Why; ye are the ſpirits of the time.
Chi. By no meanes.
Foole. The valiant fire.
Chi. Fy, fie no.
Foole. Be-lee-me ſir.
Chi. I woo'd I could ſir.
Fool. I will ſatiſfie ye.
Chi. But I will not content you; alas poore boy,

Thou.

Thou shewst an honest nature weepes for thy Master,
There's a red rogue to buy thee handkerchers.
Foole. A was an honest Gentleman, I have lost too.
Chi. Ye have indeed your labour Foole; but Stremon,
Doest thou want money too? no vitue living?
No firking out at fingers ends?
Strem. It seemes so.
Chi. Will ye all serve me?
Strem. Yes, when ye are Lord Generall,
For lesse I will not goe.
Chi. There's gold for thee then,
Thou hast a souldiers minde, Foole.
Fool. Here, your first man.
Chi. I will give thee for thy wit, for 'tis a fine wit,
A daintie diving wit, hold up; just nothing,
Goe graze i'th' commons, yet I am mercifull
There's six pence; buy a Saucer, steale an old gowne,
And beg i'th' Temple for a Prophet, come away boyes,
Let's see how things are carried, Foole, up sirra,
You may chance get a dinner: Boy your preferment
I'le undertake, for your brave Masters sake,
You shall not perish.
Fool. Chilax.
Chi. Please me well Foole,
And you shall light my pipes: Away to th' Temple.
But stay, the Kings here, sport upon sport Boyes.

Enter King, Lords, Siphax kneeling, Cloe with a Vaile.

King. What would you have Captaine,
Take suddenly, for I am wondrous busie.
Siph. A Pardon, Royall sir.
King. For what?
Siph. For that,
Which was heav'n will, I could not be mine alone sir;
My marrying with this Lady.
King. It needs no Pardon,
For marriage is no sin.
Si. Not in it selfe, sir,
But in presuming too much: Yet heav'n knowes
So does the Oracle that cast it on me,
And — the Princesse, royall sir.
King. What Princesse?
Siph. O be not angrie, my dread King, your Sister.
King. My sister? she's i'th' Temple man.
Siph. She is here sir.
Lord. The Captain's mad, she is kneeling at the Altar.
King. I know she is, with all my heart good Captain,
I do forgive ye both: be unvail'd Lady; Puts off her vaile
Will ye have more forgivenes? the mans frantick,
Come let's goe bring her out: God give yee joy, sir.
Siph. How? Cloe? my old Cloe? Exit. King, Lords.
Cloe. Even the same sir.
Chi. Gods give your manhood much content.
Strem. The Princesse
Lookes something multie since her comming over.
Fool. 'Twere good, you'd brush her over.
Siph. Fooles and Fidlers
Make sport at my abuse too.
Foole. O 'tis the nature
Of us Fooles to make bold with one another,
But you are wise, brave sirs.
Chi. Cheere up your Princesse,
Believe it sir, the King will not be angry,
Or say he were; why 'twas the Oracle,
The Oracle, and like your Grace, the Oracle.
Strem. And who, most mighty Siphax?
Siph. With mine owne whore. (science,
Cloe. With whom els should ye marry, speak your con-
Will ye transgresse the law of Armes, that ever
Rewards the Souldier with his owne sins?
Siph. Devills.
Cloe. Ye had my maiden-head, my youth, my sweetnes,
Is it not justice then? —
Siph. I see it must be,
But by this hand, I'le hang a lock upon thee.
Cloe. You shall not need, my honesty shall doe it.
Siph. If there be wars in all the world —
Cloe. I'le with ye,
For you know, I have bin a souldier,
Come, curse on: when I need another Oracle.
Chi. Send for me Siphax, I'le fit ye with a Princesse,
And so to both your honours.
Foole. And your graces.
Siph. The Devill grace ye all.
Cloe. God a mercy Chilax,
Chi. Shall we laugh halfe an houre now?
Strem. No, the King comes,
And all the traine.
Chi. Away then, our Act's ended. Exeunt.

Enter King, Calis. Memnon and Cleanthe, Curtisan, Lords.

King. You know he do's deserve ye, loves ye dearly,
You know what bloody violence had us'd The Hearse
Upon himselfe, but that his brother crost it, ready Poli-
You know the same thoughts still inhabit in him der, En-
And covet to take birth: Look on him Lady, menes the
The wars have not so far consum'd him yet, Captains
Cold age disabled him, or sicknesse sunk him
To be abhorr'd: looke on his Honour sister,
That beares no stamp of time, no wrinkles on it,
No sad demolishment, nor death can reach it:
Looke with the eyes of heaven that nightlie waken,
To view the wonders of my glorious Maker,
And not the weaknesse: looke with your vertuous eyes,
And then clad royaltie in all his conquests;
His matchlesse love hung with a thousand merits
Eternall youth attending, Fame and Fortune,
Time and Oblivion vexing at his vertues,
He shall appeare a miracle: looke on our dangers,
Looke on the publique ruine.
Calis. O, deare brother.
King. Fie, let us not like proud and greedy waters
Gaine, to give off againe: this is our Sea,
And you his Cynthia, govern him, take heed,
His flouds have bin as hie, and full as any,
And gloriously now is got up to the girdle,
The Kingdomes he hath purchas'd; noble Sister,
Take not your vertue from him, O take heed
We ebbe not now to nothing, take heed Calis.
Calis. The wil of heaven not mine, which must not alter,
And my eternall doome for ought I know
Is fixt upon me; alas, I must love nothing,
Nothing that loves againe must I be blest with:
The gentle Vine climbs up the Oke and clips him,
And when the stroke comes, yet they fall together;
Death, death must I enjoy, and live to love him,
O noble Sir!
Mem. Those teares are some reward yet,
Pray let me wed your sorrowes.

Calis.

Calis. Take 'em Souldier,
They are fruitfull ones, lay but a fight upon 'em,
And ſtrait they will conceive to infinites;
I told ye what, ye could find 'em,
Roome before there. Knock.

Enter Funerall, Captaines following, and Esmenes.

King. How now, what's this? more drops to th'Ocean?
Whole body's this?
Capt. The noble Polidor,
This ſpeakes his death.
Mem. My Brother dead?
Calis. O Goddeſſe!
O cruell, cruell Venus, here's my fortune.
King. Read Captaine.
Mem. Read aloude: farewell my follies. Esmen reades

To the Excellent Princeſſe Calis.

1. Cap. Be wiſe, as you are beauteous, love with judge-
And look with clear eyes on my noble Brother, (ment,
Value deſert and vertue, they are Jewells,
Fit for your worth and wearing: take heed Lady,
The Gods reward ingratitude moſt grievous;
Remember me no more, or if you muſt,
Seeke me in noble Memnons love, I dwell there:
I durſt not live, becauſe I durſt not wrong him,
I can no more, make mee eternall happy
With looking downe upon your loves.
Farewell.

Mem. And did'ſt thou die for me?
King. Excellent vertue!
What will ye now doe?
Calis. Dwell for euer here ſir.
Mem. For me deare Polidor? ô worthy young man!
O love, love, love, love above recompence!
Infinite love, infinite honeſty!
Good Lady leave, you muſt have no ſhare here,
Take home your ſorrowes: here's enough to ſtore me,
Brave glorious griefes! was ever ſuch a brother?
Turne all the ſtories over in the world yet,
And ſearch through all the memories of mankind,
And find me ſuch a friend; h'as out-done all,
Outſtript 'em ſheerely, all, all, thou haſt Polidor,
To die for me; why, as I hope for happineſſe,
'Twas one of the rareſt thought on things
The braveſt, and carried beyond compaſſe of our actions,
I wonder how he hit it, a young man too,
In all the bloſſomes of his youth and beautie,
In all the fulneſſe of his veines and wiſhes
Woed by that Paradice, that would catch heaven;
It ſtarts me extreamly, thou bleſt Aſhes,
Thou faithfull monument, where loue and friendſhip
Shall while the world is, worke new miracles.
Calis. O! let me ſpeake too.
Mem. No not yet, thou man,
For we are but mans ſhadowes, only man,
I have not words to utter him; ſpeake Lady,
I'le thinke a while.
Calis. The Goddeſſe grants me this yet,
I ſhall enjoy the dead: no tombe ſhall hold thee
But theſe two armes, no Trickments but my teares
Over thy Hearſe, my ſorrowes like ſad armes
Shall hang for ever: on the tuffeſt Marble
Mine eyes ſhall weepe thee out an Epitaph,
Love at thy feet ſhall kneele, his ſmart bow broken;
Faith at thy head, youth and the Graces mourners;
O ſweet young man!
King. Now I begin to melt too.
Mem. Have ye enough yet Lady? roothe for a gamſter
To my fond Love, and all thoſe idle fancies
A long farwell, thou dieſt for me deare Polidor,
To give me peace, thou haſt eternall glory,
I ſtay and talke here; I will kiſſe thee firſt,
And now I'le follow thee. Polidor riſes.
Pollidor. Hold, for heavens ſake!
Mem. Ha!
Does he live?
Doſt thou deceive me?
Pol. Thus farre,
Yet for your good, and honour.
King. Now deare ſiſter;
Calis. The Oracle is ended, noble ſir,
Diſpoſe me now as you pleaſe.
Po. You are mine then?
Calis. With all the joyes that may be.
Po. Your conſent ſir;
King. Ye have it freely.
Po. Walke along with me then,
And as you love me, love my will.
Calis. I will ſo.
Po. Here worthy Brother, take this vertuous Princeſſe,
Ye have deſerv'd her nobly, ſhe will love ye,
And when my life ſhall bring ye peace, as ſhe does,
Command it, ye ſhall have it.
Mem. Sir, I thanke ye.
King. I never found ſuch goodneſſe in ſuch yeares.
Mem. Thou ſhalt not over-doe me, though I die for't,
O how I love thy goodneſſe, my beſt brother,
You have given me here a treaſure to enrich me,
Would make the worthieſt King alive a begger,
What may I give you back againe?
Po. Your love ſir.
Mem. And you ſhall have it, even my deareſt love,
My firſt, my nobleſt love, take her againe, ſir,
She is yours, your honeſty has over-run me,
She loves ye, lov'ſt her not? excellent Princeſſe,
Injoy thy wiſh, and now get Generalls.
Po. As ye love heaven, love him, ſhe is only yours, ſir.
Mem. As ye love heaven, love him, ſhe is only yours, ſir;
My Lord, the King.
Po. He will undoe himſelfe ſir,
And muſt without her periſh; who ſhall fight then?
Who ſhall protect your Kingdome?
Mem. Give me hearing,
And after that beliefe, were ſhe my ſoule
(As I doe love her equall) all my victories,
And all the living names I have gain'd by warre,
And loving him that good, that vertuous good man,
That only worthy of the name of brother,
I would reſigne all freely, 'tis all love
To me, all marriage rites, the joy of iſſues
To know him fruitfull, that has been ſo faithfull. (ſter.
King. This is the nobleſt difference-take your choiſe ſi-
Calis. I ſee they are ſo brave, and noble both,
I know not which to looke on.
Pol. Chuſe diſcreetly,
And vertue guide ye, there all the world in one man
Stands at the marke.
Mem. There all mans honeſtie,
The ſweetneſſe of all youth —
Cal. O God's!

Mem.

Mem. My Armour,
By all the God's ſhe's yours; my armes, I ſay,
And I beſeech your Grace, give me imployment,
That ſhall be now my Miſtreſſe: here my Courtſhip.
King. Ye ſhall have any thing.
Mem. Vertuous Lady,
Remember me, your ſervant now; Young man,
You cannot over-reach me in your goodneſſe;
O love! how ſweet thou look'ſt now? and how gentle,
I ſhould have ſlubber'd thee, and ſtain'd thy beauty;
Your hand, your hand ſir;
King. Take her, and Heaven bleſſe her.
Mem. So.
Po. 'Tis your will ſir, nothing of my merit;
And as your royall gift, I take this bleſſing.
Cal. And I from heaven this gentleman: thanks Goddeſs.
Mem. So ye are p'eas'd now Lady;
Cal. Now or never.
Mem. My cold ſtiffe carkaſſe, would have frozen ye,
Warres, warres.
King. Ye ſhall have warres.
Mem. My next brave battell
I dedicate to your bright honour (ſiſter,)
Give me a ſavour, that the world may know
I am your ſouldier.
Calis. This, and all faire Fortunes. (boldly.
Mem. And he that beares this from me, muſt ſtrike
Cleanthe kneeling.
Cal. I do forgive thee: be honeſt, no more wench.
King. Come now to Revells, this bleſt day ſhall prove
The happy crown of noble Faith and Love. Exeunt.

Prologue.

TO pleaſe all's impoſſible, and to deſpaire
Ruins our ſelves, and dampes the Writers care:
would we knew what to doe, or ſay, or when
To find the mindes here equall with the men:
But we muſt venture; now to Sea we goe,
Faire fortune with us, give us roome, and blow;
Remember ye'ar all venturers; and in this Play
How many twelve-pences ye have 'ſtow'd this day:
Remember for returne of your delight, (ſpight:
we launch, and plough through ſtormes of feare, and
Give us your fore-windes fairely, fill our wings,
And ſteere us right, and as the Saylors ſing,
Loden with Wealth, on wanton ſeas, ſo we
Shall make our home-bound-voyage chearfully;
And you our noble Merchants, for your treaſure
Share equally the fraught, we run for pleaſure.

Epilogue.

HEre lyes the doubt now, let our Playes be good,
Our owne care ſayling equall in this Flood;
Our preparations new, new our Attire,
Yet here we are becalm'd ſtill, ſtill i'th' mire,
Here we ſtick faſt; Is there no way to cleare
This paſſage of your judgement, and our feare,
No mittigation of that law? Brave friends,
Conſider we are yours, made for your ends,
And every thing preſerves it ſelfe, each will
If not perverſe, and crooked, utters ſtill
The beſt of that it ventures in: have care
Ev'n for your pleaſures ſake, of what we are,
And doe not ruine all: You may frowne ſtill.
But 'tis the nobler way, to check the will.

FINIS.

Alon. My Armour.
By all the God's there's yours; my arms, I lay.
And I beseech your Grace give me employment.
That I may show my Loyalty: here my Courtship.
King. Ye shall have any thing.
Alon. Victorious Lady,
Remember me, your servant now; Young man,
You cannot over-reach me in your goodness;
O love how much you look'd now? and how gentle,
I found I have lubber'd thee, and slain thy beauty;
Your hand, your hand sir;
King. Take her, and leave on bleak her.
Alon. So.
Pe. 'Tis your will sir nothing of my merit;
And as your royall gift I take this blessing.
Cal. And from him this gentle courtesie.

Alon. Soy're a sweet pair'd now Lady;
Cal. Now or never.
Alon. My cold limbs carkaine would have it so on ye.
Warm me waiters.
King. Ye shall have warres.
Alon. My next brave battell
I dedicate to your bright bosome (Sister,)
Give me a favour that the world may know
I am your Soldier.
Cal. This, and all faire Fortune. (boldly.
Alon. And be that dares this from me, must strike
Thereby warning.
Cal. I do forgive thee: be bonest no more sir.
King. Come now to Revells this high day in prove
The happy crown of noble Faith and Love. Exeunt.

Prologue.

TO please all's impossible, and to displease
Reasons our Judges, and deserving Actors
To please the meanest we expect with the same
Pains we must operate on to Scenes and Gloss;
Fairs we must have, and Gallants, and Gallons;
Somewhat to laugh at, or else, or when
Remember for pretence or your delight, (Knights:
We hunch, and plough through Rooms of Fears, and
Gains our favour, and all our wishes,
Shall we our Poems, and our Stories frame,
Shall we our Play-mates, our own pleasures
Shall we make Paradise, to please the Sense:

Epilogue.

HEre lyes the doubt now, let our Plaies be good,
Our own true Fame pleading, shall in that Flood;
Our preparations new, our dainty,
The Scenes are handsome, all, all, th' privy,
Have us dark fair; to observe my to clear
This pallaged, our judgement, and our fear,
Nor tis that Law? private friends,
Consider we are ours, made for your ends,
And every thing performes it fully, each will
If not pertayle, and wonder, utters fill
The life of that it contains in: large care
Rests for your pleasures Fate, of what are,
And for not mine all: You may Comes fill,
But for the noble way, to chuse the best.

THE SPANISH CURAT.

Actus Primus. Scæna Prima.

Enter Angelo, Milanes, Arsenio.

Arsenio. Leandro paid all.

Mil. 'Tis his usuall custome,
And requisite he should: he has now put off
The Funerall black, (your rich heirs weares with joy,
When he pretends to weep for his dead Father,)
Your gathering Sires, so long heape match together,
That their kind Sonnes, to rid them of their care
Wish them in heaven; Or if they take a taste
Of Purgatory by the way, it matters not:
Provided they remove hence; What is befalne
To his Father, in the other world, I ask not,
I am sure his prayre is heard: would I could use one
For mine, in the same method.

Arsen. Fy upon thee.
This is prophane,

Mil. Good Doctor, doe not schoole me,
For a fault you are not free from: On my life
Were all Heires in Cordoba, put too their oathes
They would confesse with me, 'tis a sound Tenet:
I am sure Leandro do's.

Arf. He is th'owner
Of a faire Estate.

Mil. And fairly he deserves it,
He's a royall Fellow: yet observes a meane
In all his courses, carefull to on whom
He showres his bounties: he that's liberall
To all alike, may doe a Good by chance,
But never out of Judgement: This invites
The prime men of the Citie to frequent
All places he reforts to, and are happy
In his sweet Converse.

Arf. Don Jamie the Brother
To the Grandee Don Henrique, appeares much taken
With his behaviour.

Mil. There is something more in't:
Hee needs his Purse, and knowes how to make use on't,
'Tis now in fashion for your Don, that's poore,
To vow all Leagues of friendship with a Merchant
That can supply his wants, and howsoe're
Don Jamie's noble borne, his elder Brother
Don Henrique rich, and his Revenues long since
Encreasing by marrying with a wealthy Heire
Call'd Madam Violante, he yet holds
A hard hand o're Jamie, allowing him
A bare annuity onely.

Arf. Yet 'tis said
He hath no child, and by the Lawes of Spaine
If he die without issue, Don Iamie
Inherits his Estate.

Mil. Why that's the reason
Of their so many jarres: Though the young Lord
Be sick of the elder Brother, and in reason
Should flatter, and observe him, he's of a nature
Too bold and fierce, to stoop so, but beares up,
Presuming on his hopes.

Arf. What's the young Lad
That all of 'em make so much of?

Mil. 'Tis a sweet-One,
And the best condition'd youth, I ever saw yet,
So humble and so affable, that he wins
The love of all that know him, and so modest,
That (in despight of povertie) he would starve
Rather then aske a courtesie; He's the Sonne
Of a poore cast-Captaine, one Octavio,
And She, that once was called th' faire Lucinda,
Is happy in being his Mother: for his sake.

Enter Jamie, Leandro, and Arsenio.

(Though in their Fortunes saine) they are esteem'd of,
And cherish'd by the best. O here they come,
I now may spare his Character, but observe him,
Hee'l justifie my report.

Ia. My good Arsenio
Repaire more often to me: above Women
Thou ever shalt be welcome.

Asc. My Lord your favours
May quickly teach a raw undreut'd Youth
To be both rude and saveie.

Leandro. You cannot be
Too frequent, where you are so much desir'd:
And give me leave (deare friend) to be your Rivall
In part of his Affection; I will buy it
At any rate.

Ia. Stood I but now possess'd

Of what my future hope preſages to me,
I then would make it cleare thou hadſt a Patron
That would not ſay but do: yet as I am,
Be mine, I'le not receive thee as a ſervant,
But as my Son (and though I want my ſelf)
No Page attending in the Court of Spain
Shall find a kinder maſter.
Arſ. I beſeech you
That my refuſall of ſo great an offer
May make no ill conſtruction, 'tis not pride
(That common vice is farre from my condition)
That makes you a denyall to receive
A favour I ſhould ſue for: nor the faſhion
Which the country followes, in which to be a ſervant
In thoſe that groan beneath the heavy weight
Of povertie is held an argument
Of a baſe and abject mind, I wiſh my yeares
Were fit to do you ſervice in a nature
That might become a Gentleman (give me leave
To think my ſelf one) My father ſerv'd the King
As a Captain in the field; and though his fortune
Return'd him home a poore man, he was rich
In reputation, and wounds fairly taken.
Nor am I by his ill ſucceſſe deterr'd,
I rather feel a ſtrong deſire that ſwayes me
To follow his Profeſſion, and if heaven
Hath marked me out to be a man, how proud,
In the ſervice of my Country, ſhould I be,
To traile a pike under your brave command.
There, I would follow you as a guid to honour,
Though all the horrours of the Warre made up
To ſtop my paſſage.
Ia. Thou art a hopefull Boye,
And it was bravely ſpoken: For this anſwer,
I love thee more then ever.
Mil. Pitty ſuch ſeeds
Of promiſing courage ſhould not grow and proſper
Ang. What ever his reputed Parents bee,
He hath a mind that ſpeakes him right and noble.
Lea. You make him bluſh: it needs not ſweet Aſcanio,
We may heare praiſes when they are deſerv'd,
Or modeſtie unwounded. By my life
I would adde ſomething to the building up
So fair a mind, and if till you are fit
To beare Armes in the field, you'l ſpend ſome yeares
In Salamanca, I'le ſupply your ſtudies
With all conveniences.
Arſ. Your goodneſſe (Signiors)
And charitable favours overwhelm me.
If I were of your blood, you could not be
More tender of me: what then can I pay
(A poore boy and a ſtranger) but a heart
Bound to your ſervice? with what willingnes
I would receive (good Sir) your noble offer,
Heaven can beare witnes for me: but alas
Should I embrace the meanes to raiſe my fortunes,
I muſt deſtroy the lives of my poore Parents
(To whom I ow my being) they in me
Place all their comforts, and (as if I were
The light of their dim eyes) are ſo indulgent
They cannot brook one ſhort dayes abſence from me;
And (what will hardly win belief) though young,
I am their ſteward and their nurſe: the bounties
Which others beſtow on me ſerves to ſuſtain 'em,
And to forſake them in their age, in me
Were more then murther.

Enter Henrique.

Ang. This is a kind of begging
Would make a Broker charitable.
Mil. Here (ſweet heart)
I wiſh that it were more.
Lean. When this is ſpent,
Seek for ſupply from me
Ia. Thy pietie
For ever be remembred: nay take all,
Though 't were my exhibition to a Royall
For one whole yeare.
Aſc. High heavens reward your goodnes.
Hen. So Sir, is this a ſlip of your own grafting,
You are ſo prodigall?
Ia. A ſlip Sir?
Hen. Yes,
A ſlip; or call it by the proper name
Your Baſtard.
Ia. You are foul-mouth'd; do not provoke me,
I ſhall forget your Birth, if you proceed,
And uſe you, (as your manners do deſerve) uncivilly.
Hen. So brave? pray you give me hearing,
Who am I Sir?
Ia. My elder Brother: One
That might have been born a fool and ſo reputed,
But that you had the luck to creep into
The world a yeare before me.
Lean. Be more temperate.
Ia. I neither can nor will, unleſſe I learn it
By this example: let him uſe his harſh
Unſavoury reprehenſions upon thoſe
That are his hinds, and not on me. The Land
Our father left to him alone rewards him,
For being twelve moneths elder, let that be Forgotten, and let his Paraſites remember
One quality of worth or vertue in him
That may authoriſe him, to be a cenſurer
Of me, or of my manners, and I will Acknowledge him for a tutor, til then, never
Hen. From whom have you your meanes Sir?
Ia. From the will
Of my dead father; I am ſure I ſpend not
Nor give't upon your purſe.
Hen. But will it hold out
Without my help?
Ia. I am ſure it ſhall I'le ſink elſe
For ſooner I will ſeek aid from a whore,
Then a courteſie from you.
Hen. 'Tis well; you are proud of
Your new Exchequer when you have cheated him
And worn him to the quick, I may be found
In the Liſt of your acquaintance'
Lea. Pray you hold
And give me leave (my Lord) to ſay thus much
(And in mine own defence) I am no Gull
To be wrought on by perſwaſions nor no Coward
To be beaten out of my meanes, but know to whom
And why I give or lend, and will do nothing
But what my reaſon warrants; you may be
As ſparing as you pleaſe, I muſt be bold
To make uſe of mine own, without your licence.
Ia. 'Pray thee let him alone, he is not worth thy anger
All that he do's (Leandro) is for my good,
I think there's not a Gentleman of Spain,
That ha's a better ſteward, then I have of him.
Hen. Your ſteward Sir?

Ja. Yes, and a provident one:
Why, he knowes I am given to large Expence,
And therefore layes up for me: could you believe els
That he, that ſixteen years hath worne the yoke
Of barren wedlock, without hope of iſſue,
(His Coffer's full, his Lands, and Vineyards fruitfull)
Could be ſo ſold to baſe, and ſordid thrift,
As almoſt to deny himſelfe, the meanes
And neceſſaries of life? Alas, he knowes
The Lawes of Spaine appoint me for his heire,
That all muſt come to me, if I out-live him,
(Which ſure I muſt doe, by the courſe of Nature,)
And the aſſiſtance of good Mirth, and Seck,
How ever you prove Melancholy.
Hen. If I live,
Thou dearly ſhalt repent this,
Ja. When thou art dead,
I am ſure I ſhall not.
Mil. Now they begin to burn
Like oppos'd Meteors.
Arſ. Give them line, and way,
My life for Don Jamie.
Ja. Continue ſtill
The excellent Husband, and joyne Farme to Farme,
Suffer no Lordſhip, that in a cleare day
Falls in the proſpect of your coveteous eye
To be an others; Forget you are a Grandee
Take uſe upon uſe, and cut the throats of heires
With cozening Mort-gages: rack your poore Tenants,
Till they looke like ſo many Skeletons
For want of Food; And when that Widowes curſes,
The ruines of ancient Families, teares of Orphans
Have hurried you to the divell, ever remember
All was rak'd up, for me, (your thankfull Brother)
That will dance merrily upon your Grave,
And perhaps give a double Piſtolet
To ſome poore needy Frier, to ſay a Maſſe
To keep your Ghoſt from walking.
Hen. That the Law
Should force me to endure this!
Ia. Verely,
When this ſhall come to paſſe (as ſure it will)
If you can find a loope-hole, though in hell
To looke on my behaviour, you ſhall ſee me
Ranſack your Iron Cheſts, and once againe
Pluto's flame-colour'd Daughter ſhall be free
To dominier in Taverns, Maskes, and Revells
As ſhe was us'd, before ſhe was your Captive.
Me thinkes the meere conceipt of it, ſhould make you
Goe home ſick and diſtemper'd, if it do's.
I'le ſend you a Doctor of mine owne, and after
Take order for your Funerall.
Hen. You have ſaid, ſir,
I will not fight with words, but deeds to tame you,
Reſt confident I will, and thou ſhalt wiſh
This day thou hadſt been dumb. — Exit.
Mil. You have given him a heat.
But with your owne diſtemper.
Ia. Not a whit
Now he is from mine eye, I can be merry,
Forget the cauſe, and him: all plagues goe with him.
Let's talke of ſomething els: what newes is ſtirring?
Nothing to paſſe the time?
Mil. 'Faith, it is ſaid
That the next Summer will determine much
Of that we long have talk'd of, touching the Wars.
Lea. What have we to doe with them? Let us diſcourſe
Of what concernes our ſelves. 'Tis now in faſhion
To have you Gallants ſet downe, in a Taverne,
What the Arch-Dukes purpoſe is the next ſpring, & what Defence my Lords (the States) prepare: what courſe
The Emperour takes againſt the encroching Turke,
And whither his Moony-Standards are deſign'd
For Perſia or Polonia: and all this
The wiſer ſort of State-Wormes ſeeme to know
Better then their owne Affaires: this is diſcourſe
Fit for the Counſell it concernes; we are young,
And if that I might give the Theame, 'twere better
To talke of handſome women.
Mil. And that's one,
Almoſt as generall.
Arſ. Yet none agree
Who are the faireſt.
Lea. Some preſer the French,
For their conceited Dreſſings: ſome the plump
Italian Bona-Robas, ſome the State
That ours obſerve; and I have heard one ſweare,
(A merry friend of mine) that once in London,
He did enjoy the company of a Gameſter,
(A common Gameſter too) that in one night
Met him th'Italian, French, and Spaniſh waies,
And ended in the Dutch; for, to coole her ſelfe,
She kiſs'd him drunke in the morning.
Ia. Wee may ſpare
The travell of our tongues in forraigne Nations,
When in Cordoba, if you dare give credit
To my report (for I have ſeene her, Gallants)
There lives a woman) of a meane birth too,
And meanly match'd) whoſe all-excelling Forme
Diſdaines compariſon with any She
That puts in for a faire one, and though you borrow
From every Country of the Earth the beſt
Of thoſe perfections, which the Clymat yeilds
To help to make her up, if put in Ballance,
This will weigh-downe the Scale.
Lea. You talke of wonders.
Ia. She is indeed a wonder, and ſo kept,
And, as the world deſerv'd not to behold
What curious Nature made without a patterne,
Whoſe Copy ſhe hath loſt too, ſhe's ſhut up,
Sequeſtred from the world.
Lea. Who is the owner
Of ſuch a Jem? I am fir'd.
Ia. One Bartolus,
A wrangling Advocate.
Arſ. A knave on Record.
Mil. I am ſure he cheated me of the beſt part
Of my Eſtate.
Ia. Some Buſineſſe calls me hence,
(And of importance) which denies me leiſure
To give you his full character: In few words
(Though rich) he's covetous beyond expreſſion,
And to encreaſe his heape, will dare the Divell,
And all the plagues of darkneſſe: and to theſe
So jealous, as if you would paralell
Old Argus to him, you muſt multiply
His Eies an hundred times: of theſe, none ſleepe.
He that would charme the heavieſt lid, muſt hire
A better Mercurie, then Iove made uſe of:
Bleſſe your ſelves from the thought of him and her.
For 'twill be labour loſt: So farewell Signiors. — Exit.
Arſ. Leandro? in a dreame? wake man, for ſhame.

Mil. Trayned into a fooles paradiſe with a tale
Of an imagin'd Forme,
Lea. Iamie is noble,
And with a forg'd Tale would not wrong his Friend,
Nor am I ſo much fired with luſt as Envie,
That ſuch a churl as Bartolus ſhould reap
So ſweet a har veſt, half my State to any
To help me to a ſhare.
Ars. Tuſh do not hope for Impoſſibilities,
Lea. I muſt enjoy her,
And my prophetique love tells me I ſhall,
Lend me but your aſſiſtance;
Ars. Give it 'ore,
Mil. I would not have thee fool'd
Lea. I have ſtrange Engines,
Faſhioning here: and Bartolus on the Anville
Diſwade me not, but help me,
Mil. Take your fortune,
If you come off well; praiſe your wit, if not,
Expect to be the ſubject of our Laughter. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Octavio, and Iacinta.

Iac. You met Don Henrique.
Oct. Yes:
Iac. What comfort bring you?
Speake cheerefully: how did my Letter worke?
On his hard temper? I am ſure I wrot it,
So feelingly, and with the pen of ſorrow,
That it muſt force Compunction,
Oct. You are cozen'd;
Can you with one hand prop a falling Tower?
Or with the other ſtop theraging maine,
When it breakes in on the uſurped Shore?
Or any thing that is impoſſible?
And then conclude that there is ſome way left,
To move him to compaſſion.
Iac. Is there a Juſtice
Or thunder (my Octavio) and he
Not ſunk unto the center?
Oct. Good Iacinta.
With your long practiſed patience beare afflictions,
And by provoking it call not on Heavens anger,
He did not onely ſcorne to read your Letter,
But (moſt inhumane as he is) he curſed you,
Curſed you moſt bitterly,
Iac. The bad mans charity,
Oh that I could forget there were a Tye,
In me, upon him! or the releiſe I ſeeke,
(If given) were bounty in him, and not debt,
Debt of a deere accompt!
Oct. Touch not that ſtring,
'Twill but encreaſe your Sorrow, and tame ſilence,
(The Balme of the oppreſſed) which hitherto
Hath eas'd your grieved ſoule, and preſerv'd your fame,
Muſt be your Surgeon ſtill.
Iac. If the contagion
Of my misfortunes had not ſpread it ſelf,
Upon my Son Aſcanio, though my wants
Were centupli'd upon my ſelf, I could be patient:
But he is ſo good, ſo miſerable,
His pious care his dutie, and obedience,
And all that can be wiſh'd for from a Son,
Diſcharg'd to me, and I, bard of all meanes,
To returne any ſcruple of the debt
I owe him as a Mother, is a Torment,
Too painefull to be borne.
Oct. I ſuffer with you,
In that; yet find in this aſſurance comfort,
High heaven ordaines (whoſe purpoſes cannot alter)

Enter Aſcanio.

Children that pay obedience to their Parents,
Shall never beg their Bread.
Iac. Here comes our joy,
Where has my deareſt been?
Aſc. I have made (Mother)
A fortunate voyage and brought home rich prize,
In a few houres: the owners too contented,
From whom I tooke it. See heres Gold, good ſtore too
Nay pray you take it,
Iac. Mens Charities are ſo cold,
That if I knew not, thou wert made of Goodnes,
'Twould breed a jealouſie in me by what meanes,
Thou cam'ſt by ſuch a ſum
Aſc. Were it ill got,
I am ſure it could not be employed ſo well,
As to relieve your wants. Some noble Friends,
(Rais'd by heavens mercy to me, not my merits)
Beſtow'd it on me.
Oct. It were a ſacriledge
To rob thee of their bounty, ſince they gave it,
To thy uſe onely;
Iac. Buy thee brave Cloathes with it
And fit thee for a fortune, and leave us,
To our neceſſities; why do'ſt thou weep?
Aſc. Out of my feare, I have offended you;
For had I not, I am ſure you are too kind,
Not to accept the offer of my ſervice,
In which I am a gainer; I have heard
My tutor ſay of all aiereall foule
The Storke's the Embleme of true pietie,
Becauſe when age hath ſeiz'd upon her dam,
And made unfit for flight, the gratefull young one
Takes her upon his back, provides her foode,
Repaying ſo, her tender care of him,
'Ere he was fit to fly, by bearing her:
Shall I then that have reaſon, and diſcourſe
That tell me all I can doe is too litle,
Be more unnaturall then a ſilly Bird?
Or feed or cloth my ſelfe ſuperfluouſly,
And know, nay ſee you want? holy Saints keepe me.
Iac. Can I be wretched,
And know my ſelfe the Mother to ſuch Goodnes?
Oct. Come, let us drie our eyes, wee'll have a Feaſt,
Thanks to our little Steward;
Iac. And in him,
Beleeve that we are rich.
Aſc. I am ſure I am,
While I have power to comfort you, and ſerve you.
Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Henrique and Violante.

Viol. Is it my fault (Don Henrique) or my fate,
Wha'ts my offence? I came young to your Bed
I had a fruitfull Mother and you met me,
With equall ardour in your May of blood;
And why then am I barren?

How

Hen. 'Tis not in Man
To yield a reaſon for the will of Heaven,
Which is inſcrutable.
Viol. To what uſe ſerve
Full fortunes, and the meaner ſort of Bleſſings,
When that, which is the Crowne of all our wiſhes,
The period of humane happines,
One only Child that may poſſeſſe what's ours,
Is cruelly denide us?
Hen. 'Tis the curſe,
Of great Eſtates to want thoſe Pledges which,
The poore are happy in: They in a Cottage,
With joy, behold the Modells of their youth,
And as their Roote decaies thoſe budding Branches,
Sprout forth and flouriſh to renew their age;
But this is the beginning, not the end
To me, of that miſery againſt my will,
(Since Heaven denies us Iſſue of our owne)
Muſt leave the fruit of all my care and travell
To an unthankfull Brother that inſults,
On my Calamity.
Viol. I will rather chooſe,
A Baſtard from the Hoſpitall and adopt him,
And nouriſh him, as mine owne.
Hen. Such an evaſion
(My Violante) is forbid to us;
Happy the Romane State, where it was lawfull,
(If our owne Sonnes were vicious) to chooſe one
Out of a vertuous Stock, though of poore Parents,
And make him noble. But the Lawes of Spaine,
(Intending to preſerve all ancient Houſes)
Prevent ſuch free elections; with this my Brothers
Too well acquainted, and this makes him bold to Reigne 'ore me, as a Maſter,
Viol. I will fire
The Portion I brought with me, 'ere he ſpend,
A Royall of it: No Quirck left? no Quiddit
That may defeate him?
Hen. Were I but confirmed,
That you would take the meanes I uſe, with patience,
As I muſt practiſe it with my diſhonour,
I could lay levell with the earth his hopes
That ſoare above the clouds with expectation
To ſee me in my grave.
Viol. Effect but this
And our revenge ſhall be to us a Son
That ſhall inherit for us.
Hen. Do not repent
When 'tis too late.
Viol. I feare not what may fall
He diſpoſeſſ'd that doe's uſurpe on all Exeunt.

Actus Secundus, Scena prima

Enter Leandro with a letter writ out) Milanes & Aſtemio

Mil. Can any thing but wonder?
Lean. Wonder on,
I am as ye ſee, and what will follow Gentlemen
Art. Why doſt thou put on this form? what can this do?
Thou lookeſt moſt ſillily.
Mil. Like a young Clerk
A half pin'd-puppy that would write for a Royall.
Is this a commanding ſhape to win a Beautie?
To what uſe, what occaſion?
Lean. Peace ye are fooles,
More ſilly then my out-ſide ſeems ye are Ignorant
They that pretend to wonders muſt weave cunningly.
Art. What manner of acceſſe can this get? or if gotten
What credit in her eyes?
Lean. Will ye but leave me?
Mil. Me thinks a yong man, and a handſom Gentleman
(But ſure thou art lunatick) me thinks a brave man
That would catch cunningly the beames of Beautie,
And ſo diſtribute 'em, unto his comfort,
Should like himſelf appeare, young, high, and buxom.
And in the brighteſt form.
Lean. Ye are cozen'd (Gentlemen)
Neither doe I believe this, nor will follow it,
Thus I am, I will begin my voyage,
When you love, lanch it out in ſilks and velvets,
I le love in Serge, and will outgo your Sattins
To get upon my great horſe and appeare.
The ſigne of ſuch a man, and trot my meaſures,
Or fiddle out whole froſty nights (my friends)
Vnder the window, while my teeth keep tune,
I hold no handſomneſſe. Let me get in
There trot and fiddle where I may have faire play,
Art. But how get in?
Lean. Leave that to me, your patience,
I have ſome toyes here that I dare well truſt to:
I have ſmelt a Vicar out, they call him Lopez.
You are ne're the nearer now,
Mil. We do confeſſe it.
Lean. Weak ſimple men, this Vicar to this Lawyer
Is the moſt inward, Damon.
Art. What can this do?
Mil. We know the fellow, and he dwells there.
Lean. So.
Art. A poore, thin theef: he help? he; hang the Vicar
Can reading of an——preferre thee?
Lean. Thou art dead-ſick in love, and hee'l pray for thee
Have patience (Gentlemen) I ſay this Vicar,
This thing I ſay is all one with the Cloſe Bartolus
(For ſo they call the Lawyer) or his nature
Which I have ſtudied by relation;
And make no doubt I ſhall hit handſomly,
Will I work cunningly and home: underſtand me.

Enter Lopez and Diego.

Next I pray leave me, Leave me to my fortune
Difficilia pulchra, thats my Motto (Gentlemen)
I 'le win this Diamond from the rock and weare her
Or——
Mil. Peace, the Vicar: ſend ye a full ſail, Sir,
Art. There's your Confeſſor, but what ſhal be your pen-
A fools head if I fail and ſo forſake me. (nance? exit Lea.
You ſhall heare from me daily.
Mil. We will be ready,
Lop. Thin world indeed:
Lean. I'le let him breathe and mark him:
No man would think a ſtranger as I am
Should reap any great commodity from his pigbelly,
Lop. Poore ſtirring for poore Vicars,
Diego And poore Sextons.
Lop. We pray and pray, but to no purpoſe
Thoſe that enjoy our Lands, choak our Devotions.
Our poore thin ſtipends make us arrant dunces.
Diego If you live miſerably, how ſhall we do (Maſter?)
That are fed onely with the ſound of prayers?
We riſe and ring the Bells to get good ſtomacks.
And muſt be fain to eat the ſopes with reverence,

Lop.

Lop. When was there a Christning (Diego?)
Dieg. Not this ten weekes:
Alas, they have forgot to get children (Master)
The Warres, the Seas, and ufurie undoe us,
Takes off our minds, our edges, blunts our plough-shares,
They eat nothing here, but herbs, & get nothing but green
There are some poore Labourers, that perhaps (sauce:
Once in seven yeare, with helping one another,
Produce some few pind-Butter-prints, that scarce hold
The christning neither.
Lop. Your Gallants, they get Honour,
A strange fantasticall Birth, to defraud the Vicar,
And the Camp Christens their Issues, or the Curtizans,
'Tis a lewd time.
Die. They are so hard-hearted here too,
They will not dye, there's nothing got by Burialls.
Lop. Diego, the Ayre's too pure, they cannot perish:
To have a thin Stipend, and an everlasting Parish,
Lord what a torment 'tis!
Die. Good sensible Master,
You are allow'd to pray against all weathers,
(Both foule, and faire, as you shall find occasion)
Why not against all ayres?
Lop. That's not i'th' Canons,
I would it had, 'tis out of our way forty pence. (here,
Di. 'Tis strange, they are starv'd too yet they will not die
They will not Earth: a good stout plague amongst 'em,
Or halfe a dozen new fantasticall Fevers
That would turne up their heeles by whole-sale (Master)
And take the Doctors too, in their grave Counsells,
That there might be no naturall help for money;
How merrily would my Bells goe then?
Lop. Peace Diego,
The Doctors are our friends, let's please them well,
For though they kill but slow, they are certaine (Diego)
We must remove into a muddy Ayre,
A most contagious Clymat.
Die. We must certaine,
An ayre that is the nursery of Agues,
Such Agues (Master) that will shake mens soules out,
Ne're stay for Possets, nor good old wives plaisters.
Lop. Gowts and dead Palsies.
Die. The dead doe's well at all times,
Yet Gowts will hang an arse a long time (Master)
The Pox, or English Surfets if we had 'em;
Those are rich Marle, they make a Church-yard fat,
And make the Sexton sing, they never misse, Sir.
Lop. Then Wills and Funerall Sermons come in season,
And Feasts that makes us frolicke.
Die. Would I could see 'em.
Lop. And though I weepe i'th' Pulpit for my Brother,
Yet (Diego) here I laugh.
Di. The cause requires it.
Lop. Since people left to die I am dunce (Diego.)
Die. 'Tis a strange thing, I have forgot to dig too.
Lea. A pretious pair of youths; I must make toward 'em
Lop. Who's that? look out it seemes he would speak to
I hope a Marriage, or some Wil to make (Diego.) (us.
Dieg. My friend your businesse?
Lea. 'Tis to that grave Gentleman;
Blesse your good learning (Sir)
Lop. And blesse you also,
He beares a promising face, there's some hope toward.
Lea. I have a Letter to your worship.
Lop. Well Sir,
From whence I pray you?
Lea. From Nova Hispania, Sir,
And from an ancient friend of yours.
Lop. 'Tis well (Sir)
'Tis very well: the divell a-one I know there. (tenance,
Die. Take heed of a Snap (Sir) has a cozening coun-
I doe not like his way.
Lop. Let him goe forward.
Cantabit Vacuus, They that have nothing, feare nothing,
All I have to loose (Diego) is my learning,
And when he has gotten that, he may put it in a Nut-shell,
Letter Read.

Signior Lopez, Since my arrivall from Cordova to these parts I have written divers Letters unto you but as yet received no Answer of any (Good and very good. And although so great a forgetfulnesse might cause a wont in my due correspondence yet the desire I have still to serve you must more prevaile with me (Better and better: the divell a man know I yet) and therefore with the present occasion offered I am willing to crave a continuance of the favours, which I have heretofore received from you and doe recommend my Son Leandro the Bearer to you with request that he may be admitted in that Universitie till such time as I shall arrive at home; his studies he will make you acquainted withall: This kindnesse shall supply the want of your slacknesse: And so heaven keep you. Yours

Alonzo Tiveria.

Alonzo Tiveria, very well,
A very ancient friend of mine, I take it,
For till this houre I never heard his Name, yet.
Lea. You looke (Sir) as if ye had forgot my Father.
Lop. No, no, I look as I would remember him,
For that I never remembred, I cannot forget (Sir)
Alonzo Tiveria.
Lea. The same (Sir.)
Lop. And now i'th' Indies?
Lea. Yes.
Lop. He may be any where,
For ought that I consider.
Lea. Thinke againe (Sir)
You were Students both at one time in Salamanca,
And, as I take it, Chamber-fellowes.
Lop. Ha?
Lea. Nay, sure you must remember.
Lop. Would I could.
Lea. I have heard him say, you were Gossips too.
Lop. Very likely,
You did not heare him say, to whom? for we Students
May often-times over-reach our memories,
Do'st thou remember (Diego) this same Signiour?
Thou hast been mine these twenty yeares.
Di. Remember?
Why, this Fellow would make ye mad: Nova Hispania?
And Signiour Tiveria? what are these?
He may as well name ye Friends out of Cataya
Take heed I beseech your worship: doe you heare, (my
You have no Letters for me? friend?)
Lea. Not any Letter,
But I was charged to doe my Fathers love
To the old honest Sexton Diego; are you he (Sir?)
Di. Ha? have I friends, and know 'em not? my name is
But if either I remember you, or your Father, (Diego,
Or Nova Hispania (I was never there Sir)
Or any kindred that you have — for heaven-sake, Master,
Let's cast about a little, and consider,
We may dreame out our time.
Lea. It seemes I am deceiv'd (Sir)

Yet.

Yet, that you are Don Lopez, all men tell me,
The Curat here, and have bin ſome time (ſir)
And you the Sexton Diego, ſuch I am ſent too,
The Letter tells as much: may be they are dead,
And you of the like names ſucceed: I thank ye gentlemen,
Ye have done honeſtly, in telling truth,
I might have bin forward els. For that Lopez,
That was my Fathers friend, I had a charge,
(A charge of Money) to deliver (Gentlemen)
Five hundred Duckets, a poore ſmall gratuity,
But ſince you are not he, good ſir, let me thinke,
I pray ye be patient.
Lop. Pray ye ſtay a little,
Nay, let me remember, I beſeech ye ſtay, Sir.
Di. An honeſt noble friend, that ſends ſo lovingly;
An old friend too; I ſhall remember ſure, Sir.
Lop. Thou ſayſt true Diego.
Di. 'Pray ye conſider quickly,
Doe, doe, by any meanes, me thinkes already
A grave ſtaid gentleman comes to my memory.
Lea. He's old indeed, ſir.
Di. With a goodly white Beard,
(For now he muſt be ſo: I know he muſt be)
Signior Alonzo, (Maſter.)
Lop. I begin to have him.
Di. 'Has bin from hence, about ſome twenty years (ſir.)
Lea. Som five and twenty (ſir.)
Di. You ſay moſt true (ſir)
Juſt to an houre; 'tis now juſt five and twenty,
A fine ſtraite timber'd man, and a brave ſouldier,
He married: let me ſee,——
Lea. De Caſtro's Daughter.
Di. The very ſame.
Lea. Thou art a very Raſcall,——
De Caſtro is the Turke to thee, or any thing:
The Money rubbs 'em into ſtrange remembrances,
For as many Duckets more they would remember Adam.
Lop. Give me your hand, you are welcome to your (country,
Now I remember plainly, manifeſtly,
As freſhly, as if yeſterday I had ſeene him,
Moſt heartily welcome, ſinfull that I am,
Moſt ſinfull man, why ſhould I looſe this Gentleman?
This loving old Companion? we had all one ſoule, ſir,
He dwelt here hard by, at a handſome——
Lea. Farme ſir,
You ſay moſt true.
Lop. Alonzo Tiverta; (thus?
Lord, Lord, that time ſhould play the treacherous knave
Why, he was the onely friend I had in Spaine (ſir)
I knew your Mother too, a handſome Gentlewoman,
She was married very young: I married 'em:
I doe remember now the Maskes and Sports then,
The Fire-workes, and the fine delights; good faith, ſir,
Now I looke in your face, whoſe eies are thoſe Diego?
Nay, if he be not juſt Alonzo's picture——
Lea. Lord how I bluſh for theſe two impudents?
Di. Well Gentleman, I thinke your name's Leander:
Lea. It is indeed (ſir)
Gra'-mercy Letter, thou hadſt never knowne els.
Di. I have dandled ye, and kiſt ye and plaid with ye,
A hundred, and a hundred times, and danc'd ye,
And ſwong ye in my Bell-ropes, ye lov'd ſwinging.
Lop. A ſweet Boy.
Lea. Sweet lying knaves.
What would theſe doe for thouſands?
Lop. A wondrous ſweet Boy then it was, ſee now
Time that conſumes us, ſhoots him up, ſtill ſweeter.
How do's the noble Gentleman? how fares he?
When ſhall we ſee him? when will he bleſſe his Country?
Lea. O, very ſhortly, ſir, till his returne,
He has ſent me over to your charge.
Lop. And welcome,
Nay, you ſhall know you are welcome to your friend, ſir,
Lea. And to my Study (ſir) which muſt be the Law,
To further which, he would entreat your care
To plant me in the favour of ſome man
That's expert in that knowledge: for his paines,
I have three hundred Duckets more: For my Diet,
Enough (ſir) to defray me: which I am charged
To take ſtill, as I uſe it, from your cuſtodie,
I have the money ready, and I am weary. (come,
Lop. Sit down, ſit down, and once more ye are moſt wel-
The Law you have hit upon moſt happily,
Here is a Maſter in that Art, Bartolus,
A neighbour by, to him I will preferre ye;
A learned man, and my moſt loving Neighbour,
I'll doe ye faithfull ſervice (ſir.)
Di. He's an Aſſe,
And ſo wee'll uſe him; he ſhall be a Lawyer.
Lo. But if ever he recover this mony again before Diego,
And get ſome pretty pittance: my Pupill's hungry.
Lea. Pray ye Sir, unlade me.
Lop. I'le refreſh ye Sir;
When ye want, you know your Exchequer.
Lea. If all this get me but acceſſe, I am happy,
Lop. Come, I am tender of ye,
Lea. I'll goe with ye,
To have this Fort betray'd theſe ſooles muſt fleece me.
Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Bartolus, and Amaranta.

Bar. My Amaranta, a retir'd ſweet life,
Private and cloſe, and ſtill, and houſwifely,
Becomes a Wife, ſets off the grace of woman
At home to be beleev'd both young, and handſome,
As Lilies that are caſde in chriſtall Glaſſes,
Makes up the wonder: ſhew it abroad, 'tis ſtale,
And ſtill and the more eyes cheapen it, 'tis more ſlubberd,
And what need windowes open to inviting?
Or evening Tarraſſes, to take opinions?
When the moſt wholſome Ayre (my wife) blowes inward,
When good thoughts are the nobleſt Campanions,
And old chaſt ſtories (wife) the beſt diſcourſes;
But why doe I talke thus, that know thy nature?
Ama. You know your own diſeaſe: diſtruſt, & jealouſies,
And thoſe two, give theſe Leſſons not good meaning,
What triall is there of my honeſtie,
When I am mew'd at home? to what end, Husband,
Serves all the vertuous thoughts, and chaſt behaviours
Without their uſes? Then they are known moſt excellent
When, by their contraries they are ſet off, and burniſh'd,
If ye both hold me faire, and chaſt, and vertuous,
Let me goe feareleſſe out, and win that greatneſſe:
Theſe Seeds grow not in Shades, and conceal'd places
Set 'em i'th' heat of all, then they riſe glorious.
Bar. Peace, ye are too loude.
Ama. You are too covetous,
If that be rank'd a vertue, you have a rich one,

Set me (like other Lawyers wives) off handsomely,
Attended as I ought, and as they have it,
My Coach, my people, and my handsome women,
My will, in honest things.
Bar. Peace Amarinta: (cures'em,
Ama. They have content, rich clothes, and that re-
Bindes, to their carefull Husbands, their observance,
They are merry, ride abroad, meet, laugh,
Bar. Thou shalt too:
Ama. And freely may converse with proper Gentlemen,
Suffer temptations daily to their honour.
Enter Woman-Moore.
Bar. You are now too far againe: thou shalt have any Let me but lay up for a handsome Office, (thing,
And then my Amarinta——
Moor. Here's a thing now,
Ye place as pleasure to me: all my retinue,
My Chamber-maid, my Kitchin-maid, my friend,
And what she falles in, I must doe my selfe.
A foyle to set my Beauty off, I thanke ye,
You will place the Devill next for a Companion,
Bar. No more such words (good wife)
What would you have (Maid?)
Moor. Master Curate, and the Sexton, & a stranger (sir)
Attend to speake with your worship.
Bar. A stranger? (not.
Ama. You had best to be jealous of the man you know
Bar. 'Pree thee no more of that.
Ama. 'Pray ye goe out to 'em,
That will be safest for ye, I am well here,
I onely love your peace, and serve like a slave for it.
Bar. No, no, thou shalt not; 'tis some honest Client
Rich, and litigious, the Curate has brought to me,
Pre'thee goe in (my Duck) I'll but speake to 'em,
And returne instantly.
Ama. I am commanded,
One day you will know my sufferance.—— Exit.
Bar. And reward it.
So, so, fast bind, fast find; Come in my Neighbours,
My loving Neighbours pray ye come in, ye are welcome,

Enter Lopez, Leandro, and Diego.

Lop. Blesse your good reverence.
Bar. Good-day, good Master Curate,
And neighbour Diego, welcome: what's your businesse?
And 'pray ye be short (good friends) the time is pretious,
Welcome, good sir.
Lop. To be short then with your Mastership,
(For I know your severall houres, are full of businesse)
We have brought ye this young-man, of honest parents,
And of an honest face.
Bar. It seemes so (Neighbours)
But to what end?
Lop. To be your Pupill (Sir)
Your Servant, if you please.
Lea. I have travell'd far, sir,
To seeke a worthy man,
Bar. Alas, good Gentleman,
I am a poore man, and a private too,
Unfit to keep a Servant of your Reckoning;
My house a little Cottage, and scarce able
To hold my selfe, and those poore few live under it;
Besides, you must not blame me Gentleman,
If I were able to receive a Servant,
To be a little scrupulous of his dealing
For, in these times——

Lop. 'Pray let me answer that (sir)
Here is five hundred Duckets, to secure him,
He cannot want (sir) to make good his credit,
Good gold, and coyne.
Bar. And thats an honest pledge;
Yet sure, that needs not, for his face, and carriage,
Seeme to declare an ill-bred honesty,
Lea. And for I have a ripe mind to the Law (sir)
(In which I understand you live a Master)
The least poore corner in your house, poore bed (sir)
(Let me not seeme intruding to your Worship)
With some Books to instruct me, and your Counsell,
Shall I rest most content with: other Acquaintance
Then your grave presence, and the grounds of Law
I dare not covet, nor I will not seeke (sir)
For surely mine owne nature desires privacie.
Next, for your monthly paines (to shew my thanks,)
I doe proportion out some twenty Duckets;
As I grow riper, more: three hundred now (sir)
To shew my love to learning, and my Master,
My diet, I'll defray too, without trouble.
Lop. Note but his mind to learning. (money.
Bar. I do strangely, yes, and I like it too, thankes to his
Di. Would he would live with me, and learn to dig too.
Lop. A wondrous modest man (sir.)
Bar. So it seemes,
His deare love to his Studie must be nourish'd
Neighbour, he's like to prove.
Lop. With your good counsell,
And with your diligence, as you will ply him;
His Parents, when they know your care——
Bar. Come hither;
Die. An honester young man, your worship ne're kept,
But he is so bashfull——
Bar. O I like him better,
Say I should undertake ee, which indeed (sir)
Will be no little straightnesse to my living,
Considering my Affaires, and my small house (sir)
For I see some promises that pull me to ye;
Could you content your selfe, at first thus meanly,
To lye hard, in all but ——part of my house (sir)
For I have not many Lodgings to allow ye;
And studie should be still remote from company;
A little fire sometimes too, to refresh ye;
A Student must be frugall: sometimes Lights too,
According to your labour.
Lea. Any thing (sir)
That's dry, and wholsome: I am no bred-wanton.
Bar. Then I receive you: but I must desire ye
To keep within your confines.
Lea. Ever sir,
There's the Gold, and ever be your servant,
Take it and give me Bookes: may I but prove (sir)
According to my wish, and these shall multiply.
Lop. Do, study hard, pray ye take him in and settle him,
He's onely fit for you; Shew him his Cell (sir.) (yer,
Die. Take a good heart; and when ye are a cunning Law-
I'le sell my Bells and you shall prove it lawfull,
Ba. Come, sir, with me neighbours I thank your diligence.
Lop. I'le come sometimes, and crack a cake with ye.
Bar. Welcome—— Exeu.
Lop. Here's a mony got with ease here, spend that jovially,
And pray for the Foole, the Founder.
Die. Many more Fooles
I heartily pray may follow his example,
Lawyers, or Lubbers, or of what condition,

And

And many ſuch ſweet friends in Nova Hiſpania.
Lop. It will do well; Let 'em but ſend their moneys,
Come from what quarter of the world, I care not,
I'll know 'em inſtantly; nay I'll be a kin to 'em;
I cannot miſſe a man, that ſends me money:
Let him Law there, long as his Duckets laſt, Boy,
I'll grace him, and prefer him.
Die. I'll turn Trade (Maſter) and now live by the living
Let the dead ſtinke, 'tis a poore ſtinking Trade.
Lop. If the young Foole now
Should chance to chop upon his faire Wife (Diego.)
Die. And handle her Caſe (Maſter) that's a law point,
A point would make him ſtart, and put on his Spectacles
A hidden point, were worth the canvaſſing.
Lop. Now ſurely, ſurely, I ſhould love him (Diego)
And love him heartily: nay, I ſhould love my ſelfe,
Or any thing that had but that good fortune,
For to ſay truth the Lawyer is a dog-bolt,
An arrant worme: and though I call him worſhipfull,
I wiſh him a canoniz'd Cuckold (Diego)
Now, if my youth doe dub him——
Di. He is too demure (ſir.) Lop. If he do ſting her home.
Die. There's no ſuch matter,
The woman was not borne to ſo much bleſſedneſſe,
He has no heate: ſtudy conſumes his oyle (Maſter,)
Lop. Let's leave it to the will of Fate, and preſently
Over a cup of luſtie Sack, let's prophecie.
I am like a man that dreampt he was an Emperour,
Come Diego, hope, & whilſt he laſts, we'll lay it on. Exit.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Jamy Millanes, Arſenio.

Jam. Angelo, Millanes, did you ſee this wonder?
Mil. Yes, yes. Jam. And you Arſenio?
Ar. Yes he's gon (Sir)
Strangely diſguis'd, he's ſet upon his voyage.
Love guide his thoughts: he's a brave honeſt fellow,
Sit cloſe Don Lawyer, ô that arrant knave now,
How he will ſtinke, will ſmoake againe, will burſt:
He's the moſt arrant Beaſt. Mil. He may be more beaſt.
Ja. Let him beare ſix, and ſix, that all may blaze him,
The villany he has ſowed into my Brother,
And from his State, the Revenue he has reach'd at:
Pay him, my good Leandro, take my praiers.
Ar. And all our wiſhes plough with his fine white heifer.
Ja. Marke him (my deare Friend) for a famous Cuckold,
Let it out-live his Bookes, his paines, and heare me,
The more he ſeeks to ſmother it with Juſtice, Enter a
Let it blaze out the more: what news Andrea? Servant.
Andr. Newes I am loth to tell ye: but I am charg'd (Sir)
Your Brother layes a ſtrict command upon ye,
No more to know his houſe, upon your danger,
I am ſorry (Sir.)
Jam. Faith never be: I am glad on't,
He keepes the houſe of pride, and foolery:
I meane to ſhun it: ſo returne my Anſwer,
'Twill ſhortly ſpew him out; Come, let's be merry,
And lay our heads together, carefully
How we may helpe our friend; and let's lodge neare him,
Be ſtill at hand: I would not for my patrimony,
But he ſhould crown his Lawyer, a learned Monſter,
Come, let's away I am ſtark mad till I ſee him. Exeunt.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Bartolus, and Amaranta.

Amar. Why, will ye bring men in, and yet be jealous?
Why will ye lodge a young man, a man able,
And yet repine?
Bar. He ſhall not trouble thee (Sweet)
A modeſt poore ſlight thing, did I not tell thee
He was onely given to the Booke, and for that
How royally he paies? finds his owne meat too.
Am. I will not have him here: I know your coutſes,
And what fits you will fall into of madneſſe.
Bar. Y'faith, I will not Wife, Am. I will not try ye,
Bar. He comes not neare thee: ſhall not dare to tread
Within thy Lodgings, in an old out-Roome
Where Logs, and Coles were layd.
Am. Now ye lay fire; Fire to conſume your quiet.
Bar. Didſt thou know him,
Thou wouldſt thinke as I doe: he diſquiet thee? (him,
Thou mayſt weare him next thy heart, & yet not warme
His mind (poore man) 's o'th' Law, how to live after,
And not on lewdneſſe: on my conſcience
He knowes not how to looke upon a woman
More then by reading what Sex ſhe is.
Am. I doe not like it (Sir.)
Bar. Do'ſt thou not ſee (Foole)
What preſents he ſends hourely in his gratefulneſſe?
What delicate meates?
Am. You had beſt truſt him at your Table,
Doe and repent it, doe.
Bar. If thou be'ſt willing,
By my troth, I thinke he might come, he's ſo modeſt,
He never ſpeakes: there's part of that he gave me,
He'll eat but halfe a dozen bits, and riſe immediatly,
Even as he eats, he ſtudies: he'll not diſquiet thee,
Doe as thou pleaſeſt (Wife.)
Am. What means this Wood-cocke? Knock within.
Bar. Retire (Sweet, there's one knocks: come in, your buſineſſe.
Enter Servant.
Ser. My Lord Don Henrique, would entreat ye, Sir,
To come immediatly, and ſpeake with him,
He has buſineſſe of ſome moment.
Bar. I'll attend him,
I muſt be gon: I pre'thee thinke the beſt (wife)
At my returne, I'll tell thee more, good morrow;
Sir, keep ye cloſe, and ſtudy hard: an houre hence
I'll read a new Caſe to ye:—Exit. Leandro within.
Lean. I'll be ready. Enter Amaranta.
Amar. So many hundred Duckets, to ly ſcurvily?
And learne the pelting law? this ſounds but ſlenderly,
But very poorely: I would ſee this fellow
Very faine ſee him, how he lookes: I will find
To what end, and what ſtudy: there's the place:
I'll goe o'th' other ſide, and take my Fortune;
I think there is a window. Exit. Enter Leandro.
Lean. He's gone out
Now, if I could but ſee her: ſhe is not this way:
How naſtily he keepes his houſe? my Chamber,
If I continue long, will choak me up,
It is ſo damp: I ſhall be mortified
For any woman, if I ſtay a moneth here:
I'll in, and ſtrike my Lute, that ſound may call her. Exit.
Enter Amaranta. Lute and Song.
Ama. He keeps very cloſe: Lord, how I long to ſee him:
A Lute ſtrooke handſomely, a voice too; I'll heare that:
Theſe Verſes are no Law, they ſound too ſweetly,
Now I am more deſirous. (Leandro peeping.)
Lea. 'Tis ſhe certain. Am. What's that that peeps?
Lea. O, admirable face! Am. Sure 'tis the man.
Lea. I will goe out a little.

Am. Hee lookes not like a foole, his face is noble:
How ſtill he ſtands?
Lea. I am ſtrucken dumb, with wonder,
Sure, all the Excellence of Earth dwells here.
Am. How pale he looks? yet how his eies like torches,
Fling their beames round: how manly his face ſhewes?
He comes on: ſurely he will ſpeak: he is made moſt hand-
This is no Clerk behaviour; Now I have ſeen ye, (ſomly:
I'l take my time: husband, ye have brought home tinder. Ex
Lea. Sure ſhe has transform'd me,
I had forgot my tongue cleane,
I never ſaw a face yet, but this rare one,
But I was able boldly to encounter it,
And ſpeak my mind, my lips were lock upon me,
This is divine, and onely ſerv'd with reverence;
O moſt faire cover, of a hand far fairer,
Thou bleſſed Innocence, that gaurds that whiteneſs,
Live next my heart. I am glad I have got a relick, A noiſe
A relick when I pray to it, may work wonders. within.
Harke, there's ſome noyſe: I muſt retire againe.
This bleſſed Apparition, makes me happy;
I'll ſuffer, and I'll ſacrifice my ſubſtance,
But I'll enjoy: now ſoftly to my Kennell. Exit.

Actus Tertius, Scæna Prima.

Enter Henrique and Bartolus.

Hen. You know my cauſe ſufficiently?
Bar. I doe (Sir.)
Hen. And though it will impaire my honeſty,
And ſtrike deep at my Credit, yet (my Bartolus)
There being no other evaſion left to free me
From the vexation of my ſpightfull Brother,
That moſt inſultingly raignes over me,
I muſt and will goe forward.
Bar. Doe (my Lord)
And looke not after credit, we ſhall cure that,
Your bended honeſtie, we ſhall ſet right (Sir)
We Surgeons of the Law, doe deſperate cures (Sir)
And you ſhall ſee how heartily I'll handle it:
Marke how I'll knock it home: be of good cheare (Sir)
You give good Fees, and thoſe beget good Cauſes,
The prerogative of your crownes will carry the matter,
(Carry it cheere) The Aſſiſnt ſits to morrow;
And he's your friend, your monied men love naturally,
And as your loves are cleare, ſo are your Cauſes.
Hen. He ſhall not waite for that.
Bar. No, no, he muſt not,
Line your Cauſe warmly (Sir) the times are Aguiſh,
That holds a Plea in heare; hang the penurious,
Their Cauſes (like their purſes) have poore Iſſues.
Hen. That way, I was ever bountifull.
Bar. 'Tis true (Sir)
That makes ye fear'd, forces the Snakes to kneele to ye,
Live full of money, and fupply the Lawyer,
And take your choice of what mans lands you pleaſe (Sir)
What pleaſures, or what profits; what revenges,
They are all your owne: I muſt have witneſſes
Enough, and ready.
Hen. You ſhall not want (my Bartolus.)
Bar. Subſtantiall fearleſs ſoules, that will ſweare ſuddenly,
That will ſweare any thing.
Hen. They ſhall ſweare truth too.
Bar. That's no great matter: for variety
They may ſweare truth, oh 'tis not much look'd after:
I will ſerve Proceſſe, preſently, and ſtrongly
Upon your Brother, and Octavio,
Jacintha, and the Boy; provide your proceſſe (Sir)
And ſet 'em fairely off, be ſure of Witneſſes,
Though they coſt money, want no ſtore of witneſſes,
I have ſeen a handſome Cauſe, ſo fowly loſt (Sir,)
So beaſtly caſt away for want of Witneſſes.
Hen. There ſhall want nothing,
Bar. Then be gone, be provident,
Send to the Judge, a ſecret way: you have me,
And let him underſtand the heart.
Hen. I ſhall (Sir.)
Bar. And feele the pulſes ſtrongly beat, I'll ſtudy,
And at my houre, but mark me, goe, be happy,
Goe, and beleeve i'th' Law.
Hen. I hope 'twill helpe me. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Lopez, Diego, and foure Pariſhioners and Singers.

Lop. Nea'r talke to me, I will not ſtay amongſt ye,
Debauſh'd and ignorant lazie knaves I found ye,
And fooles I leave ye, I have taught theſe twenty yeares,
Preacht ſpoon-meat to ye, that a child might ſwallow,
Yet ye are Block-heads ſtill: what ſhould I ſay to ye?
Ye have neither faith, nor money left to ſave ye,
Am I a fit companion for ſuch Beggers?
1. If the Shepheard will ſuffer the ſheep to be ſcab'd (ſir)
Lop. No, no, ye are rotten.
Di. Would they were, for my ſake.
Lop. I have noynted ye, and tar'd ye with my doctrine,
And yet the murren ſticks to ye, yet ye are mangy,
I will avoid ye. Two chaires ſet out.
2. 'Pray ye (Sir) be not angry,
In the pride of your new Caſſock, doe not part with us,
We doe acknowledge ye a carefull Curat,
And one that ſeldome troubles us with Sermons,
A ſhort ſlice of a Reading ſerves us (Sir)
We doe acknowledge ye a quiet Teacher,
Before You'll vex your Audience, you'll ſleep with 'em,
And that's a loving thing.
3. We grant ye (Sir)
The onely benefactor to our Retuling,
To all our merry Sports, the firſt provoker,
And at our Feaſts we know there is no reaſon,
But you that edifie us moſt, ſhould eat moſt.
Lop. I will not ſtay for all this, ye ſhall know me
A man borne to a more beſeeming fortune
Then ringing all in, to a rout of Dunces.
4. We will increaſe your Tithes, you ſhall have Egs too,
Though they may prove moſt dangerous to our Iſſues.
1. I am a Smith; yet thus far out of my love
You ſhall have the tenth horſe I prick, to pray for,
I am ſure I prick five hundred in a yeare (Sir.)
2. I am a Cooke, a man of a divide conſcience,
Yet thus far I relent; you ſhall have tith porrage. (ſir.)
3. Your ſtipend ſhal be rais'd to (good neighbour Die-
Di. Would ye have me ſpeak for ye? I am more angry
Ten times more vex'd, not to be pacified!
No there be other places for poore Sextons
Places of profit (Friends) fine ſtirring places,
And people that know how to uſe our Offices,
Know what they were made for: I ſpeak for ſuch Capons?
Ye ſhall find the Key o'th' Church,
Under the doore (Neighbours,)

You

You may goe in, and drive away the flawes.
Lop. My Surplesse, with one sleeve, you shall find there,
For to that dearth of Linnen, you have driven me,
And the old Canvoske Cope, that hangs by gymitrie.
'Pray ye there, em carefully, they are very tender.
The remnant of the Books, lie where they did (Neigh.)
Half pust away with the Church-wardens pipings. (bours)
Such smoaky zeales they have against hard places,
The poore mans Box is there too: if ye find any thing
Beside the posie, and that halfe rub'd out too,
For feare it should awake too much charitie
Give it to pious uses, that is, spend it so.
Die. The Bell-ropes, they are strong enough to hang ye,
So we bequeath ye to your destiny.
1. 'Pray ye be not so hastie.
Di. I'll speake a proud word to ye,
Would ye have us stay?
2. We doe most hearilty pray ye.
3. I'll draw as mighty drinke (Sir.)
Lop. A strong motive,
The stronger still the more ye come unto me.
3. And I'll send for my Daughter
Lop. This may stir too:
The Maiden is of age, and must be edified.
4. You shall have any thing: loose our learned Vicar?
And our most constant friend; honest deare Diego?
Di. Yet all this will not do: I'll tell ye (Neighbours)
And tell ye true: if ye will have us stay,
If you will have the comforts of our companies,
You shall be bound to doe us right in these points,
You shall be bound, and this the obligation,
Dy when 'tis fit, that we may have fit duties,
And doe not seeke to draw out our undoings,
Marry tryde women, that are free, and fruitfull,
Get children in abundance, for your Christnings,
Or suffer to be got, 'tis equall justice.
Lop. Let Weddings, Christnings, Churchings, Funerals,
And merry Gossippings goe round, goe round still,
Round as a Pig, that we may find the profit.
Die. And let your old men fall sick handsomely:
And dy immediatly, their Sonnes may shoot up:
Let women dy oth' sullens too, 'tis natural,
But be sure their Daughters be of age first,
That they may stock us still: your queazie young wives
That perish undeliver'd, I am vext with,
And vext abundantly, it much concernes me,
There's a childes buriall lost, looke that be mended.
Lo. Let 'em be brought to bed, then dy when they please,
These things considered (Country-men) and sworne to
2. All these, and all our sports againe, and gambolls.
3. We must dy, and we must live, and we'll be merry,
Every man shall be rich by one another.
2. We are here to morrow, and gone to day: for my part
If getting children can be friend my Neighbours,
I'll labour hard but I will fill your Font (Sir.)
1. I have a Mother now, and an old Father,
They are as sure your own, within these two moneths—
4. My Sister must be prayd for too, she is desperate,
Desperate in love.
Die. Keepe, desperate men farre from her.
Then 'twill goe hard: doe you see how melancholy?
Doe you marke the man? do you professe ye love him?
And would doe any thing to stay his fury?
And are ye unprovided to refresh him,
To make him know your loves? fie Neighbours,
2. We'll doe any thing.
We have brought Musick to appease his spirit,
And the best Song we'll give him.
Die. 'Pray ye sit down (Sir)
They know their duties now, and they stand ready
To tender their best mirth.
Lop. 'Tis well, proceed Neighbours,
I am glad I have brought ye to understand good manners,
Ye had Puritan hearts a while, spurn'd at all pastimes,
But I see some hope now.
Die. We are set proceed Neighbours.
Enter Arsenio and Millanor.
Arf. What ayles this Priest? how highly the thing takes
Mi. Lord how it looks? has he not bought some Prebend?
Leandro's money, makes the Rascall merry,
Merry at heart; he spies us. (Table.
Lo. Be gon Neighbours, The Bar & Book ready on a
Here are some Gentlemen: be gone good Neighbours,
Be gon, and labour to redeeme my favour,
No more words but be gon: these two are Gentlemen,
No company for crusty-handed fellowes.
Dieg. We will stay for a yeare or two, and trie ye.
Lop. Fill all your hearts with joy, we will stay with ye,
Be gone no more; I take your pastimes graciously:
Would ye with me (my friends?)
Arf. We would looke upon ye,
For me-thinks ye looke lovely.
Lop. Ye have no Letters?
Nor any kind Remembrances?
Mil. Remembrances?
Lop. From Nova Hispania, or some part remote (Sir)
You looke like travell'd men: may be some old friends
That happily I have forgot; some Signeours
In China, or Catayo; some Companions—
Dieg. In the Mogulls Court, or else-where.
Arf. They are mad sure.
Lop. Ye came not from Peru? doe they look (Diego)
As if they had some mistery about 'em?
Another Don Alonzo now?
Di. I marry,
And so much money, Sir, from one you know not,
Let it be who it will.
Lop. They have gracious favours.
Would ye be private?
Mil. There's no need on't (Sir)
We come to bring ye a Remembrance from a Merchant.
Lop. 'Tis very well, 'tis like I know him.
Arf. No sir,
I doe not thinke ye doe.
Lop. A new mistake (Diego)
Let's carry it decently.
Arf. We come to tell ye,
You have received great summes from a young Factor
They call Leandro, that has rob'd his Master,
Rob'd him, and run away.
Dieg. Let's keep close (Master)
This newes comes from a cold Country.
Lop. By my faith it freezes, Curate)
Mil. Is not this true? doe you shrink now (good man
Doe I not touch ye?
Lop. We have a hundred Duckets
Yet left, we doe beseech ye sir—
Mil. You'll hang both.
Lop. One may suffice.
Di. I will not hang alone (Master)
I had the least part, you shall hang the highest.
Plague o' this Tiveria, and the Letter,

The divell sent it, pox, to pepper us,
From Nova Hispania we shall hang at home now.
Arf. I see ye are penitent, and I have compassion
Ye are secure both; doe but what we charge ye,
Ye shall have more gold too, and we shall give it,
Yet ne're indanger ye.
Lop. Command us (Master)
Command us presently, and see how nimbly
Die. And if we doe not handsomely endeavour ——
Arf. Goe home and till ye heare more keep private,
Till we appeare againe, no words, (Vicar)
There's something added.
Mil. For you too.
Lop. We are ready.
Mil. Goe, and expect us hourely, if ye faile,
Though ye had twenty lives ——
Die. We are fit to loose 'em.
Lop. 'Tis most expedient that we should hang both.
Die. If we be hang'd, we cannot blame our fortune.
Mil. Farewell, and be your owne friends.
Lop. We expect ye. —— Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Octavio, Jacintha, Ascanio.

Oct. We cited to the Court! A Bar. Table-bookes, chaires, & paper standish
Ja. It is my wonder,
Oct. But not our fear, (Jacintha) wealthy men (Exeunt.
That have Estates to loose, whose conscious thoughts
Are full of inward guilt, may shake with horrour,
To have their Actions sifted, or appeare
Before the Judge. But we that know our selves
As innocent, as poore, that have no Fleece
On which the Talons of the griping Law
Can take sure hold, may smile with scorne on all
That can be urg'd against us.
Ia. I am confident
There is no man so covetous, that desires
To ravish our wants from us, and lesse hope
There can be so much Justice left on earth,
(Though sude and call'd upon) to ease us of
The burthen of our wrongs.
Oct. What thinkes Ascanio?
Should we be call'd in question or accus'd
Unjustly, what would you doe to redeeme us,
From tirannous oppression?
Asc. I could pray
To him that ever has an open eare
To heare the innocent, and right their wrongs;
Nay, by my truth, I thinke I could out plead
An Advocate, and sweat as much as he
Do's for a double Fee, ere you should suffer
In an honest cause.

Enter Iamie and Bartolus.

Oct. Happy simplicitie!
Ia. My dearest, and my best one: Don Iamie,
Oct. And the Advocate, that caus'd us to be summond.
Asc. My Lord is mov'd, I see it in his lookes,
And that man, in the Gowne, in my opinion
Lookes like a proaguing knave.
Iac. Peace, give them leave.
Iam. Serve me with Processe?
Bar. My Lord, you are not lawlesse.
Iam. Nor thou honest;
One, that not long since was the buckram Scribe,
That would run on mens errands for an Asper,
And from such basenesse, having tais'd a stock
To bribe the covetous Judge, call'd to the Bar,
So poore in practise too, that you would plead
A needy Clyents Cause, for a flurr'd hen,
Or halfe a little loyn of Veale, though fly-blowne,
And these, the greatest Fees you could arrive at
For just proceedings; but since you earn'd Rascall ——
Bar. Good words, my Lord.
Iam. And grew my Brothers Bawd
In all his vitious courses, soothing him
In his dishonest practises, you are growne
The rich, and eminent knave, in the divels name,
What am I cited for?
Bar. You shall know anon,
And then too late repent this bitter language,
Or I'll misse of my ends.
Iam. Wer't not in Court,
I would beat that fat of thine, rais'd by the food
Snatch'd from poore Clyents mouthes, into a jelly:
I would (my man of Law) but I am patient,
And would obey the Judge.
Bar. 'Tis your best course:
Would every enemy I have would beare me,
I would wish no better Action.
Oct. 'Save your Lordship.
Asc. My humble service.
Iam. My good Boy, how dost thou?
Why art thou call'd into the Court?

Enter Assistant, Henrique, Officer, and Witnesses.

Asc. I know not,
But 'tis my Lord the Assistants pleasure
I should attend here.
Iam. He will soone resolve us.
Offi. Make way there for the Judge.
Iam. How? my kind Brother?
Nay then 'tis mack: there is some villany towards.
Assist. 'Tis Sessions purchas'd at your suit, Don Henrique,
Hath brought us hither, to heare and determine
Of what you can prefer.
Henrique. I doe beseech
The honourable Court, I may be heard
In my Advocate.
Assist. 'Tis granted.
Bar. humh, humh.
Iam. That preface
If left out in a Lawyer, spoyles the Cause,
Though ne're so good, and honest.
Bar. If I stood here,
To plead in the defence of an ill man,
(Most equall Judge) or to accuse the innocent
(To both which, I professe my selfe a stranger)
It would be requisite I should deck my Language
With Tropes and Figures, and all flourishes
That grace a Rethorician, 'tis confest'd
Adulterate Mettals, need the Gold-smiths Art,
To set 'em off; what, in it selfe is perfect
Contemnes a borrowed glosse: This Lord (my Client)
Whose honest cause, when 'tis related truly,
Will challenge Justice, finding in his conscience
A tender scruple of a fault long since
By him committed, thinkes it not sufficient
To be absolv'd of't, by his Confessor,
If that in open Court, he publish not
What was so long conceal'd.

Iam.

Iam. To what tends this?

Bar. In his young yeares (it is no miracle
That youth, and heat of Blood, should mix together.)
He look'd upon this woman, on whose face
The ruines yet remaine, of excellent forme,
He look'd on her, and lov'd her.

Iac. You good Angels,
What an impudence is this?

Bar. And us'd all meanes
Of Service, Courtship, Presents, that might win her
To be at his devotion: but in vaine
Her maiden Fort, impregnable held out
Untill he promis'd Marriage; and before
These Witnesses a solemne Contract pass'd
To take her as his wife.

Assist. Give them their oath. (swear.

Iam. They are incompetent Witnesses, his own Crea,
And will sweare any thing for halfe a royall.

Off. Silence.

Assist. Proceed.

Bar. Upon this strong assurance
He did enjoy his wishes to the full,
Which satisfied, and then with eyes of Judgement
(Had winck'd with lust before) considering duly
The inequality of the Match, he being Nobly descended, and allyed, but she
Without a name, or Family, secretly
He purchas'd a Divorce, to disanull
His former Contract, marrying openly
The Lady Violante.

Iac. As you sit here
The Deputy of the great King, who is
The Substitute of that impartiall Judge
With whom, or Wealth, or titles prevaile nothing,
Grant to a much wrong'd Widow, or a Wife
Your patience, with liberty to speake
In her owne Cause, and let me face to face
To this bad man, deliver what he is:
And if my wrongs, with his ingratitude ballanc'd,
Move not compassion, let me die unpitied;
His teares, his oathes, his perjuries, I passe o're
To thinke of them, is a disease; but death
Should I repeat them. I dare not deny,
(For Innocence cannot justifie what's false)
But all the Advocate hath alleadged concerning
His falshood and my shame in my consent,
To be most true: But now I turne to thee,
To thee Don Henrique, and if impious Acts
Have left thee blood enough to make a blush,
I'll paint it on thy cheekes. Was not the wrong
Sufficient to defeat me of mine honour,
To leave me full of sorrow, as of wans,
The witnesse of thy lust, left in my womb,
To testifie thy fallhood, and my shame?
But now so many yeares I had conceal'd
Thy most inhumane wickednesse, and won
This Gentleman, to hide it from the world
To Father what was thine (for yet by heaven,
Though in the City, he pas'd for my husband,
He never knew me as his wife) ——

Assist. 'Tis strange:
Give him an Oath.

Off. I gladly sweare, and truly.

Iac. After all this (I say) when I had borne
These wrongs, with Saint-like patience, saw another
Freely enjoy, what was (in Justice) mine,
Yet still so tender of thy rest, and quiet,
I never would divulge it, to disturb
Thy peace at home, yet thou most barbarous,
To be so careleſſe of me, and my Fame,
(For all respect of thine in the first step
To thy base lust, was lost) in open Court Chaff-beard and
To publish my disgrace? and on record, men for ready.
To write me up an easie-yeilding wanton?
I thinke can find no president: In my extreames,
One comfort yet is left, that though the Law
Divorce me from thy bed, and made free way
To the unjust embraces of an other,
It cannot yet deny that this thy Son
(Looke up Ascanio, since it is come out)
Is thy legitimate heire.

Iam. Confitteracie:
A trick (my Lord) to cheat me; e're you give
Your Sentence, grant me hearing.

Assist. New Chymera's?

Iam. I am (my Lord) since he is without Issue,
Or hope of any, his undoubted Heire,
And this forg'd by the Advocate, to defeat me
Of what the Lawes of Spaine, confer upon me,
A meere Imposture, and conspiracie
Against my future fortunes,

Assist. You are too bold.
Speak to the Cause Don Henrique.

Hen. I confesse, nour,
(Though the acknowledgement must wound mine ho-
That all the Court hath heard touching this Cause,
Or with me, or against me, is most true:
The later part my Brother urg'd, excepted:
For what I now doe, is not out of Spleene
(As he pretends) but from remorse of conscience)
And to repaire the wrong that I have done
To this poore woman: And I beseech your Lordship
To thinke I have not so far lost my reason,
To bring into my Familie, to succeed me,
The stranger--Issue of anothers Bed,
By proofe, this is my Son, I challenge him,
Accept him, and acknowledge him, and desire
By a definitive Sentence of the Court,
He may be so recorded, and full powre
To me, to take him home.

Iac. A second rape
To the poore remnant of Content, that's left me,
If this be granted: and all my former wrongs
Were but beginnings to my miseries,
But this the heighe of all: rather then part
With my Ascanio, I'll deny my oath,
Professe my selfe a Strumpet, and endure
What punishment soe're the Court decrees
Against a wretch that hath forsworne her selfe,
Or plai'd the impudent whore.

Assist. This tastes of passion,
And that must not divert the course of Justice;
Don Henrique, take your Son, with this Condition
You give him maintenance, as becomes his birth,
And 'twill stand with your honour to doe something
For this wronged woman: I will compell nothing,
But leave it to your will. Break up the Court:
It is in vaine to move me; my doom's pass'd,
And cannot be revok'd. —— Exit.

Hen. There's your reward.

Bar. More Causes? and such Fees. Now to my Wife,
I have too long bin absent: Health to your Lordship.

Ass.

Asc. You all look strangely, and I feare beleeve
This unexpected fortune makes me proud,
Indeed it do's not: I shall ever pay you
The duty of a son, and honour you
Next to my Father: good my Lord, for yet
I dare not call you uncle, be not sad,
I never shall forget those noble favours
You did me being a stranger, and if ever
I live to be the master of a fortune,
You shall command it.
Jam. Since it was determin'd
I should be cozen'd, I am glad the profit
Shall fall on thee, I am too tough to melt,
But something I will do.
Hen. 'Pray you take leave
Of your steward (gentle Brother) the good husband
That takes up all for you.
Jam. Very well, mock on,
It is your turn: I may have mine—Exit.
Off. But do not Forget us deare Ascanio
Asc. Do not feare it,
I Every day will see you: every houre
Remember you in my prayers.
Jam. My grief's too great
To be expressed in words——Exit.
Hen. Take that and leave us,
Leave us without reply, nay come back sirrah
And study to forget such things as these
As are not worth the knowledge.
Asc. O good Sir.
These are bad principles——
Hen. Such as you must learn
Now you are mine for wealth and poverty
Can hold no friendship: and what is my will
You must observe and do, though good or ill. Exeunt

Scena Quarta.

Enter Bartolus.

Bar. Where is my wife? 'fore heaven, I have done wonders
Done mighty things to day, my Amaranta,
My heart rejoyces at my wealthy Gleanings,
A rich litigious Lord I love to follow,
A Lord that builds his happinesse on brawlings,
O 'tis a blessed thing to have rich Clyents,
Why, wife I say, how fares my studious Pupill?
Hard at it still? ye are too violent
All things must have their rests, they will not last else
Come out and breathe. Leandro within
Lean. I do beseech you pardon me
I am deeply in a sweet point Sir,
Bar. I'le instruct ye:
Enter Amaranta.
I say take breath, seek health first, then your study,
O my sweet soul I have brought thee golden birds home,
Birds in abundance: I have done strange wonders:
There's more a hatching too.
Am. Have ye done good husband?
Then 'tis a good day spent
Bar. Good enough chicken,
I have spred the nets o'th' law, to catch rich booties,
And they come flittering in: how do's my Pupil?
My modest thing, hast thou yet spoken to him?
Am. As I past by his chamber I might see him,
But he is so bookish,
Bar. And so bashfull too,
I faith he is, before he will speak, he will starve there
Am. I pitie him a little.
Bar. So do I too.
Am. And if he please to take the aire o'th' gardens
Or walk i'th' inward roomes, so he molest not
Bar. He shall not trouble thee, he dare not speak to thee
Enter Moore with Chesse board
Bring out the Chesse-board—come let's have a game
I'le try your masterie, you say you are cunning, (wife,
Am. As learned as ye are (Sir) I shall beat ye
Enter Leander.
Ba. Here he steales out, put him not out of countenance
'Prethee look another way, he will be gone else
Walk and refresh your self, I'l be with you presently,
Lean. I'le take the aire a little.
Bar. 'Twill be healthfull.
Am. Will ye be there? then here? Ile spare ye that man,
Lean. 'Would I were so neare too, and a mate sitting,
A. What think ye (Sir) to this? have at your Knight now
Bar. 'Twas subtilly playd: your Queen lies at my service
Pre thee look off, he is ready to pop in again,
Look off I say, do'st thou not see how he bushes?
Am. I do, not blast him:
Lean. But ye do, and burn too.
What killing looks she steals?
Bar. I have you now, close,
Now for a Mate.
Lean. You are a blessed man that may so have her.
Oh that I might play with her—knock within
Bar. Who's there? I come, you cannot scape me now wife
I come, I come, knock
Lean. Most blessed hand that calls him.
Bar. Play quickly wife.
Am. 'Pray ye give leave to think, Sir,
Enter Moore.
Moore An honest neighbour that dwells hard by (Sir)
Would fain speak with your worship about businesse.
Lean. The devil blow him off.
Bar. Play.
Am. I will study:
For if you beat me thus, you will still laugh at me—knock
Bar. He knocks again; I cannot stay. Leandro
'Pray thee come near.
Lean. I am well (Sir) here,
Bar. Come hither:
Be not afraid but come.
Am. Here's none will bite (Sir)
Lean. God forbid Lady.
Am. 'Pray come nearer,
Lean. Yes forsooth.
Bar. 'Pre thee observe these men just as they stand here
And see this Lady, do not alter 'em,
And be not partiall, Pupill.
Lean. No indeed Sir.
Bar. Let her not move a pawn, I'le come back presently
Nay you shall know I am a Conquerour.
Have an eye Pupill—— Exit.
Am. Can ye play at Chesse Sir?
Lean. A little Lady.
Am. But you cannot tell me
How to avoid this Mate & win the Game too
Ha's noble eyes: ye dare not friend me so farre.
Lean. I dare do any thing that's in mans power, Lady,

To

To be a friend to such a noble beauty.
Am. This is no Lawyers language: I pray ye tell me,
Whether may I remove, Ye see I am set round?
To avoid my husband.
Lean. I shall tell ye happily.
But happily you will not be instructed.
Am. Yes, and I thank ye too, shall I move this man?
Lean. Those are unseemly: move one can serve ye
Can honour ye, can love ye.
Am. 'Pray ye tell quickly
He will return and then
Lean. I'le tell ye instantly
Move me, and I will move any way to serve ye
Move your heart this way (Lady)
Am. How?
Lean. 'Pray ye heare me.
Behold the sport of Love, when he is impetious
Behold the slave of Love
Am. Move any Queen this way?
Sute, he's some worthy man: then if he hedge me
Or here to open him.
Lean. Do but behold me
If there be pity in you, do but view me,
But view the misery I have undertaken
For you the povertie.
Am. He will come presently.
Now play your best Sir, though I loose this Rook here
Yet I get Libertie.
Lean. I'le seize your fair hand
And warm it with a hundred, hundred kisses.
The God of love warm your desires but equal
That shall play my game now.
Am. What do you mean Sir?
Why do you stop me?
Lean. That ye may intend me.
The time ha's blest us both: Love bids us use it.
I am a Gentleman nobly descended:
Young to invite your Love, rich to maintain it.
I bring a whole heart to ye, thus I give it,
And to those burning altars thus I offer,
And this divine lips, where perpetuall Spring grows,
Am. Take that, ye are too saucy.
Lean. How proud Lady?
Strike my deserts?
Am. I was too blame.

Enter Bartolus.

Bar. What wife, there?
Heaven keep my house from thieves.
Lean. I am wretched:
Opened, discovered, lost to my wishes.
I shall be whooted at.
Bar. What noise was this (wife?)
Why dost thou smile?
Lean. This proud thing will betray me,
Bar. Why dost lie here? what anger (deare?)
Am. Why none, Sir,
Onely a chance, your pupill said he plaid well,
And so indeed he do's: he undervook for ye
Because I would not be so long time idle
I made my Essayes, wolded your mace,
And he again a cunningly endangered me,
Indeed he put me strangely to't. When presently
Hearing you come, and having broke his ambush too
Having the second time brought off my Queen Sir,
I rose o'th' sudden smilingly to shew ye,
My apron caught the Chesse-board, and the men,
And there the noise was.
Bar. Thou art grown a Master,
For all this, I shall beat ye.
Lean. Or I, Lawyer,
For now I love her more, 'twas a neat answer,
And by it hangs a mighty hope, I thank her
She gave my pate a sound stock that it rings yet,
But you shall have a sounder if I live Lawyer,
My heart akes yet, I would not be in that fear.
Bar. I am glad ye are a gamester, Sir, sometimes
For recreation we two shall fight hard arie,
Am. He will prove too hard for me,
Lean. I hope he shall do, (good Lady,
But your Ches-board is too hard for my head, fine that
Bar. I have been attoning two most wrangling neigh-
They had no money, therefore I made even (bours,
Come, let's go in, and eat, truly I am hungry.
Lean. I have eaten already, I must intreat your pardon
Bar. Do as ye please, we shall expect ye at supper.
He ha's got a little heart, now it seems handsomly,
Am. You'l get no little head, if I do not look to ye.
Lean. If ever I do catch thee again thou vanity.
Am. I was too blame to be so rash, I am sorie. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Don Henrique, Violante, Ascanio.

Hen. Heare but my reasons,
Viol. O my patience heare 'em.
Can cunning falshood colour so excuse?
With any seeming shape of borrowed truth?
Extenuate this wofull wrong, not error.
Hen. You gave consent that to defeat my brother
I should take any course,
Viol. But not to make
The cure more loathsome then the fowle disease:
Was't not enough you took me to your bed,
Tir'd with loose dalliance, and with empty veines,
All those abilities spoke before and wished,
That could conferre the name of mother on me?
But that (to perfect my account of sorrow)
For my long barrenesse you must higthen it
By shewing to my face, that you were fruitfull
Hug'd in the base embraces of another?
If Solitude that dwelt beneath my roofe,
And want of children was a torment to me
What end of my vexation to behold
A bastard to upbraid me with my wants?
And heare the name of father paid to ye
Yet know my self no mother,
What can I say?
Hen. Shall I confesse my fault and ask your pardon?
Will that content ye?
Viol. If it could make void,
What is confirm'd in Court, No, no, Don Henrique,
You shall know that I find my self abus'd,
And adde to that I have a woman's anger,
And while I look upon the Basilisk,
Whose envious eyes have blasted all my comforts
Rest confident I'le study my dark ends,
And not your pleasures.
Asc. Noble Lady, heare me,
Not as my Fathers son, but as your Servant,
Vouchsafe to heare me, for such in my duty,

I

I ever will appeare : And far be it from
My poore ambition, ever to looke on you,
But with that reverence ; which a ſlave ſtands bound
To pay a worthy Miſtris : I have heard
That Dames of higheſt place, nay Queenes themſelves,
Diſdaine not to be ſerv'd by ſuch as are
Of meaneſt Birth: and I ſhall be moſt happie,
To be emploi'd when you pleaſe to command me
Even in the courſeſt Office, as your Page,
I can wayte on your trencher : : fill your wine
Carry your pontaſles, and be ſometimes bleſs'd
In all humilitie to touch your feete
Or if that you eſteeme that too much grace
I can run by your Coach : obſerve your lookes
And hope to gaine a fortune by my ſervice,
With your good favour, which now, as a Son,
I dare not challenge
Viol. As a Son,
Aſc. Forgive me
I will forget the name, let it be death
For me to call you Mother.
Viol. Still upbraided?
Hen. No way left to appeaſe you?
Viol. None : now heare me,
Heare what I vow before the face of heaven,
And if I breake it all plagues in this life,
And thoſe that after death are fear'd, fall on me,
While that this Baſtard ſtaies under my rooffe,
Looke for no peace at home, for I renounce
All Offices of a wife,
Hen. What am I falne to? (howres
Viol. I will not eate, nor ſleepe with you and thoſe
Which I ſhould ſpend in prayers for your health
Shall be emploi'd in Curſes,
Hen. Terrible,
Viol. All the day long, i'le be as tedious to you
As lingring fevers, and i'le watch the nights,
To ring alon'd your ſhame and breake your ſleepes
Or if you doe but ſlumber, i'le appeare
In the ſhape of all my wrongs, and like a fury
Fright you to madnes, and if all this faile
To worke out my revenge, I have friends and kinſmen,
That will not ſit downe tame with the diſgrace
That's offer'd to our noble familie
In what I ſuffer,
Hen. How am I devided
Betweene the duties I owe as a Husband,
And pietie of a Parent?
Aſc. I am taught Sir
By the inſtinct of nature that obedience
Which bids me to prefer your peace of mind,
Before thoſe pleaſures that are deareſt to me
Be wholy hers (my Lord) I quit all parts,
That I may challenge : may you grow old together
And no diſtaſt e're find you and before
The Characters of age are printed on you
May you ſee many Images of your ſelves,
Though I, like ſome falſe Glaſſe, that's never look'd in
Am caſt a ſide, and broken from this howre
(Unles invited, which I dare not hope for)
I never will ſet my forbidden feete,
Over your threſhold : onely give me leave
Though caſt off to the world, to mention you
In my devotions 'tis all I ſue for
And ſo I take my laſt leave
Hen. Though I am
Devoted to a wife nay allmoſt ſol'd
A ſlave to ſerve her pleaſures, yet I cannot
So part with all humanity, but I muſt
Shew ſomething of a Father : thou ſhalt not goe
Unfurniſh'd and unfriended too : take that
To guard thee from neceſſities ; may thy goodnes
Meet many favours, and thine innocence
Deſerve to be the heire of greater fortunes,
Then thou wer't borne to. Scorne me not Violante
This baniſhment is a kind of civill death,
And now, as it were at his Funerall
To ſhed a teare or two, is not unmanly
And ſo farewell for ever : one word more,
Though I muſt never ſee thee (my Aſcanio)
When this is ſpent (for ſo the Judge decreed)
Send to me for ſupply : are you pleas'd now?
Viol. Yes : I have cauſe : to ſee you howle and blubber
At the parting of my torment, & your ſhame Bed ready, wine, table Standish & Paper.
'Tis well: proceed: ſupply his wants: doe doe:
Let the great dowre I brought ſerve to maintain
Your Baſtards riots : ſend my Clothes and Jewells,
To your old acquaintance, your deare dame his Mother
Now you begin to melt, I know 'twill ſollow,
Hen. Is all I doe miſconſtrude?
Viol. I will take
A courſe to right my ſelfe a ſpeeding one :
By the bleſſ'd Saints, I will ; if I prove cruell
The ſhame to ſee thy fooliſh pitty taught me
To looſe my naturall ſoftnes, keepe off from me
Thy flateries are infectious, and i'le fle thee
As I would doe a Leaper.
Hen. Let not fury
Tranſport you ſo : you know I am your Creature;
All love, but to your ſelf, with him, hath left me
I'le ioyne with you in any thing
Viol. In vaine
I'le take mine owne waies, and will have no partners,
Hen. I will not croſſe you,
Viol. Doe not, they ſhall find
That to a Woman of her hopes beguil'd
A viper troad on, or an Aſpick's, mild. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Lopez. Millanes Arſenio.

Lop. Sits the game there? I have you by mine order,
I love Leandro for't
Mil. But you muſt ſhew it
In lending him your helpe, to gain him meanes
And opportunitie.
Lop. He ſhall want nothing,
I know my Advocate to a hayre, and what
Will fetch him from his prayers, if he uſe any,
I am honyed with the project : I would have him horn'd
For a moſt pretious Beaſt.
Arſ. But you looſe time,
Lop. I am gon, inſtruct you Diego, you will find him
A ſharpe and ſubtle knave, give him but hints
And he will amplifie : Se all things ready
I'll fetch him with a vengeance. Exit.
Arſ. If he faile now,
Wee'll give him over too,
Mil. Tuſh he is fleſh'd,
And knowes what vaine to ſtrike for his owne credit.

Have

Arſ. All things are ready.
Mil. Then we ſhall have a merry Scene, no're feare it.
Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Amaranta (with a note) and Moore.

Amar. Is thy Maſter gone out?
Moore. Even now, the Curat fetch'd him,
About a ſerious buſineſſe as it ſeem'd,
For he ſnatch'd up his Cloak, and bruſh'd his hat ſtrait,
Set his Band handſomely, and out he gallop'd.
Amar. 'Tis well, 'tis very well, he went out (Egla.)
As luckily, as one would ſay, goe Husband,
He was call'd by providence: fling this ſhort paper
Into Leandro's Cell, and waken him,
He is monſtrous vexed, and muſty, at my Cheſſe-play;
But this ſhall ſupple him, when he has read it:
Take your owne recreation for two houres,
And hinder nothing.
Moore. If I doe, I'll hang for't. Exeunt.

Scena quarta.

Enter Octavio, Jacintha.

Oct. If that you lov'd Aſcanio for himſelfe,
And not your private ends, you rather ſhould
Bleſſe the faire opportunitie, that reſtores him
To his Birth-right, and the Honours he was borne to,
Then grieve at his good Fortune.
Jac. Grieve Octavio?
I would reſigne my Eſſence, that he were
As happy as my love could faſhion him,
Though every bleſſing that ſhould fall on him,
Might prove a curſe to me, my ſorrow ſprings
Out of my feare, and doubt he is not ſafe.
I am acquainted with Don Henrique's nature,
And I have heard too much the fiery temper
Of Madam Violante: can you thinke
That ſhe, that almoſt is at war with heaven
For being barren, will with equall eyes
Behold a Son of mine?
Oct. His Fathers care,
That for the want of Iſſue tooke him home,
(Though with the forfeiture of his owne fame)
Will looke unto his ſafetie.
Jac. Step-mothers
Have many eyes, to find a way to miſchiefe,
Though blind to goodneſſe.
Enter Jamy and Aſcanio.
Oct. Here comes Don Jamy,
And with him our Aſcanio.
Jamy. Good youth leave me,
I know thou art forbid my company,
And onely to be ſeene with me, will call on Thy Fathers anger.
Arſ. Sir, if that to ſerve you
Could looſe me any thing (as indeed it cannot)
I ſtill would follow you. Alas I was borne
To doe you hurt but not to help my ſelfe,
I was, for ſome particular end, tooke home,
But am caſt off againe.
Jam. Is't poſſible?
Aſc. The Lady, whom my Father calls his wife
Abhors my ſight, is ſick of me, and forc'd him
To turne me out of doores.
Jac. By my beſt hopes
I thanke her crueltie, for it comes heere
A ſaving charitie.
Aſc. I am onely happy
That yet I can relieve you, 'pray you ſhare:
My Father's wondrous kind, and promiſes
That I ſhould be ſupplide: but ſure the Lady
Is a malitious woman, and I feare
Meanes me no good.
Enter Servant.
Jamy. I am turn'd a ſtone with wonder,
And know not what to thinke.
Ser. From my Lady,
Your private eare, and this——
Jamy. New Miracles?
Ser. She ſayes, if you dare make your ſelfe a Fortune,
She will propoſe the meanes; My Lord Don Henrique
Is now from home, and ſhe alone expects you,
If you dare truſt her ſo, if not deſpaire of
A ſecond offer, Exit.
Jam. Though there were an Ambuſh
Layd for my life, I,ll on, and ſound this ſecret,
Retire thee (my Aſcanio) with thy Mother:
But ſtir not forth, ſome great deſigne's on foot,
Fall what can fall, if e're the Sun be ſet,
I ſee you not, give me dead.
Aſc. We will expect you,
And thoſe bleſs'd Angels, that love goodneſſe, guard you.
Exeunt.

Scena Quinta.

Enter Lopez and Bartolus.

Bar. Is't poſſible he ſhould be rich?
Lop. Moſt poſſible,
He hath bin long, though he had but little gettings,
Drawing together, Sir.
Bar. Accounted a poore Sexton,
Honeſt poore Diego,
Lop. I aſſure ye, a cloſe Fellow,
Both cloſe, and ſcraping, and that fills the bags, Sir,
Bar. A notable good Fellow too?
Lop. Sometimes, Sir, Diego ready in Bed, wine, cup.
When he hop'd to drink a man into a ſurfeit,
That he might gaine by his Grave.
Bar. So many thouſands?
Lop. Heaven knowes what.
Bar. 'Tis ſtrange,
'Tis very ſtrange; but we ſee by endeavour,
And honeſt labour——
Lop. Milo, by continuance
Grew from a ſilly Calfe (with your worſhips reverence)
To carry a Bull, from a penny, to a pound, Sir,
And from a pound, to many: 'tis the progreſſe.
Bar. Ye ſay true, but he lov'd to feed well alſo,
And that me-thinks——
Lop. From another mans Trencher, Sir,
And there he found it ſeaſon'd with ſmall charge:
There he would play the Tyrant, and would devoure ye
More then the Graves he made, at home he liv'd
Like a Camelion ſuckt th'Ayre of miſery, Table out. Stem.
And grew fat by th'Brewis of an Eg-ſhel, diſh paper ſtools.

Would ſmell a Cooks ſhop, and goe home and ſurfeit,
And be a moneth in faſting out that Fever. (ye?
Bar. Theſe are good Symptomes: do's he lye ſo ſick ſay
Lop. Oh, very ſick.
Bar. And choſen me Executor?
Lop. Onely your Worſhip.
Bar. No hope of his amendment?
Lop. None, that we find.
Bar. He hath no kinſmen neither?
Lop. 'Truth, very few.
Bar. His mind will be the quieter,
What Doctors has he?
Lop. There's none ſir, he believes in.
Bar. They are but needleſſe things, in ſuch extremities.
Who drawes the good-man's will?
Lop. Marry that doe I, Sir.
And to my griefe.
Bar. Griefe will doe little now, Sir,
Draw it to your comfort, Friend, and as I counſell ye,
An honeſt man, but ſuch men live not alwayes
Who are about him?
Lop. Many now he is paſſing.
That would pretend to his love, yes, and ſome gentlemen
That would faine counſell him, and be of his kindred;
Rich men can want no heires, Sir.
Bar. They doe ill,
Indeed they doe, to trouble him: very ill, Sir,
But we ſhall take a care.

Enter Diego (in a Bed) Millanes, Arſenio, and Pariſhioners.

Lop. Will ye come neare, Sir,
'Pray ye bring him out; Now ye may ſee in what ſtate:
Give him freſh ayre. Bed thruſt out.
Bar. I am ſorry, Neighbour Diego,
To find ye in ſo weake a ſtate.
Die. Ye are welcome,
But I am fleeting, Sir.
Bar. Me-thinkes he looks well,
His colour freſh, and ſtrong, his eyes are cheartfull.
Lop. A glimmering before death, 'tis nothing els, Sir,
Do you ſee how he fumbles with the ſheet? do ye note that
Di. My learned Sir 'pray ye ſit: I am bold to ſend for ye,
To take a care of what I leave.
Lop. Doe you heare that?
Arſ. Play the knave finely.
Die. So I will, I warrant ye,
And careſully.
Bar. 'Pray ye doe not trouble him,
You ſee he's weake and has a wandeing fancie.
Di. My honeſt Neighbours, weep not, I muſt leave ye,
I cannot alwayes beare ye company,
We muſt drop ſtill, there is no remedie:
'Pray ye Maſter Curat, will ye write my Teſtament,
And write it largely it may be remembred
And be witneſſe to my Legacies good Gentlemen;
Your worſhip I doe make my full Executor,
You are a man of wit and underſtanding:
Give me a cup of wine to raiſe my Spirits,
For I ſpeake low: I would before theſe Neighbours
Have ye to ſweare (Sir) that you will ſee it executed,
And what I give, let equally be rendred
For my ſoules health.
Bar. I vow it truly, Neighbours,
Let not that trouble ye before all theſe,
Once more I give my Oath.
Di. Then ſet me higher,
And pray ye come neare me all.
Lop. We are ready for ye.
Adil. Now ſpur the Aſſe, and get our friend time.
Die. Firſt then,
After I have given my Body to the wormes
(For they muſt be ſerv'd firſt, they are ſeldome cozen'd)
Lop. Remember your Pariſh, Neighbour.
Di. You ſpeake truly,
I doe remember it, a lewd vile Pariſh,
And pray it may be mended: To the Poore of it,
(Which is to all the Pariſh) I give nothing,
For nothing, unto nothing, is moſt naturall,
Yet leave as much ſpace, as will build an Hoſpitall,
Their children may pray for me.
Bar. What doe you give to it?
Die. Set downe two thouſand Duckets,
Bar. 'Tis a good gift,
And will be long remembred.
Die. To your worſhip,
(Becauſe you muſt take paines to ſee all finiſh'd)
I give two thouſand more, it may be three, Sir,
A poore gratuitie for your paines-taking.
Bar. Theſe are large ſummes;
Lop. Nothing to him that has 'em.
Die. To my old Maſter Vicar. I give five hundred,
(Five hundred, and five hundred, are too few Sir)
But there be more to ſerve.
Bar. This fellow coynes ſure. (Books,
Di. Give me ſome more drink. Pray ye buy Books, buy
You have a learned head, ſtuffe it with Libraries,
And underſtand 'em, when ye have done, 'tis Juſtice,
Run not the Pariſh mad with Controverſies,
Nor preach not Abſtinence to longing women,
'Twill budge the bottoms of their conſciences:
I would give the Church new Organs, but I prophecie
The Church-wardens would quickly pipe 'em out o'th' Pa-
Two hundred Duckets more to mend the chancel, (riſh,
And to paint true Orthographie, as many,
They write Sunt with a C, which is abominable,
'Pray you ſet that downe, to poore Maidens marriages.
Lo. I that's well thought of, what's your will in that point?
A meritorious thing.
Bar. No end of this will?
Di. I give per annum two hundred ells of Lockram,
That there be no ſtrait dealings in their Linnens,
But the Sayles cut according to their Burthens;
To all Bell-Ringers, I bequeath new Ropes,
And let them uſe 'em at their owne diſcretions.
Arſ. You may remember us.
Di. I doe, good Gentlemen,
And I bequeath ye both good carefull Surgeons
A Legacy, you have need of, more then money,
I know you want good Diets and good Lotions,
And in your pleaſures good take heed.
Lop. He raves now.
But 'twill be quickly off,
Di. I doe bequeath ye
Commodities of pins: browne papers: pack-threds,
Roſt porke, & puddings: Ginger-bread, & Jewes-trumps,
Of penny Pipes, and mouldy Pepper: take 'em,
Take 'em even where your pleaſe, and be cozen'd with 'em,
I ſhould bequeath ye Executions alſo,
But thoſe I'll leave to th' Law.
Lop. Now he growes temperate.
Bar. You will give no more?
Di. I am loth to give more from ye,

Becauſe

Because I know you will have a care to execute
Onely, to pious uses, Sir, a little.
Bar. If he be worth all these, I am made for ever,
Di. I give to fatall Dames, that spin mens threds out,
And poore distressed Damsells, that are militant
As members of our owne Afflictions,
A hundred Crowns to buy warm tubbs to worke in,
I give five hundred pounds to buy a Church-yard,
A spacious Church-yard, to lay Theeves and knaves in,
Rich men, and honest men, take all the roome up.
Lop. Are ye not weary?
Di. Never of well-doing.
Bar. These are mad Legacies.
Di. They were got as madly;
My Sheep, and Oxen, and my moveables,
My Plate, and Jewells, and five hundred Acres;
I have no heires.
Bar. This cannot be, 'tis Monstrous.
Di. Three Ships at Sea too.
Bar. You have made me full Executor.
Di. Full, full, and totall, would I had more to give ye
But these may serve an honest mind.
Bar. Ye say true,
A very honest mind, and make it rich too;
Rich, wondrous rich, but where shall I raise these monys,
About your house? I see no such great promises;
Where shall I find these summes?
Di. Even where you please Sir,
You are wise and provident and know businesse
Ev'n raise 'em where you shal think good, I am reasonable
Bar. Thinke good? will that raise thousands?
What doe you make me?
Di. You have sworn to see it done, that's all my comfort.
Bar. Where I please? this is pack'd sure to disgrace me.
Di. Ye are just and honest, and I know you will doe it,
Ev'n where you please, for you know where the wealth is.
Bar. I am abused, betrayed, I am laugh'd at, scorn'd,
Baffel'd, and boared, it seeme.
Arf. No, no, ye are fooled.
Lop. Most finely fooled, and handsomely, and neatly,
Such cunning Masters must be fooled sometimes, Sir,
And have their worships noses wiped, 'tis healthfull,
We are but quit: you foole us of our moneys
In every Cause, in every Quiddit wipe us. (then,
Di. Ha, ha, ha ha, some more drink, for my heart, Gentle-
This merry Lawyer—— ha, ha, ha, ha this Scholler——
I thinke this fitt will cure me: this Executor——
I shall laugh out my Lungs.
Bar. This is derision above sufferance, villany
Plotted, and set against me.
Di. Faith 'tis knavery,
In troth I must confesse, thou art fooled indeed, Lawyer.
Mil. Did you thinke, had this man been rich——
Bar. 'Tis well, Sir.
Mil. He would have chosen such a Wolfe, a Canicker,
A Maggot-pate, to be his whole Executor.
Lop. A Lawyer, that entangles all mens honesties,
And lives like a Spider in a Cobweb lurking,
And catching at all Flies, that passe his pits-falls?
Puts powder to all States, to make 'em caper?
Would he trust you?
Di. Doe you deserve? I find, Gentlemen,
This Cataplasme of a well cozen'd Lawyer
Laid to my stomach lenifies my Fever,
Me-thinkes I could eat now and walke a little:
Bar. I am asham'd to feele how flat I am cheated,
How grossely, and malitiously made a May-game,
A damned Trick; my wife, my wife, some Rascall:
My credit, and my wife, some lustfull villaine,
Some Bawd, some Rogue,
Arf. Some craftie Foole has found ye:
This 'tis Sir, to teach ye to be too busie,
To covet all the gaines, and all the rumours
To have a stirring care in all mens actions.
Lop. We did this, but to vex your fine officiousnesse.
Bar. Good yeild ye and go'd thank ye: I am fooled, gen-
The Lawyer is an Asse, I doe confesse it, (tlemen;
A weak dull shallow Asse: good even to your worships:
Vicar, remember Vicar, Rascall remember,
Thou notable rich Rascall.
Di. I doe remember, Sir,
'Pray ye stay a little, I have ev'n two Legacies
To make your mouth up, Sir.
Bar. Remember Varletts, (tocks. Ex.
Quake & remember, Rogues; I have brine for your But-
Lop. Oh how he frets, and fumes now like a dunghill.
Di. His gall containes fine stuffe now to make poysons,
Rare damned stuffe.
Arf. Let's after him, and still vex him,
And take my Friend off: by this time he has prosper'd,
He cannot loose this deere time: 'tis impossible.
Mil. Well Diego, thou hast done.
Lop. Hast done it daintily.
Mil. And shalt be as well paid, Boy——
Arf. Goe, let's crucifie him. Exeunt.

Scena Sexta.

Enter Amaranta, Leandro.

Lea. I have told ye all my story, and how desperately.
Am. I doe believe: let's walke on, time is pretious,
Not to be spent in words, here no more wooing,
The open Ayre's an enemy to Lovers, Priester ready
Doe as I tell ye. for noyse.
Lea. I'll doe any thing,
I am so over-joy'd, I'll fly to serve ye.
Am. Take your joy moderately, as it is ministred,
And as the cause invites: that man's a foole
That at the sight o'th' Bond, dances and leapes,
Then is the true joy, when the money comes.
Lea. You cannot now deny me.
Am. Nay, you know not,
Women have crotchets, and strange fits.
Lea. You shall not.
Am. Hold ye to that and sweare it confidently,
Then I shall make a scruple to deny ye:
'Pray ye let's step in, and see a friend of mine,
The weather's sharp: we'll stay but halfe an houre,
We may be miss'd els: a private fine house 'tis, Sir,
And we may find many good welcomes.
Lea. Doe Lady,
Doe happy Lady.
Am. All your mind's of doing,
You must be modester.
Lea. I will be any thing. —— Exeunt.

Scena Septima.

Enter Bartolus.

Bar. Open the dores and give me roome to chase in Mine owne roome, and my liberty: why Maid there,

Open, I ſay, and doe not anger me,
I am ſubject to much fury: when ye diſh-clout?
When doe ye come? a ſleepe, ye lazie hell-hound?
Nothing intended, but your eaſe, and eating?
No body here? why wife, why wife? why jewell?
No tongue to anſwer me? pre'thee (good Pupill)
Diſpence a little with thy carefull ſtudy,
And ſtep to th' doore, and let me in; nor he neither?
Ha! not at's ſtudy? nor aſleepe? nor no-body?
I'll make ye heare: the houſe of Ignorance,
No ſound inhabits here: I have a key yet
That commands all: I feare I am metamorphiz'd.

Enter Lopez, Arſenio, Milanes, Diego.

Lop. He keepes his fury ſtill, and may doe miſchiefe.
Mil. He ſhalbe hang'd firſt, we'll be ſticklers there, boyes
Di. The hundred thouſand Dreams now, that poſſes him
Of jealouſie, and of revenge, and frailtie
Of drawing Bills againſt us, and Petitions.
Lop. And caſting what his credit ſhall recover.
Mil. Let him caſt till his Maw come up, we care not,
You ſhall be ſtill ſecured. A great noyſe within.
Die. We'll pay him home then;
Hark what a noyſe he keeps within?
Lop. Certaine
H'as ſet his Chimneys o' fire, or the divell roars there.
Di. The Codixes o'th' Law are broke looſe, Gentlemen.
Arſ. He's fighting ſure,
Di I'll tell ye that immediatly—— Exit.
Mil. Or doing ſome ſtrange out-rage on himſelfe.
Arſ. Hang him, he dares not be ſo valiant.

Enter Diego.

Di. There's no body at home and he chaſes like a Lyon,
And ſtinkes withall. Noyſe ſtill.
Lop. No body?
Di. Not a creature,
Nothing within, but he and his Law-tempeſt,
The Ladies, diſhes, kettles, how they fly all?
And how the Glaſſes through the Roomes?

Enter Bartolus.

Arſ. My friend ſure
Has got her out, and now he has made an end on't.
Lop. See where the Sea comes? how it foams, & bruſſels?
The great Leviathan o'th' Law, how it tumbles?
Bar. Made every way an Aſſe? abus'd on all ſides?
And from all quarters, people come to laugh at me?
Riſe like a Comet, to be wonder'd at?
A horrid Comet, for Boyes tongues, and Ballads?
I will run from my wits.

Enter Amaranta, Leandro.

Arſ. Doe, doe, (good Lawyer)
And from thy money too, then thou wilt be quiet.
Mil. Here ſhe comes home: now mark the ſalutations;
How like an Aſſe my friend goes?
Arſ. She has pull'd his eares downe.
Bar. Now, what ſweet voyage? to what Garden, Lady?
Or to what Coſens houſe?
Am. Is this my welcome?
I cannot goe to Church, but thus I am ſcandall'd,
Uſe no devotion for my ſoule, but Gentlemen——
Bar. To Church?
Am. Yes, and ye keep ſweet youths to wait upon me,
Sweet bred-up youths, to be a credit to me.
There's your delight againe, pray take him to ye,
However comes neare me more, to debaſe me. (ye?
Ba. How's this? how's this? good wife, how has he wrongd
Am. I was faine to drive him like a ſheep before me,
I bluſh to thinke how people ſleere, and ſcorn'd me,
Others have handſome men, that know behaviour,
Place, and obſervance: this ſilly thing knowes nothing,
Cannot tell ten; Let every Raſcall juſtle me,
And ſtill I puſh'd him on, as he had bin comming.
Bar. Ha! did ye puſh him on? is he ſo ſtupid?
Am. When others were attentive to the Prieſt,
Good devout Gentleman, then fell he faſt
Faſt, ſound aſleepe: then firſt began the Bag-pipes
The ſeverall ſtops on's noſe, made a rare muſick,
A rare and lowd, and thoſe plaid many an Antheme
Put out of that, he fell ſtrait into dreaming.
Arſ. As cunning, as ſhe is ſweet; I like this carriage.
Bar. What did he then?
Am. Why then he talked in his Sleep too,
Nay I'll divulge your morall vertues (ſheeps-face)
And talk'd aloude, that every eare was fixt to him:
Did not I ſuffer (doe you thinke) in this time?
Talk of your bawling Law, of appellations
Of Declarations, and Excommunications:
Warrants, and Executions: and ſuch divells (ryes
That drove all the Gentlemen out o'th' Church, by hur-
With execrable oaths, they would never come there again
Thus am I ſerv'd, and man'd.
Lea. I pray ye forgive me,
I muſt confeſſe I am not fit to wait upon ye:
Alas, I was brought up——
Am. To be an Aſſe,
A Lawyers Aſſe, to carry Bookes, and Buckrams.
Bar. But what did you at Church?
Lop. At Church, did ye aske her?
Doe you heare gentlemen, doe you mark that queſtion?
Becauſe you are halfe an heretique your ſelfe, Sir,
Would ye breed her too? this ſhall to the Inquiſition,
A pious Gentlewoman, reprov'd for praying?
I'll ſee this filed, and you ſhall heare further, Sir.
Arſ. Ye have an ill heart.
Lop. It ſhall be found our Gentlemen,
There be thoſe youths will ſearch it.
Die. You are warme Signiour,
But a Faggot will warme ye better: we are witneſſes.
Lop. Enough to hang him, doe not doubt.
Mil. Nay certaine,
I doe beleeve has rather no Religion. (Church ſir?
Lop. That muſt be knowne too, becauſe ſhee goes to
O monſtrum informe ingens!
Die. Let him goe on, ſir,
His wealth will build a Nunnery, a faire one,
And this good Lady, when he is hang'd, and roaſted,
May there be Abbeſſe.
Bar. You are cozend, honeſt Gentlemen,
I doe not forbid the uſe, but the forme, marke me.
Lop. Forme? what doe ye make of Forme?
Bar. They will undoe me,
Sweare, as I oft have done, and ſo betray me;
I muſt make faire way, and hereafter, Wife,
You are welcome home, & henceforth take your pleaſure,
Goe, when ye ſhall thinke fit, I will not hinder ye,
My eyes are open now, and I ſee my errour,
My ſhame as great as that, but I muſt hide it.
The whole conveyance now I ſmell, but Baſta,
Another time muſt ſerve: you ſee us friends, now
Heartily friends, and no more chiding (gentlemen)
I have bin too fooliſh, I confeſſe, no more words,
No more (ſweet wife.)

Am.

Am. You know my easie nature
Bar. Goe get ye in: you see she has bin angry:
Forbeare her sight a while and time will pacify.
And learne to be more bold.
Lea. I would I could,
I will doe all I am able. Exit.
Bar. Doe Leandro,
We will not part, but friends of all hands.
Lop. Well said,
Now ye are reasonable, we can looke on ye,
Bar. Ye have iercke me: but for all that I forgive ye
Forgive ye hartily, and doe invite ye
To morrow to a Breakfast, I make but seldome
But now we will be merry.
Arf. Now ye are friendly,
Your doggednes and nigardize flung from ye.
And now we will come to ye
Bar. Give me your hands, all;
You shall be wellcome hartily.
Lop. We will be,
For wee'll eate hard
Bar. The harder, the more wellcome,
And till the morning farewell; I have busines. Exit.
Mil. Farewell good bountiful Bartolus 'tis a brave wench
A sudaine witty Theif, and worth all service:
Goe wee'll all goe, and crucifie the Lawyer,
Dio. I'll clap foure tire of teeth into my mouth more
But I will grind his substance.
Arf. Well Leandro,
Thou hast had a strange voyage, but I hope
Thou rid'st now in safe harbour,
Mil. Lets goe drinke, Friends,
And laugh alou'd at all our merry may-games
Lop. A match, a match 'twill whet our stomachs better.
Exeunt.

Actus Quintus. Scæna Prima.

Enter Violante and Servant.

Ser. Madam hees come. Chaire and stooles out.
Viol. 'Tis well how did he looke, (startled?
When he knew from whom you were sent? was he not
Or confident? or fearefull?
Ser. As appear'd
Like one that knew his fortune at the worst,
And car'd not what could follow,
Viol. 'Tis the better
Reach me a Chaire: So bring him in, be carefull
That none disturb us: I will try his temper,
And if I find him apt for my employments,
Enter Iam, Servant.
I'll worke him to my ends, if not I shall Find other Engines.
Ser. Ther's my Ladie,
Viol. Leave us
Iam. You sent for me?
Viol. I did, and do's the favour,
Your present state considered, and my power,
Deserve no greater Ceremonie?
Iam. Ceremonie?
I use to pay that, where I doe owe durie,
Not to my Brothers wife: I cannot fawne,
If you expect it from me, you are cozen'd,
And so farewell.
Viol. He beates up still; I like it,
Pray you a word
Iam. Yes: I will give you leave ting
On equall termes, and sit by you as a friend,
But not stand as a Suitor: Now your pleasure?
Viol. You are very bold.
Iam. 'Tis fitt: since you are proud
I was not made to feed that foolish humour,
With flattery and obseruance
Viol. Yet, with your favour,
A little forme ioyn'd with respect to her,
That can add to yours wants, or free you from 'em
(Nay raise you to a fate, beyond your hopes)
Might well become your wisedome,
Iam. It would rather
Write me a Foole, should I but onely think
That any good to me, could flow from you,
Whom for so many yeares: I have found and prov'd
My greatest Enemy: I am still the same
My wants have not transform'd me: I dare tell you,
To your new cerviz'd face, what I have spoken
Freely behind your back, what I thinke of you,
You are the proudest thing, and have the least,
Reason to be so, that I ever read of
In stature you are a Gianteese: and your Tailour
Takes measure of you, with a Iacobs staffe,
Or he can never reach you, this by the way
For your large size: Now, in a word, or two
To treat of your Complexion were decorum:
You are so far from faire, I doubt your Mother
Was too familiar with the Moore, that serv'd her,
Your Limbes and Features, I passe breifely over,
As things not worth description, and come roundly
To your soule, if you have any: for 'tis doubtfull
Viol. I laugh at this, proceed
Iam. This Soule, I speake of
Or rather salt to keepe this heape of flesh,
From being a walking stench, like a large Inne,
Stands open for the entertainement of
All impious practises: but ther's no Corner
An honest thought can take up: and as it were not Sufficient in your self to comprehend
All wicked plots, you have taught the Foole, my Brother
By your contagion, almost to put off
The nature of the man, and turn'd him Devill
Because he should be like you, and I hope
Will march to hell together: I have spoken,
And if the limming you, in your true Colours
Can make the Painter gracious, I stand readie
For my reward, or if my words distaste you
I weigh it not, for though your Groomes were ready
To cut my throat for't, be assur'd I cannot Use other Language
Viol. You thinke you have said now,
Like a brave fellow: in this Womans War
You ever have bin train'd: spoke big: but suffer'd
Like a tame Asse; and when most spur'd and gall'd
Were never Master of the Spleene or Spirit,
That could raise up the anger of a man,
And force it into action,
Iam. Yes vile Creature
Wer't thou a subject worthy of my Sword,
Or that thy death, this moment, could call home,
My banish'd hopes, thou now wer't dead: dead (woman)
But being as thou art, it is sufficient
I scorne thee, and contemne thee
Viol. This shewes nobly:

(Table ready covered with Cloath Napkins Salt Trenchers and Bread)

I muſt confeſſe it: I am taken with it
For had you kneeld, and whind and ſhew'd a baſe
And low dejected mind, I had deſpis'd you
This Bravery (in your adverſe fortune) conquers
And do's command me, and upon the ſudaine
I feele a kind of pittie, growing in me,
For your misfortunes, pittie ſome ſayes the Parent,
Of future love, and I repent my part,
So far in what you have ſuffered, that I could,
(But you are cold) doe ſomething to repaire
What your baſe Brother (ſuch Iami I thinke him)
Hath brought to ruine
Iam. Ha?
Viol. Be not amaz'd,
Our injuries are equall in his Baſtard
You are familliar with what I grone for
And though the name of Husband holds a tye
Beyond a Brother, I, a poore weake Woman,
Am ſenſible, and tender of a wrong,
And to revenge it, would break through all letts,
That durſt oppoſe me.
Iam. Is it poſſible?
Viol. By this kiſſe: ſtart not: thus much, as a ſtranger
You may take from me; But, if you were pleas'd,
I ſhould ſelect you, as a boſome Friend,
I would print 'em, thus, and thus,
Iam. Keepe off.
Viol. Come neare,
Neere into the Cabinet of my Counſailes:
Simplicity and patience dwell with Fooles,
And let them beare thoſe burthens, which wiſe men
Boldly ſhake off; Be mine and ioyne with me,
And when that I have rais'd you to a fortune,
(Doe not deny your ſelfe the happie meanes)
You'l looke on me, with more iudicious eies
And ſweare I am moſt faire.
Iam. What would this Woman?
The purpoſe of theſe words? ſpeake not in ridles
And when I underſtand what you would counſell,
My anſwer ſhall be ſuddaine,
Viol. Thus then Iami,
The objects of our fury, are the ſame,
For young Aſcanio, whom you ſnake like hug'd
(Frozen with wants to death) in your warme boſome,
Lives to ſupplant you, in your certaine hopes,
And kills in me all comfort.
Iam. Now 'tis plaine,
I apprehend you: and were he remov'd——
Viol. You, once againe, were the undoubted heire.
Iam. 'Tis not to be denyed; I was ice before,
But now ye have fir'd me,——
Viol. I'l add fuell to it,
And by a nearer cut, doe you but ſteere
As I direct you bring our Bark into
The Port of happines,
Iam. How?
Viol. By Henriques death:
But you'l ſay hee's your Brother; in great fortunes
(Which are epitomes of States & Kingdomes) Diſhes covered with papers in each ready.
The politicke brooke no Rivalls,
Iam. Excellent.
For ſure I thinke out of a ſcrupulous feare,
To feed in expectation, when I may
(Diſpenſing but a little with my conſcience)
Come into full poſſeſſion, would not argue
One that deſir'd to thrive,
Viol. Now you ſpeake like
A man that knowes the World.
Iam. I needs muſt learne
That have ſo good a Tutreſſe: And what thinke you,
(Don Henrique and Aſcanio cut off)
That none may live, that ſhall deſire to trace us
In our black pathes, if that Octavio
His foſter Father and the ſad Iacinta,
(Faith pittie her, and free her from her Sorrowes)
Should fall Companions with 'em? When we are red
With murther, let us often bath in blood,
The collour will be ſcarlet.
Viol. And that's glorious,
And will protect the fact
Iam. Suppoſe this don:
(If undiſcovered) we may get for money,
(As that you know buyes any thing in Rome)
A diſpenſation
Viol. And be married?
Iam. True.
Or if it be knowne, truſſe up our Gold and Jewells,
And fly to ſome free State, and there with ſcorne——
Viol. Laugh at the lawes of Spaine.
'Twere admirable.
Iam. We ſhall beget rare Children. I am rap'd with
The meere imagination——
Viol. Shall it be don?
Iam. Shall? tis too tedious: furniſh me with meanes
To hire the inſtruments, and to your ſelf,
Say it is done already: I will ſhew you,
'Ere the Sun ſet, how much you have wrought upon me,
Your province is onely to uſe ſome meanes,
To ſend my Brother, to the Grove, that's neighbour,
To the weſt Port of th' Citie; leave the reſt,
To my owne practiſe; I have talk'd too long:
But now will doe: this kiſſe, with my Confeſſion,
To worke a fell revenge: A mans a foole,
If not inſtructed in a Womans Schoole. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Bartolus Algazeirs and a Paratour. The Table ſet out and ſtooles.

Bar. You are well enough diſguiz'd, furniſh the Table,
Make no ſhew, what ye are, till I diſcover
Not a ſoule knowes ye here: be quick and diligent,
Theſe youthes, I have invited to a Breakefaſt,
But what the Sawce will be, I am of opinion
I ſhall take off the edges of their Appetites,
And greaze their gums, for eating hartily,
This month or two they have plaid their prizes with me
And with their ſeverall ſlurts they have lighted dange-
But ſure I ſhall be quit: I heare 'em comming (rouſly
Goe off, and wait the bringing in your ſervice,
And doe it handſomely: you know where to have it
Enter Millanes, Arſenio, Lopez, Diego.
Wellcome i'Faith,
Arſ. That's well ſaid, honeſt Lawyer,
Lop. Said like a Neighbour
Bar. Wellcome all: all over
And let's be merry:
Mil. To that end we came Sir,
An hower of freedome's worth an age of juglings,
Die. I am come too Sir, to ſpecifie my Stomach
A poore reteyner to your worſhips bountie,

Bar. And thou ſhalt have it fill'd, my merry Diego,
My liberall, and my bonney bounteous Diego
Even fil'd till it groane againe
Di. Let it have faire play,
And if it founder then——
I'll tell ye neighbours,
Though I were angry yeſterday, with ye all,
And very angry for me thought ye bobd me.
Lop. No, no, by no meanes.
Bar. No, when I conſidered
It was a jeſt, and carried off ſo quaintly
It made me merry: very merry, Gentlemen,
I doe confeſs I could not ſleepe to thinke on't
The mirth ſo tickled me, I could not ſlumber,
Lop. Good mirth do's worke ſo: honeſt mirth,
Now, ſhould we have meant in earneſt——
Bar. You ſay true Neighbour,
Lop. It might have bred ſuch a diſtaſt and ſowreneſſe,
Such fond imaginations in your Braines, Sir
For things thruſt home in earneſt ——
Bar. Very certaine
But I know ye all for merry waggs, and ere long
You ſhall know me too. in another faſhion
Though y'are pamper'd ye ſhall beare part 'oth burthen.

Enter Amaranta and Leandro.

Come Wife; Come bid 'em welcome; Come my Jewell:
And Pupill, you ſhall come too; nere hang backward,
Come, come the womans pleas'd, her angers over,
Come, be not baſhfull,
Am. What do's he prepare here?
Sure ther's no meate 'ith houſe at leaſt none dreſt,
Do's he meane to mock 'em? or ſome new bred Crotchet
Come o're his braines; I doe not like his kindnes?
But ſilence beſt becomes me: if he meane foule play
Sure they are enough to right themſelves and let 'em,

But the poore Girle; you know ther's no meat neither
Bar. Peace and be quiet; I ſhall make you ſmoak els
Ther's men and Meate enough, ſet it downe formally

Enter Algazeirs with diſhes.

Am. I feare ſome lew'd tricke, yet I dare not ſpeake on't
Bar. I have no dainties for ye Gentlemen,
Nor lodes of meat, to make the roome ſmell of 'em
Onely a diſh to every man I have dedicated,
And if I have pleas'd his appetite,
Lop. O, a Capon,
A Bird of grace, and be thy will, I honour it
Di. For me ſome fortie pound of lovely Beeſſe,
Plac'd in a mediterranean ſea of Breviſſe
Bar. Fall to, fall to that we may drinke and laugh after Wait diligently knaves,
Miſ. What tare bits this?
An execution, bleſſe me!
Bar. Nay take it to ye
Ther's no avoiding it, 'tis ſomewhat tough Sir,
But a good ſtomach will endure it eaſily
The ſum is, but a thouſand duckets Sir,
Arſ. A Capias from my Surgeon, and my Silke man,
Bar. Your carefull makers, but they have mard your diet
Sir not, your Swords are gon: ther's no avoiding me
And theſe are Algazeirs, doe you heare that paſſing bell?
Lop. A ſtrong Citation, bleſſe me!
Bar. Out with your Beads Curat,
The devills in your diſh: bell, booke, and Candell,
Lop. A warrant to appeare before the Judges?

Bar. Ye need not,
Your feare I hope will make ye find your Breeches,
All. We are betraid
Bar. Invited doe not wrong me,
Fall to, good Gueſts, you have diligent men about ye,
Ye ſhall want nothing, that may perfecture ye
Theſe will not ſee ye ſtarv; Have I now found ye
Have I requited ye? You fool'd the Lawyer,
And thought it meritorious, to abuſe him,
A thick ram headed knave: you rid, you ſpurd him,
And glorified your wits, the more ye wrongd him;
Within this hower, ye ſhall have all your Creditours,
A ſecond diſh of new debts, come upon ye,
And new invitements to the whip (Don Diego)
And Excommunications for the Learned Curat,
A Maſque of all your furies ſhall dance to ye,
Arſ. You dare not uſe us thus?
Bar. You ſhall be bobd (Gentlemen)

To priſon, without pittie inſtantly
Before ye ſpeake another word to priſon.
I have a better Guard, without, that waytes;
Doe you ſee this man, Don Curat? 'tis a Paratour
That comes to tell ye a delightfull ſtory.
Of an old whore, ye have and then to teach ye
What is the penaltie; Laugh at me now Sir,
What Legacie would ye bequeath me now,
(And pay it on the naile?) to fly my fury?
Lop. O gentle Sir,
Bar. Do'ſt thou hope I will be gentle,
Thou fooliſh unconſiderate Curat?
Lop. Let me goe Sir,
Bar. I'll ſee thee hang firſt,
Lop. And as I am a true Vicar,
Hark in your eare, hark ſoftly ——
Bar. No, no bribery.
I'll have my ſwindge upon thee; Sirha? Raſcall?
You lenten Chaps, you that ſay ſick, and mockt me,
Mockt me, abhominably; abuſed me lewdly
I'll make thee ſick at heart, before I leave thee,
And groane, and dye indeed, and be worth nothing
Not worth a bleſſing, nor a Bell to knell for thee,
A ſheete to cover thee, but that thou ſtealeſt, (with
Stealeſt from the Merchant, and the Ring he was buried
Stealeſt from his Grave, doe you ſmell me now?
Dio. Have mercy on me! (thee
Bar. No Pſalme of mercy ſhall hold me from hanging

But ſweet and healthfull; Your puniſhment, and yours, Sir
For ſome neare reaſons, that concernes my Credit,
I will take to my ſelf.
Am. Doe Sir, and ſpare not
I have bin too good a wife, and too obedient,
But ſince ye dare provoke me to be fooliſh ——
Lea. She has, yes, and too worthie of your rage,
Before the world, I juſtifie her goodnes,
And turne that man, that dares but taint her vertues,
To my Swords point; that lying man, that baſe man,
Turne him, but face to face, that I may know him
Bar. What have I here?

Lea. A Gentleman, a free man,
One that made triall of this Ladies conſtancie,
And found it ſtrong as fate; Leave off your fooling.
For if you follow this courſe, you will be Chronicled
Enter Iames and Aſſiſtant.
For a devill, whilſt a Saint ſhe is mentioned,
You know my name indeed; I am now no Lawyer.
Some comfort now, I hope, or els would I wer hanged up
Die. And yet the Judge, he makes me ſwet.
Bar. What newes now?
Iam. I will juſtifie upon my life, and Credit
What you have heard, for truth, and will make prooffe of Aſſiſt. I will be ready at the appointed hower there,
And ſo I leave ye.
Bar. Stay I beſeech your worſhip,
And doe but heare me,
Iam. Good Sir, intend this buſines,
And let this bawling Foole: No more words Lawyer,
And no more angers, for I gueſſe your reaſons,
This Gentleman, i'l juſtifie in all places,
And that faire Ladies worth; Let who dare croſſe it,
The Plot was caſt by me, to make thee jealous,
But not to wrong your wife, ſhe is faire and vertuous,
Die. Take us to mercy too, we beſeech your honour,
We ſhall be juſtified the way of all fleſh els,
Iam. No more talke, nor no more diſſention Lawyer,
I know your anger, 'tis a vaine and ſlight one,
For if you doe; i'll lay your whole life open
A life that all the world ſhall i'll bring witnes,
And rip before a Judge the ulcerous villanies
You know I know ye, and I can bring witnes.
Bar. Nay good Sir, noble Sir.
Iam. Be at peace then preſently,
Immediately take honeſt and faire truce (tleman;
With your good Wife, and ſhake hands with that Gen-
Has honour'd ye too much, and doe it cheerefully,
Lop. Take us along, for heaven ſake too.
Bar. I am Friends,
There is no remedie, I muſt put up all,
And like my neighbours rub it ou't by'th ſhoulders,
And perfect friends; Leandro now I thanke ye,
And ther's my hand, I have no more grudge to ye,
But I am too meane henceforward for your Companie,
Lea. I ſhall not trouble ye,
Arſ. We will be friends too:
Mil. Nay Lawyer, you ſhall not fright us farther,
For all your devills wee will bolt,
Bar. I grant ye.
The Gentlemans your Baile, and thank his comming,
Did not he know me too well, you ſhould ſmart for't;
Goe all in peace, but when ye Foole next, Gentlemen,
Come not to me to Breakefaſt.
Die. I'l be bak'd firſt.
Bar. And pray ye remember, when ye are bold & merry,
The Lawyers Bancket, and the Sawce he gave ye,
Iam. Come: goe along; I have employment for ye,
Employment for your lewd braynes too, to coole ye.
For all, for every one.
All. We are all your Servants.
Die. All, all for any thing, from this day forward,
I'l hate all Breakefaſts, and depend on dinners
Iam. I am glad you come off faire
Lea. The faire has bleſt me.
Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Octavio, Iacinta, Aſcanio.

Oct. This is the place, but why we are appointed
By Don Iames to ſtay here, is a depth
I cannot ſound,
Aſc. Beleev't he is too noble,
To purpoſe any thing but for our good
Had I aſſurance of a thouſand Lives,
And with them perpetuitie of pleaſure,
And ſhould looſe all, if he prov'd only falſe,
Yet I durſt run the hazard,
Iac. 'Tis our comfort,
We cannot be more wretched then we are,
And death concludes all miſery,
Oct. Undiſcovered

Enter Henrique, Iames.

We muſt attend him
Aſc. Our ſtay is not long
With him Don Henrique?
Iac. Now I feare;
Be ſilent.
Hen. Why do'ſt thou follow me?
Iam. To ſave your life,
A plot is laid for't, all my wrongs forgot,
I have a Brothers Love,
Hen. But thy falſe ſelf,
I feare no enemy.
Iam. You have no Friend,
But what breathes in me: If you move a ſtep
Beyond this ground you tread on: you are loſt.
Hen. 'Tis by thy practiſe then: I am ſent hither
To meete her, that prefers my life, and ſafetie
Before her owne.
Iam. That you ſhould be abus'd thus
With weake credulitie: She for whoſe ſake,
You have forgot we had one noble Father,
Or that one Mother bare us, for whoſe love,
You breake a contract, to which heaven was witnes,
To ſatisfie whoſe pride, and willfull humour,
You have expos'd a ſweet, and hopefull Son,
To all the miſeries, that want can bring him,
And ſuch a Son, though you are moſt obdurate,
To give whom entertainement Savages
Would quit their Caves themſelves, to keepe him from
Bleake cold, and hunger: This diſſembling Woman,
This Idoll, whom you worſhip: all your love
And ſervice trod under her feete, deſignes you
To fill a grave, or dead, to lye a pray,
For Wolues, and vultures.
Hen. 'Tis falſe; I defie thee,
And ſtand upon my Guard

Enter Leandro Millanes, Arſenio, Bart. Lopez, Deigo, Octavio Iacinta Aſcanio and Servants.

Iam. Alas, 'tis weake:
Come on, ſince you will teach me to be cruell,
By having no faith, in me, take your fortune,
Bring the reſt forth, and bind them faſt.
Oct. My Lord.
Aſc. In what have we offended?

Ia.

Iam. I am deafe,
And following my will, I doe not ſtand
Accomptable to reaſon: See her Ring
(The firſt pledge of your love, and ſervice to her)
Deliverd as a Warrant for your death:
Theſe Bags of gold you gave up to her truſt,
(The uſe of which, you did deny your ſelfe)
Beſtow'd on me, and with a prodigall hand,
Whom ſhe pick'd forth to be the Architect
Of her moſt bloudy building; and to Fee
Theſe Inſtruments, to bring Materials
To raiſe it up, ſhe bad me ſpare no coſt,
And (as a ſurpluſage) offer'd her ſelfe
To be at my devotion.
Henr. O accurſs'd!
Iam. But be incredulous ſtill, think this my pride
Faſhion excuſes to your ſelfe, and ſweare
That ſhe is innocent, that ſhe doats on ye;
Believe this, as a fearefull Dreame, and that
You ſle not at my mercy, which in this
I will ſhew onely: She her ſelfe ſhall give
The dreadfull Sentence, to remove all ſcruple
Who 'tis that ſends you to the other world.

Enter Violante.

Appeares my Violante? ſpeake (my deareſt)
Do's not the object pleaſe you?
Viol. More then if
All Treaſure that's above the earth, with that,
That lyes conceal'd in both the Indian Mines,
Were laid downe at my feet: O hold Iamy
Thou onely canſt deſerve me.
Iam. I am forward,
And (as you eaſily may perceive,) I ſleepe not
On your commands.

Enter Aſſiſtant and Officers.

Viol. But yet they live: I look'd
To find them dead.
Iam. That was deſer'd, that you
Might triumph in their miſery, and have the powre
To ſay they are not,
Viol. 'Twas well thought upon:
This kiſſe, and all the pleaſures of my Bed
This night, ſhall thanke thee.
Hen. Monſter!
Viol. You Sir, that
Would have me mother Baſtards, being unable
To honour me with one Child of mine owne,
That underneath my Roofe, kept your call-Strumpet,
And out of my Revenues, would maintaine
Her riotous iſſue: Now you find what 'tis
To tempt a woman: with as little feeling
As I turne off a ſlave, that is unfit
To doe me ſervice; or a horſe, or dog
That have out-liv'd their uſe, I ſhake thee off,
To make thy peace with heaven.
Hen. I doe deſerve this,
And never truly felt before, what ſorrow
Attends on wilfull dotage.
Viol. For you, Miſtris,
That had the pleaſure of his youth before me,
And triumph'd in the fruit that you had by him,
But that I thinke, to have the Baſtard ſtrangled
Before thy face, and thou with ſpeed to follow
The way he leades thee, is ſufficient torture,
I would cut off thy noſe, put out thine eyes,
And ſet my foot on theſe bewitching lips,
That had the ſtart of mine: but as thou art,
Goe to the grave unpittied.
Aſſiſt. Who would beleeve
Such rage could be in woman?
Viol. For this Fellow,
He is not worth my knowledge.
Iam. Let him live then,
Since you eſteeme him innocent.
Viol. No, Iamy,
He ſhall make up the meſſe: now ſtrike together
And let them fall ſo.
Aſſiſt. Unheard of cruelty!
I can endure no longer: ſeize on her.
Viol. Am I betrai'd?
Is this thy faith, Iamy?
Iam. Could your deſires
Challenge performance of a deed ſo horrid?
Or, though that you had ſold your ſelfe to hell,
I ſhould make up the bargaine? Live (deare Brother)
Live long, and happy: I forgive you freely;
To have done you this ſervice, is to me
A faire Inheritance: And how e're harſh language
(Call'd on, by your rough uſage) paſs'd my lipps,
In my heart, I ever lov'd you: All my labours
Were but to ſhew, how much your love was cozen'd,
When it beheld it ſelfe in this falſe Glaſſe,
That did abuſe you; and I am ſo far
From envying your Aſcanio his good fortune,
That if your State were mine, I would adopt him.
Theſe are the Murtherers, my noble Friend,
Which (to make triall of her bloudy purpoſe)
I won, to come diſguis'd thus.
Hen. I am too full
Of griefe, and ſhame to ſpeake: but what I'le doe,
Shall to the world proclaime my penitence;
And howſoever I have liv'd, I'le die
A much chang'd man.
Iam. Were it but poſſible
You could make ſatisfaction to this woman,
Our joyes were perfect.
Hen. That's my onely comfort,
That it is in my power: I ne're was married
To this bad woman, though I doted on her,
But daily did deferre it, ſtill expecting
When griefe would kill Iacintha.
Aſſiſt. All is come out,
And finds a faire ſucceſſe: take her Don Henrique,
And once againe embrace your Son.
Hen. Moſt gladly.
Aſſiſt. Your Brother hath deſerv'd well.
Hen. And ſhall ſhare
The moitie of my State.
Aſſiſt. I have heard, Advocate,
What an ill Inſtrument you have bin to him;
From this time ſtrengthen him, with honeſt counſells,
As you'le deſerve my pardon.
Bar. I'le change my Copy:
But I am puniſh'd, for I feare I have had
A ſmart blow, though unſeene.
Aſſiſt. Curat, and Sexton,
I have heard of you too, let me heare no more,
And what's paſt, is forgotten; For this woman,
Though her intent were bloody, yet our Law
Calls it not death: yet that her puniſhment

May deter others from such bad attempts.
The Dowry she brought with her, shall be employ'd
To build a Nunnery, where she shall spend
The remnant of her life.

Viol. Since I have miss'd my ends,
I scorne what can fall on me.

Assist. The strict discipline
Of the Church, will teach you better thoughts. And Sir,
You that are Batchelors, if you ever marry [thers,
In Bartolus, you may behold the true
Of Covetousnesse, and Jealousie, And at dottage,
And falshood in Diego, keep a meane then;
For be assur'd that wives men shall be,
That give themselves to a womans will. Exeunt.

Prologue.

TO tell ye (Gentlemen,) we have a Play,
A new one too, and that we thinck it to day,
The Name ye know, that's nothing to my Story;
To tell ye, 'tis familiar, out of Story;
Of State, of Bitternesse: of wit you'l say,
For that is now held wit, that tends that way,
which we avoid: To tell ye to 'tis merry,
And meant to make ye pleasant, and not weary:
The Stremme that guides ye, vnite to attend:
To tell ye that 'tis good, 'tis to no end,
If you believe not. Nay, to boe this fit,
To sweare it, if you sweare against, is wit
To assure you any thing, unlesse you see,
And so conceive, is vanity in me;
Therefore I leave it to it selfe, and pray
Like a good Barke, it may worke out to day,
And stem all doubts; 'twas built for such a presse,
And we hope high ly: if she lye aboord
For bin wine vantage, we give mind us will,
Why let her worke, they be you cut it,
And sweet opinion it, and we are bound to pay,
You are worthy Judges, and you crowne the Play.

Epilogue.

THe Play is done, yet our Suit never ends,
Still when you part, you would fet part our friends,
Our noblest friends; if ought have falne amis,
O let it be sufficient, that it is,
And you have pitt'd it. In Buildings great
All the whole Body, cannot be so neat,
But something may be mended; Those are faire,
And worthy love, that may desire, but spare.

FINIS.

THE

THE LITTLE FRENCH LAWYER.

Actus Primus. Scena Prima.

Enter Dinant and Clermont.

Din. Disswade me not.
Clert. It will breed a braule.
Din. I care not, I weare a Sword.
Cler. And weare discretion with it,
Or cast it off, let that direct your arme,
'Tis madnesse els, not valour, and more base
Then to receive a wrong.
Din. Why would you have me
Sit downe with a disgrace, and thanke the doer?
We are not Stoicks, and that passive courage
Is onely now, commendable in Lackies,
Peasants, and Tradesmen, not in men of ranke,
And qualitie, as I am.
Cler. Doe not cherish
That daring vice, for which the whole age suffers
The blood of our bold youth, that heretofore
Was spent in honourable action,
Or to defend, or to enlarge the Kingdome,
For the honour of our Country, and our Prince,
Poures it selfe out, with prodigall expence
Upon our Mothers lap, the Earth that bred us
For every trifle, and these private Duells,
Which had their first originall from the French;
(And for which, to this day, we are justly censured)
And banisht from all civill Governments
Scarce three in Venice, in as many yeares;
In Florence, they are rarer, and in all
The faire Dominions of the Spanish King,
They are never heard of: Nay, those neighbour Countries,
Which gladly imitate our other follies,
And come at a deare rate to buy them of us,
Begin now to detest them.
Din. Will you? and yet——
Cler. And I have heard, that some of our late Kings,
For the lie, wearing of a Mistris, feathers;
A cheate at Cards or Dice and such like causes,
Have lost as many gallant Gentlemen,
As might have met the great Turke in the field
With confidence of a glorious Victorie,
And shall we then——
Din. No more, for shame no more,
Are you become a Patron to? 'tis a new one,
No more on't, burn't, give it to some Orator,
To help him to enlarge his exercise,
With such a one, it might doe well, and profit
The Curat of the Parish, but for Clermont
The bold, and under-taking Clermont,
To talke thus to his friend, his friend that knowes him,
Dinant, that knowes his Clermont, is absurd,
And meere Apocripha.
Cler. Why, what know you of me?
Din. Why if thou hast forgot thy selfe, I'll tell thee,
And not looke backe, to speake of what thou wert
At fifteene, for at those yeares, I have heard
Thou wast flesh'd, and enter'd bravely.
Cler. Well sir, well.
Din. But yesterday, thou wast the common second,
Of all that onely knew thee, thou hadst bills
Set up on every post, to give thee notice,
Where any difference was, and who were parties,
And as, to save the charges of the Law;
Poore men seeke Arbitrators, thou wert chosen
By such as knew thee not, to compound quarrells:
But thou wert so delighted with the sport,
That if there were no just cause, thou wouldst make one,
Or be engag'd thy selfe: This godly calling
Thou hast followed five and twenty yeares, and studied
The Criticismes of contentions, and art thou
In so few houres transform'd? certaine this night
Thou hast had strange dreames, or rather visions.
Cler. Yes, Sir,
I have seene fooles, and fighters, chain'd together,
And the Fighters had the upper hand, and whipt first,
The poore Sotts laughing at 'em. What I have bin
It skils not, what I will be is resolv'd on.
Din. Why then you'll fight no more?
Cler. Such is my purpose.
Din. On no occasion?
Cler. There you stagger me,
Some kind of wrongs there are, which flesh and blood
Cannot endure.
Din. Thou wouldst not willingly,
Live a protested coward, or be call'd one?
Cler. Words, are but words.
Din. Nor would'st thou take a blow? (enemy,
Cler. Not from my friend, though drunke, and from an
I thinke much lesse.
Din. There's some hope of thee left then.
Wouldst thou heare me, behind my back disgrac'd?
Cler. Do you think I am a rogue? they that should do it
Had better bin borne dumbe.
Din. Or in thy presence?

See me o're-charg'd with odds?
Cler. I'd fall my ſelfe firſt. (thee.
Din. Would'ſt thou endure thy Miſtris be taken from
And thou ſit quiet?
Cler. There you touch my honour,
No French man can endure that.
Din. Pl—— upon thee,
Why doſt thou talke of Peace then? that dar'ſt ſuffer
Nothing, or in thy ſelfe, or in thy friend
That is unmanly?
Cler. That I grant, I cannot:
But I'll not quarrell with this Gentleman,
For wearing ſtammell Breeches, or this Gameſter,
For playing a thouſand pounds, that owes me nothing;
~~For this mans taking up a common Wench~~
In raggs, and lowſie, then maintaining her
Caroached in cloth of Tiſſue, not five hundred
Of ſuch like toyes, ~~that at no part concerne me~~;
Marry, where my honour, or my friend is queſtioned,
I have a Sword, and I thinke I may uſe it
To the cutting of a Raſcalls throat, or ſo,
Like a good Chriſtian.
Din. Thou art of a fine Religion,
And rather then we'll make a Schiſme in friendſhip,
I will be of it: But to be ſerious,
Thou art acquainted with my tedious love-ſuit
To faire Lamira.
Cler. Too well Sir, and remember
Your preſents, courtſhip, that's too good a name,
Your ſlave-like ſervices, your morning muſique;
Your walking three houres in the raine at midnight,
To ſee her at her window, ſometimes laugh'd at,
Sometimes admitted, and vouchſaf'd to kiſſe
Her glove, her ſkirt, nay, I have heard, her ſlippers,
How then you triumph'd?
Here was love forſooth.
Din. Theſe follies I deny not,
Such a contemptible thing, my dotage made me,
But my reward for this ——
Cler. As you deſerv'd.
For he that makes a goddeſſe of a Puppet,
Merits no other recompence.
Din. This day friend,
For thou art ſo——
Cler. I am no flatterer.
Din. This proud, ingrateſull ſhe, is married to Lame Champernell.
Cler. I know him, he has bin
As tall a Sea-man, and has thriv'd as well by't,
The loſſe of a legg and an Arme deducted, as any
That ever put from Marſeils: you are tame,
Pl—— on't, it mads me; if it were my caſe,
I ſhould kill all the family.
Din. Yet but now
You did preach patience.
Cler. I then came from confeſſion,
And 't was enjoyn'd me three houres for a pennance,
To be a peaceable man, and to talke like one,
But now, all elſe being pardon'd, I begin
On a new Tally, Foot doe any thing,
I'll ſecond you.
Din. I would not willingly
Make red, my yet white conſcience, yet I purpoſe
In the open ſtreet, as they come from the Temple,
(For this way they muſt paſſe,) to ſpeake my wrongs,
And doe it boldly. Muſick playes.

Cler. Were thy tongue a Cannon,
I would ſtand by thee, boy, they come, upon 'em.
Din. Obſerve a little firſt.
Cler. This is fine fooling,

Enter Portalgrue, Champernell, Lamira, Verſa, Beaupre, Verdoome.

An Epithalamin Song at the Wedding.

O make away bring on the Bride
And place her by her Lovers ſide:
You faire troope of Maides attend her,
Pure, and holy thoughts befriend her.
Bluſh, and wiſh, you Virgins all,
Many ſuch faire nights may fall.

Chorus,

Hymen, fill her houſe with joy,
All thy ſacred fires employ:
Bleſſe the Bed with holy love,
Now faire role of Beauty move.

Din. Stand by, for 'twill be heard.
Verſa. This is ſtrange rudeneſſe.
Din. 'Tis courtſhip, ballanced with injuries,
You all looke pale with guilt, but I will dy
Your cheekes with bluſhes, if in your fear'd veines,
There yet remaine ſo much of honeſt blood
To make the colour; firſt to ye my Lord,
The Father of this Bride, whom you have ſent
Alive into her grave.
Champ. How? to her grave?
Dina. Be patient ſir, I'll ſpeake of you anon,
You that allowed me liberall acceſſe,
To make my way with ſervice, and approv'd of
My birth, my perſon, yeares, and no baſe fortune:
You that are rich, and but in this held wiſe too,
That as a Father ſhould have look'd upon
Your Daughter in a Husband, and aim'd more
At what her youth, and heat of blood requir'd
In lawfull pleaſures, then the parting from
Your Crownes to pay her dowre: you that already
Have one foot in the grave, yet ſtudy profit,
As if you were aſſur'd, to live here ever;
What poore end had you, in this choice? in what
Deſerve I your contempt? my houſe, and honours,
At all parts equall yours, my fame as faire,
And not to praiſe my ſelfe, the City rankes me,
In the firſt file, of her moſt hopefull Gentry:
But Champernell is rich, and needs a nurſe,
And not your gold: And add to that, he's old too,
His whole eſtate in likelihood, to deſcend
Upon a Family; Here was providence,
I grant, but in a Nobleman, baſe thrift:
No Merchants, nay, no Pirats, ſell for Bondmen
Their Countrey-men, but you, a Gentleman,
To ſave a little gold, have ſold your Daughter
To worſe then ſlaverie.
Cler. This was ſpoke home indeed.
Beau. Sir, I ſhall take ſome other time to tell you,
That this harſh language, was delivered to
An old man, but my Father.
Din. At your pleaſure.
Cler. Proceed in your deſigne, let me alone,
To anſwer him, or any man.
Verd. You preſume
Too much upon your name, but may be couſin'd.
Din. But for you, moſt unmindfull of my ſervice,

For

For now I may upbraid you, and with honour,
Since all is loſt, and you I am a prince,
Inhabite, deliver'd from a torment in you,
For ſuch you muſt have bin, you to whom nature
Gave with a liberall hand moſt excellent forme,
Your education, language, and diſcourſe,
And judgement to diſtinguiſh when you ſhall
With feeling ſorrow, underſtand how wretched
And miſerable, you have made your ſelfe,
And but your ſelfe, have nothing to accuſe,
Can you with hope from any beg compaſſion?
But you will ſay, you ſerv'd your Fathers pleaſure,
Forgetting that unjuſt commands of Parents
Are not to be obey'd, or that you are rich,
And that to wealth, all pleaſures els are ſervants,
Yet but conſider, how this wealth was purchas'd,
'Twill trouble the poſſeſſion.

Champ. You ſir know
I got it, and with honour.

Din. But from whom?
Remember that, and how: you'll come indeed
To houſes bravely furniſh'd, but demanding
Where it was bought, this ſouldier will not lie,
But anſwer truly, this rich cloth of Arras,
I made my purſe in ſuch a Ship, this Plate
Was my ſhare in another; theſe faire Jewells,
Comming a ſhore, I got in ſuch a Village,
The Maid, or Matron kill'd, from whom they were ra-
The Wines you drinke, are guilty too, for this,
This Candie Wine, three Merchants were undone,
Theſe Stokes breake as many more, in briefe,
All you ſhall meane, or touch, or ſee, is purchas'd
By lawleſſe force, and you but revell in
The teares, and groanes of ſuch as were the owners.

Champ. 'Tis falſe, moſt baſely falſe.

Verta. Let looſers talke.

Din. Laſtly, thoſe joyes, thoſe beſt of joyes, which Hy-
Freely beſtowes on ſuch, that come to ioyne
The ſacred knot herbleſſes, wonne unto it
By equall love, and mutuall affection,
Not blindly led, with the deſire of riches,
Moſt miſerable you ſhall never taſte of,
This Marriage night, you'll meet a Widowes bed,
Or failing of thoſe pleaſures, all Brides looke for,
Sinne in your wiſh to poſſeſſe ſo,

Champ. Thou art a Villaine,
A baſe, malicious ſlanderer.

Cler. Smite him.

Din. No, he is not worth a blow.

Champ. O that I had thee
In ſome cloſe vault, that only would yeild roome
To me to uſe my Sword, ſo thee no hope
To run away, I would make thee on thy knees,
Bite out the tongue that wrong'd me.

Verta. Pray you have patience.

Lamira. This day I am to be your Soveraigne,
Let me command you.

Champ. I am loſt with rage,
And know not what I am my ſelfe, nor you:
Away, dare ſhadows, you that love the ſmoke
Of peace, more then the fire of glorious Warre,
And like unprofitable drones, ſuccesſion
Your grandſires labours, that are all now,
Were gathering Bees, and fill'd their hive, this Country
With brave triumphant ſpoiles, and from our Actions?
You object my prizes to me, had you ſeene
The horrour of a Sea-fight, with what danger
I made them mine; the fire I ſcarceleſſe fought in,
And quench'd it in mine enemies blood, which ſtraight,
Like Oyle pour'd out on't, made it burne anew;
My Deck blowne up, with noiſe enough to mocke
The lowdeſt thunder, and the deſperate ſoules
That Boorded me, ſent to defie the tempeſt
That were againſt me to the angrie Sea,
Frighted with men throwen ore; no victory,
But in deſpight of the fure Elements,
The Fire, the Ayre, the Sea, and ſands hid in it
To be atchiev'd, you would confeſſe poore men,
(Though hopeleſſe, ſuch an honourable way
To get or wealth, or honour) in your ſelves;
He that through all theſe dreadfull paſſages,
Purſued and overtooke them, unafrighted,
Deſerves reward, and not to have it ſtil'd
By the baſe name of theft.

Din. This is the Courtſhip,
That you muſt looke for, Madam.

Cler. 'Twill doe well,
When nothing can be done, to ſpend the night with:
Your tongue is ſound, good Lord, I could wiſh
For this young Ladyes ſake this leg, this arme,
And there is ſomething els I will not name,
(Though 'tis the onely thing, that muſt content her)
Had the ſame vigour.

Champ. You ſhall buy theſe ſcoffes
With your beſt blood, helpe me once noble anger,
(Nay ſtirre not, I alone muſt right my ſelfe)
And with one leg, tranſport me, to correct
Theſe ſcandalous praters: O that noble wounds Falls.
Should hinder juſt revenge? D'ye jeere me too?
I got theſe, not as you doe, your diſeaſes
In Brothells, or with riotous abuſe
Of wine in Taverns; I have one leg ſhot,
One arme diſabled, and am honour'd more,
By looſing them, as I did, in the face
Of a brave enemy, then if they were
As when I put to Sea: you are Frenchmen onely,
In that you have bin laied, and cur'd, goe to:
You mock my leg, but every hope about you,
Makes you good Almanack-makers, to foretell
What wether we ſhall have.

Din. Put up your Sword.

Cler. Or mine: it to a Crutch, there't may be uſefull,
And live, on the relation to your Wife,
Of what a brave man you were once.

Din. And tell her,
What a fine vertue, 'tis in a young Lady
To give an old man pap.

Cler. Or hire a Surgeon
To teach her to roule up your broken limbes.

Din. To make a Pulteſſe, and endure the ſent
Of oiles, and naſty Plaiſters.

Verta. Fie ſir, fie,
You that have ſtood all dangers of all kinds,
To yeild to a rivalls ſcoffe?

Lamira. Shed teares upon
Your Wedding day? this is unmanly Gentlemen.

Champ. They are teares of anger: O that I ſhould live
To play the woman thus? All powerfull heaven,
Reſtore me, but one houre, that ſtrength agen,
That I had once, to chaſtiſe in theſe men,
Their follies, and ill manners, and that done,
When you pleaſe, I'll yeild up the fort of life.

And

And doe it gladly
Cler. We ha' the better of him,
We ha' made him crye.
Verdo. You ſhall have ſatisfaction,
And I will doe it nobly, or diſclaime me.
Beaup. I ſay no more' you have a Brother, Siſter,
This is your Wedding day, we are in the ſtreete,
And howſoever, they forget their honour,
'Tis fit I looſe not mine, by their example.
Verta. If there be Lawes in Paris looke to anſwer
This inſolent affront
Cler. You that live by them,
Study 'em for heavens ſake; for my part I know not
Nor care not what they are, Is their ought els
That you would ſay?
Din. Nothing, I have my ends,
Lamira weepes, I have ſaid too much I feare;
So dearely once I lov'd her, that I cannot Endure to ſee her teares. Exiunt. Dinant and Clermont.
Champ. See you performe it,
And doe it like my Nephew.
Verdo. If I faile in't
Nere know me more, Couſen Beaupre
Champ. Repent not
What thou haſt done, my life, thou ſhalt not find
I am decrepit; in my love, and ſervice,
I will be young, and conſtant, and beleeve me,
For thou ſhall find it true, in ſcorne of all
The ſcandalls theſe rude men have throwne upon me
I'le meete thy pleaſures, with a young mans ardour
And in all circumſtances, of a Husband,
Performe my parts.
Lamira. Good Sir, I am your ſervant,
And 'tis too late now, if I did repent,
(Which as I am a virgin yet, I doe not)
To undoe the knot, that by the Church is tyed
Onely I would beſeech ye, as you have,
A good opinion of me, and my vertues,
For ſo you have pleas'd to ſtile my innocent weakenes,
That what hath paſs'd beween Dinant and me,
Or what now in your hearing he hath ſpoken,
Beget not doubts, or feares.
Champ. I apprehend you,
You thinke I will be jealous, as I live
Thou art miſtaken ſweet; and to confirme it
Diſcourſe with whom thou wilt, ride where thou wilt,
Feaſt whom thou wilt, as often as thou wilt,
For I will have no other guards upon thee
Then thine owne thoughts,
Lamira. I'le uſe this liberty
With moderation Sir,
Beaup. I am reſolv'd
Steale off, i'le follow you,
Champ. Come Sir, you droope,
Till you find cauſe, which I ſhall never give
Diſlike not of your ſon in Law,
Verta. Sir, You teach me
The language I ſhould uſe; I am moſt happy
In being ſo neere you. Exeunt Verdone and Beaupre.
Lamira. O my teares good nurſe
Follow my Brother unobſerv'd and learne,
Which way he takes.
Nurſ. I will be carefull Madam. Exit Nurſe.
Cham. Betweene us complements are ſuperfluous,
One Gentlemen, th' affront we have met here
Wee'l thinke upon hereafter, 'twere unfit
To cheriſh any thought to breed unreſt,
Or to our ſelves, or to our Nuptiall feaſt.
Exeunt.

Enter Dinant and Clermont.

Cler. We ſhall have ſport, ner fear't
Din. What ſport I prithee?
Cler. Why we muſt fight, I know it, and I long for't
It was apparent in the fiery eye,
Of young Verdone, Beaupre look'd pale and ſhooke too,
Familiar ſignes of anger. They are both brave fellowes
Tride and approv'd, and I am proud to encounter.
With men, from whom no honour can be loſt
They will play up to a man, and ſet him off,
When ere I goe to the field, heaven keepe me from
The meeting of an unfleſh'd youth or Coward,
The firſt to get a name, comes on too hot,
The Coward is ſo ſwift in giving ground,
There is no overtaking him, without
A hunting Nag, well breath'd too.
Din. All this while,
You ne'r thinke on the danger,
Cler. Why 'tis no more,
Then meeting of a douſen Friends at Supper,
And drinking hard; miſcheif comes there unlook'd for,
I am ſure as ſuddaine, and ſtrikes home as often,
For this we are prepar'd
Din. Lamira Loves
Her Brother Beaupre dearely,
Cler. What of that?
Din. And ſhould he call me to account for what
But now I ſpeake, nor can I with mine honour
Recant my words, that little hope is left me,
'Ere to enjoye what (next to heaven I long for,)
Is taken from me,
Cler. Why what can you hope for,
She being now married?
Din. On my Clermont,
To you all ſecrets of my heart lye open,
And I reſt moſt ſecure that whatſoe'r
I locke up there, is as a private thought,
And will no farther wrong me, I am a Frenchman,
And for the greater part, we are borne Courtiers,
She is a woman, and how ever yet,
No heat of ſervice, had the power to melt
Her frozen Chaſtity, time and opportunitie
May worke her to my ends, I confeſſe ill ones,
And yet I muſt purſue 'em: now her marriage,
In probabilitie, will no way hurt,
But rather help me,
Cler. Sits the wind there? pray you tell me
How farr off, dwells your love from luſt?
Din. Too neere,
But prithee chide me not,
Cler. Not I, goe on boye,
I have faults my ſelf, and will not reprehend
A crime I am not free from: for her Marriage,
I doe eſteeme it (and moſt batchellors are
Of my opinion) as a faire protection,
To play the wanton, without loſſe of honour.
Din. Would ſhe make riſe of't ſo, I were moſt happy.
Cler. No more of this, Judge now,
Whither I have the guift of prophecie.

Enter Beaupre and Verdone.

Beaup. Monſieur Dinant.
I am glad to find you, Sir.

Din.

Din. I am at your service.
Verd. Good Monsieur Clermont, I have long wish'd
To be knowne better to you,
Cler. My desires
Embrace your wishes Sir,
Beaup. Sir, I have ever
Esteem'd you truly noble, and professe.
I should have bin most proud, to have had the honour,
To call you Brother, but my Fathers pleasure
Denied that happinesse, I know no man lives,
That can command his passions, and therefore
Dare not condemne, the late intemperate language
You were pleas'd to use, to my Father and my Sister
Shee's old and fine a woman, I most tortle,
My honour does compell me to entreat you,
To doe me the favour, with your sword to meete me
A little without the Citie.
Din. You much honour me.
In the demand, I'l gladly waite upon you,
Beaup. O Sir you teach me what to say: the time?
Din. With the next Sun, if you thinke fit.
Beaup. The place.
Din. Nere to the vineyard eastward from the Citie,
Beaup. I like it well, this gentleman if you please
Will keepe me company,
Cler. That is agreed on;
And in my friends behalf I will attend him
Verd. You shall not misse my service.
Beaup. Good day Gentlemen. Ex. Beaup. and Verdoune.
Din. At your Commandement.
Cler. Prou'd to be your servants,
I thinke there is no Nation under heaven
That cut their enemies throates with complement,
And such fine trickes as we doe: If you have Any few Prayers to say, this night you may
Ca l 'em to mind and use 'em, for my self,
As I have little to loose, my care is lesse,
So till to morrow morning, I bequeath you,
To your devotions; and those payed but use
That noble courage I have seene, and we Shall fight, as in a Castle,
Din. Thou art all honour,
Thy resolution, would steele a Coward,
And I most fortunate, in such a Friend,
All tendernesse, and nice respect of woman,
Be now far from me, reputation take
A full possession of my heart, and prove
Honour the first place holds, the second love. Exeunt.

Enter Lamira, Charlote.

Lamir. Sleepes my Lord still Carlote,
Char. Not to be wak'd
By your Ladiships cheerefull lookes, I well perceive
That this night, the good Lord hath bin
At an unusuall service, and no wonder
If he rest after it
Lamir. You are very bold
Char. Your Creature Madam and when you are pleas'd
Sadnesse to me's a stranger, your good pardon
If I speake like a foole, I could have wish't,
To have eating your place to night, had bold Dinant
Your first and most obsequious servant rather
Those delicates, which by his lethargie
As it appeares, have cloyed my Lord,
Lamira. No more,
Charl. I am silenc'd Madam
Lamira. Saw you my nurse this morning?
Charl. No Madam.
Lamira. I am full of feares! Knock within.
Who's that?
Charl. She you enquir'd for Lamira. Bring her in, and leave me. Ex. Charlote.
Now nurse what newes. Enter Nurse.
Nurse. O Ladie dreadfull ones,
They are to fight this morning, ther's no remedie
I saw my Lord your Brother, and Verdoune.
Take horse as I came by,
Lamir. Whet's Clermont?
Nurse. I met him too, and mounted,
Lamir. Whet's Dinant? (tricke,
Nurse. There's all the hope, I have staied him with a
If I have done well so,
Lamir. What tricke?
Nurse. I 'tould him,
Your Ladiship layed your command upon him,
To attend you presently, and to confirme it,
Gave him the ring' he oft hath seene you weare,
That you bestowed on me; he waites without
Disguis'd, and if you have that power in him,
As I presume you have, it is in you
To stay or alter him.
Lamir. Have you learnt the place,
Where they are to encounter?
Nurse. Yes 'tis where
The Duke of Burgundie, met Lewis th' eleventh
Lamir. Enough I will reward thee liberally, Ex. Nurse.
Goe bring him in, full deare I lov'd Dinant,
While it was lawfull, but those fires are quenched,
I being now anothers, truth forgive me
And let dissimulation, be no crime,
Though most unwillingly, I put it on
To guard a Brothers safetie.

Enter Dinant.

Dina. Now your p'easure,
Though ill you have deserv'd it, you perser'd
I am still your foole, and cannot but obey
What ever you command
Lamir. You speake as if
You did repent it, and 'tis not worth my thankes then,
But there has bin a time, in which you would Receive this as a favour
Din. Hope was left then
Of recompence.
Lamir. Why I am still Lamira.
And you Dinant and 'tis yet in my power
I dare not say, i'll put it into act,
To reward your love and service,
Din. Ther's some comfort,
Lamir. But thinke not that so low I prize my fame,
To give it up to any man that refuses
To buy it, or with danger or performance
Of what I shall enjoine him,
Din. Name that danger
Be it of what horrid shape soever Ladie
Which I will shrinke at; only at this instant
Be speedie in't
Lamir. I'll put you to the triall:
You shall not fight to day, doe you start at that?
Not with my Brother, I have heard your difference,
Mine is no Helens beauty, to be purchas'd
With blood, and so defended if you looke for

Favour

Favours from me, deſerve them with obedience,
Ther's no way els to gain 'em
Din. You command
What with mine honour I cannot obey
Which lies at pawne againſt it and a friend
Equally deare as that, or life engag'd,
Not for himſelf, but me.
Lamir. Why, fooliſh man,
Dare you ſollicite me, to ſerve your luſt,
In which not onely, I abuſe my Lord,
My father, and my family, but write whore,
Though not upon my forhead, in my conſcience,
To be read howerly, and yet name your honours?
Yours ſuffer but in circumſtance; mine in ſubſtance,
If you obey me, you part with ſome credit,
From whom? the giddy multitude; but mankind
Will cenſure me, and juſtly
Din. I will looſe,
What moſt I doe deſire, rather then hazard
So deare a friend, or write my ſelfe a coward,
'Tis better be no man
Lamir. This will not doe;
Why I deſire not, you ſhould be a coward,
Nor doe I weigh my Brothers life with yours,
Meete him, fight with him, doe, and kill him fairely,
Let me not ſuffer for you, I am careleſſe.
Din. Suffer for me?
Lamir. For you, my kindneſſe to you,
Already brands me, with a ſtrumpets name,
Din. O that I knew the wretch!
Lamir. I will not name him,
Nor give you any Character to know him;
But if you dare, and inſtantly ride foorth
At the weſt port of the City, and defend there
My reputation, againſt all you meete,
For two houres on 'ly, i'l not ſweare Dinant,
To ſatisfie, (though ſure I thinke I ſhall)
What ever you deſire, if you denie this
Be deſperate, for willingly, by this light,
I'l never ſee thee more
Din. Two houres, doe you ſay?
Lamir. Only two houres,
Dina. I were no Gentleman,
Should I make ſcruple of it; this favour armes me,
And boldly il' performe it. Exit.
Lamir. I am glad on't.
This will prevent their meeting yet, and keepe
My Brother ſafe, which was the marke I ſhott at. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scena Prima.

Enter Cleremont, as in the field.

Cler. I am firſt i'th field that honours gain'd of our ſide
Pray Heaven I may get of as honourablie,
The houre is paſt, I wonder Dinant comes not,
This is the place, I cannot ſee him yet;
It is his quarrell too, that brought me hither,
And I ne'r knew him yet, but to this honour,
A firme and worthy Friend, yet I ſee nothing,
Nor Horſe nor man; 'twould vex me, to be left here,
To th mercy of two ſwords, and two approved ones
I never knew him laſt.

Enter Beaupre and Verdone.

Beaup. You are well met Cleremont. (Sir
Verdo. You are a faire Gentleman, & love your friend
What are you ready the time has over tane us?
Beaup. And this you know the place.
Cler. No Dinant yet?
Beaup. We come not now to argue, but to doe;
We waite you Sir,
Cler. Ther's no time paſt yet. Gentlemen,
We have day enough: i'ſt poſſible he comes not?
You ſee I am ready here, and doe but ſtay,
Till my Friend come, walke but a turne or two,
'Twill not be long.
Verd. We came to fight.
Cler. Yee ſhall fight Gentlemen,
And fight enough, but a ſhort turne or two
I thinke I ſee him, ſet up your watch, wee'l fight by it.
Beau. That is not hee; we will not be deluded.
Cler. Am I bobd thus, pray take a pipe of tobacco?
Or ſing but ſome new ayre; by that time, Gentlemen—
Verd. Come draw your ſword, you know the cuſtome here
Firſt come, firſt ſerv'd (Sir
Cler. Though it be held a cuſtome,
And practiſed ſo, I doe not hold it honeſt;
What honour can you both win on me ſingle?
Beaup. Yeild up you ſword then.
Cler. Yeild my Sword? that's Hebrew;
I'll be firſt cut a peices; hold but a while,
I'll take the next that comes,

Enter an old Gentleman.

You are an old Gentleman.
Gent. Yes indeed am I, Sir.
Cler. And weare no Sword?
Gent. I need none; Sir,
Cler. I would you did, and had one;
I want now ſuch a fooliſh courteſie
You ſee theſe Gentlemen;
Gent. You want a ſecond.
In good Faith Sir, I was never handſome at it,
I would you had my Son, but hee's in Italy,
A proper Gentleman; you may doe well gallants
If you quarrell be not capitall, to have more mercy,
The Gentleman may doe his Country—
Cler. Now I beſeech you, Sir,
If you dare not fight, doe not ſtay to beg my pardon,
There lies your way.
Gent. Good morrow Gentlemen. Exit.
Verd. You ſee your fortune,
You had better yeild your ſword.
Cler. Pray yee ſtay a little

Enter two Gentlemen.

Upon mine honeſtie, you ſhall be fought with;
Well, Dinant, well, theſe weare ſwords and ſeeme brave
As you are Gentlemen, one of you ſupply me (fellowes
I want a ſecond now to meete theſe gallants,
You know what honour is,
1 Gent. Sir you muſt pardon us,
We goe about the ſame worke, you are ready for;
And muſt fight preſently, els we were your ſervants,
2 Gent. God ſpeed you, and good day. Exit Gent.
Cler. Am I thus Colted?
Beaup. Come either yeild—
Cler. As you are honeſt Gentlemen,
Stay but the next, and then i'll take my fortune,
And if I fight not like a man—Fy Dinant,
Cold now and treacherous,

Enter Monſieur la Writ within.

La Writ. I underſtand your cauſes.
Yours about corne, yours about pinnes and glaſſes,

Will

Will you make me mad, have I not all the parcells?
And his Petition too, about Bell-founding?
Send in your witnesses, what will you have me doe?
Will you have me break my heart? my brains are melted;
And tell your Master, as I am a gentleman,
His Cause shall be the first, commend me to your Mistris,
And tell her, if there be an extraordinary feather,
And tall enough for her: I shall dispatch you too,
I know your Cause, for transporting of Farthingales
Trouble me no more, I say, againe to you,
No more vexation: bid my wife send me some puddings;
I have a Cause to run through, requires puddings,
Puddings enough. Farewell.
Cler. God speed you, sir.
Beaup. Would he would take this fellow.
Verd. A rare Youth.
Cler. If you be not hastie, sir.
La-writ. Yes, I am hastie,
Exceeding hastie, sir, I am going to the Parliament,
You understand this bag, if you have any businesse
Depending there, be short, and let me heare it,
And pay your Fees.
Cler. 'Faith, sir, I have a businesse,
But it depends upon no Parliament.
La-writ. I have no skill in't then.
Cler. I must desire you,
'Tis a Sword matter, sir.
La-writ. I am no Cutler,
I am an Advocate, sir.
Beau. How the thing lookes?
Verd. When he brings him to fight.
Cler. Be not so hastie,
You weare a good Sword.
La-writ. I know not that,
I never drew it yet, or whether it be a Sword——
Cler. I must entreat you try, sir, and beare a part
Against these Gentlemen, I want a second;
Yee seeme a man, and 'tis a noble office.
La-writ. I am a Lawyer, sir, I am no fighter.
Cler. You that breed quarrells, sir, know best to satisfie.
Beau. This is some sport yet.
Verd. If this fellow should fight. (ward,
La-writ. And for any thing I know, I am an arrant co-
Doe not trust me, I thinke I am a coward.
Cler. Try, try, you are mistaken: walke on gentlemen,
The man shall follow presently.
La-writ. Are ye mad gentleman?
My businesse is within this halfe houre,
Cler. That's all one,
We'll dispatch within this quarter, there in that bottome,
'Tis most convenient gentlemen.
Beau. Well, we'll wait, sir.
Verd. Why this will be a comick fight, you'll follow.
La-w. As I am a true man, I cannot fight. Ex. Beaup. Verdone.
Cler. Away, away,
I know you can: I like your modesty,
I know you will fight, and so fight, with such mettall,
And with such judgement, meet your enemies fury;
I see it in your eye, sir.
La-writ. I'le be hang'd then; (ting.
And I charge you, in the Kings name, name no more figh-
Cler. I charge you in the Kings name, play the man,
Which if you doe not quickly, I begin with you,
Ile make you dance, doe you see your fiddle sticke?
Sweet Advocate thou shalt fight.
La-writ. Stand farther gentleman.
Or I'le give you such a dust o'th' chapps——
Cler. Spoke bravely,
And like thy selfe, a noble Advocate:
Come, to thy tooles.
La-writ. I doe not say I'le fight.
Cler. I say thou shalt, and bravely.
La-writ. If I doe fight;
I say, if I doe, but doe not depend upon't,
And yet I have a foolish itch upon me,
What shall become of my Writings?
Cler. Let 'em ly by,
They will not run away, man.
La-writ. I may be kil'd too,
And where are all my causes then? my businesse?
I will not fight, I cannot fight, my Causes——
Cler. Thou shalt fight, if thou hadst a thousand causes,
Thou art a man to fight for any cause,
And carry it with honour.
La-writ. Hum! say you so? if I should
Be such a coxcombe to prove valiant now——
Cler. I know thou art most valiant.
La-writ. Doe you thinke so?
I am undone for ever, if it prove so,
I tell you that, my honest friend, for ever;
For I shall ne're leave quarrelling.
How long must we fight? for I cannot stay,
Nor will not stay, I have businesse.
Cler. We'll do't in a minute in a moment. (belly,
La-writ. Here will I hang my bag then, it may save my
I never lov'd cold iron there.
Cler. You doe wisely. (quickly,
La-writ. Help me to pluck my sword out then, quickly,
'T has not seen Sun these ten yeares.
Cler. How it grumbles?
This Sword is vengeance angry.
La-writ. Now I'le put my hat up,
And say my prayers as I goe; away boy,
If I be kill'd, remember the little Lawyer. Exeunt.

Enter Beaupre.

Beaup. They are both come on, that may be a stubborne (rascall,
Take you that ground, Enter La-writ.
Ile stay here, fight bravely. (play,
La-wr. To't chearfully my boyes, you'll let's have faire
None of your foyning tricks.
Beau. Come forward Monsieur; Fight.
What hast thou there? a pudding in thy belly?
I shall see what it holds.
La-writ. Put your spoone home then:
Nay, since I must fight, have at you without wit, sir:
God a mercy bagg.
Beau. Nothing but bumbast in yee?
The rogue winkes and fights.
La-wr. Now your fine fencing sir: Beau. loses his sword,
Stand off, thou diest on point else. La. writ treads on it,
I have it, I have it: yet further off:
I have his Sword.
Beau. Then keep it, be sure you keep it.
La-writ. I'le put it in my mouth else.
Stand further off yet, and stand quietly,
And looke another way, or I'le be with you.
Is this all? I'le undertake within these two dayes
To furnish any Cutler in this Kingdome.
Beau. Pox, what a fortune's this? disarm'd by a puppie?
A fraile? a dog?
La-Writ. No more o'these words Gentleman,
Sweet gentleman no more, doe not provoke me,

Goe walk i'th' horſe faire; whiſtle gentleman,
What muſt I doe now?

Enter Cleremont, purſued by Verdoone.

Cler. Help me, I am almoſt breathleſſe.
La-writ. With all my heart, there's a cold py for you, ſir.
Cler. Thou ſtrik'ſt me, foole.
La-writ. Thou foole, ſtand further off then,
Deliver, deliver.
Cler. Hold faſt. He ſtrikes up the others heeles,
La-writ. I never faile in't and takes his Sword too.
There's twelve pence, go buy you two leaden Daggers,
Have I done well?
Cler. Moſt like a gentleman.
Beau. And we two baſely loſt.
Verd. 'Tis but a fortune,
We ſhall yet find an houre. Ex. Beau. Verdoone ſad.
Cler. I ſhall be glad on't.
La-writ. Where's my cloake, and my trinkets?
Or will you fight any longer, for a craſh or two?
Cler. I am your noble friend, ſir.
La-writ. It may be ſo.
Cler. What honour ſhall I doe you,
For this great courteſie?
La-writ. All I deſire of ye, (more on't
Is to take the quarrell to your ſelfe, and let me heare no
I have no liking to't, 'tis a fooliſh matter,
And help me to put up my Sword.
Cler. Moſt willingly,
But I am bound to gratifie you, and I muſt not leave you.
La-writ. I tell you, I will not be gratified,
Nor I will heare no more on't: take the Swords too,
And doe not anger me but leave me quietly.
For the matter of honour, 'tis at your owne diſpoſure,
And ſo, and ſo,
Cler. This is a moſt rare Lawyer:
I am ſure moſt valiant. Well Dinant, as you ſatisfie me,
I ſay no more: I am loden like an Armorer. Exit. Cler.

Enter Dinant.

Din. To be diſpatcht upon a ſleeveleſſe errand?
To leave my friend engag'd, mine honour tainted?
Theſe are trim things. I am ſet here like a Perdue,
To watch a fellow, that has wrong'd my Miſtris,
A ſcurvy fellow, that muſt paſſe this way,
But what this ſcurvy fellow is, or whence,
Or whether his name be William or John,
Or Anthony or Dick, or any thing, I know not;
A ſcurvy raſcally fellow. I muſt aime at,
And there's the office of an Aſſe flung on me.
Sure Cleremont has fought, but how come off,
And what the world ſhall thinke of, me hereafter:
Well, woman, woman, I muſt looke your raſcalls,
And looſe my reputation: ye have a fine power over us.
Theſe two long houres I have trotted here, and curiouſly
Survei'd all goers by, yet find no raſcall,
Nor any face to quarrell with: La-writ ſings within
What's that? then Enters.
This is a raſcally voice ſure: it comes this way.
La-writ. He ſtrooke ſo hard the Baſon broke,
And Tarquin heard the ſound.
Din. What matter thing is this? let me ſurvey it.
La-writ. And then he ſtrooke his necke in two.
Din. This may be a raſcall, but 'tis a mad raſcall,
What an Alphabet of faces he puts on?
Hey how it fences? if this ſhould be the rogue,
As 'tis the likelieſt rogue. I ſee this day—
Law. Was ever man for Ladies ſake? down, down.
Di. And what are you good ſir? down, down, down, down.
La-wr. What's that to you, good ſir? downe, downe.
Din. A pox on you good, ſir, downe, downe, downe,
You with your Buckram bag, what make you here? (now.
And from whence come you? I could fight with my ſhadow
La-w. Thou fierce man, that like ſir Lancelot doſt appear,
I need not tell thee what I am, nor eke what I make here.
Din. This is a pretious knave, ſtay, ſtay, good Triſtram,
And let me aske thy mightineſſe a queſtion,
Did ye never abuſe a Lady?
La-writ. Not; to abuſe a Lady, is very hard, ſir,
Din. Say you ſo, ſir?
Didſt thou never abuſe her honour?
La-writ. Not; to abuſe her honour, is impoſſible.
Din. Certaine this is the raſcall: What's thy name?
La-writ. My name is Cock a two, uſe me reſpectively,
I will be Cocke of three elſe.
Din. What's all this?
You ſay, you did abuſe a Lady;
La-writ. You ly.
Din. And that you wrong'd her honour.
La-writ. That's two lyes,
Speake ſuddenly, for I am full of buſineſſe. (goose,
Din. What art thou, or what canſt thou be, thou pes-
That dar'ſt give me the ly thus? thou mak'ſt me wonder.
Law. And wonder on, till time makes all this plaine.
Din. You muſt not part ſo, ſir, art thou a gentleman?
La-w. Aske thoſe, upon whoſe ruines, I am mounted.
Din. This is ſome Cavellero Knight o'th' Sun.
La-w. I tell thee, I am as good a gentleman as the Duke;
I have atchieved — goe follow thy buſineſſe.
Din. But for this Lady, ſir—
La-writ. Why, hang this Lady, ſir, (dies
And the Lady Mother too, ſir, what have I to do with La-

Enter Cleremont.

Cler. 'Tis the little Lawyers voice: has he got my way?
It ſhould be here abouts.
Din. Ye dry biſket rogue,
I wil ſo ſwinge you for this blaſphemie—
Have I found you out?
Cler. That ſhould be Dinants tongue too. (tho.
La-w. And I defy thee, do thy worſt: I ho quoth Lancelot
And that thou ſhalt know, I am a true gentleman,
And ſpeake according to the phraſe triumphant;
Thy Lady, is a ſcurvy Lady, and a ſhitten Lady,
And though I never heard of her, a dehoſhed Lady,
And thou, a Squire of low degree; will that content thee?
Doſt thou way-lay me with Ladies? A pretty ſword, ſir,
A very pretty ſword, I have a great mind to't.
Din. You ſhall not looſe your longing, rogue.
Cler. Hold, hold,
Hold Dinant, as thou art a gentleman.
La-writ. As much as you will, my hand is in now.
Cler. I am your friend, ſir: Dinant you draw your ſword
Upon the gentleman, preſerv'd your honour:
This was my ſecond and did back me nobly,
For ſhame forbeare.
Din. I aske your mercy, ſir, and am your ſervant now.
La-writ. May we not fight then?
Cler. I am ſure you ſhall not now.
La-w. I am ſorry for't I am ſure I'le ſtay no longer then.
Not a jot longer: are there any more on ye afore?
I will ſing ſtill, ſir. Exit La-writ.
Din. I looke now you ſhould chide me, and 'Tis fit,
And with much bitterneſſe, expreſſe your anger,
I have deſerv'd: yet when you know—

Cler.

Cler. I thanke ye,
Doe you thinke, that the wrong you have offred me,
The most unmanly wrong, unfriendly wrong——
Din. I doe confesse ——
Cler. That boyish sleight——
Din. Not so, sir.
Cler. That poore, and base renouncing of your honour,
Can be allaied with words?
Din. I give you way still. (part,
Cler. Coloured with smooth excuses? Was it a friends
A Gentlemans, a mans that weares a Sword,
And stands upon the point of reputation,
To hide his head, then, when his honour call'd him?
Call'd him alowd, and lead him to his fortune?
To halt and slip the coller? by my life,
I would have given my life, I had never knowne thee,
Thou hast eaten Canker-like into my judgement
With this disgrace, my whole life, cannot heale againe.
Din. This I can suffer too, I find it honest.
Cler. Can you pretend an excuse now may absolve you,
Or any thing like honest, to bring you off?
Ingage me like an Asse?
Din. Will you but heare me?
Cler. Expose me like a Jade, to tug, and hale through,
Laugh'd at, and almost hooted? your disgraces,
Invite mens Swords, and angers to dispatch me.
Din. If you will be patient. (friend,
Cler. And be abus'd still: But that I have call'd thee
And to that name, allow a Sanctuary,
You should heare further from me, I would not talk thus:
But henceforth stand upon your owne bottome, sir,
And beare your owne abuses, I scorne my sword
Should travell in so poore and empty quarrells.
Din. Ha, you done yet? take your whole swinge of anger,
I'le beare all with content.
Cler. Why were you absent?
Din. You know I am no Coward, you have seene that,
And therefore, out of feare, forsooke you not:
You know I am not false, of a treacherous nature,
Apt to betray my friend I have fought for you too;
You know no businesse, that concern'd my state,
My kindred, or my life.
Cler. Where was the fault then?
Din. The honour of that Lady I adore
Her credit, and her name: ye know she sent for me,
And with what hast.
Cler. What was he that traduc'd?
Din. The man i'th' Moone, I think, hither I was sent,
But to what end——

Enter old Lady.

Cler. This is a pretty flim-flam.
O.La. I am glad I have met you sir, I have bin seeking,
And seeking every where.
Cler. And now you have found him,
Declare that businesse, our Embassadour. (Lady.
O.Lady. What's that to ye good man flouter? O sir, my
Din. Prethee no more of thy Lady, I have too much on't.
Cler. Let me have a little, speake to me,
Old Lady. To you sir?
'Tis more then time: All occasions set aside sir,
Or whatsoever may be thought a businesse——
Din. What then?
Old Lady. Repaire to me within this houre.
Cler. Where? (sent for.
O.Lady. What's that to you? come you, sir, when y'are
Cler. God a mercy Mumpsimus,
You may goe Dinant, and follow this old Fairie,
Till you have lost your selfe, your friends, your credit,
And hunny out your youth, in rare adventures,
I can but grieve, I have knowne you.
Old Lady. Will ye goe sir?
I come not often to you with these blessings,
You may believe that thing there, and repent it,
That dogged thing,
Cler. Peace touchwood.
Din. I will not goe:
Goe bid your Lady seeke some foole, to fawne on her
Some unexperienc'd puppie, to make sport with,
I have bin her mirth too long, thus I shake from me
The fetters she put on; thus her enchantments
I blow away like wind, no more her beauty.
Old Lady. Take heed sir, what you say.
Cler. Goe forward Dinant.
Din. The charmes shot from her eyes——
O.Lady. Be wise.
Cler. Be Valiant. (tions
Din. That tongue that tells faire tales to mens destru-
Shall never rack me more.
Old Lady. Stay there.
Cler. Goe forward.
Din. I will now heare her, see her as a woman,
Survey her, and the power man has allowed, sir,
As I would doe the course of common things,
Unmov'd, unstruck.
Cler. Hold there, and I forgive thee.
Din. She is not faire, and that that makes her proud,
Is not her owne, our eies bestow it on her,
To touch and kisse her, is no blessednesse,
A Sun-burnt Ethiopes lip's as soft as hers.
Goe bid her stick some other triumph up,
And take into her favour some dull foole,
That has no pretious time to loose, no friends,
No honour, nor no life, like a bold Merchant,
A bold and banquerupt man, I have ventur'd all these,
And split my bottome: returne this answer to her,
I am awake againe, and see her mischiefes,
And am not now, on every idle errand,
And now coyn'd anger, to be hurried,
And then despis'd againe, I have forgot her.
Cler. If this be true——
O.Lady. I am sorry, I have troubled you,
More sorrie, that my Lady has adventur'd
So great a favour, in so weake a mind: (it,
This houre you have refus'd, that when you come to know
Will run you mad, and make you curse that fellow,
She is not faire, nor handsome, so I leave you.
Cler. Stay Lady, stay, but is there such a businesse?
O.Lady. You would breake your neck 'twere yours.
Cler. My back, you would say.
O.La. But play the friends part still, sir, and undoe him,
'Tis a faire office.
Din. I have spoke too liberally.
O.Lady. I shall deliver what you say.
Cler. You shall be hang'd first,
You would faine be prating now; take the man with you.
O.Lady. Not I, I have no power.
Cler. You may goe Dinant.
O.Lady. 'Tis in's own will, I had no further charge, sir,
Then to tell him what I did, which if I had thought
It should have bin receiv'd so——
Cler. 'Faith you may,
You doe not know, how far it may concerne you.

If I perceiv'd any trick in't.
Din. 'Twill end there.
Cler. 'Tis my fault then, there is an houre in fortune,
That must be ſtill obſerv'd: you thinke I'll chide you,
When things muſt be, nay ſee, an he will hold his head up?
Would ſuch a Lady ſend with ſuch a charge too?
Say ſhe has plaid the foole, play the foole with her againe,
The great foole, the greater ſtill the better,
He ſhall goe with you woman.
Old Lady. As it pleaſe him,
I know the way alone elſe.
Din. Where is your Lady?
O. Lady. I ſhall direct you quickly.
Din. Well, I'll goe,
But what her wrongs, will give me leave to ſay. (you.
Cler. We'll leave that to your ſelves: I ſhall heare from
Din. As ſoone as I come off——
Cler. Come on then bravely;
Farewell till then, and play the man.
Din. You are merry;
All I expect is ſcorne: Ile lead you Lady.
Exeunt ſeverally.

Actus tertius. Scena prima.

Enter Champernell, Lamira, Beaupre, Verdoone, Chailote.

Beaup. We'll venture on him.
Cham. Out of my doores I charge thee, ſee me no more.
Lam. Your Nephew?
Cham. I diſclaime him.
He has no part in me, nor in my blood,
My Brother that kept fortune bound, and left
Conqueſt hereditary to his Iſſue
Could not beget a coward.
Verd. I fought, ſir,
Like a good fellow, and a ſouldier too,
But men are men, and cannot make their fates:
Aſcribe you to my Father, what you pleaſe,
I am borne to ſuffer.
Cham. All diſgrace, wretch.
Lam. Good ſir be patient.
Cham. Was there no tree,
(For to fall by a noble enemies ſword,
A Coward is unworthy) nor no River,
To ſcree thy life out backward, or to drowne it,
But that thou muſt ſurvive thy infamie?
And kill me, with the ſight of one I hate?
And gladly would forget?
Beaup. Sir, his misfortune
Deſerves not this reproofe.
Cham. In your opinion,
'Tis fit you two ſhould be of one beliefe,
You are indeed, fine gallants, and fight bravely
I'th' City with your tongues, but in the field
Have neither ſpirit to dare, nor power to doe,
Your ſwords, are all ledd there.
Beaup. I know no duty,
(How ever you may wreake your ſpleene on him)
That bindes me to endure this.
Cham. From Dinant
You'll ſuffer more; that ever curſed I,
Should give my honour up, to the defence
Of ſuch a thing as he is, or my Lady
That is all Innocent, for whom a dove would
Aſſume the courage of a daring Eagle,
Repoſe her confidence in one that can
No better guard her. In contempt of you
I love Dinant, mine enemy, nay admire him,
His valour claimes it from me, and with juſtice,
He that could fight thus, in a cauſe not honeſt,
His ſword edg'd with defence, of right and honour,
Would pierce as deep as lightning, with that ſpeed too,
And kill as deadly.
Verd. You are as far from Juſtice,
In him you praiſe, as equitie in the cenſure,
You load me with.
Beaup. Dinant? he durſt not meet us.
Lam. How? durſt not brother?
Beaup. Durſt not, I repeat it;
Verdo. Nor was it Clermont's valour that diſarm'd us,
I had the better of him; for Dinant,
If that might make my peace with you, I dare
Write him a Coward, upon every poſt,
And with the hazard of my life defend it.
Lam. If 'twere laied at the ſtake, you'd looſe it, Nephew.
Cham. Came he not, ſay you?
Verd. No, but in his roome,
There was a divell, hir'd from ſome Magician
I'th' ſhape of an Attorney.
Beau. 'Twas he did it.
Verd. And his the honour.
Beau. I could wiſh Dinant——
But what talke I of one that ſtept aſide,
And durſt not come?
Lam. I am ſuch a friend to truth,
I cannot heare this: why doe you detract
Thus poorely (I ſhould ſay to others baſely)
From one, of ſuch approv'd worth?
Cham. Ha! how's this?
Lam. From one ſo excellent, in all that's noble,
Whoſe onely weakneſſe, is exceſſe of courage?
That knowes no enemies, this he cannot maſter,
But his affections, and in them, the worſt
His love to me.
Cham. To you?
Lam. Yes, ſir to me,
I dare (for what is that, which Innocence dares not)
To you profeſſe it, and he ſhun'd the Combat
For feare, or doubt of theſe: bluſh and repent,
That you in thought, ere did that wrong to valour.
Beau. Why, this is rare.
Cham. 'Fore heaven, exceeding rare;
Why modeſt Lady, you that ſing ſuch Encomiums
Of your firſt Suiter——
Verd. How can ye convince us
In our reports?
Lam. With what you cannot anſwer,
'Twas my command that ſtaied him.
Cham. Your command?
Lam. Mine, ſir, and had my will rank'd with my power,
And his obedience, I could have ſent him
With more eaſe, weaponleſſe to you, and bound,
Then have kept him back, ſo well he loves his honour
Beyond his life.
Cham. Better, and better ſtill,
Lam. I wrought with him in private to divert him
From your aſſur'd deſtruction, had he met you.
Cham. In private?
Lam. Yes, and us'd all Arts, all Charmes,

Of one that knew her selfe the absolute Mistris
Of all his faculties.
Cham. Gave all rewards too
His service could deserve; did not he take
The measure of my sheets?
Lam. Doe not looke yellow,
I have cause to speake; frownes cannot fright me,
By all my hopes, as I am spotlesse to you,
If I rest once assur'd, you doe but doubt me,
Or curbe me of that freedome, you once gave me——
Cham. VVhat then?
Lam. I'll not alone, abuse your bed, that's nothing,
But to your more vexation, 'tis resov'd on,
I'll run away, and then try if Dinant
Have courage to defend me.
Champ. Impudent!
Verdo. And on the sudden——
Beau. How are ye transform'd,
From what you were?
Lam. I was an innocent Virgin,
And I can truly sweare, a Wife as pure
As ever lay by Husband, and will dy so,
Let me live unsuspected, I am no servant,
Nor will be us'd like one: If you desire
To keep me constant, as I would be, let
Trust and beliefe in you, beget, and nurse it;
Unnecessary jealousies, make more whores
Then all baites els, laied to entrap our frailties.
Beau. There's no contesting with her, from a child
Once mov'd, she hardly was to be appeas'd,
Yet I dare sweare her honest.
Cham. So I thinke too,
On better judgement: I am no Italian
To lock her up; nor would I be a Dutchman,
To have my Wife, my soveraigne, to command me;
I'll try the gentler way, but if that faile,
Believe it, Sir, there's nothing but extreames,
VVhich she must feele from me.
Beau. That, as you please sir. (sweetly,
Charl. You have won the breeches, Madam, looke up
My Lord limpes toward you.
Lam. You will learne more manners.
Charl. This is a fee, for counsell that's unask'd for.
Cham. Come, I mistook thee sweet, prethee forgive me,
I never will be jealous: ere I cherish
Such a mechanick humour; I'll be nothing;
I'll say Dinant, is all that thou wouldst have him,
VVill that suffice?
Lam. 'Tis well, sir.
Champ. Use thy freedome
Uncheck'd, and unobserv'd, if thou wilt have it,
These shall forget their honour, I my wrongs
We'll all dote on him, hell be my reward
If I dissemble.
Lam. And that hell take me
If I affect him, he's a lustfull villaine,
(But yet no coward) and sollicites me
To my dishonour, that's indeed a quarrell,
And truly mine, which I will so revenge,
As it shall fright such as dare onely thinke
To be adulterers.
Cham. Use thine owne waies,
I give up all to thee.
Beau. O women, women!
When you are pleas'd, you are the least of evils.
Verd. I'll rime to't, but provoke the worst of divells.
Exeunt.

Enter Monsier Sampson, and three Clients.

Samp. I know Monsier La-writ.
1 Cly. VVould he knew himselfe, Sir. (yer.
Samp. He was a pretty Lawyer, a kind of pretty Law-
Of a kind, of unable thing.
2 Cly. A fine Lawyer, Sir,
And would have firk'd you up a businesse,
And out of this Court into that.
Samp. Ye are too forward,
Not so fine my friends, something he could have done,
But short, short.
1 Cly. I know your worships favour,
You are Nephew to the Judge, Sir.
Samp. It may be so, (friends;
And something may be done, without trotting i'th' durt,
It may be I can take him in his Chamber,
And have an houres talke, it may be so,
And tell him that in's eare, there are such courtesies:
I will not say, I can.
3 Cly. VVe know you can, sir. (wait?
Sam. Peradventure I, peradventure no: but where's La-
VVhere's your sufficient Lawyer?
1 Cly. He's blowne up, Sir.
2 Cly. Run mad, and quarrells, with the dog he meets;
He is no Lawyer of this world now.
Samp. Your reason?
Is he defunct? is he dead?
2 Cly. No, he's not dead yet, sir; (houres:
But I would be loth to take a lease on's life for two
Alas, he is possest sir, with the spirit of fighting,
And quarrells with all people; but how he came to it——
Samp. If he fight well, and like a Gentleman,
The man may fight, for 'tis a lawfull calling.
Looke you my friends, I am a civill Gentleman,
And my Lord my Uncle loves me.
3 Cly. We all know it, sir. (businesse,
Sam. I thinke he does, sir, I have busines too, much
Turn you some forty or fifty Causes in a weeke;
Yet when I get an houre of vacancie,
I can fight too my friends, a little does well,
I would be loth to learne to fight.
1 Cly. But and't please you sir,
His fighting has neglected all our businesse,
We are undone, our causes cast away, sir,
His not appearance.
Sam. There he fought too long
A little, & fight well he fought too long indeed friends;
But ne'r the lesse, things must be, as they may,
And there be wayes——
1 Cly. We know, sir, if you please——
Sam. Something I'll doe; goe rally up your Causes.
Enter La-writ, and a Gentleman at the dore.
2 Cly. Now you may behold sir,
And be a witnesse, whether we lie or no. (men,
La-writ. I'll meet you at the Ordinary, sweet Gentle-
And if there be a wench or two——
Gent. We'll have 'em,
La-wr. No handling any Duells before I come,
We'll have no going lesse, I hate a coward.
Gent. There shall be nothing done.
La-wr. Make all the quarrells
You can devise before I come, and let's all fight,
There is no sport els.
Gent. We'll see what may be done, sir,
3 Cly. Ha? Monsier La-writ?

La-writ.

La-Wr. Baffled in way of buſineſſe,
My cauſes caſt away, Judgement againſt us?
Why there it goes
2 Cli. What ſhall we do the whilſt Sir?
La-Wr. Breed new diſſentions, goe hang your ſelves
'Tis allo ne to me; I have a new trade of living.
1 Cli. Doe you heare what he ſaies Sir?
Sam. The Gentleman, ſpeakes finely (tion
La-Wr. Will any of you fight? Fightings my occupa-
If you find your ſelves agreev'd;
Sam. A compleate Gentleman.
La-Wr. Avant thou buckrum budget of petitions,
Thou ſpittle of lame cauſes; I lament for thee,
And till revenge be taken —
Sam. 'Tis moſt excellent. (place.
La-Wr. There every man chuſe his paper, and his
I'll anſwer ye all, I will neglect no mans buſines
But he ſhall have ſatisfaction like a Gentleman,
The Judge may doe and not doe, hee's but a Monſieur
Sam. You have nothing of mine in your bag, Sir,
La-Wr. I know not Sir,
But you may put any thing in, any fighting thing
Sam. It is ſufficient, you may heare hereafter.
La-Wr. I reſt your ſervant Sir,
Sam. No more words Gentlemen
But follow me, no more words as you love me,
The Gentlemans, a noble Gentleman.
I ſhall doe what I can, and then —
Cli. We thanke you Sir, Exit Sam. and Clients.
Sam. Not a word to diſturb him, hee's a Gentleman.
La-Wr. No cauſe goe? o my ſide the judge caſt all?
And becauſe I was honourably employed in action,
And not appear'd, pronounce? 'tis very well,
'Tis well ſaith, 'tis well, Judge.

Enter Clermont.

Cler. Who have we here?
My little furious Lawyer?
La-Wr. I ſay 'tis well,
But marke the end.
Cler. How he is metamorphis'd?
Nothing of Lawyer left not a bit of buckrum,
No ſoliciting face now,
This is no ſimple converſion
Your ſervant Sir, and Friend.
La-Wr. You come in time, Sir,
Cler. The happier man, to be at your command then.
La-Wr. You may wonder to ſee me thus; but tha'ts all
Time ſhall declare; 'tis true I was a Lawyer, (one
But I have meud that coat, I hate a Lawyer,
I talk'd much in the Court, now I hate talking
I did you the office of a man.
Cler. I muſt confeſſe it,
La-wr. And budg'd not, no I budg'd not
Cler. No, ye did not,
La-wr. Ther's it then, one good turne requires another
Cler. Moſt willing Sir, I am ready at your ſervice
La-wr. There read, and underſtand, & then deliver it
Cler. This is a challenge Sir,
La-wr. 'Tis very like Sir,
I ſeldome now write Sonnets
Cler. O admirantis,
To Monſieur Vertaigne the preſident,
La-wr. I chooſe no foole ſir,
Cler. Why hee's no ſword man Sir,
La-wr. Let him learne, let him learne,
Time that traines Chickens up, will teach him quickly
Cler. Why hee's a Judge, an old man.
La-wr. Never too old
To be a Gentleman; and he that is a judge
Can judge beſt what belongs to wounded honour;
There are my griefes he has caſt away my cauſes,
In which he has bowed my reputation.
And therefore Judge, or no Judge,
Cler. Pray be rul'd Sir,
This is the maddeſt thing —
La-wr. You will not carry it,
Cler. I doe not tell you ſo, but if you may be perſwaded
La-wr. You know how you us'd me, when I would not Doe you remember Gentleman? (fight,
Cler. The Divells in him.
La-wr. I ſee it in your eyes, that you dare it
You have a carrying face, and you ſhall carry it,
Cler. The leaſt is baniſhment
La-wr. Be baniſh'd then;
'Tis a friends part, wee'll meete in Africa,
Or any corner of the earth.
Cler. Say he will not fight,
La-wr. I know then what to ſay take you no care Sir,
Cler. Well, I will carry it, and deliver it,
And to morrow morning meete you in the leuer,
Till when, my ſervice,
La-Wr. A Judge, or no Judge, no Judge. Exit La-wr.
Cler. This is the prettieſt Rogue that 'ere I read of,
None to provoke to'h field but the old preſident;
What face ſhall I put on? if I come in earneſt,
I am ſure to weare a paire of braceletts;
This may make ſome ſport yet, I will deliver it
Here comes the preſident.

Enter Vertaigne with two Gentlemen.

Vert. I ſhall find time Gentlemen,
To doe your cauſes good, is not that Clermont.
1 Gent. 'Tis he my Lord?
Vert. Why does he ſmile upon me?
Am I become ridiculous? has your fortune Sir
Upon my ſon made you contemne his Father?
The glory of a Gentleman, is faire bearing,
Cler. Miſtake me not my Lord, you ſhall not find that;
I come with no blowen ſpirit to abuſe you,
I know your place, and honour due unto it,
The reverence to your ſilver age and vertue,
Vert. Your face is merry ſtill.
Cler. So is my buſineſſe,
And I beſeech your honour, miſtake me not
I have brought you from a wild, or rather mad man
As mad a peice — of you were wont to love mirth,
In your young dayes, I have knowne your honour wo it
This may be made no little one, 'tis a challenge Sir,
Nay ſtart not I beſeech you, it meanes you no harme
Nor any man of honour, or underſtanding
'Tis to ſteale from your ſerious houres a little laughters
I am bold to bring it to your Lordſhip,
Vert. 'Tis to me indeed.
Doe they take me for a ſword man, at theſe yeares? (Sir,
Cler. 'Tis onely worth your honours mirth thats all
'Tad bin in me elſe a ſawcie rudeneſſe.
Vert. From one La-Writ, a very punctuall challenge,
Cler. But if your Lordſhip marke it, no great matter
Vert. I have knowne ſuch a wrangling advocate,
Such a little figent thing; Oh I remember him,
A notable talking knave, now out upon him,
Has challeng'd me downe right, defied me mortally
I doe remember too, I caſt his cauſes

Cler.

Cler. Why ther's the quarrell Sir, the morrall quarrell
Vert. Why what a knave is this? as y'are? Gentleman
Is there no further purpose but meere mirth?
What a bold man of warre, he invites me roundly
Cler. If there should be, I were no Gentleman.
Not worthy of the honour of my kindred,
And though I am sure your Lordship hate my person,
Which time may bring againe into your favour,
Yet for my manners —
Vert. I am satisfied,
You see Sir, I have out liv'd those daies of fighting,
And therfore cannot do him the honour to beate him my (selfe
But I have a kinsman, much of his abilitie
His wit and carriage, for this calls him foole,
One that will spit as senseleſſe fire, as this fellow
Cler. And such a man to undertake, my Lord, (gether
Vert. Nay hees too forward, these two pitch barrells to-
Cler. Upon my soule no harme.
Vert. It makes me smile,
Why what a stinking smother will they utter?
Yes he shall undertake Sir, as my Champion,
Since you propound it mirth, i'll venture on it
And shall defend my cause, but as y'ar honeſt
Sports not with blood.
Cler. Thinke not so basely, good Sir,
Vert. A squire shall waite upon you from my kinsman,
To morrow morning, make your sport at full,
You want no subject, but no wounds.
Cler. That's my eare —
Vert. And so good day. Exit Vertaine and Gentleman.
Cler. Many unto your honour,
This is a noble fellow of a sweet spirit,
Now must I thinke how to contrive this matter,
For together they shall goe. Enter Dinant.
Din. O Clermont
I am glad I have found thee,
Cler. I can tell thee rare things,
Din. O I can tell thee rarer,
Dost thou love me?
Cler. Love thee?
Din. Doeſt thou love me dearely
Dar'ſt thou for my sake?
Cler. Any thing that's honeſt
Din. Though it be dangerous
Cler. Pox o dangerous
Din. Nay wonderous dangerous.
Cler. Wilt thou breake my heart?
Din. Along with me then.
Cler. I must part to morrow.
Din. You shall, you shall, be faithfull for this night
And thou hast made thy freind.
Cler. Away and talke not — Exeunt.
Enter Lamira and Nurse.
Lam. O Nurse welcome, where's Dinant?
Nurse. Hee is at my back
'Tis the most liberall Gentleman, this gold,
He gave me for my paines, nor can I blame you,
If you yeild up the fort
Lam. How? yeild it up?
Nurse. I know not, he that loves, and gives so largely,
And a young Lord to boote, or I am coufend
May enter every where,
Lam. Thou't make me angry.
Enter Dinant and Clermont.
Nurse. Why if you are I hope heres one will please you,
Looke on him with my eyes, good luck goe with you
Were I young for your sake. —
Din. I thanke thee Nurse,
Nurse. I would be tractable, and as I am —
Lam. Leave the roome,
So old, and so immodeſt? and be carefull,
Since whispers will make sleeping jealousies.
That none disturb my Lord. Exit Nurse.
Cler. Will you dispatch?
Till you come to the matter be not rapt thus,
Walk in, walk in, I am your scout for once,
You owe me the like service,
Din. And will pay it,
Lam. As you respect our lives, speake not so loud
Cler. Why, to it in dumb shew then, I am silenc'd
Lam. Be not so hasty Sir, the golden apples,
Had a fell dragon for their guard, your pleasures
Are to be attempted with Herculean danger,
Or never to be gotten
Din. Speake the meanes,
Lam. Thus briefely my Lord sleepes now, and alas,
Each night he only sleepes.
Cler. Goe keepe her stirring,
Lam. Now if he wake, as sometimes he does,
He only stretches out his hand and feeles,
Whether I am a bed, which being assur'd of
He sleepes againe; But should he misse me, valour
Could not defend our lives,
Din. What's to be done then?
Lam. Servants have servile Faiths, nor have I any
That I dare trust; on noble Clermont
We safely may rely
Cler. What man can doe,
Command and boldly,
Lam. Thus then in my place,
You must lye with my Lord,
Cler. With an old man?
Two beards together? that's preposterous.
Lam. There is no other way, and though 'tis dangerous
He having servants within call, and arm'd too,
Slaves feed to act, all that his jealousy,
And rage commands them, yet a true friend should not
Checke at the hazard of a life,
Cler. I thanke you,
I love my friend, but know no reason why
To hate my self, to be a kind of pander,
You see I am willing,
But to betray mine owne throat you must pardon,
Din. Then I am lost, and all my hopes defeated
Were I to hazard ten times more for you,
You should find, Clermont —
Cler. You shall not out doe me,
Fall what may fall, i'll do't
Din. But for his beard —
Lam. To cover that you shall have my night Linnen,
And you dispos'd of, my Dinant and I,
Will have some private conference.
Enter Champ. privately.
Cler. Private doing,
Or i'll not venture.
Lam. That's as we agree. Exeunt.
Enter Nurse and Charloth, pass'over the stage with pillowes night Cloaths and such things.
Cham. What can this Woman do preserving her honour?
I have given her all the liberty that may be (lous
I will not be far off though, nor I will not be jea-
Nor trust too much, I think she is vertuous,

Yet

Yet when I hold her beſt, ſhe's but a woman,
As full of frailty as of Faith, a poore ſleight woman,
And her beſt thoughts, but weake fortifications,
There may be a meane wrought. Well, let'em work then,
I ſhall meet with it: till the ſignes be monſtrous,
And ſtick upon my head, I will not believe it, Stands pri-
She may be, & ſhe may not: now to my obſervation. vate.

Enter Dinant, and Lamira.

Din. VVhy do you make me ſtay ſo? if you love me——
Lam. You are too hot, and violent.
Din. Why doe you ſhift thus
From one chamber to another?
Lam. A little delay, ſir,
Like fire, a little ſprinckled ore with water,
Makes the deſires burne cleare, and ten times hotter.
Din. Why doe you ſpeake ſo lowd? I pray'e goe in Sweet Miſtris I am mad, time ſteales away,
And when we would enjoy——
Lam. Now fy, fy ſervant, Wine.
Like ſenſuall beaſts, ſhall we enjoy our pleaſures?
Din. Pray doe but kiſſe me then.
Lam. Why, that I will, and you ſhall find anon, ſervant.
Di. oftly for heavens ſake, you know my friend's engag'd,
A little now, now; Will you goe in againe?
Lam. Ha, ha, ha, ha.
Din. Why doe you laugh ſo lowd? precious,
Will you betray me? ha my friends throat cut?
Lam. Come, come, I'le kiſſe thee again.
Cham. Will you ſo? you are liberall,
If you doe cozen me——

Enter Nurſe with Wine.

Din. What's this?
Lam. Wine, wine, a draught or two.
Din. What does this woman here?
Lam. She ſhall not hinder you.
Din. This might have bin ſpar'd,
'Tis but delay, and time loſt: pray ſend her ſoftly off.
Lam. Sit downe, and mix your ſpirits with VVine,
I will make you another Hercules.
Din. I dare not drinke;
Fy, what delayes you make? I dare not, Recorders.
I ſhall be drunke preſently and do ſtrange things then.
Lam. Not drink a cup with your Miſtris? O the pleaſure.
Din. Lady, why this? Muſicke.
Lam. We muſt have mirth to our wine, man.
Din. Pl—— o'th' Muſick.
Cham. God-a-mercy VVench,
If thou doſt Cuckold me, I ſhall forgive thee.
Din. The houſe will all riſe now, this will diſturb all.
Did you doe this?
Lam. Peace, and ſit quiet, foole,
You love me, come, ſit downe and drinke.

Enter Cleremont above.

Cler. VVhat a divell ails you?
How cold I ſweat? a hogs pox, ſtop your pipes, Muſick.
The thing will wake; now, now me thinks I find
His Sword juſt gliding through my throte: VVhat's that?
A vengeance choke your pipes. Are you there Lady?
Stop, ſtop thoſe raſcalls; doe you bring me hither
To be cut into minced meate? VVhy Dinant?
Din. I cannot doe withall;
I have ſpoke, and ſpoke: I am betraied and loſt too.
Cler. Doe you heare me? do you underſtand me?
Plague dam your whiſtles. Muſicke ends.
Lam. 'Twas but an over-ſight, they have done, ly down.
Cler. VVould you had done too.
You know not
In what a miſery, and feare I ly.
You have a Lady in your armes.
Din. I would have—— The Recorders
Cham. I'le watch you, goodman wood have. againe.
Cler. Remove for heavens ſake,
And fall to that you come for.
Lam. Ly you downe,
'Tis but an houres endurance now.
Cler. I dare not, ſoftly ſweet Lady,——heart?
Lam. 'Tis nothing but your feare, he ſleeps ſtill ſoundly,
Ly gently downe.
Cler. 'Pray make an end.
Din. Come, Madam.
Lam. Theſe Chambers are too neare. Ex. Din. Lam.
Cham. I ſhall be nearer;
Well, goe thy wayes. I'le truſt thee through the world,
Deale how thou wilt: that that I never feele,
I'le never feare. Yet by the honour of a Souldiour,
I hold thee truly Noble. How theſe things will looke,
And how their bloods will curdle? play on children,
You ſhall have pap anon. O thou grand foole,
That thou knoweſt, but thy fortune—— Muſick dies.
Cler. Peace, good Madam,
Stop her mouth Dinant, it ſleeps yet, 'pray' be wary,
Diſpatch, I cannot endure this miſery,
I can heare nothing more; I'le ſay my praiers,
And downe againe—— Whiſtle within.
A thouſand larums, fall upon my quarter,
Heaven ſend me off; When I ly keeping courſes.
Pl—— o' your fumbling Dinant; how I ſhake?
'Tis ſtill againe. Would I were in the Indies. Exit Cler.

Enter Dinant, and Lamira. A light within.

Din. Why doe ye uſe me thus? thus poorely? baſely?
Worke me into a hope, and then deſtroy me?
Why did you ſend for me? this new way traine me?
Lam. Madman, a fool, & fall man, now Ile ſhew thee man
Din. 'Pray' put your light out.
Lam. No I'le hold it thus,
That all chaſt eyes, may ſee thy luſt, and ſcorne it,
Tell me but this, when you firſt doted on me,
And made ſuite to enjoy me, as your wife,
Did you not hold me honeſt?
Din. Yes, moſt vertuous.
Lam. And did not that appeare, the onely luſtre
That made me worth your love, and admiration?
Din. I muſt confeſſe——
Lam. Why would you deale ſo baſely?
So like a thiefe? a villaine?
Din. Peace, good Madam.
Lam. I'le ſpeake aloud too; thus malicioufly,
Thus breaking all the rules of honeſtie,
Of honour, and of truth, for which I lov'd you,
For which, I call'd you ſervant, and admir'd you,
To ſteale that jewell, purchas'd by another
Plouſly ſet in Wedlock, even that Jewell,
Becauſe it had no flame, you held unvaluable:
Can he that has lov'd good, doat on the divell?
For he that ſeekes a whore, ſeeks but his agent:
Or am I of ſo wild, and low of blood,
So nurs'd in infamies?
Din. I doe not thinke ſo,
And I repent.
Lam. That will not ſerve your turne, ſir.

Din.

Din. It was your treaty drew me on.
Lam. But it was your villany,
Made you purſue it: I drew you but to try
How much a man, and nobly you durſt ſtand,
How well you had deſerv'd the name of vertuous;
But you, like a wild torrent, mix'd with all
Beaſtly and baſe affections came floating on,
Swelling your poiſon'd billowes——
Din. Will you betray me?
Lam. To all the miſeries, a vext woman may.
Din. Let me but out,
Give me but roome, to toſſe my ſword about me,
And I will tell you, y'are a treacherous woman,
O that I had but words!
Lam. They will not ſerve you.
Din. But two-edg'd words to cut thee; a Lady traytor?
Periſh by a proud puppet? I did you too much honour,
To tender you my love, too much reſpected you,
To thinke you worthy of my worſt embraces.
Goe, take your groome, and let him dally with you,
Your greaſie groome; I ſcorne to impe your lame ſtock,
You are not faire, nor handſome, I lyed loudly.
This tongue abus'd you, when it ſpoke you beauteous.
Lam. 'Tis very well, 'tis brave.
Din. Put out your light,
Your laſcivious eyes, are flames enough
For fooles to find you out: a Lady plotter?
Muſt I begin, your ſacrifice of miſchiefe?
I and my friend, the firſt fruits of that blood,
You and your honourable Husband aime at?
Crooked and wretched you are both.
Lam. To you, ſir,
Yet to the eye of Juſtice, ſtreight as Truth.
Din. Is this a womans love? a womans mercy?
Do you profeſſe this ſeriouſly? doe you laugh at me?
Lam. Ha, ha.
Din. Pl—— light upon your ſcornes, upon your flatteries
Upon your tempting faces, all deſtructions:
A bedrid Winter hang upon your cheekes,
And blaſt, blaſt, blaſt, thoſe buds of pride that point you;
Death in your eyes, to fright men from theſe dangers,
Raiſe up your trophy Clermont.
Cler. What a vengeance ayle you?
Din. What diſmall noiſe, is there, no honour in you?
Clermont, we are betraied, betraied, ſold by a woman,
Deale bravely for thy ſelfe.
Cler. This comes of rutting:
Are we made ſtales to one another?
Din. Yes, we are undone, loſt.
Cler. You ſhall pay for't grey-beard:
Vp up, you ſleep your laſt elſe. Lights above, two Servants and Anabell.
1 Serv. No, not yet, ſir,
Lady, looke up: would you have wrong'd this beauty?
Wake ſo tender a Virgin, with rough tearmes?
You weare a ſword; we muſt entreat you leave it.
2 Serv. Fy ſir, ſo ſweet a Lady?
Cle. Was this my bed-fellow? pray give me leave to look,
I am not mad yet, I may be, by and by.
Did this ly by me?
Did I feare this? is this a cauſe to ſhake at?
Away with me for ſhame, I am a raſcall.

Enter Champernell, Beaupre, Verdoone, Lamira, Anabel, Clermont, and two Servants.

Din. I am amaz'd too.
Beau. We'll recover you.
Verd. You walk like Robin-good-fellow, all the houſe over
And every man afraid of you.
Din. 'Tis well Lady.
The honour of this deed, will be your owne,
The world ſhall know your bounty.
Beaup. What ſhall we doe with 'em?
Cler. Geld me,
For 'tis not fit I ſhould be a man againe,
I am an Aſſe, a Dog.
Lam. Take your revenges,
You know my Husbands wrongs, and your owne loſſes.
Anab. A brave man, an admirable brave man;
Well, well, I would not be ſo tried again;
A very handſome proper gentleman.
Cler. Will you let me ly by her, but one houre more,
And then hang me? (bravely,
Din. Wee wait your malice, put your ſwords home
You have reaſon to ſeeke blood.
Lam. Not as you are Noble.
Cham. Hands off and give them liberty, onely diſarm'em.
Beaup. We have done that already.
Champ. You are welcome gentlemen,
I am glad my houſe, has any pleaſure for you,
I keep a couple of Ladies here, they ſay faire,
And you are young, and handſome gentlemen;
Have you any more mind to Wenches?
Cler. To be abus'd too? Lady, you might have help'd this,
Ana. Sir now 'tis paſt, but, 't may be I may ſtand,
Your friend hereafter, in a greater matter.
Cler. Never whilſt you live.
Ana. You cannot tell——now ſir a parting hand,
Cler. Downe and Roſes:
Well, I may live to ſee you again. A dull rogue,
No revelation in thee.
Lam. Were you well frighted?
Were your fitts, from the heart, of all colds and colours?
That's all your puniſhment.
Cler. It might have bin all yours,
Had not a blockhead undertaken it.
Cham. Your ſwords you muſt leave to theſe gentlemen.
Verd. And now, when you dare fight,
We are on even Ice againe.
Din. 'Tis well:
To be a Miſtris, is to be a monſter,
And ſo I leave your houſe, and you for ever.
Lam. Leave your wild luſts, and then you are a maſter.
Cham. You may depart too.
Cler. I had rather ſtay here.
Cham. Faith we ſhall fright you worſe.
Cler. Not in that manner,
There's five hundred crownes, fright me but ſo againe,
Din. Come Clermont, this is the houre of foole.
Cler. Wiſer the next ſhall be or we'll to ſchoole. Exeunt.
Champ. How coolely theſe hot gallants are departed?
Faith couſin 'twas unconſcionably done,
To ly ſo ſtill and ſo long.
Anab. 'Twas your pleaſure,
If 'twere a fault I may hereafter mend.
Champ. O, My beſt Wife.
Take now what courſe thou wilt, and lead what life.
Lam. The more truſt you commit, the more care ſtill,
Goodneſſe and vertue, ſhall attend my will.
Cham. Let's laugh this night out now & countour gains,
We have our honours home, and they their paines.
Exeunt omnes.

Actus quarti. Scena Prima.

Enter Clerémont, Dinant.

Din. It holds, they will goe thither.
Cler. To their Summer house?
Din. Thither i'th' evening, and which is the most insti-(ction,
Onely to insult upon our miseries.
Cler. Are you provided?
Din. Yes, yes.
Cler. Throughly?
Din. Throughly.
Cler. Batta enough, I have your mind, I wil not faile you.
Din. At such an houre.
Cler. Have I a memorie?
A Cause, and Will to doe? thou art so fullen——
Din. And shall be, till I have a faire reparation.
Cler. I have more reason, for I scaped a fortune,
Which if I come so neare againe: I say nothing,
But if I sweat not in another fashion——
O, a delicate Wench.
Din. 'Tis certaine a most handsome one.
Cle. And me thought the thing was angry with it self too
It lay so long conceal'd, but I must part with you,
I have a scene of mirth, to drive this from my heart,
And my houre is come.
Din. Misse not your time.
Cler. I dare not. Exeunt severally.

Enter Sampson, and a Gentleman.

Gent. I presume, sir, you now need no instruction,
But fairely know, what belongs to a Gentleman;
You beare your Uncles cause.
Sam. Doe not disturbe me,
I understand my cause, and the right carriage.
Gent. Be not too bloody.
Sam. As I find my enemy; if his sword bite,
If it bite, sir, you must pardon me.
Gent. No doubt he is valiant,
He durst not undertake else,
Sam. Hee's most welcome,
As he is most valiant, he were no man for me else.
Gent. But say he should relent.
Sam. Hee dies relenting.
I cannot helpe it, he must die relenting,
If he pray, praying ipso facto, praying,
Your honourable way, admits no prayer,
And if he fight, he falls, there's his quietus.
Gent. Y'are nobly punctuall, let's retire and meet 'em,
But still I say, have mercy.
Samp. Hay, honour. Exeunt.

Enter Champernell, Lamira, Anabell, Beaupr, Verdoone, Charlote and a servant.

Lam. Will not you goe sweet-heart?
Cham. Goe? I'le fly with thee,
I stay behind?
Lam. My Father will be there too,
And all our best friends,
Beaup. And if we be not merry,
We have hard lucke, Lady.
Verd. Faith let's have a kind of play.
Cham. What shall it be?
Verd. The story of Dinant.
Lam. With the merry conceits of Clerémont,
His fitts and Fevers.
Ana. But I'le lie still no more.
Lam. That, as you make the Play, 'twill be rare sport,
And how 'twill vex my gallants, when they heare it?
Have you given order for the Couch?
Charl. Yes, Madam.
Cham. My easie Nag, and padd.
Serv. 'Tis making ready.
Champ. Where are your horses?
Beau. Ready at an houre, sir: we'll not be last.
Cham. Fy, what a night shall we have?
A roaring merry night.
Lam. We'll fly at all, sir.
Cham. I'le fly at thee too, finely, and so ruffle thee,
I'le try your Art, upon a Country pallet.
Lam. Brag not too much, for feare I should expect it,
Then if you faile——
Cham. Thou faiest too true, we all talke,
But let's in, and prepare, and after dinner
Begin our mirthfull pilgrimage.
Lam. He that's sad,
A crab-fac'd Mistris cleave to him for this yeare. Exeunt.

Enter Clerement. and La-writ.

La-writ. Since it cannot be the Judge——
Cler. 'Tis a great deale better.
La-writ. You are sure, he is his kinsman? a gentleman?
Cler. As arrant a gentleman, and a brave fellow,
And so neare to his blood——
La-writ. It shall suffice,
I'le set him further off, I'le give a remove
Shall quit his kindred, I'le kill him.
Cler. Will ye kill him?
La-w. And there were no more cosins in the world I kil him,
I do mean, sir, to kill all my Lords kindred.
For every Cause a cousin.
Cler. How if he have no more cousins.
La-writ. The next a kin then, to his Lordships favour,
The man he smiles upon.
Cler. Why this is vengeance, horrid, and dire.
La-writ. I love a dire revenge:
Give me the man, that will all others kill,
And last himselfe,
Cler. You stole that resolution.
La-writ. I had it in a Play, but that's all one,
I woo'd see it done.
Cler. Come, you must be more mercifull.
La-writ. To no Lords cosins in the world, I have 'em;
A Lords cosin to me is a kind of Cocatrice,
If I see him first, he dies.
A strange Antipathy,
Cler. What think you of their Neeces?
La-writ. If I like 'em,
They may live, unthankfully; 'tis a cold morning.
Cler. 'Tis sharpe indeed; you have broke your fast.
La-writ. No verily.
Cler. Your valour would have ask'd a good foundation.
La-writ. Hang him, I'le kill him fasting.
Enter Sampson and the Gent.
Cler. Here they come,
Beare your selfe in your language, smooth and gently,
When your swords argue.
La-writ. 'Pray sir spare your precepts,
Gent. I have brought you sir——
La-writ. 'Tis very well, no words,

You

You are welcome, sir.
Sam. I thanke you, sir, few words.
La-writ. I'le kill you for your Uncles sake.
Sam. I love you,
I'le cut your throat, for your owne sake.
La-writ. I esteeme of you.
Cler. Let's render 'em honest, and faire, gentlemen,
Search my friend, I'le search yours.
Gent. That's quickly done.
Cler. You come with no spells, nor witchcrafts?
Sam. I come fairely, to kill him honestly.
La-writ. Hang Spells, and Witchcrafts,
I come to kill my Lords Nephew like a gentleman,
And so I kisse his hand.
Gent. This doublet is too stiffe.
La-writ. Off woo't, I have it,
And all such fortifications, feele my skin,
If that be stiffe, flea that off too.
Gent. 'Tis no soft one.
La-wr. Off, woo't, I say:
I'le fight with him, like a flead Catt.
Gent. You are well, you are well. Put off.
Cler. You must uncase too.
Sam. Yes, sir.
But tell me this, why should I mix mine honour
With a fellow, that has ne'r a lace in's shirt?
Gent. That's a maine point, my friend has two.
Cler. That's true, sir.
La-w. Base and degenerate cousin, doest not thou know
An old, and tatter'd colours, to the enemy,
Is of more honour, and shewes more ominous?
This shirt, five times, victorious I have fought under,
And cut through squadrons, of your curious Cut-workes,
As I will doe through thine, shake, and be satisfied.
Cler. This is unanswerable.
Sam. But may I fight, with a foule shirt?
Gent. Most certaine, so it be a fighting shirt,
Let it be ne'r so foule, or lowsie, Cæsar wore such a one.
Sam. Saint Denis then: I accept your shirt.
Cler. Not so forward, first you must talke,
'Tis a maine point, of the French method,
Talke civilly, and make your cause Authentique.
Gent. No weapon must be neare you, nor no anger.
Cler. When you have done, then stir your resolutions,
Take to your Weapons bravely.
La-writ. 'Tis too cold;
This for a Summer fight.
Cler. Not for a world, you should transgresse the rules.
Sam. 'Tis peevish weather,
I had rather fight without.
Gent. An 'twere in a river.
Cler. Where both stood up to th' chins.
La-writ. Then let's talke quickly,
Pl—o' this circumstance.
Cler. Are the Horses come yet?
Gent. Yes certaine: give your swords to us, now civilly.
Cler. We'll stand a while off; take the things, & leave 'em,
You know when, and let the children play:
This is a dainty time of yeare for puppies,
Would the old Lord were here.
Gent. He would dy with laughter.
Cler. I am sorry I have no time, to see this game out,
Away, away.
Gent. Here's like to be a hot fight,
Call when y'are fit. Ex. Cler. and Gent.
La-writ. Why look you sir, you seem to be a gentleman,
And you come in honour of your Uncle, hoh, hoh, 'tis very cold;
Your Uncle has offer'd me some few affronts,
Past flesh and blood to beare: hoh, hoh, wondrous cold.
Sam. My Lord, mine Uncle, is an honourable man,
And what he offers, hoh, hoh, cold indeed,
Having made choice of me, an unworthy kinsman,
Yet take me with you: hoh, hoh, pestilence cold,
Not altogether.
La-wr. Hoh, hoh, I say altogether.
Sam. You say you know not what then: hoh, hoh, sir.
La-w. Sir me with your sword in your hand;
You have a scurvy Uncle, you have a most scurvy cause,
And you are — hoh, hoh.
Sam. Hoh, hoh, what?
La-writ. A shitten scurvy Cousin.
Samp. Our Swords? our swords?
Thou art a dog, and like a dog: our swords?
La-w. Our weapons gentlemen: ha? wher's your second?
Sam. Where's yours?
La-writ. So ho? our weapons?
Sam. Wa, ha, ho, our weapons?
Our Doublets and our weapons, I am dead.
La-w. First? second? third? a pl—— he woo you gentlemen
Sam. Are these the rules of honour? I am starv'd.
La-w. They are gone, and we are here; what shall we do?
Sam. O for a couple of faggots.
La-writ. Hang a couple of faggots;
Dar'st thou take a killing cold with me?
Sam. I have it already. (Doublets?
La-writ. Rogues, theeves, hoh hoh, run away with our
To fight at Buffets now, 'twere such a May-game.
Sam. There were no honour in't, p—— on't, 'tis scurvy.
La-w. Or to revenge my wrongs at fifty-cuffes.
Sam. My Lord, mine Uncles cause, depend on Boxes?
La-w. Let's goe in quest if ever we recover 'em.
Sam. I, come, our colds together, and our doublets.
La-w. Give me thy hand; thou art a valiant gentleman.
I say, if ever we recover 'em——
Sam. Let's get into a house, and warme our hearts.
La-writ. There's ne'r a house within this mile, beat me,
Kick me, and beat me as I goe, and I'le beat thee too,
To keepe us warme; if ever we recover 'em——
Kick hard, I am frozen: so, so, now I feele it.
Sam. I am dull yet.
La-w. I'le warme thee I'le warme thee.—Gentlemen,
Rogues, theeves, theeves: run now I'le follow thee. Exeunt.

Enter Vertaigne, Champernell, Beaupre, Verdoone, Lamira, Annabell, Charlott, Nurse.

Verta. Use legs, and have legs.
Cham. You that have legs say so,
I put my one to too much stresse.
Verdo. Your horse, sir,
Will meet you within halfe a mile,
Lam. I like
The walke so well, I should not misse my Coach,
Though it were further. Annabell thou art sad:
What ayles my Niece?
Beau. Shee's still devising, sister,
How quietly her late bed-fellow lay by her.
Nurse. Old as I am, he would have startled me,
Nor can you blame her.
Charl. Had I ta'ne her place.
I know not, but I feare, I should ha' shreek'd,
Though he had never offer'd——
Ana. Out upon thee,
Thou wouldst have taught him.

Charlote. I thinke, with your pardon,
That you wish now you had.
Ana. I am glad I yeild you Cornet.
Such a ample scope of mirth. Musicke within.
Verta. Nay, be not angrie,
There's no ill meant: ha? Musique, and choice musique?
Cham. 'Tis near us in the Grove what courteous bounty
Bestowes it on us? my dancing daies are done;
Yet I would thanke the giver, did I know him.
Verd. 'Tis questionlesse, some one of your own Village,
That hearing of your purpos'd journey thicher,
Prepares it for your entertainment, and
The honour of my Lady.
Lam. I thinke rather,
Some of your Lordships Clyents.
Beaup. What say you Cousin?
If they should prove your Suitors?
Verd. That's most likely.
Nurse. I say, if you are noble, be't who will;
Goe presently and thanke 'em: I can jump yet,
Or tread a measure.
Lam. Like a Millers Mare.
Nurs. I warrant you well enough to serve the Country,
I'le make one, and lead the way. Exit.
Charl. Doe you note,
How zealous the old Crone is?
Lam. And you titter
As eagerly as she: come sweet, we'll follow,
No ill can be intended. Musicke ends.
Cham. I ne'r fear'd yet. Exeunt.

Song in the Wood.

This way, this way, come and heare,
You that hold, these pleasures deare,
Fill your eares, with our sweet sound,
Whilst we melt the frozen ground:
This way come, make haste o'faire,
Let your cleare eyes gild the ayer;
Come and blesse us with your sight,
This way, this way, seeke delight.

Enter a company of Gentlemen, like Ruffians.

1 Gent. They are ours, but draw them on a little further
From the foot-path into the neighbouring thicket,
And we may do't, as safe, as in a Castle.
2 Gent. They follow still; the President, Vertaigne
Comes on a-pace, and Champernell limps after;
The women, as if they had wings, and walk't
Upon the ayre, fly to us.
1 Gent. They are welcome,
We'll make 'em sport; make a stand here, all know
How we are to proceed.
2 Gen. We are instructed. Still Musick within.
1 Gent. One straine or two more. Gent. off.

Enter Vertaigne, Champernell, Beaupre, Verdoune, Lamira, Anabell, Nurse, Charlote.

Excellent, they are come.
Nurse. We cannot misse, in such a businesse, yet
Mine eare ne'r fail'd me. Musick for the Dance.
Charl. Would we were at it once,
I doe not walke, but dance.
1 Gen. You shall have dancing.
Lam. Begin, and when I give the word——
2 Gent. No more.
We are instructed. Dance.
Beaupre. But win us fairely—— Now.
1 Gent. O sir, We do not come to try your valour,
But to possess you, yet we use you kindly
In that, like English theeves, wee kill you not,
But are contented with the spoile.
Verta. Oh heaven!
How hath mine age deserv'd this?
Cham. Hell confound it,
This comes of walking; had I kept my legs,
My legs in my good house, my Armour on,
My Staffe in my rest, and this good sword too friend,
How I would breake and scatter these.
All Gent. Ha, ha, ha.
Cham. Doe you scorne me rogues?
Nurs. Nay, Gentlemen, kind gentlemen,
Or honest keepers of these woods; but heare me,
Be not so rough; if you are taken with
My beauty, as it hath bin worth the seeking,
Some one or two of you, try me in private,
You shall not find me squeamish.
Charl. Doe not kill me,
And doe your worst, I'le suffer.
Lam. Peace vile creatures.
Vert. Do you know me, or my place that you presume not
To touch my person?
1 Gent. If you are well, rest so,
Provoke not angry wasps.
Verta. You are Wasps indeed,
Never created to yeild VVax, or honey,
But for your Countries torment, yet are, if men,
As you seeme such in shape, if true bore French-men,
How ever want compells you to these courses,
Rest satisfied with what you can take from us,
(These Ladies honours, and our liberties safe)
VVe freely give it.
1 Gent. You give but our owne.
Verta. Looke on these grey haires, as you would be old,
Their teares, as you would have yours to find mercy,
VVhen Justice shall o'retake you.
Cham. Looke on me,
Looke on me rascalls, and learne of me too,
That have bin in some part of your profession,
Before that most of you ere suck'd I know it,
I have rode hard, and late too.
Verta. Take heed, sir.
Cham. Then use me, like a brother of the trade,
For I have been at Sea, as you on land are,
Restore my Matrimony undefil'd,
VVrong not my Neece, and for our gold or silver,
If I pursue you, hang me.
Nurs. 'Tis well offer'd,
And as I said, sweet gentlemen, with fowre faces,
If you are high, and want some sport, or so,
(As living without action here, you may doe)
Forbeare their tender griffells, they are meate
VVill wash away, there is no substance in it,
VVe that are expert in the game, and tough to,
VVill hold you play.

Enter Dinant and Clermont.

1 Gent. This hen longs to be troden.
Din. Lackey my horse.
Cler. This way, I heard the cries
Of distress'd women.
2 Gent. Stand upon your guard.
Din. VVho's here? my wittie, scornfull Lady-plot?

In

In the hands of ruffians,
Cler. And my fine cold virgin,
That was insensible of man, and woman?
Din. Justice too,
Without a sword to guard it self?
Cler. And valour with its hands bound?
Din. And the great Souldier dull?
Why this is strange;
Lam. Dinant as thou art noble ——
Ana. As thou art valiant Clermont. ——
Lam. As ever I appear'd lovely ——
Ana. As you ever hope,
For what I would give gladly ——
Cler. Pretty conjurations,
Lam. All injuries, a little laied behind you
Ana. Shew your selves men, and help us
Din. Though your many
And grosse abuses of me, should more move me
To triumph in your miseries then releive you, ——
Yet that hereafter, you may know that I
The scorne and despis'd Dinant, knows what does.
Belong to honour, thus ——
Cler. I will say little, Fight.
Speake thou for me,
Cham. 'Tis bravely fought,
Verta. Brave troopers,
To doe thus for their enemies.
Cham. They are lost yet,
1 Gen. You that would rescue others, shall now feele
What they were borne to,
2 Gen. Hurry them away. Exit. Martin Vertaigne,
Cham. That I could follow them, and Champernell.
Verta. I only can lament my fortune, and desire of heaven
A little life for my revenge.
Cham. The provost,
Sha ll fire the woods, but I will find e'm out,
No cave, no rocke, nor hell shall keepe them from
My searching vengeance.

Enter La-writ and Sampson.

La-wr. O cold! o fearfull cold! plague of all seconds,
Sam. O for a pint of burnt wine, or a sip
Of aqua fortis.
Cham. The rogues have met with these two
Upon my life and robd 'em
La-Wr. As you are honourable Gentlemen,
Impart unto a couple of cold combatants,
Sam. My Lord, mine uncle as I live,
La-wr. Pox take him. —
How that word, has warm'd my mouth?
Verta. Why how now Cousen?
Why, why? and where man, have you bin? at a Poulters?
That you are cas'd thus like a rabbet? I could laugh now,
And I shall laugh, for all I have lost my Children,
Laugh monstruously
Cham. What are they?
Verta. Give me leave Sir,
Laugh more and more, never leave laughing,
Cham. Why Sir?
Verta. Why 'tis such a thing I smell it Sir, I smell it,
Such a ridiculous thing, ——
La-wr. Do you laugh at me my Lord?
I am very cold, but that should not be laught at,
Cham. What art thou?
La-wr. What are thou?
Sam. If he had his doublet. ——
And his sword by his side, as a Gentleman ought to have Ver. Peace Mounsier Sampson.
Cham. Come hither little Gentleman,
La wr. Base is the slave commanded: come to the Verta. This is the little advocate
Cham. What advocate?
Verta. The little advocate that sent me a challenge,
I told you that my Nephew under cooke it,
And what t'was like to prove: now you see the issue.
Cham. Is this the little Lawyer?
La.wr. You have a sword Sir,
And I have none, you have a doublet too,
That keepes you warme, and makes you merry,
Sam. If your Lordship knew
The nature, and the nobleness of the Gentleman,
Though he show sleight here, for what gulfs of danger
His manhood has arrived,
La-wr. Bee't even.
Mens faces are foolish,
And often head long, over run their fortunes,
Sam. That little Lawyer, would so pricke his ears up,
And bite your honour by the nose,
Cham. Say you so Sir? (too
La-wr. So niggle about your grave shins Lord Vernaigne
Sam. No more sweet Gentleman, no more of that Sir,
La-wr. I will have more, I must have more.
Verta. Out with it.
Sam. Nay he is as brave a fellow. ——
Cham. Have I caught you? Strike him downe.
Verta. Doe not kill him, doe not kill him.
No no, no, I will not (heart
Cham. Doe you peepe againe, downe downe proud
Sam. O valour,
Looke up brave friend, I have no meanes to rescue thee,
My Kingdome for a sword,
Cham. I'll sword you presently,
I'll claw your skin-coate too.
Verta. Away good Sampson,
You goe to wrastle els instantly,
Sam. But doe not murder my brave friend
Ver. Not one word,
Cham. If you doe sirra, ——
Sam. Must I goe off dishonour'd?
Adversity tries valour, so I leave thee. Exit.
Cham. Are you a Lawyer Sir?
La-Wr. I was, I was Sir,
Cham. Nay never looke, your Lawyers face is broken
And your litigious blood, about your eares sirra,
Why doe you fight and snarle?
La.Wr. I was possest.
Cham. Ile dispossesse you.
Vert. Ha ha ha.
La-Wr. Et tu Brute.
Vert. Beate him no more.
Cham. Alas Sir I must beate him,
Beate him into his businesse agen, he will be lost else.
Vert. Then take your way,
Cham. Ly still, and doe not struggle,
La.Wr. I am patient,
I never saw my blood before, it jades me,
I have no more heart now then a goose. (of living.
Cham. Why sirra, why do you leave your trade, your trade
And send your challenges like thunderbolts,
To men of honour'd place?
La-wr. I understand Sir,
I never understood, before your beating,

Cham.

Cham. Does this worke on you?
La-wr. Yes.
Cham. Doe you thanke me for't?
La-wr. As well as a beaten man can.
Cham. And doe you promise me,
To fall close to your trade againe? leave brawling
La-wr. If you will give me leave and life;
Cham. And aske this noble man forgiveneſſe?
La-Wr. Hartily. (you
Cham. Riſe then, and gee you gone, and let me heare of
As of an Advocate new vampt; no more words,
Get you off quickly, and make no murmurs
I ſhall purſue you elſe,
La-Wr. I have done ſweet Gentlemen. Exit.
Vert. But we forget our ſelves, our Friends and Children
Cham. Wee'l raiſe the country firſt, then take our fortunes.
Exeunt.

Enter one Gent. and Lamira.

1 Gent. Shall I entereate for what I may command?
Lam. Thinke on my birth.
1 Gent. Here I am only Noble.
A King, and thou in my dominions foole,
A ſubject and a ſlave.
Lam. Be not a Tyrant;
A raviſher of honour, gentle Sir,
And I will thinke ye ſuch, and on my knees,
As to my Soveraigne, pay a Subjects duty,
With prayers and teares,
1 Gent. I like this humble carriage.
I will walke by, but kneele you ſtill and weepe too,
It ſhewes well, while I meditate on the prey,
Before I ſeize it.
Lam. Is there no mercie, heaven?

Enter ſecond Gent. and Anabell.

2 Gent. Not kiſſe you?
I will kiſſe and kiſſe againe,
Ana. Savage vill aine!
My Innocence be my ſtrength, I doe defie thee,
Thus ſcorne and ſpit at thee; will you come on Sir,
You are hot, there is a cooler,
2 Gen. A virago? (deſſe,
Ana. No, lothſome Goate, more, more I am that God-
That here with whippes of ſteele in hell hereafter
Scourge rape and theft,
2 Gen. I'll try your deity,
Ana. My chaſtity, and this knife held by a Virgin,
Againſt thy luſt, thy ſword and thee a Beaſt.
Call on for the encounter.
2 Gen. Now what thinke you? Throwes her and takes her Knife.
Are you a Goddeſſe?
Ana. In me their power ſuffers,
That ſhould protect the Innocent,
1 Gent. I am all fire,
And thou ſhall quench it, and ſerve my pleaſures,
Come partner in the ſpoile and the reward,
Let us enjoy our purchaſe
Lam. O Dinant!
O Heaven! o Husband!
Ana. O my Cleremont!
1 Gent. Two are our ſlaves they call on, bring 'em forth
As they are chaind together let them ſee
And ſuffer in the object.

Enter Dinant and Cleremont bound. By the reſt of the Gent.

2 Gen. While we ſit
And without pitty heare 'em
Cler. By my life,
I ſuffer more for thee then for my ſelf,
Din. Be a man Cleremont, and looke upon 'em,
As ſuch that not alone abus'd our ſervice,
Fed us with hopes moſt bitter indigeſtion,
But when love faild, to draw on further miſchief,
The baites they laied for us; were our owne honours,
Which thus hath made us ſlaves too, worſe then ſlaves
2 Gen. He dies
1 Gen. Pray hold, give him a little reſpite,
Din. I ſee you now beyond expreſſion wretched,
The wit you bragd of, foold, that boaſted honour,
As you believ'd compaſs'd with walls of braſſe,
To guard it ſure, Subject to be o're thrown
With the leaſt blaſt of luſt.
Lam. A moſt ſad truth.
Din. That confidence which was not to be ſhaken
In a perpetuall fever, and thoſe favours,
Which with ſo ſtrong, and Ceremonious duty
Your lover and a Gentleman long ſought for,
Sought, ſued, and kneeld in vaine for, muſt you yeild up
To a licentious villaine, that will hardly,
Allow you thanks for't
Cler. Something I muſt ſay too,
And to you pretty one, though crying one;
To be hangd now, when theſe worſhipfull benchers pleaſe
Though I know not their faces that condemne me,
A little ſtartles me, but a man is nothing,
A Maydenhead is the thing, the thing all aime at;
Doe not you wiſh now, and wiſh from your heart too,
When ſcarce ſweet with my feares, I long lay by you
Thoſe feares you and your good Aunt put upon me,
To make you ſport you had giuen a little hint,
A touch or ſo, to tell me I was mortall,
And by a mortall woman?
Ana. Pray you no more
Cler. If I had loos'd that virgin Zone, obſerve me,
I would have hired the beſt of all our Poets
To have ſung ſo much, and ſo well in the honour
Of that nights joye, that Ovids afternoone,
Nor his Corvina ſhould againe be mentioned,
Ana. I doe repent, and wiſh I had,
Cler. That's comfort,
But now. ——
2 Gent. Another that will have it offer'd,
Compell it to be offer'd, ſhall enjoye it.
Cler. A rogue, a ruffian.
2 Gen. As you love your throat, ——
1 Gen. Away with them.
Ana. O Clerement!
Lam. O Dinant!
Din. I can but add your ſorrowes to my ſorrowes,
Your feares to my feares,
Cler. To your wiſhes mine.
This ſlave may prove unable to performe,
Till I performe the taske that I was borne for,
Ana. Amen, amen.
1 Gent. Drag the ſlaves hence, for you
A while i'll locke you up here ſtudy all wayes
You can to pleaſe me, or the deed being done,
You are but dead.
2 Gen. This ſtrong vault ſhall conteine you
There thinke how many for your maydenhead
Have pin'd away, and be prepared to looſe it
With penitence.
1 Gent. No humane help can ſave you.
Ladyes. Helpe, helpe? ——

2 Gent.

2 Gent. You cry in vaine, rockes cannot heare you.

Actus Quinti. Scena Prima.

A Horrid noise of Musique within.

Enter one and open the Chamber doore, in which Lamira and Anabell were shut, they in all feare.

Lam. O Cousen how I shake, all this long night,
What frights and noises we have heard still they encrease
The villaines put on shapes to torture us,
And to their Divells forme such preparations
As if they were a hatching new dishonours,
And fatall ruine, past dull mans invention
Goe not too far, and pray good Cousen Anabell
Harke a new noise. A strange Musick.
Ana. They are exquisite in mischeif. Sackbuts & Trump mu-
I will goe on this roome gives no protection. sick.
More then the next, what's that? how sad and hollow,
The sound comes to us. They are peeping.
Lam. Groning? or singing is it? Louder.
Ana. The wind I think murmuring amongst old rooms
Lam. Now it growes lowder sure some sad prefage
Of our lowle losse —— peepe ——, looke now they peepe,
Ana. Pox peepe 'em.
Lam. O give them gentle language,
Ana. Give 'em rats-bane. Peepe above.
Lam. Now they are above
Ana. I would they were i'th Center,
Lam. Thou art so foolish desperate,
Ana. Since we must loose,
Lam. Call 'em brave fellowes, Gentlemen,
Ana. Call 'em rogues,
Rogues as they are, rude rogues, uncivill villaines (ger?
Lam. Look an thou woot, beware, dost thou feele the dan-
Ana. Till the danger feele me, this will I talke still,
And worse when that comes too; they cannot eate me
This is a punishment, upon our owne prides,
Most justly laied; we must abuse brave Gentlemen,
Make 'em tame fooles & hobby-horses, laugh & jeere at
Such men too, and so handsome and so Noble,
That howsoere we seem'd to carry it
Woo'd 'twer to doe againe,
Lam. I doe confesse consen,
It was too harsh, too foolish?
Ana. Doe you feele it?
Doe you find it now? take heed ot'h punishment,
We might have had two gallant Gentlemen,
Proper young, o how it tortures me
Two Divells now, two rascalls two and twenty
Lam. O thinke not so
Ana. Nay an we scape so modestly ——
Lam. May we be worthy any eyes, or knowledge,
When we are used thus?
Ana. Why not? why doe you cry!
Are we not women still? what were we made for?
Lam. But thus, thus basely ——
Ana. 'Tis against our wills,
And if there come a thousand so, ——
Lam. Out on thee,
Ana. You are a foole, what we cannot resist,
Why should we greive and blush for? there be women,
And they that beare the name of excellent women
Would give their whole estates, to meete this fortune
Lam. Harke, a new noise. New found within.
Ana. Let 'em goe on, I feare not,
If wrangling, fighting and scratching cannot preserve me
Why so be it Cousen; if I be ordain'd
To breed a race of rogues.

Enter foure over the stage with Beaupre, and Verdoone bound, and halters about their necks.

Lam. They come
Ana. Be firme,
They are welcom. (ther
Lam. What mask of death is this? O my deare Bro-
Ana. My coose to; why now y'are glorious villaines
Lam. O shall we loose our honours?
Ana. Let 'em goe,
When death prepares the way, they are but Pageants
Why must these dye?
Beau. Lament your owne misfortunes,
We perish happily before your ruines,
Ana. Has mischeif ne'r a tongue?
1 Gent. Yes foolish woman,
Our Captaines will is death.
Ana. You dare not doe it
Tell thy base boisterous Captaine what I say,
Thy lawlesse Captaine that he dares not;
Doe you laugh you rogue? you pamperd rogue?
Lam. Good Sir,
Good Cousen gently, as y'are a Gentleman,
Ana. A gentleman? a slave, a dog the devills harbinger
Lam. Sir as you had a mother,
Ana. He a Mother?
Shame not the name of mother, a She Beare
A bloody old woolf bitch, a woman Mother?
Lookes that rude lumpe, as if he had a mother?
Intreat him hang him, do thy worst, thou dar'st not,
Thou dar'st not wrong their lives, thy Captain dares not
They are persons of more price
Ver. What ere we suffer
Let not your angers wrong you,
Ana. You cannot suffer.
The men that doe this deed, must live i'th moone
Free from the gripe of Justice.
Lam. Is it not better?
Ann. Is it not better? let 'em goe on like rascalls
And put false faces on; they dare not doe it;
Flatter such scabbs of nature,
Gent. Woman, woman
The next worke is with you.
Ana. Unbind those Gentlemen,
And put their fatall fortunes on our neckes.
Lam. As you have money doe;
Ana. As you are monsters. (mones
Lam. Fright us no more with shipwrack of our ho-
Nor if there be a guilt by us committed
Let it endanger those, I
Ana. I say they dare not.
There be a thousand gallowses, yee rogues,
Tortures, ye bloody rogues wheeles,
Gent. Away.
Lam. Stay.
Ana. Stay,
Stay and i'll flatter too: good sweet fac'd Gentlemen
You excellent in honesty; o kinsmen!
O Noble kinsmen!
Gen. Away with 'em. Exit Verd. Beaup. and Gent.
Ana. Stay yet
The Devill and his lovely dam walke with you,
Come fortify your self, if they doe dy,

Which

Which all their ruggednesse, cannot rack into me
They cannot find an houre more Innocent,
Nor more friends to revenge 'em.

Enter Clermont disguis'd.

Lam. Now stand constant,
For now our tryalls come,
Cler. This beauties mine
Your minute moves not yet,
Lam. She sinkes if Christian,
If any sparke of noble heate.—
Cler. Rise Lady
And feareless rise, there's no dishonour meant you,
Doe you know my tongue?
Ana. I have heard it,
Cler. Marke it better
I am one that loves you, fairely, nobly loves you
Looke on my face?
Ana. O Sir?
Cler. No more words, softly
Hearke, but hearke wisely how, understand well,
Suspect not, feare not
Ana. You have brought me comfort
Cler. If you thinke me worthy of your Husband,
I am no rogue, nor Begger if you dare doe thus—
Ana. You are Mounsier Clermont,
Cler. I am the same
If you dare venture, speake, if not I leave you,
And leave you to the mercy of these villaines
That will not wooe ye much,
Ana. Save my reputation,
And free me from these slaves.
Cler. By this kisse i'll doe it
And from the least dishonour they dare aime at you
I have a priest too, shall be ready.
Ana. You are forward,
Lam. Is this my constant Cousen? how she whispers,
Kisses and huggs the theif.
Ana. You ll offer nothing
Cler. Tis all be tyed
Not as I am a Gentleman
Ana. Can you releive my Aunt too?
Cler. Not yet Mistris.
But feare nothing all shall be well away quickly
It must be done i'th moment or (ding
Ana. I am with yee
Cler. I'll know now who sleepes by me, keepe your stan-

Exit Cler. and Anabell.

Lam. Well, go thy waye, & thine own shame dwell with
Is this the constancy she shewed the bravery (thee?
The deare love and the life, she owed her kinsmen?
O brave tongue, valiant glorious woman?
Is this the noble anger you arriv'd at?
Are these the theeves you scornd the rogues you rayld at?
The scabs and scums of nature? o faire modesty,
Excellent vertue, whither art thou fled?
What hand o'heaven is over us, when strong virgins
Yeild to their feares, and to their feares their fortunes?
Never beleef come neare me more, farewell wench,
A long farewell from all that ever knew thee,
My turne is next,
I am resolved it comes
But in a nobler shape, ha?

Enter Dinant.

Din. Blesse yee Lady
Lam. Indeed Sir. I had need of many blessings,
For all the houres I have had since I came here,
Have bin so many curses. How got you liberty?
For I presume you come to comfort me
Din. To comfort you, and love you, 'tis most true,
My bondage was as yours, as full of bitternesse
And every hower my death.
Lam. Heaven was your comfort.
Din. Till the last evening, sitting full of sadnesse
Wailing, sweet Mistris, your unhappy fortunes
Mine owne, I had the least care of, round about me,
The Captaine, and the company stood gaping,
When I began the story of my love,
To you faire Saint, and with so full a sorrow,
Followed each point, that even from those rude eyes,
That never knew what pitty meant or mercy
Ther stole downe soft relentings, take heed Mistris,
And let not such unholy hearts out doe you,
The soft plum'd god will see againe, thus taken,
As men transform'd with the strange tale I told
They stood amaz'd then bid me rise and live,
Take liberty and meanes to see your person,
And wisht me prosperous in your love, wish you so,
Be wise and loving Lady, shew but you so
Lam. O Sir, are these fit houres, to talke of love in?
Shall we make fooles of our afflictions?
Can any thing sound sweetly in mine eares,
Where all the noise of bloody horrour?
My Brother, and my Cousen, they are dead Sir,
Dead, basely dead, is this an age to foole in?
And I my self, I know not what I shall be
Yet I must thanke you, and if happily
You had asked me yesterday, when these were living,
And my feares lesse, I might have hearkned to you,
Din. Peace to your grief, I bind you to your word.

Enter Clermont Anabell, Beaupre, Verdoune, Charles Nurse, the two Gentlemen.

Lam. How? doe you conjure?
Din. Not to raise dreadfull apparitions, Madam,
But such as you would gladly see.
Lam. My Brother, and nephew living?
Beap. And both owe their lives,
To the favour of these Gentlemen,
Verd. Who deserve
Our service, and for us, your gracious thankes.
Lam. Which I give freely, and become a suitour,
To be hereafter more familiar. Kisse.
With such great worth and vertue,
1 Gen. Ever thinke us,
Your servants Madam.
Cler. Why if thou wilt needs know
How we are freed, I will discover it,
And with laconick brevity, these Gentlemen
This night incountring with those out lawes that Yesterday made us prisoners, and as we were
Attempted by 'em they with greater courage,
(I am sure with better fortune not alone,
Guarded themselves, but forc'd the bloody thieves,
Being got betweene them, and this hellish Cave,
For safety of their lives, to fly up higher
Into the woods, all left to their possession
This save your Brother, and your nephew from
The gibbet, this redeem'd me from my Chaines,
And gave my friend his liberty this preserv'd
Your honour ready to be lost,
Din. But that
I know this for a ly, and that the thieves

And

And gentlemen, are the same men, by my practise,
Suborn'd to this he does deliver it
With such a constant brow, that I am doubtfull,
I should believe him too.
1 Gent. If we did well,
We are rewarded.
2 Gent. Thankes but takes away
From what was freely purpos'd.
Cler. Now by this hand,
You have so cunningly discharg'd your parts,
That while we live, rest confident you shall
Command Dinant and Clermont, not Beaupre,
Nor Verdome sents it: for the Ladyes, they
Were easie to be gul'd.
1 Gent. 'Twas but a jest,
And yet the jest, may chance to breake our neckes
Should it be knowne.
Cler. Feare nothing.
Din. Clermont.
Say, what successe?
Cler. As thou wouldst wish, 'tis done Lad,
The grove will witnesse with me, that this night,
I lay not like a blocke: but how speed you?
Din. I yet am in suspence, devise some meanes
To get these off, and speedily.
Cler. I have it,
Come, we are dull, I thinke that the good fellowes,
Our predecessors in this place, were not
So foolish, and improvident husbands, but
'Twill yeild us meat, and wine.
1 Gent. Let's ransack it,
'Tis ours now, by the Law.
Cler. How say you sweet one,
Have you an appetite?
Ann. To walke againe
Th' Woods, if you thinke fit, rather then eate.
Cler. A little respite prithee; nay blush not,
You aske but whats your owne, and warrantable.
Monsier, Beaupre, Verdome,
What thinke you of the motion?
Ver. Lead the way. Exeunt Manet, Din. and Lamira.
Beau. We follow willingly.
Cler. When you shall thinke fit,
We will expect you.
Din. Now be mistris of
Your promise Lady.
Lam. 'Twas to give you hearing.
Din. But that word hearing, did include a grant,
And you must make it good.
Lam. Must?
Din. Must, and shall,
I will be fool'd no more, you had your tricks;
Made properties, of me, and of my friend;
Presum'd upon your power, and whip'd me with
The rod of mine owne dotage: doe not flatter
Your selfe, with hope, that any humane helpe
Can free you, and for ayde by miracle;
A base unthankfull woman is unworthy.
Lam. You will not force me?
Rather then enjury you
With your consent because I will tormente you;
I'le make you feele the effects of abus'd love,
And glory in your torture.
Lam. Brother, Nephew,
Helpe, helpe for heavens sake.
Din. Teare your throat, cry lowder,
Though every leafe, these trees beare, were an Eccho,
And summond in your best friends to redeeme you,
It should be fruitlesse: 'tis not that I love you,
Or value those delights you prize so high,
That I'le enjoy you, a French crowne will buy
More sport, and a companion, to whom,
You in your best trim, are an Ethiope.
Lam. Forbeare me then.
Din. Not so, I'll do't in spite,
And breake that stubborne disobedient will,
That hath so long held out, that boasted honour,
I will make equall with a common Whore;
The spring of Chastity, that fed your pride,
And grew into a River of vaine glory,
I will defile with mudd, the mudd of lust,
And make it lothsome even to goats.
Lam. O heaven!
No pitty sir?
Din. You taught me to be cruell,
And dare you thinke of mercy? I'le tell thee foole,
Those that surpriz'd thee, were my instruments,
I can plot too, good Madam, you shall find it:
And in the stead of licking of my fingers,
Kneeling, and whining like a boy new breech'd,
To get a toy forsooth, not worth an apple,
Thus make my way, and with Authority,
Command what I would have.
Lam. I am lost for ever:
Good sir, I doe confesse my fault, my grosse fault,
And yeild my selfe up, miserable guilty;
Thus kneeling, I confesse, you cannot study
Sufficient punishments, to load me with;
I am in your power, and I confesse againe,
You cannot be too cruell: if there be,
Besides the losse of my long guarded honour,
Any thing else to make the ballance even:
Pray put it in, all hopes, all helpes have left me;
I am girt round with sorrow, hell's about me,
And ravishment, the least that I can looke for,
Doe what you please.
Din. Indeed I will doe nothing,
Nor touch, nor hurt you Lady, nor had ever
Such a lewd purpose.
Lam. Can there be such goodnesse,
And in a man so injur'd?
Din. Be confirmed in't,
I seale it thus: I must confesse you've'd me,
In fooling me so often, and those feares,
You threw upon me, call'd for a requitall,
Which now I have return'd, all unchast love
Dinant thus throwes away; live to mankind,
As you have done to me, and I will honour
Your vertue, and no more thinke of your beauty.
Lam. All I possesse, comes short of satisfaction.
Din. No complements: the terrours of this night
Imagine, but a fearfull dreame, and so
With ease forget it: for Dinant, that labour'd
To blast your honour, is a Champion for it,
And will protect and guard it.
Lam. 'Tis as safe then,
As if a compleat Army undertooke it. Exeunt.

Enter Lawrit, Sampson, Clyents.

Law-rit. Do not perswade me gentle Monsier Sampson,
I am a mortall man againe, a Lawyer,
My mortall part, I have put off.

Sam. Sweet Monſier,
Let but our honours teach us,
La-wrir. Monſier Sampſon;
My honourable friend, my valiant friend,
Be but ſo beat en-forward my brave Clyents,
I am yours, and you are mine againe, be but ſo thraſht,
Receive that Caſtigation with a cudgell.
Sam. Which calls upon us for a Reparation.
La-wr. I have, it coſt me halfe a crowne, I beare it
All over me, I beare it Monſier Sampſon;
The oyles, and the old woman, that repaires to me,
To noint my beaten body.
Sam. It concernes you,
You have bin ſwing'd.
La-writ. Let it concerne thee too;
Goe and be beaten, ſpeake ſcurvy words, as I did,
Speake to that Lion Lord, waken his anger,
And have a hundred Baſtinado's, doe;
Three broken pates, thy teeth knockt out, doe Sampſon,
Thy valiant armes and leggs beaten to Pouldreſſes,
Doe ſilly Sampſon, doe.
1 Cly. You wrong the gentleman,
To put him out of his right minde thus:
You wrong us, and our Cauſes.
La-writ. Downe with him gentlemen,
Turne him, and beat him, if he breake our peace,
Then when thou haſt bin Lam'd, thy ſmall guts periſht,
Then talke to me, before I ſcorne thy counſell,
Feele what I feele, and let my Lord repaire thee.
Sam. And can the brave La-writ ——
2 Cly. Tempt him no further,
Be warn'd and ſay no more.
La-writ. If thou doeſt, Sampſon,
Thou ſeeſt my Mirmidons, I'le let 'em looſe,
That in a moment——
Sam. I ſay nothing, ſir, but I could wiſh——
La-wr. They ſhall deſtroy thee wiſhing;
There's ne'r a man of theſe, but have loſt ten Cauſes,
Dearer then ten mens lives; tempt, and thou dieſt:
Goe home, and ſmile upon my Lord, mine Uncle,
Take Money of the men thou meaneſt to Cozen,
Drinke Wine, and eat good meat, and live diſcreetly,
Talke little, 'tis an Antidote againſt a beating; (placket,
Keep thy hand from thy ſword, and from thy Laundreſſe
And thou wilt live long.
1 Cly. Give eare, and be inſtructed.
La-writ. I find I am wiſer then a Juſtice of Peace now,
Give me the wiſdome that's beaten into a man
That ſticks ſtill by him: art thou a new man?
Sam. Yes, yes,
Thy learned precepts have inchanted me,
La-writ. Goe my ſon Sampſon, I have now begot thee,
I'le ſend thee cauſes; ſpeake to thy Lord, and live.
And lay my ſhare by, goe and live in peace,
Put on new ſuites, and ſhew fit for thy place;
That man neglects his living, is an Aſſe: Exit Samp.
Farewell; come chearly boyes, about our buſineſſe,
Now welcome tongue againe, hang Swords.
1 Cly. Sweet Advocate. Exeunt.

Enter Nurſe and Charlote.

Nur. I know not wench, they may call 'em what they will,
Outlawes, or theeves, but I am ſure, to me
One was an honeſt man, he us'd me well;
What I did, 'tis no matter, he complain'd not.
Char. I muſt confeſſe, there was one bold with me too,
Some coy thing, would ſay rude, but 'tis no matter,
I was to pay a Waiting womans ranſome,
And I have don't, and I would pay't againe,
Were I to ſine to morrow
Nur. Alas, there was no hurt,
It's be a ſin, for ſuch as live at hard meat,
And keepe a long Lent, in the woods as they doe,
To taſt a little fleſh,
Char. God help the Courtiers,
That ly at racke and manger
Nurſe. I ſhall love
A theefe the better for this while I live,
They are men of a charitable vocation,
And give where there is need, and with diſcretion,
And put a good ſpeed penny in my purſe,
That has bin empty twenty yeares,
Char. Peace Nurſe,
Farewell, and cry not roſt meate, me thinkes Clermont
And my Lady Anabell are in one night,
Familliarly acquainted.
Nurſe. I obſerve it,
If ſhe have got a penny too.

Enter Vertaigne Chamberuell and Provoſt.

Charl. No more,
My Lord Mounſier Vertaigne the provoſt too,
Haſt and acquaint my Lady, Exit Nurſe and Charl.
Pro. Wonderous ſtrainge,
Vert. 'Tis true Sir, on my credit,
Cham. On mine honour,
Pro. I have bin provoſt-Marſhall twenty yeares,
And have truſſed up a thouſand of theſe raſcalls,
But ſo nere Paris yet, I never met with,
One of that Brotherhood.
Cham. We to our coſt have,
But will you ſearch the wood
Pro. It is beſet,
They cannot ſcape us, Nothing makes me wonder,
So much as having you within their power
They let you goe; it was a Courteſy,
That French theeves uſe not often, I much pitty
The Gentle Ladyes, yet I know not how,
I rather hope then feare

Enter Dinant, Clermont, Verdoone, Beaupre, Lamira, Anabell, Charlote, Nurſe.

Are theſe the priſoners?
Din. We were ſuch
Verta. Kill me not, exceſſe of joy,
Cham. I ſee thou liveſt, but haſt thou had no foule play
Lam. No on my ſoule, my uſage hath bin noble,
Far from all violence,
Cham. How were you freed,
But kiſſe me firſt, wee'll talk of that at leaſure,
I am glad I have thee; Neice how you keepe off,
As you knew me not?
Ana. Sir, I am where
I owe moſt duty
Cler. 'Tis indeed moſt true Sir,
The man that ſhould have bin your bed fellow
Your Lordſhips Bedfellow, that could not ſmell out
A Virgin of ſixteene, that was your foole,
To make you merry, this poore ſimple fellow
Has met the maid agen, and now ſhe knowes,
He is a man,
Cham. How! is ſhe diſhonoured?
Cler. Not unleſſe marriage be diſhoncurable,
Heaven is a witneſſe of our happy contract
And the next Prieſt we meete ſhall warrant it

To

To all the world : I lay with her in jeaſt,
'Tis turn'd to earneſt now.
Cham. Is this true Neice
Din. Her bluſhing ſilence grants it ; nay Sir ſtorme not
He is my friend, and I can make this good,
His birth and fortunes equall hers, your Lordſhip
Might have fought out a worſe we are all friends too,
All differences end thus. Now Sir, unleſſe
You would raiſe new diſſentions make perfect
What is ſo well begun
Verta. That were not manly,
Lam. Let me perſwade you,
Cham. Well God give you joy,
She ſhall not come a Begger to you Sir,
For you Monſieur Dinant 'ere long i'll ſhew you,
Another Neice, to this not much inferiour,
As you ſhall like proceed
Din. I thanke you Sir,
Cham. Backe then to Paris, well that travell ends
That makes of deadly enemies perfect friends.

Exeunt omnes.

Prologue.

To promiſe much, before a play begin,
And when 'tis done, aske pardon, were a ſinne
Wee'll not be guilty of : and to excuſe
Before we know a fault were to abuſe
The writers and our ſelves, for I dare ſay
We all are foold if this be not a Playe
And ſuch a play as ſhall, (ſo ſhould playes doe)
Impe times dull wings, and make you merry too
'Twas to that purpoſe writ, ſo we intend it
And we have our wiſht ends, if you commend it.

Epilogue.

Gentlemen,

I Am ſent forth to enquire what you decree
Of us and our Poets, they will be
This night exceeding merry, ſo will we
If you approve their labours. They profeſſe
You are their patrons, and we ſay no leſſe,
Reſolve us then, for you can onely tell
Whither we have done id'ly or done well.

FINIS.

The Cuſtome of the Countrey.

Actus Primus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Rutillio, and Arnoldo.

Rut. WHy doe you grieve thus ſtill?
Arn. 'Twold melt a Marble (tune.
And tame a ſavage man, to feele my for-
Rut. What fortune? I have liv'd this 30. yeares
And run through all theſe follies you call fortunes
Yet never fixt on any good, and conſtant,
But what I made my ſelfe: why ſhould I grieve then,
And chat I may mould any way?
Arn. You are wide ſtill. (woman,
Rut. You love a gentlewoman, a young handſome
I have lov'd a thouſand, not ſo few.
Arn. You are diſpos'd.
Rut. You hope to marry her; 'tis a lawfull calling
And prettily eſteem'd of, but take heed then,
Take heed dear brother of a ſtranger fortune
Then ere you felt yet; fortune my foe is a friend to it.
Arn. 'Tis true I love, dearly, and truly love,
A noble, vertuous, and moſt beauteous maid,
And am belov'd againe.
Rut. That's too much a conſcience
To love all theſe would run me out ô my wits.
Arn. Prethee give eare, I am to marry her
Rut. Diſpatch it then, and I'le goe call the Piper.
Arn. But ô the wicked Cuſtômes of this countrey
The barbarous, moſt inhumane, damned Cuſtome
Rut. 'Tis true, to marry is a cuſtome
In the world; for looke you brother,
Woo'd any man, ſtand plucking for the Ace of Harts,
With one packe of cards all dayes on's life?
Arn. You doe not
Or elſe you purpoſe not to underſtand me
Rut. Proceed, I will give eare.
Arn. They have a Cuſtome
In this moſt beaſtly countrey, out upon't.
Rut. Lets heare it firſt.
Arn. That when a maid is contracted
And ready for the tye o'th Church, the Governour,
He that commands in chiefe, muſt have her maiden-head
Or ranſome it for mony at his pleaſure. (cuſtome?
Rut. How might a man atchieve that place? a rare
An admirable rare cuſtome: and none excepted?
Arn. None, none.
Rut. The rarer ſtill: how could I lay about me?
In this rare office? are they born to it, or choſen?
Arn. Both equall damnable.
Rut. Me thinks both excellent
Would I were the next heire
Arn. To this mad fortune
Am I now come, my marriage is proclaim'd.
And nothing can redeem me from this miſchief,
Rut. Shees very young;
Arn. Yes.
Rut. And faire I dare proclaime her
Elſe mine eyes faile,
Arn. Faire as the bud unblaſted.
Rut. I cannot blame him then if 'twere mine own caſe.
I would not goe an ace leſſe
Arn. Fye Rutillio
Why do you make your brothers miſery
Your ſport and game?
Rut. There is no paſtime like it
Arn. I look'd for your advice, your timely counſell,
How to avoid this blow, not to be mockt at,
And my afflictions jeer'd.
Rut. I tell thee Arnoldo,
An thou wert my Father, as thou art but my brother,
My younger brother too, I muſt be merry
And where there is a wench it can, a young wench,
A handſome wench, and ſooner a good turne too,
An I were to be hangd, thus muſt I handle it.
But you ſhal ſee Sir, I can change this habit
To doe you any ſervice; adviſe what you pleaſe,
And ſee with what devotion I'le attend it?
But yet me thinks, I am taken with this cuſtome.

Ent: Charino and Zenocia.

And could pretend to'th place.
Arn. Draw off a little?
Here comes my Miſtris and her Father.
Rut. IA dainty wench;
Woo'd might farme his Cuſtome
Char. My deare daughter,
Now to bethink your ſelfe of new advice
Will be too late, later this timeleſſe ſorrow,
No price, nor prayers, can infringe the fate
Your beauty hath caſt on you, my beſt Zenocia,
Be rul'd by me, a Fathers care directs yee,
Looke on the Count, looke cheerfully and ſweetly;
What though he have the power to poſſeſſe yee,
To plucke your maiden honour, and then ſlight yee
By cuſtome, unreſiſtable to enjoy you;
Yet my ſweet childe, ſo much your youth and goodneſs

The beauty of your ſoule, and Saint-like modeſty, (him
Have wonne upon his wilde minde; ſo much charm'd
That all power laid aſide, what Law allows him,
Or ſuddain fires, kindled from thoſe bright eyes,
He ſues to be your ſervant, fairly, nobly
For ever to be tyed your faithfull Husband:
Conſider my beſt childe:
Zeno. I have conſidered
Char. The bleſſedneſſe that this breeds too, conſider
Beſides your Fathers Honour, your own peace,
The baniſhment for ever of this cuſtome
This baſe and barbarous uſe, for after once
He has found the happineſſe of holy marriage
And what it is to grow up with one beauty,
How he will ſcorne and kicke at ſuch a heritage
Left him by luſt and lewd progenitors.
All Virgins too, ſhall bleſſe your name, ſhall Saint it,
And like ſo many Pilgrims goe to your ſhrine,
When time has turn'd your beauty into aſhes,
Filld with your pious memory.
Zeno. Good Father
Hide not that bitter pill, I loth to ſwallow
In ſuch ſweet words:
Char. The Count's a handſome Gentleman,
And having him, y'are certaine of a fortune,
A high and noble fortune to attend you:
Where if you fling your love upon this ſtranger
This young Arnoldo, not knowing from what place
Or honourable ſtrain of blood he is ſprung, you ventur
All your owne ſweets, and my long cares to nothing,
Nor are you certaine of his faith; why may not that
Wander as he does, every where?
Zen. No more Sir;
I muſt not heare, I dare not heare him wrongd thus,
Vertue is never wounded, but I ſuffer.
'Tis an ill office in your age, a poore one,
To judge thus weakly: and believe your ſelfe too,
A weaker to betray your innocent daughter,
To his intemp'rate, rude, and wilde embraces,
She hates as Heaven hates falſhood.
Rut. A good wench,
She ſticks cloſe to you Sir.
Zeno. His faith uncertaine?
The nobleneſſe his vertue ſprings from, doubted?
De'e doubt tis day now? or when your body's perfect,
Your ſtomacks well diſpos'd, your pulſes temperate,
De'e doubt you are in health? I tell you Father,
One houre of this mans goodneſſe, this mans Nobleneſſe
Put in the ſcale, againſt the Counts whole being,
Forgive his luſts too, which are halfe his life,
He could no more endure to hold weight with him;
Arnoldoes very looks, are faire examples;
His common and indifferent actions,
Rules and ſtrong ties of vertue: he has my firſt love,
To him in ſacred vow I have given this body,
In him my mind inhabits.
Rut. Good wench ſtill
Zen. And till he fling me off, as undeſerving
Which I confeſſe I am, of ſuch a bleſſing,
But would be loth to finde it ſo——
Arn. O never;
Never my happy Miſtris, never, never,
When your poor ſervant lives but in your favour,
One foote it'h grave, the other ſhall not linger,
What ſacrifice of thanks, what age of ſervice,
What danger, of more dreadfull looke then death,
What willing martyrdome to crown me conſtant
May merit ſuch a goodneſſe, ſuch a ſweetneſſe?
A love ſo Nobly great, no power can ruine;
Moſt bleſſed maid goe on, the gods that gave this,
This pure unſpotted love, the child of Heaven,
In their own goodneſſe, muſt preſerve and ſave it
And raiſe you a reward, beyond our recompence;
Zen. I aske but you, a pure maid to poſſeſſe,
And then they have crownd my wiſhes: If I fall then
Goe ſeek ſome better love, mine will debaſe you.
Rut. A pretty innocent foole; well Governour, (ſelfe
Though I think well of your cuſtome, & could wiſh my
For this night in your place, heartily wiſh it:
Yet if you play not faire play, and above boord too,
I have a fooliſh pin here, I ſay no more; (inchanted
I'le tell you what & if your honours guts are not
Arn. I ſhould now chide you Sir, for ſo declining
The goodneſſe and the grace you have ever ſhewed me,
And your own vertue too, in ſeeking raſhly
To violate that love heaven has appointed,
To wreſt your daughters thoughts, part that affection
That both our hearts have tyed & ſeek to give it,
Rut. To a wild fellow, that would weary her;
A Canniball, that feedes on the heads of maides,
Then flings their bones and bodies to the Devill,
Would any man of diſcretion venture ſuch a griffle,
To the rude clawes of ſuch a Cat-a-mountain?
You had better teare her between 2 Oaks, a Town bull
Is a meer Stoick to this fellow, a grave Philoſopher,
And a Spaniſh Jennet, a moſt vertuous Gentleman.
Arn. Does this ſeem handſome Sir?
Rut. Though I confeſſe
Any man would deſire to have her, and by any meanes,
At any rate too, yet that this common hang-man,
That hath whips off the heads of a 1000. maids already
That he ſhould gleane the harveſt, ſticks in my ſtomack:
This rogue that breaks young wenches to the ſaddle,
And teaches them to ſtumble ever after;
That he ſhould have her? for my brother now
That is a handſome young fellow, and well thought on,
And will deale tenderly in the buſineſſe;
Or for my ſelfe that have a reputation,
And have ſtudied the concluſions of theſe cauſes
And know the perfect mannage, I'le tel you old Sir,
If I ſhould call you wiſe Sir, I ſhould bely you,
This thing you ſtudy to betray your child to.
This Maiden-monger. When you have done your beſt
And think you have fixt her in the point of honour
Who do you think you have tyed her too? a Surgeon,
I muſt confeſſe an excellent defector,
One that has cut up more young tender Lamb-pies——
Char. What I ſpeake Gentlemen, was meer compulſion
No Fathers free-will, nor did I touch your perſon,
With any edge of ſpight, or ſtraine your loves
With any baſe, or hired perſwaſions; Exit.
Witneſſe theſe tears, how well I wiſht your fortunes.
Rut. Theres ſome grace in thee yet, you are determined,
To marry this Count Lady,
Zen. Marry him Rutillio?
Rut. Marry him, and lye with him I meane,
Zeno. You cannot meane that,
If you be a true Gentleman, you dare not,
The brother to this man, and one that loves him;
I'le marry the Devill firſt
Rut. A better choice
And lay his hornes by a hanſomer bedfellow,
A cooler o' my conſcience
Arn. Pray let me aske you;
And my deare Miſtris, be not angry with me
For what I ſhall propound, I am confident,

No

No promiſe, nor no power, can force your love,
I meane in way of marriage, never ſtirr you,
Nor to forget my faith, no ſtate can wound you.
But for this cuſtome, which this wretched country
Hath wrought into a law, and muſt be ſatisfied;
Where all the pleas of honour, are but laughed at,
And modeſty regarded as a may-game,
What ſhall be here conſidered? power we have none,
To make reſiſtance, nor policie to croſſe it:
'Tis held religion too, to pay this duty.
Zeno. I'le dye an Atheiſt then.
Arn. My nobleſt Miſtris
Not that I wiſh it ſo, but ſay it were ſo,
Say you did render up, part of your honour,
For whilſt your will is cleare, all cannot periſh;
Say for one night, you entertained this monſter
Should I eſteeme you worſe, forc'd to this render?
Your minde I know is pure, and full as beautepus;
After this ſhort eclipſe, you would riſe againe
And ſhaking of that cloud, ſpred all your luſtre
Zeno. Who made you witty, to undoe your ſelfe, Sir?
Or are you loden, with the love I bring you;
And faine would fling that burthen on another?
Am I growne common in your eyes Arnoldo?
Old, or unworthy of your fellowſhip?
Dee thinke becauſe a woman, I muſt err,
And therefore rather wiſh that fall before hand
Coloured with cuſtome, not to be reſiſted?
Dee love as painters doe, onely ſome peices
Some certaine handſome touches of your Miſtris,
And let the minde paſſe by you, unexamined?
Be not abuſd; with what the maiden veſſell
Is ſeaſond firſt, you underſtand the proverbe.
Rut. I am afraid, this thing will make me vertuous,
Zeno. Should you lay by the leaſt part of that love
Y'aue ſworne is mine, your youth & faith has given me,
To entertaine another, nay a fairer,
And make the caſe thus deſp'rate, ſhe muſt dye elſe;
D'ee thinke I would give way, or count this honeſt?
Be not deceiv'd, theſe eyes ſhould never ſee you more,
This tongue forget to name you, and this heart
Hate you, as if you were borne, my full Antipathie.
Empire and more imperious love, alone
Rule, and admit no rivalls, the pureſt ſprings
When they are courted by laſcivious land-floods,
Their maiden pureneſſe, and their cooleneſſe periſh.
And though they purge againſt to their firſt beauty,
The ſweetneſſe of their taſte, is cleane departed.
I muſt have all or none; and am not worthy
Longer the noble name of wife, Arnoldo,
Then I can bring a whole hart pure & handſom.
Arnol. I never ſhall deſerve you: not to thanke you;
You are ſo heavenly good, no man can reach you:
I am ſorrie I ſpake ſo raſhly, t'was but to try you.
Rut. You might have tryed a thouſnd women ſo, (ſell
And 900, fourſcore & 19 ſhould ha'followedy our coun-
Take heed o' clapping ſpurrs to ſuch free cattell,
Arn. We muſt bethinke us ſuddenly and conſtantly,
And wiſely too, we expect no common danger.
Zen. Be moſt aſſur'd, I'le dye firſt.

Enter Clodio and guard:

Rut. An't come to that once,
The Devill picke his bones, that dyes a coward
I'le jog along with you, here comes the Stallion
How ſmug he lookes upon the imagination
Of what he hopes to act? pox on your kidnes,
How they begin to melt? how big he beares
Sure he will leape before us all: what a ſweete company
Of rogues and panders, wait upon his lewdneſſe?
Plague of your chops, you ha' more handſome bitts,
Then a hundred honeſter men, and more deſerving
How the dogg leeres.
Clod. You need not now be jealous (done
I ſpeake at diſtance to your wife, but when the Preiſt has
We ſhall grow nearer, and more familiar.
Rut. I'le watch you for that tricke, baboone, I'le
Smoke you: the rogue ſwets, as if he had eaten
Graines, hee broyles, if I doe come to the Baſting of you.
Arno. Your Lordſhip.
May happily ſpeake this, to fright a ſtranger,
But 'tis not in your honour, to performe it;
The cuſtome of this place, if ſuch there be,
At beſt moſt damnable, may vrge you to it,
But if you be an honeſt man you hate it,
How ever I will preſently prepare
To make her mine, and moſt undovbtedlye;
Beleeve you are abus'd, this cuſtome fain'd to,
And what you now pretend, moſt faire and vertuous.
Clod. Goe and beleeve, a good beleife does well Sir;
And you Sir, cleare the place, but leave her here.
Arn. Your Lordſhips pleaſure
Clod. That anon Arnoldo,
This is but talke
Rut. Shall we goe off?
Arn. By any meanes
I know ſhe has pious thoughts enough to guard her:
Beſides, heres nothing due to him till the tye be done
Nor dare he offer.
Rut. Now doe I long to worry him:
Pray have a care to the main chance. Ex. Arn.
Zen. Pray Sir feare not and Rut.
Clod. Now, what ſay you to me?
Zen. Sir it becomes
The modeſtie, that maides are ever borne with,
To uſe few words.
Clod. Doe you ſee nothing in me
Nothing to catch your eyes nothing of wonder,
The common mould of men, come ſhort, and want in?
Doe you read no future fortune for your ſelfe here?
And what a happineſſe, it may be to you,
To have him honour you, all women aime at?
To have him love you Lady, that man love you,
The beſt, and the moſt beauteous, have run mad for?
Looke and be wiſe, you have a favour offerd you
I doe not euery day propound to women;
You are a prettie one: and though each hower,
I am glutted, with the ſacrifice of beautie,
I may be brought, as you may handle it,
To caſt ſo good a grace and likeing on you,
You underſtand, come kiſſe me, and be joyfull,
I giue you leave.
Zen. Faith Sir, twill not ſhew handſome;
Our ſex his bluſhing, full of feare, unskild too,
In theſe alarums.
Clod. Learne then and be perfect
Zen. I doe beſeech your honour pardon me,
And take ſome skilfull one, can hold you play,
I am a foole.
Clod. I tell thee maide I love thee,
Let that word make thee happie, ſo farr love thee,
That though I may enjoy thee without ceremony,
I will deſcend ſo lowe, to marry thee,
Me thinkes I ſee the race, that ſhall ſpring from us,
Some Princes, ſome great Souldiers
Zen. I am afraid.

Your honours couzen'd in this calculation;
For certaine, I shall nere haue a child by you.
Clod. Why?
Zen. Because I must not thinke to marry you,
I dare not Sir, the step betwixt your honour,
And my poore humble State.
Clod. I will descend to thee,
And buoye thee up.
Zen. I'le sinke to th' Center first, (sure,
Why would your Lordship marry, and confine that plea-
You ever have had freely cast upon you?
Take heed my Lord this marring is a mad matter,
Lighter a paire of sheckles will hang on you,
And quieter a quartaine feaver finde you
If you wed me I must enjoy you onely,
Your eyes must be cald home, your thoughts in cages,
To sing to no cares then but mine; your hart bound
The custome, that your youth was euer nurst in,
Must be forgot, I shall forget my duty else,
And how that will appeare,
Clod. Woe'le talke of that more
Zen. Besides I tell yee, I am naturally,
As all young women are, that shew like handsome,
Exceeding proud, being cõmended, monstrous Boy ready
Of an unquiet temper, seldome pleas'd. for the
Unlesse it be with infinite obseruance. Songs
Which you were never bred to, once well angered,
As every crosse in us, prouokes that passion,
And like a Sea, I roule, tosse, and chafe a weeke after.
And then all mischiefe I can think upon,
Abusing of your bed the least and poorest,
I tell you what you'le finde, and in these fits,
This little beauty, you are pleased to honour,
Will be so chang'd, so alterd to an ugliness,
To such a vizard, ten to one, I dye too,
Take't then upon my death you murdered me,
Clod. Away, away fool, why dost thou proclaime these
To prevent that in me, thou hast chosen in another
Zen. Him I have chosen, I can rule and master,
Temper to what I please, you are a great one
Of a strong will to bend, I dare not venture,
Be wise my Lord, and say you were well counseld,
Take mony for my ransome, and forget me,
Twill be both safe, and noble for your honour,
And whersoeuer my fortunes shall conduct me,
So worthy mentions I shall render of you
So vertuous and so faire.
Clod. You will not marry me:
Zen. I doe beseech your honour, be not angry
At what I say, I cannot love yee, dare not;
But such a ransome, for the flowre you covet
Clod. No money, nor no prayers, shall redeeme that,
Not all the art you have
Zen. Set your owne price Sir.
Clod. Goe to your wedding, neuer kneel to me
When that's done, you are mine, I will enjoy you:
Your teares do nothing, I will not loose my custome
To cast upon my selfe an Empires fortune (Exit.
Zen. My minde shall not pay this custome, cruel man
Clod. Your body wil content me: I'le look for you, Ex.
Enter Charino and seruants in blackes. Couering
the place with blackes. (sweets
Char. Strew all your withered flowers, your Autumn
By the hot Sun, raviſht of bud and beauty
Thus round about her Bride-bed hang those blacks ther
The emblemes of her honour lost; all joy Bowle of
That leades a Virgin to receive her Lover, wine ready.
Keepe from this place all fellow-maides that blesse her,
And blushing and unloose her Zone, keep from her:
No merry noise nor lusty songs be heard here,
Nor ful cups crownd with wine, make the rooms giddy;
This is no masque of mirth, but murdered honour.
Sing mournfully that sad Epithalamion,
I gave thee now: and prethee let thy Lute weepe.
Song, Dance. Enter Rutillio. (a wedding?
Rut. How now, what livery's this? doe you call this
This is more like a funerall.
Char. It is one,
And my poor Daughter going to her grave,
To his most loth'd embraces that gapes for her.
Make the Earles bed ready, is the marriage done Sir?
Rut. Yes they are knit; but must this flubberdegullion
Have her maiden-head now?
Arn. Theres no avoyding it?
Rut. And there's the scaffold where she must loose it.
Arn. The bed sir?
Rut. No way to wipe his mouldy chaps?
Char. That we know
Rut. To any honest wel-deserving fellow,
And 'twere but to a merry Cobler, I could sit still now,
I love the game so well, but that this puckfist,
This universall rutter, fare ye well Sir;
And if you have any good prayers, put 'em forward,
There may be yet a remedy.
Char. I wish it, Exit Ru.
And all my best devotions offer to it.
Enter Clodio and Guard.
Clod. Now is this rye dispatch'd?
Char. I thinke it be Sir,
Clod. And my bed ready? wine
Char. There you may quickly find Sir,
Such a loth'd preparation.
Clod. Never grumble,
Nor fling a discontent upon my pleasure
It must and shall be done: give me some wine,
And fill it till it leape upon my lips:
Here's to the foolish maidenhead you wot of,
The toy I must take paines for
Char. I beseech your Lord-ship
Load not a Fathers love,
Clod. Pledge it Charino,
Or by my life I'le make thee pledge thy last
And be sure she be a maid, a perfect Virgin,
(I will not have my expectation dul'd)
Or your old pate goes off. I am hot and fiery
And my bloud beates alarums through my body
And fancie high. You of my guard retire,
And let me heare no noyse about the lodging
But musick and sweet ayres, now fetch your daughter,
And bid the coy wench put on all her beauties,
All her enticements, out-blush damask roses,
And dim the breaking East with her bright Christalls.
I am all on fire, away
Char. And I am frozen. Exit.
Enter Zenocia with Bow and Quiver, an Arrow bent,
Arnoldo and Rutillio after her, arm'd.
Zen. Come feareless on
Rut. Nay an I budge from thee
Beate me with durty sticks.
Clod. What Masque is this?
What pretty fancy to provoke me high?
The beauteous Huntresse, fairer far, and sweeter;
Diana shewes an Ethiop to this beauty
Protected by two Virgin Knights.
Rut. That's a lye,
A loud one, if you knew as much as I doe

The

The guard's dispers'd
Arn. Fortune I hope invites us
Clod. I can no longer hold, she pulls my heart from me
Zen. Stand, & stand fast, move not a foote, nor speak not,
For if thou dost upon this point thy death sits.
Thou miserable, base, and sordid lecher,
Thou scum of noble blood, repent and speedily,
Repent thy thousand thefts, from helplesse virgins,
Their innocence betrayed to thy embraces.
Arn. The base dishonour, that thou dost to strangers,
In glorying to abuse the lawes of marriage,
Thy Infamy thou hast flung upon thy countrey,
In nourishing this black and barbarous custome
Clod. My guard.
Arn. One word more, and thou diest.
Rut. One syllable
That tends to any thing, but I beseech you,
And as y'are Gentlemen tender my case,
And I'le thrust my javeling downe thy throate
Thou Dogg-whelpe, thou, pox upon thee, what Should I call the? Pompean,
Thou kisse my Lady? thou scowr her chamber pot:
Thou have a mayden head? a mottly coate,
You great blinde foole, farewell and be hanged to yee,
Loose no time Lady.
Arn. Pray take your pleasure Sir,
And so wee'l take our leaves
Zen. We are determined,
Dye, before yield
Arn. Honour, and a faire grave
Zen. Before a lustfull bed, so for our fortunes.
Rut. Do cat a wbes, good count, cry, prethee cry,
O what a wench hast thou lost? cry you great booby. Exeunt

Enter Charino.

Clod. And is she gone then, am I dishonoured thus
Cozend and baffuld my guard there no man answer?
My guard I say, Sirra you knew of this plott.
Where are my guard? Ile ha' your life you villaine.
Char. You politique old th fox.
Heaven send her far enough Enter Guard.
And let me paye the ransome.
Guard. Did your honour call us?
Clod. Post every way, and presently recover,
The two strange Gentlemen, and the faire Lady,
Guard. This day was married Sir.
Clod. The same.
Guard. We saw e'en
Making with all maine speed to'th port.
Clod. Away villains. Ex. Gard:
Recover her, or I shall dye; deale truely,
Didst not thou know,
Char. By all thats good I did not
If your honour meane their flight, to say I grieve for that,
Will be to lye; you may handle me as you please.
Clod. Be sure, with all the cruelty, with all the rigor,
For thou hast robd mee villaine of a treasure.

Enter Guard.

How now?
Guard. They'r all aboord, a bark rode ready for 'em,
And now are under sayle and past recovery
Clod. Rig me a ship with all the speed that may be,
I will not loose her: thou her most false Father,
Shalt go along; and if I misse her, heare me,
Whole day will I studie to destroy thee.
Char. I shall be joyfull of it; and so you'll finde me.
Ex. omnes.

Actus Secundus. Scena prima.

Enter Manuell du Sosa. and Guiomar.

Man. I heare, and see, too much of him, and that
Compells me Madam, though unwillingly,
To wish I had no uncles part in him,
And much I feare, the comfort of a Son
You will not long enjoy.
Gui. 'Tis not my fault,
And therefore from his guilt my innocence
Cannot be taynted, since his Fathers death
(Peace to his soule) a Mothers prayers and care,
Were never wanting, in his education.
His child-hood I passe, as being brought up
Under my wing; and growing ripe for study,
I overcame the tenderness, and joye
I had to looke upon him, and provided
The choicest Masters, and of greatest name
Of Salamanca, in all liberall Arts.
Man. To train his youth up.
I must witnesse that.
Guio. How there he prospered, to the admiration,
Of all that knew him, for a generall scholler,
Being one of note, before he was a man,
Is still remembred in that Academy,
From thence I sent him to the Emperours court,
Attended like his Fathers Sonne and there
Maintaind him, in such bravery and height,
As did become a courtier. hapy
Man. 'Twas that spoild him, my Nephew had b ene
The court's a schoole indeed, in which some few
Learne vertuous principles, but most forget,
What ever they brought thither good and honest.
Trifling is there in practice, serious actions,
Are obsolete and out of use, my Nephew
Had beene a happy man, had he ne're knowne
What's there in grace, and fashion.
Guio. I have heard yet,
That while he liv'd in court, the Emperour
Tooke notice of his carriage and good parts,
The grandees did not scorne his compan y,
And of the greatest Ladies he was held,
A compleate Gentleman.
Man. He indeed daunc'd well,
A turne o'th toe, with a loftie tricke or two,
To argue nimblenesse, and a strong backe,
Will go farr with a Madam: 'tis most true,
That hee's an excellent scholler, and he knowes it;
An exact courtier, and he knowes that too;
He has fought thrice, and come off still with honour,
Which he forgets not
Guio. Nor I have much reason.
To greive his fortune that way,
Man. You are mistaken,
Prosperity does search a Gentlemans temper,
More then his adverse fortune: I have knowen
Many, and of rare parts from their successe
In private duells, rais'd up to such a pride,
And so transformed from what they were, that all
That lov'd them truely, wish'd they had fallen in them.
I need not write examples, in your sone,
'Tis too apparent; for are Don Duarte,
Made tryall of his valour, he indeed was
Admired for civill courtesy, but now
Hee's swolne so high, out of his owne assurance,
Of what he dares do, that he seekes occasions,

Unjust

Unjuſt occaſions, grounded on blinde paſſion,
Ever to be in quarrels, and this makes him
Shund of all faire ſocieties.
Guio. Would it were
In my weake power to help it: I will uſe
With my entreaties th' authority of a mother,
As you may of an Vncle, and enlarge it
With your command, as being a governor
To the great King in Lisborne.
Enter Duarte and his Page.
Man. Here he comes.
We are unſeene, obſerve him.
Dua. Boye
Page. My Lord.
Dua. What ſaith the ſpaniſh captaine that I ſtrooke,
To my bold challenge?
Page. He refuſ'd to read it.
Dua. Why didſt not leave it there?
Page. I did my Lord,
But to no purpoſe, for he ſeemes more willing
To ſit downe with the wrongs, then to repaire
His honour by the ſword; he knowes too well,
That from your Lordſhip nothing can be got
But more blowes, and diſgraces.
Dua. Hee's a wretch,
A miſerable wretch, and all my furie
Is loſt upon him; holds the maſque, appointed
Ith' honour of Hippolita:
Page. 'Tis broke off.
Dua. The reaſon?
Page. This was one, they heard your Lordſhip
Was by the Ladies choiſe to lead the dance;
And therefore they, too well aſſur'd how farr
You would out ſhine e'm, gave it ore and ſaied
They would not ſerve for foiles to ſet you off.
Dua. They at their beſt are ſuch, and ever ſhall be
Where I appeare.
Man. Doe you note his modeſtie?
Dua. But was there nothing elſe pretended?
Page. Yes,
Young Don Alonzo, the great Captaines Nephew,
Stood on compariſons.
Dua. With whom?
Page. With you,
And openly profeſs'd, that all precedence,
His birth and ſtate conſidered, was due to him
Nor were your Lordſhip to contend with one
So farr above you.
Dua. I looke downe upon him
With ſuch contempt and ſcorne, as on my ſlave,
Hee's a name onely, and all good in him,
He muſt derive, from his great grandſires aſhes,
For had not their victorious acts bequeath'd,
His titles to him, and wrot on his forehead,
This is a Lord, he had liv'd unobſerv'd
By any man of marke, and died as one
Among the common route, compaire with me?
'Tis giant-like ambition; I know him,
And know my ſelfe, that man is truely noble,
And he may juſtly call that worth his owne,
Which his deſerts have purchac'd, I could wiſh
My birth were more obſcure, my freinds and kinſmen
Of leſſer power, or that my provident Father,
Had been like to that riotous Emperour
That choſe his belly for his onely heire;
For being of no family then, and poore
My vertues whereſo'er I liv'd, ſhould make
That kingedome my inheritance.
Guio. Strange ſelfe love
Dua. For if I ſtudied the countries lawes,
I ſhould ſo eaſily, ſound all their depth,
And riſe up ſuch a wonder, that the pleaders,
That now are in moſt practice, and eſteeme
Should ſtarve for want of clients: If I traveld,
Like wiſe Vlyſſes to ſee men and manners,
I would returne in act, more knowing, then
Homer could fancie him; If a Phyſitian,
So oft I would reſtore death wounded men,
That where I liv'd, Gallen ſhould not be nam'd,
And he that joyn'd againe the ſcatterd limbs
Of torne Hippolitus ſhould be forgotten.
I could teach Ovid courtſhip, how to win,
A Julia, and enjoy her, though her dower
Were all the Sun gives light to: and for armes
Were the Perſian hoſt that drank up Rivers, added
To the Turkes preſent powers, I could direct,
Command, and marſhall them.
Man. And yet you know not
To rule your ſelfe, you would not to a boy elſe
Like Plautus Braggart boaſt thus.
Dua. All I ſpeake,
In act I can make good,
Guio. Why then being Maſter,
Of ſuch and ſo good parts doe you deſtroy them,
With ſelfe opinion or like a rich miſer,
Hoard up the treaſures you poſſeſs, imparting,
Nor to your ſelfe nor others, the uſe of them?
They are to you, but like inchanted viands,
On which you ſeeme to feed, yet pine with hunger;
And thoſe ſo rare perfections in my ſon
Which would make others happy, renders me
A wretched Mother,
Man. You are too inſolent.
And thoſe too many excellencies, that feed
Your pride, turne to a plurify, and kill
That which ſhould nouriſh vertue; dare you think
All bleſſings are conferd on you alone.
Ya're groſly couſend; there's no good in you,
Which others have not: are you a Scholler? ſo
Are many, and as knowing: are you valiant?
Waſte not that courage then in braules, but ſpend it
In the warres, in ſervice of your King and Countrey.
Duarte. Yes, ſo I might be generall, no man lives,
That's worthy to command me
Man. Sir, in Lisborne
I am: and you ſhall know it; every hower
I am troubled with complaints of your behaviour
From men of all conditions, and all ſexes.
And my authority, which you preſume
Will beare you out, in that you are my Nephew,
No longer ſhall protect you, for I vowe
Though all that's paſt I pardon, I will puniſh
The next fault with as much ſeverity
As if you were a ſtranger, reſt aſſur'd on't.
Guio. And by that love you ſhould beare, or that duty
You owe a Mother, once more I command you
To caſt this hautineſſe off; which if you doe,
All that is mine, is yours, if not, expect
My prayers, and vowes, for your converſion onely,
But never meanes nor favour. Exit. Manuell and Guiomar.
Dua. I am tutord
As I if I were a child ſtill, the baſe peaſants
That feare, and envy my great worth, have done this;
But I will finde them out, I will aboord
Yet my diſguiſe, I have too long been idle
Nor will I curbe my ſpirit, I was borne free,

And

And will pursue the course best liketh me. Exeunt.

Enter Leopold, Sailors, and Zenocia.

Leop. Devide the spoile amongst you, this fair captive
I only challenge for my selfe.
Sail. You have wonne her
And well deserve her: twenty yeares I have liv'd
A Burgesse of the Sea, and have been present
At many a desperate fight, but never saw
So small a barque with such incredible valour
So long defended, and against such odds;
And by two men scarce arm'd too.
Leop. 'Twas a wonder.
And yet the courage they expresst being taken
And the contempt of death wan more upon me
Then all they did, when they were free: me thinkes
I see them yet when they were brought aboord us,
Disarm'd and ready to be put in fetters
How on the suddain, as if they had sworn,
Never to taste the bread of servitude,
Both snatching up their swords, and from this Virgin,
Taking a farewell only with their eyes,
They leapt into the Sea.
Sail. Indeed 'twas rare.
Leop. It wrought so much on me, that but I feard,
The great ship that pursued us, our own safety
Hindring my charitable purpose to 'em,
I would have took 'em up, and with their lives
They should have had their liberties.
Zen. O too late
For they are lost, for ever lost
Leop. Take comfort
'Tis not impossible, but that they live yet,
For when they left the ships they were within
A league o'th shore, and with such strength and cunning
They swimming, did delude the rising billows,
With one hand making way, and with the other,
Their bloudy swords advanst, threatning the Sea-gods
With war, unlesse they brought them safely off,
That I am almost confident they live
And you again may see them.
Zen. In that hope
I brook a wretched being, till I am
Made certaine of their fortunes, but they dead
Death hath so many doores to let out life,
I will not long survive them.
Leop. Hope the best,
And let the courteous usage you have found,
Not usuall in men of Warre perswade you
To tell me your condition.
Zen. You know it,
A Captive, my fate and your power have made me,
Such I am now, but what I was it skills not:
For they being dead, in whom I only live
I dare not challenge family, or country
And therefore Sir enquire not, let it suffice,
I am your servant, and a thankfull servant,
(If you will call that so, which is but duty)
I ever will be, and my honour safe,
Which nobly hitherto ye have preserv'd
No slavery can appear in such a forme,
Which with a masculine constancy, I will not
Boldly looke on and suffer.
Leop. You mistake me:
That you are made my prisoner, may prove
The birth of your good fortune. I doe finde
A winning language in your tongue and looks;
Nor can a suite by you mov'd be deni'd,
And therefore of a prisoner you must be
The Victors advocate
Zen. To whom?
Leop. A Lady.
In whom all graces that can perfect beauty
Are friendly met, I grant that you are faire:
And had I not seen her before, perhaps
I might have fought to you
Zen. This I heare gladly,
Leop. To this incomparable Lady I will give you,
(Yet being mine, you are already here)
And to serve her is more then to be free,
At least I think so: and when you live with her,
If you will please to think on him that brought you
To such a happinesse, for so her bountie
Will make you think her service, you shall ever
Make me at your devotion
Zen. All I can doe,
Rest you assur'd of.
Leop. At night I'le present you,
Till when I am your guard
Zen. Ever your servant. Exeunt.

Enter Arnoldo and Rutillio.

Arn. To what are we reserv'd?
Rut. Truth tis uncertaine,
Drowning we have scap'd miraculously, and
Stand faire for ought I know for hanging; money
We have none, nor ere are like to have; 'tis
To be doubted: besides we are strangers,
Wondrous hungry strangers; and charity
Growing cold, and miracles ceasing,
Without a Conjurers help, cannot finde
When we shall eate agen.
Arn. These are no wants
If put in ballance, with Zenocias losse;
In that alone, all miseries are spoken:
O my Rutillio, when I think on her,
And that which she may suffer, being a captive,
Then I could curse my selfe, almost those powers
That send me from the fury of the Ocean.
Rut. You have lost a wife indeed, a faire and chast one,
Two blessings, not found often in one woman;
But she may be recovered, questionlesse
The ship that took us was of Portugall
And he in Lisbon, by some meanes or other
We may heare of her.
Arn. In that hope I live.
Rut. And so do I, but hope is a poor sallad
To dine and sup with, after a two dayes fast too,
Have you no money left?
Arn. Not a Denier,
Rut. Nor any thing to pawn? 'tis now in fashion,
Having a Mistris, sure you should not be
Without a neate historicall shirt.
Arn. For shame
Talke not so poorly.
I must talke of that
Necessity prompts us to, for beg I cannot,
Nor am I made to creep in at a window,
To filch to feed me, something must be done,
And suddenly resolve on't.

Enter Zabulon and a servant.

Arn. What are these?
Rut. One by his habite is a Jew
Zab. No more:
Thou art sure that's he
Ser. Most certaine.
Zab. How long is it
Since first she saw him?

Ser. Some

Ser. Some two hours. Exit Ser.
Zab. Be gone——let me alone to work him.
Rut. How he eyes you,
Now he moves, towards us, in the Devills name
What would he with us?
Arn. Innocence is bold:
Nor can I feare
Zab. That you are poore and ſtrangers,
I eaſily perceive
Rut. But that you'le help us,
Or any of your tribe, we dare not hope Sir.
Zab. Why think you ſo?
Rut. Becauſe you are a Jew Sir,
And courteſies come ſooner from the Devill
Then any of your Nation.
Zab. We are men,
And have like you, compaſſion when we finde
Fit ſubjects for our bounty, and for proofe
That we dare give, and freely, not to you Sir,
Pray ſpare your paines, there's gold, ſtand not amaz'd,
'Tis current I aſſure you
Rut. Take it man.
Sure thy good Angel is a Jew, and comes Tapers
In his own ſhape to help thee: I could wiſh now, ready.
Mine would appeare ſo, like a Turke.
Arn. I thank you,
But yet muſt tell you, if this be the prologue
To any bad act, you would have me practice
I muſt not take it.
Zab. This is but the earneſt
Of that which is to follow, and the bond
Which you muſt ſeale to for't, is your advancement,
Fortune with all that's in her power to give,
Offers her ſelfe up to you; entertaine her,
And that which Princes have kneel'd for in vaine
Preſents it ſelfe to you.
Arn. 'Tis above wonder
Rut. But far beneath the truth, in my relation
Of what you ſhall poſſeſſe, if you embrace it.
There is an hour in each mans life appointed
To make his happineſſe if then he ſeize it,
And this, (in which, beyond all expectation,
You are invited to your good) is yours,
If you dare follow me, ſo, if not, hereafter
Expect not the like offer. Exit.
Arn. 'Tis no viſion.
Rut. 'Tis gold I'm ſure. We muſt like brothers ſhare,
There's for you; by this light I'me glad I have it.
There are few gallants, (for men may be ſuch
And yet want gold, yea and ſometimes ſilver,)
But would receive ſuch favours from the Divel,
Though he appeared like a broker, and demanded
Sixty ith' hundred.
Arn. Wherefore ſhould I feare,
Some plot upon my life? 'tis now to me
Not worth the keeping. I will follow him,
Farewell, wiſh me good fortune, we ſhall meete
Againe I doubt not.
Rut. Or I'le ne're truſt Jew more. Exit Arnoldo.
Nor Chriſtian for his ſake—— plague o' my ſtars,
How long might I have walkt without a cloake,
Before I ſhould have met with ſuch a fortune?
We elder Brothers, though we are proper men,
Ha not the luck. Ha' too much beard, that ſpoiles us;
The ſmooth chin carries all? whats here to do now?
Manet Rutillio.
Enter Duart, Alonſo, and a Page.
Dua. I'le take you as I finde you:
Alon. That were baſe——you ſee I am unarm'd.
Dua. Out with your bodkin
Your pocket dagger, your ſtiletto, out with it,
Or by this hand i'le kill you: ſuch as you are
Have ſtudied the undoing of poore Cutlers,
And made all manly weapons out of faſhion:
You carry Poniards to murder men,
Yet dare not wear a ſword to guard your Honour.
Rut. that's true indeed: upon my life this gallant
Is brib'd to repeale baniſht ſwords.
Dua. I'le ſhew you
The difference now, between a Spaniſh rapier
And your pure piſa.
Alon. Let me fetch a ſword,
Upon mine honour I'le returne.
Dua. Not ſo Sir.
Alon. Or lend me yours I pray you, and take this,
Rut. To be diſgrac'd as you are, no I thank you
Spight of the faſhion, while I live, I am Lights
Inſtructed to goe arm'd: what folly 'tis ready.
For you that are a man, to put your ſelfe
Into your enemies mercie.
Dua. Yield it quickly
Or I'le cut off your hand, and now diſgrace you,
Thus kicke and baffle you: as you like this
You may again prefer complaints againſt me
To my Uncle and my Mother, and then think
To make it good with a poniard.
Alon. I am paid
For being of the faſhion.
Dua. Get a ſword,
Then if you dare, redeeme your reputation:
You know I am eaſily found: Ile adde this to it
To put you in mind.
Rut. You are too inſolent,
And do inſult too much on the advantage,
Of that which your unequall weapon gave you,
More then your valour.
Dua. This to me you peaſant?
Thou art not worthy of my ſteele poore fellow,
Tis ſcorne, not pitty, makes me give thee life:
Kneele down and thank me for't: how, do you ſtare?
Rut. I have a ſword Sir, you ſhall finde, a good one;
This is no ſtabbing guard.
Dua. Wert thou thrice arm'd,
Thus yet I durſt attempt thee.
Rut. Then have at you,
I ſcorne to take blows.
Dua. O I am ſlaine.
Page. Help! murther, murther!
Alon. Shift for your ſelfe you are dead elſe,
You have kill'd the Governours Nephew.
Page. Raiſe the ſtreetes there.
Alon. If once you are beſet you cannot ſcape,
Will you betray your ſelfe?
Rut. Undone for ever. Exit Rut. & Alonzo.
Enter Officers.
Off. Who makes this out-cry,
Page. O my Lord is murdered;
This way he tooke, make after him,
Help help there. Exit Page.
2. Off. 'Tis Don Duart.
1. Off. Pride has got a fall
He was ſtill in quarrels, ſcorn'd us Peace-makers,
And all our bill-authority, now ha's paid for't.
You ha' met with your match Sir now, bring off his body
And beare it to the Governour. Some purſue
The murderer; yeaif he ſcape, it ſkills not;

Were

Were I a Prince, I would reward him for't,
He ha's ridde the City of a turbulent beast,
There's few will pitty him: but for his Mother
I truly grieve indeed, (hee's a good Lady. Exeunt.

Enter Guiomar and Servants.

Guio. Hee's not i'th house,
Ser. No madam:
Guio. Haste and seek him,
Goe all and every where, I'le not to bed
Till you returne him, take away the lights too,
The Moone lends me too much, to finde my feares,
And those devotions I am to pay
Are written in my heart, not in this booke, Kneele.
And I shall reade them there without a taper, Exit Serv.

Enter Rutillio.

Rut. I am pursued; all the Ports are stopt too;
Not any hope to escape, behind, before me,
On either side I am beset, curst fortune
My enemie on the Sea, and on the Land too,
Redeem'd from one affliction to another:
Would I had made the greedy waves my tombe
And dyed obscure, and innocent, not as Nerse (me?
Smear'd ore with blood. Whither have my fears brought
I am got into a house, the doors all open,
This, by the largenesse of the roome, the hangings,
And other rich adornments, glittring through
The sable masque of night, sayes it belongs
To one of meanes and ranke: no servant stirring?
Murmur nor whisper?
Guio. Who's that?
Rut. By the voice,
This is a woman.
Guio. Stephano, Jaspe, Julia,
Who waites there?
Rut. 'Tis the Lady of the house
I'le flie to her protection.
Guio. Speak, what are you?
Rut. Of all that ever breath'd, a man most wretched.
Guio. I am sure you are a man of most ill manners,
You could not with so little reverence else
Presse to my private chamber. Whither would you,
Or what do you seeke for?
Rut. Gracious woman heare me;
I am a stranger, and in that I answer
All your demands, a most unfortunate stranger,
That cald unto it by my enemies pride,
Have left him dead i'th streets, Justice pursues me,
And for that life, I tooke unwillingly,
And in a faire defence, I must lose mine,
Unlesse you in your charity protect me.
Your house is now my sanctuary, and the Altar,
I gladly would take hold of your Graces mercy
By all that's deare unto you, by your vertues,
And by your innocence, that needs no forgivenesse
Take pitty on me.
Guio. Are you a Castillian?
Rut. No Madam, Italy claims my birth.
Guio. I ask not
With purpose to betray you, if you were
Ten thousand times a Spaniard, the nation
We Portugals most hate, I yet would save you
If it lay in my power: lift up these hangings,
Behind my Beds head theres a hollow place,
Into which enter; so, but from this stir not
If the Officers come, as you expect they will doe,
I know they owe such reverence to my lodgings
That they will easily give credit to me
And search no further.

Rut. The blest Saints pay for me
The infinite debt I owe you.
Guio. How he quakes?
Thus far I feele his heart beate, be of comfort,
Once more I give my promise for your safety,
All men are subject to such accidents,
Especially the valiant; and who knows not,
But that the charity I afford this stranger
My only Son else-where may stand in neede of?

Enter Officers and servants with the body of Duart—Page.

1 Ser. Now Madam, if your wisedome ever could Raise up defences against floods of sorrow
That hast to overwhelme you, make true use of
Your great discretion.
2 Ser. Your only sonne
My Lord Duart's slaine.
1 Off. His murtherer, pursued by us
Was by a boy discovered
Entring your house, and that induced us
To presse into it for his apprhension.
Guio. Oh?
1 Ser. Sure her heart is broke.
Off. Madam.
Guio. Stand off,
My sorrow is so deare and pretious to me,
That you must not partake it, suffer it Hold a purse
Like wounds that do breed inward to dispatch me. ready.
O my Duart, such an end as this
Thy pride long since did prophesie; thou art dead,
And to encrease my misery, thy sad mother?
Must make a wilfull shipwrack of her vow
Or thou fall unreveng'd. My soule's divided
And piety to a son, and true performance
Of hospitable duties to my guest,
That are to others Angels, are my furies,
Vengeance knocks at my heart, but my word given
Denies the entrance, is no medium left,
But that I must protect the murderer
Or suffer in that faith he made his Altar?
Motherly love give place, the fault made this way,
To keep a vow, to which high heaven is witnesse,
Heaven may be pleas'd to pardon.

Enter Manuel, Doctors, Surgeons.

Man. 'Tis too late
Hee's gone, past all recovery: now reproofe
Were but unseasonable when I should give comfort,
And yet remember Sister.
Guio. O forbeare,
Search for the murtherer, and remove the body,
And as you thinke fit, give it buriall.
Wretch that I am, uncapable of all comfort,
And therefore I intreate my friends and kinsfolk,
And you my Lord, for some spare to forbeare
Your courteous visitations.
Man. We obey you. Exeunt omnes, with the body.

Manet Guiomar.

Rut. My spirits come back, and now despaire resignes
Her place againe to hope.
Guio. What ere thou art
To whom I have given meanes of life, to witnesse
With what religion I have kept my promise,
Come fearlesse forth, but let thy face be cover'd,
That I hereafter be not forc't to know thee,
For motherly affection may returne
My vow once paid to heaven. Thou hast taken from me,
The respiration of my heart, the light
Of my swolne eyes, in his life that sustain'd me:
Yet my word given to save you, I make good,

Because what you did, was not done with malice,
You are not knowne, there is no marke about you
That can discover you; let not feare betray you.
With all convenient speed you can, flie from me
That I may never see you; and that want
Of meanes may be no let unto your journie,
There are a hundred Crownes: you are at the doore now,
And so farewell for ever.
Rut. Let me first fall
Before your feete, and on them pay the duty
I owe your goodnesse; next all blessings to you,
And heaven restore the joyes I have bereft you,
With full increase hereafter, living be
The Goddesse stil'd of Hospitalitie.

Actus Tertius. Scæna Prima.

Enter Leopold. and Zenocia.

Leo. Fling off these sullen cloudes, you are enterd now
Into a house of joy and hapinesse,
I have prepar'd a blessing for ye.
Zen. Thanke ye
Leo. You are peevish
And know not whe ye are freinded, I have ul'd thoseмeans
My state would rather aske a curse,
The Lady of this house, the noble Lady,
Will take ye as her owne, and use ye graciously:
Make much of what you are, Mistris of that beautie,
And expose it not to such betraying sorrowes:
When ye are old, and all those sweets hang witherd,
Enter Servant.
Then sit and sight
Zen My Autum is not farr off,
Leo. Have you told your Lady
Ser. Yes Sir, I have told her
Both of your noble service, and your present,
Which she accepts,
Leo. I should be blest to see her.
Ser. That now you cannot doe: she keeps her Chamber
Not well dispos'd; and has denied all visits,
The maid I have in charge to receive from ye,
So please you render her.
Leo. With all my service,
But faine I would have seene,
Ser. 'Tis but your patience;
No doubt she cannot but remember nobely.
Leo. These three yeares I have lov'd this scornfull Lady,
And followed her with all the truth of service,
In all which time, but twice she has honoured me
With sight of her blest beauty: when you please Sir,
You may receive your charge, and tell your Lady;
A Gentleman whose life is onely dedicated,
To her commands, kisses her beauteous hands;
And Faire-one, now your helpe, you may remember
The honest courtesies, since you are mine
I ever did your modesty: you shall be neare her,
And if sometimes you name my service to her
And tell her with what noblenesse I love her,
'Twill be a gratitude I shall remember.
Zen. What in my poore power lyes, so it be honest,
Leo. I aske no more.
Ser. You must along with me (Faire)
Leo. And so I leave you two: but to a fortune
Too happy for my fate: you shall enjoy her.
Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda. Enter Zabulon and Servants.

Zab. Be quick, be quick, Out with the bucket there,
These sents are dull; cast richer on, and fuller;
Sente every place, where have you plas'd the musicke?
Ser. Here they stand ready Sir.
Zab. 'Tis well, be sure
The wines be lusty, high, and full of spirit,
And Amberd all.
Ser. They are
Zab. Give faire attendance.
In the best trim, and state, make ready all. (Banquet set forth
I shall come presently againe. Exit.
2. Ser. We shall Sir,
What preperation's this?
Some new devise
My Lady has in hand,
1. Ser. ô, prosper it
As long as it carries good wine in the mouth!
And good meate with it, where are all the rest
2. Ser. They are ready to attend.
Ser. Sure some great person, Musicke
They would not make this hurry else.
2. Ser. Harke the Musicke.
Enter Zabulon and Arnoldo.
It will appeare now certaine, here it comes.
Now to our places.
Ar. Whether will he lead me?
What invitations this? to what new end,
Are these faire preperations? a rich Banquet,
Musicke, and every place stuck with adornment,
Fit for a Princes welcome; what new game
Has Fortune now prepared to shew me happie?
And then againe to sink me? 'tis no illusion.
Mine eyes are not deceiv'd, all these are reall;
What wealth and State?
Zab. Will you sit downe and eate Sir?
These carry little wonder, they are usuall;
But you shall see, if you be wise to observe it,
That that will strike indeed: strike with amazement,
Then if you be a man: this faire health to you.
Ar. What shall I see? I pledge ye Sir, I was never
So buried in amazement—
Zab. You are so still
Drinke freely.
Ar. The very wines are admirable:
Good Sir, give me leave to aske this question,
For what great worthy man, are these prepard?
And why do you bring me hither?
Zab. They are for you, Sir;
And under-vallve not the worth you carry,
You are that worthy man: thinke well of these.
They shall be more, and greater.
Ar. Well, blinde fortune
Thou hast the prettiest changes when thou art pleas'd,
To play thy game out wantonly—
Zab. Come be lusty
And awake your Spirits. Cease Musick
Ar. Good Sir, do not wake me. (Servants
For willingly I would dye in this dreame, pray whose
Are all these that attend her?
Zab They are yours,
They wait on you,
Ar. I never yet remember
I kept such faces, nor that I was ever able
To maintaine so many.
Zab. Now you are, and shall be,
Ar. You'l say this house is mine too?
Zab. Say it? sweare it.

Ar. And

Ar. And all this wealth?
Zab. This is the leaſt you ſee Sir.
Ar. Why, where has this been hid theſe thirtie yeares?
For certainely I never found I was wealthie
Till this hower, never dream'd of houſe, and Servants,
I had thought I had been a younger brother, a poore Gent.
I may eat boldly then.
Zab. 'Tis prepared for ye.
Ar. The taſte is perfect, and moſt delicate:
But why for me? give me ſome wine, I do drink;
I feele it ſenſibly, and I am here,
Here in this glorious place: I am bravely uſed too,
Good Gentle Sir, give me leave to thinke a little
For either I am much abus'd——
Zab. Strike Muſick
And ſing that luſty Song. Muſick Song.
Ar. Bewitching harmony!
Sure I am turn'd into another Creature.
Enter Hyppolita.
Happy and bleſt, Arnoldo was unfortunate;
Ha? bleſſe mine eyes; what pretious piece of nature
To poze the world?
Zab. I told you, you would ſee that,
Would darken theſe poore preparations;
What think ye now? nay riſe not, 'tis no viſion.
Ar. Tis more: 'tis miracle.
Hyp. You are welcome Sir.
Ar. It ſpeakes, and entertaines me ſtill more glorious;
She is warme, and this is fleſh here: how ſhe ſtirs me.
Bleſſe me what ſtars are there?
Hyp. May I ſit neere ye?
Ar. No, you are too pure an object to behold,
Too excellent to looke upon, and live;
I muſt remove.
Zab. She is a woman Sir,
Fy, what faint hart is this
Ar. The houſe of wonder.
Zab. Do not you thinke your ſelfe now truely happie?
You have the abſtract of all ſweetneſſe by ye,
The pretious wealth youth Labors to arrive at
Nor is ſhe leſſe in honour, then in beauty,
Ferraras, roiall Duke, is proud to call her
His beſt, his nobleſt, and moſt happie Siſter,
Fortune has made her Miſtris of herſelfe,
Wealthy, and wiſe, without a power to ſway her,
Wonder of Italy, of all harts Miſtris.
Arn. And all this is——
Zab. Hyppolita the beauteous.
Hyp. You are a poore relator of my fortunes,
Too weake a Chronicle to ſpeak my bleſſings,
And leave out that eſſentiall part of Story
I am moſt high and happy in, moſt fortunate,
The acquaintance, and the noble fellowſhip
Of this faire Gentleman: pray ye do not wonder,
Nor hold it ſtrange to heare a handſome Lady
Speak freely to ye: with your fair leave & courteſie
I will ſit by ye.
Arn. I know not what to anſwer,
Nor where I am, nor to what end conſider;
Why do you uſe me thus?
Hyp. are ye angry Sir,
Becauſe ye are entertain'd with all humanity?
Freely and nobly us'd?
Arn. No gentle Lady
That were uncivill, but it much amazes me
A ſtranger, and a man of no deſert
Should finde ſuch floods of courteſie.
Hyp. I love ye,
I honour ye, the firſt and beſt of all men,
And where that faire opinion leads, 'tis uſuall
Theſe trifles that but ſerve to ſet off, follow,
I would not have you proud now, nor diſdainful
Becauſe I ſay I love ye, though I ſweare it,
Nor thinke it a ſtale favour I fling on ye,
Though ye be handſome, and the only man
I muſt confeſſe I ever fixt mine eye on,
And bring along all promiſes that pleaſe us,
Yet I ſhould hate ye then, deſpiſe ye, ſcorne ye,
And with as much contempt purſue your perſon,
As now I doe with love. But you are wiſer,
At leaſt I think, more maſter of your fortune,
And ſo I drink your health.
Arn. Hold faſt good honeſty,
I am a loſt man elſe.
Hyp. Now you may kiſſe me,
'Tis the firſt kiſſe, I ever aſke, I ſweare to ye.
Arn. That I dare doe ſweet Lady.
Hyp. You doe it well too;
You are a Maſter Sir, that makes you coy.
Arn. Would you would ſend your people off.
Hyp. Well thought on.
Wait all without. Exit. Zab. and ſervants
Zab. I hope ſhe is pleaſ'd throughly.
Hyp. Why ſtand ye ſtill? her'es no man to detect ye,
My people are gon off: come, come, leave conjuring
The Spirit you would raiſe, is here already
Looke boldly on me.
Ar. What would you have me doe?
Hyp. O moſt unmanly queſtion! have you do?
Is't poſſible your yeares ſhould want a Tutor?
I'le teach ye: come, embrace me.
Ar. Fy ſtand off;
And give me leave, more now, then ere, to wonder,
A building of ſo goodly a proportion,
Outwardly all exact, the frame of Heaven,
Should hide within ſo baſe Inhabitants?
You are ſo faire, as if the morning bare ye,
Imagination never made a ſweeter,
Can it be poſſible this frame ſhould ſuffer,
And bulke on ſlight affections, fright the viewer?
Be excellent in all, as you are outward,
The worthy Miſtris of thoſe many bleſſings
Heaven has beſtowed, make 'em appeare ſtill nobler,
Becauſe they are truſted to a weaker keeper.
Would ye have me love ye?
Hyp. Yes,
Ar. Not for your beautie;
Though I confeſſe, it blowes the firſt fire in us,
Time as he paſſes by, puts out that ſparkle,
Nor for your wealth, although the world kneele to it,
And make it all addition to a woman,
Fortune that ruines all, makes that his conqueſt;
Be honeſt, and be vertuous, I'le admire ye,
At leaſt be wiſe, and where ye lay theſe nets,
Strow over 'em a little modeſty,
'Twill well become your cauſe, and catch more Fooles.
Hyp. Could any one that lov'd this wholſome counſell
But love the giver more? you make me fonder:
You have a vertuous minde, I want that ornament;
Is it a ſin I covet to enjoy ye?
If ye imagine I am too free a Lover,
And act that part belongs to you I am ſilent,
Mine eyes ſhall ſpeake my bluſhes, parly with ye,
I will not touch your hand, but with a trembling
Fitting a veſtall Nun; not long to kiſſe ye,
But gently as the aire, and undiſcerned too,

I'le ſteale it thus: I'le walke your ſhadow by ye,
So ſtill and ſilent that it ſhall be equall,
To put me off, as that, and when I covet,
To give ſuch toyes as theſe ——
Ar. A new temptation ——
Hyp. Thus like the lazie minuts will I drop 'em,
Which paſt once are forgotten.
Ar. Excellent vice!
Hyp. Will ye be won? looke ſtedfaſtly upon me,
Looke manly, take a mans affections to you;
Young women, in the old world were not wont, Sir,
To hang out gaudy buſhes for their beauties,
To talke themſelues into young-mens affections;
How cold and dull you are?
Ar. How I ſtagger?
She is wiſe, as faire; but 'tis a wicked wiſedome;
I'le choake before I yield.
Hyp. who waites within there Zabulon within.
Make ready the greene chamber,
Zab. It ſhall be Madam.
Ar. I am a fraid ſhe will injoy me indeed,
Hyp. What Muſicke do ye love?
Ar. A modeſt tongue.
Hyp. Wee'll have enough of that: fy, fy, how lumpiſh?
In a young Ladies armes, thus dull?
Ar. For heaven ſake
Profeſs a little goodneſſe.
Hyp. Of what Countrey?
Ar. I am of Rome.
Hyp. Nay then I know you mock me,
The Italians are not frighted with ſuch bug-bears,
Prethee go in.
Ar. I am not well;
Hyp. I'le make thee,
I'le kiſſe thee well:
Ar. I am not ſicke of that ſore.
Hyp. upon my conſcience, I muſt raviſh thee,
I ſhall be famous for the firſt example:
With this I'le tye ye firſt, then trye your ſtrength Sir,
Ar. My ſtrength, away baſe woman? I abhor thee.
I am not caught with ſtales, diſeaſe dwell with thee. Exit.
Hyp. Are ye ſo quicke? and have I loſt my wiſhes?
Hoe, Zabulon; my Seruants.

Enter Zabulon and Servants.

Call'd ye Madam?
Hyp. Is all that beautie ſcorned, ſo many ſude for?
So many Princes? by a ſtranger too?
Muſt I endure this?
Zab. Wher's the Gentleman?
Hyp. Go preſently, purſue the ſtranger, Zabulon.
He has broke from me, Jewels I have given him: (dome,
Charge him with theft: hee has ſtolne my love, my free-
Draw him before the Governour, impriſon him,
Why doſt thou ſtay?
Zab. I'le teach him a new daunce,
For playing faſt and looſe with ſuch a Lady.
Come fellowes, come: I'le execute your anger,
And to the full.
Hyp. His ſcorne ſhall feele my vengeance. —— Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Sulpicia and Jaques.

Sul. Shall I never ſee a luſty man againe?
Ja. Faith Miſtris
You do ſo over-labour 'em when you have 'em,
And ſo dry-founder 'em, they cannot laſt.
Sul. Wher's the French-man?
Alas, he's all to fitters,
And lyes, taking the height of his fortune with a Sirreng.
Hee's chin'd, he's chin'd good man, he is a mourner.
Sul. What's become of the Dane?
Ja. Who? goldy-locks?
Hee's foule i'th touch-hole; and recoiles againe,
The main Spring's weakned that holds up his cock,
He lies at the ſigne of the Sun, to be new breech'd.
Sul. The Rutter too, is gone.
Ja. O that was a brave raſcall,
He would labour like a threſher: but alas
What thing can ever laſt? he has been ill mewd,
And drawne too ſoon; I have ſeene him in the Hoſpitall.
Sul. There was an Engliſh-man.
Ja. I there was an Engliſh-man;
You'le ſcant finde any now, to make that name good.
There was thoſe Engliſh that were men indeed,
And would performe like men, but now they are vaniſht:
They are ſo taken up in their own Countrey,
And ſo beaten off their ſpeed, by their own women,
When they come here, they draw their legs like hackneys:
Drinke, and their owne devices has undone 'em.
Sul. I muſt have one that's ſtrong, no life in Lisbon elſe,
Perfect and young: my cuſtome with young Ladies,
And high-fed Citie dames, will fall, and breake elſe.
I want my ſelfe too, in mine age to nouriſh me: (neſſe
They are are all ſunk I maintain'd: now what's this buſi-
What goodly fellow's that?

Enter Rutillio and Officers

Rut. Why do you drag me?
Pox o' your Juſtice; let me looſe.
1 Off. Not ſo Sir. (lerk,
Rut. Cannot a man fall into one of your drunken Cel-
And ventur the breaking on's neck, your trap-doores open
But he muſt be us'd thus raſcally?
1 Off. What made you wandring
So late i'th night? you know that is impriſonment.
Rut. May be I walke in my ſleep.
2 Off. May be wee'l walk ye.
What made ye wandring Sir, into that vault
Where all the Citie ſtore, and the Munition lay?
Rut. I fell into't by chance, I broke my ſhins for't.
Your Worſhips feele not that: I knockt my head
Againſt a hundred poſts, would you had had it.
Cannot I breake my necke in mine own defence?
2 Off. This will not ſerve: you cannot put it off ſo,
Your comming thither was to play the villaine,
To fire the powder, to blow that part oth' City.
Rut. Yes, with my noſe: why were the trap-doors open?
Might not you fall, or you? had you gone that way?
I thought your Citie had ſunke.
1 Off. You did your beſt Sir,
We muſt preſume to help it into'th aire.
If you call that ſinking: we have told you what's the law,
He that is taken there, unleſſe a Magiſtrate,
And have command in that place, preſently
If there be nothing found apparent, neare him
Worthie his torture, or his preſent death,
Muſt either pay his fine for his preſumption,
(Which is ſixe hundred Duckets) or for ſix yeares
Tug at an Oare i'th Gallies: will ye walke Sir,
For we preſume you cannot pay the penalty.
Rut. Row in the Gallies, after all this miſchief? (there.
2 Off. May be you were drunke, they'le keepe you ſober
Rut. Tug at an Oare? you are not arrant raſcals,
To catch me in a pit-fall, and betray me,
Sul. A luſty minded man.
Ja. A wondrous able.
Sul. Pray Gentlemen, allow me but that liberty
To ſpeake a few words with your priſoner

And

And I ſhall thanke you.
1 Off. Take your pleaſure, Lady. (ye,
Sul. What would you give that woman ſhould redeem
Redeem ye from this ſlavery?
Rut. Beſides my ſervice
I would give her my whole ſelfe, I would be her vaſſall.
Sul. Shee has reaſon to expect as much, conſidering
The great ſumme ſhe payes for't, yet take comfort
What ye ſhall doe to merit this, is eaſie
And I will be the woman ſhall befriend ye,
'Tis but to entertaine ſome handſome Ladies,
And young faire Gentlewomen: you gheſſe the way:
But giving of your mind—
Rut. I am excellent at it:
You cannot picke out ſuch another living.
I underſtand ye: is't not thus?
Sul. Ye have it.
Rut. Bring me a hundred of em: I'le diſpatch 'em,
I will be none but yours: ſhould another offer
Another way to redeem me, I ſhould ſcorne it.
What women you ſhall pleaſe: I am monſtrous luſty:
Not to be taken downe: would you have Children?
I'le get you thoſe as faſt, and thicke as flie-blows.
Sul. I admire him: wonder at him.
Rut. Harke ye Lady,
You may require ſometimes—
Sul. I by my faith.
Rut. And you ſhall have it by my faith, & handſomly:
This old Cat wil ſuck ſhrewdly: you have no daughters?
I flye at all: now am I in my Kingdome,
Tug at an Oare? no, tug in a feather-bed,
With good warme Caudles; hang your bread and water,
I'le make you young againe, beleeve that Lady.
I will ſo frubbiſh you.
Sul. Come, follow Officers,
This Gentleman is free: I'le pay the Duckets. (tub
Rut. And when you catch me in your City-powdring-
Againe, boile me with Cabbidge.
1 Off. You are both warn'd and arm'd Sir. Exeunt.

Scæna quarta, Enter Leopold, Hypolita, Zenocia.

Zen. Will your Ladiſhip weare this dreſſing?
Hyp. Leave thy prating:
I care not what I weare.
Zen. Yet 'tis my duty
To know your pleaſure, and my worſt affection
To ſee you diſcontented.
Hyp. Weeping too?
Prethee forgive me: I am much diſtemperd,
And ſpeake I know not what: to make thee amends
The gowne that I wore yeſterday, is thine;
Let it alone a while.
Leo. Now you perceive,
And taſte her bounty.
Zen. Much above my merit.
Leo. But have you not yet found a happy time
To move for me.
Zen. I have watched all occaſions,
But hitherto, without ſucceſſe: yet doubt not
But I'le embrace the firſt meanes.
Leo. Do, and proſper;
Excellent creature, whoſe perfections make
Even ſorrow lovely, if your frowns thus take me
What would your ſmiles doe?
Hyp. Pox ô this ſtale Courtſhip:
If I have any power:
Leo. I am commanded,
Obedience is the Lovers ſacrifice
Which I pay gladly.

Hyp. To be forc'd to wooe,
Being a woman, could not but torment me,
But bringing for my Advocates, youth and beauty,
Set off with wealth: and then to be deni'd too
Do's comprehend all tortures. They flattered me,
That ſaid my lookes were charmes, my touches fetters,
My locks ſoft chaines, to binde the armes of Princes,
And make them in that with'd for bondage, happy,
I am like others of a courſer feature,
As weake to allure, but in my dotage, ſtronger:
I am no Circe; he, more then Ulyſſes,
Scornes all my offerd bounties, ſlights my favours,
And, as I were ſome new Egyptian, flyes me,
Leaving no pawne, but my own ſhame behind him.
But he ſhall finde, that in my fell revenge,
I am a woman: one that never pardons
The rude contemner of her profferd ſweetneſſe.

Enter Zabulon.

Zab. Madam, 'tis don:;
Hyp. What's done?
Zab. The uncivill ſtranger
Is at your ſuite arreſted.
Hyp. 'Tis well handled.
Zab. And under guard ſent to the Governour,
With whom my teſtimony, and the favour,
He beares your Ladiſhip, have ſo prevail'd
That he is ſentene'd.
Hyp. How?
Zab. To looſe his head.
Hyp. Is that the meanes to quench the ſcorching heate
Of my inrag'd deſires? muſt innocence ſuffer,
'Cauſe I am faulty? or is my Love ſo fatall
That of neceſſity it muſt deſtroy
The object it moſt longs for? dull Hypollita,
To thinke that injuries could make way for love,
When courteſies were deſpis'd: that by his death
Thou ſhouldſt give that, which only thou canſt hope for
While he is living: My honours at the ſtake now,
And cannot be preſerv'd, unleſſe he periſh
The enjoying of the thing I love, I ever
Have priz'd above my fame: why doubt I how then?
One only way is left me, to redeeme all:
Make ready my Caroch
Leo. What will you Madam
Hyp. And yet I am impatient of ſuch ſtay:
Bind up my haire: fy, fy, while that is doing
The Law may ceaſe his life: thus, as I am thinj,
Not like Hypollita, but a Baſſanall
My frantique Love tranſports me. Exit.
Leo. Sure ſhee's diſtracted.
Zab. Pray you follow her: I will along with you:
I more then gheſſe the cauſe women that love
Are moſt uncertaine, and one minute crave,
What, in another they refuſe to have. Exit.

Scæna 5ª. Enter Clodio, Charino.

Clo. Aſſure thy ſelfe Charino, I am alter'd
From what I was; the tempeſts we have met with
In our uncertaine voyage, were ſmooth gales
Compar'd to thoſe, the memory of my luſts
Raiſ'd in my conſcience: and if ere againe
I live to ſee Zenocia, I will fine,
And ſeeke to her as a Lover, and a Servant,
And not command affection, like a Tyrant.
Char. In hearing this; you make me young againe,
And heaven, it ſeemes, favouring this good change in you
In ſetting of a period to our dangers
Gives us faire hopes, to find that here in Liſbon
Which hitherto in vain we long have ſought for.

I have receiv'd aſſur'd intelligence,
Such ſtrangers have bin ſeen here: and though yet
I cannot learn their fortunes, nor the place
Of their abode, I have a ſoule preſages
A fortunate event here.
Clo. There have paſs'd
A mutuall enterchange of courteſies
Betweene me, and the Governour; therfore boldly
We may preſume of him, and of his power
If we finde cauſe to uſe them, otherwiſe
I Would not be known here, and theſe diſguiſes
Will keep us from diſcovery.

Enter Manuel, Doctor, Arnolde, Guard.

Char. What are theſe?
Clo. The Governour: with him my Rivall, bound.
Char. For certaine 'tis Arnolde.
Clo. Let's attend
What the ſucceſſe will be.
Man. Is't poſſible
There ſhould be hope of his recovery,
His wounds ſo many and ſo deadly?
Doct. So they appear'd at firſt, but the blood ſtop'd,
His trance forſook him, and on better ſearch
We found they were not mortall;
Man. Uſe all care
To perfect this unhop'd for cure: that done
Propoſe your own rewards; and till you ſhall
Heare farther from me, for ſome ends I have,
Conceal'd it from his Mother.
Doct. Weel not falle Sir. Exit.
Man. You ſtil ſtand confident on your innocence.
Arn. It is my laſt and laſt guard, which I will not Leave, to relye on your uncertaine mercy.

Enter Hyppolita, Zabulan, Leopold, Zenocia, a Servant.

Hyp. Who bade you follow me? Goe home, & you Sir,
As you reſpect me, goe with her.
Arn. Zenocia?
And in her houſe a Servant?
Cha. 'Tis my daughter.
Clo. My love! Contain your joy, obſerve the ſequel. Zen. paſſes
Man. Fye Madam, how undecent 'tis for you,
So far, unlike your ſelfe to bee ſeene thus
In th'open ſtreets? why do you kneele? pray you riſe,
I am acquainted with the wrongs, and loſſe
You have ſuſtain'd, and the Delinquent now
Stands ready for his puniſhment.
Hyp. Let it fall Sir,
On the offender: he is innocent
And moſt unworthy of theſe bonds he weares,
But I made up of guilt.
Man. What ſtrange turne's this?
Leo. This was my priſoner once.
Hyp. If chaſtity
In a young man, and tempted to the height too,
Did ere deſerve reward, or admiration,
He juſtly may claim both. Love to his perſon
(Or if you pleaſe give it a fowler name)
Compel'd me firſt to train him to my houſe,
All engines I rais'd there to ſhake his vertue,
Which in the aſſault were ſo baffe, he unmov'd ſtil
As if he had no part of humane frailty,
Againſt the nature of my Sex, almoſt
I plaid the Raviſher. You might have ſeen
In our contention, young Apollo fly
And love-ſicke Daphne follow, all arts failing,
By flight he won the victory, breaking from
My ſcorn'd embraces: the repulſe (in women
Unſufferable) invited me to purſue
Revenge: and from this grew
His Accuſation, and the abuſe
Of your ſtill equall juſtice: My rage ever
Thanks heaven, though wanton, I found not my ſelfe
So far engag'd to hell, to proſecute
To the death what I had plotted, for that love
That made me firſt deſire him, then accuſe him,
Commands me with the hazard of my ſelfe
Firſt to entreate his pardon, then acquit him.
Man. What ere you are, ſo much I love your vertue
That I deſire your friendſhip: doe you unlooſe him
From thoſe bonds, you are worthy of, your repentance
Makes part of ſatisfaction; yet I muſt
Severely reprehend you.
Leo. I am made
A ſtale on all parts: But this fellow ſhall
Pay dearely for her favour.
Arn. My life's ſo full
Of various changes, that I now deſpaire
Of any certaine port; one trouble ending,
A new, and worſe ſucceeds it: what ſhould Zenocia
Doe in this womans houſe? Can chaſtity
And hot Luſt dwell together without infection?
I would not be or jealous, or ſecure,
Yet ſomething muſt be done, to ſound the depth on't:
That ſhe lives is my bliſſe, but living there,
A hell of torments; there's no way to her
In whom I live, but by this door, through which
To me, 'tis death to enter, yet I muſt,
And will make tryall.
Man. Let me hear no more
Of theſe devices, Lady: this I pardon,
And at your interceſſion I forgive
Your inſtrument the Jew too: get you home.
The hundred thouſand crowns you lent the City
Towards the ſetting forth of the laſt Navy
Bound for the Iſlands, was a good then, which
I ballance with your ill now.
Char. Now Sir, to him,
You know my daughter needs it.
Hyp. Let me take
A farewell with mine eye, Sir, though my lip,
Be barr'd the Ceremonie, courteſie
And cuſtome too allowes of.
Arn. Gentle Madam,
I neither am ſo cold, nor ſo ill bred
But that I dare receive it: you are unguarded,
And let me tell you that I am aſham'd
Of my late rudeneſs, and would gladly therefore
If you pleaſe to accept my ready ſervice
Waite on you to your houſe.
Hyp. Above my hope:
Sir, if an Angel were to be my convoy
He ſhould not be more welcome. Exit Arn. and Hyp.
Clo. Now you know me.
Man. Yes Sir, and honour you: ever remembring
Your many bounties, being ambitious only
To give you cauſe to ſay by ſome one ſervice
That I am not ungratefull.
Clo. 'Tis now offer'd:
I have a ſuite to you, and an eaſie one,
Which e're long you ſhall know.
Man. When you think fit Sir,
And then as a command, I will receive it,
Till when, moſt welcome: you are welcome too Sir,
'Tis ſpoken from the heart, and therefore needs not
Much proteſtation: at your better leyſure
I will enquire the cauſe that brought you hither:

In

In the meane time serve you.
Clo. You out-doe me Sir. Exeunt.

Actus quartus. Scena Prima.

Enter Duarte, Doctor.

Duart. You have bestowed on me a second life
For which I live your creature, and have better'd
What nature fram'd imperfect, my first being
Insolent pride made monstrous; but this later
In learning me to know my selfe, hath taught me
Not to wrong others.
Doct. Then we live indeed.
When we can goe to rest without a larum
Given every minute to a guilt-sick conscience
To keep us waking, and rise in the morniug
Secure in being innocent: but when
In the remembrance of our worser actions
We ever beare about us whips and furies,
To make the day a night of sorrow to us,
Even life's a burthen.
Dua. I have found and felt it;
But will endeavour having first made peace
With those intestine enemies my rude passions
To be so with man-kinde: but worthy Doctor,
Pray if you can resolve me; was the Gentleman
That left me dead, ere brought into his cryall?
Doct. Nor known, nor apprehended.
Dua. Thats my griefe.
Doct. Why doe you wish he had been punished?
Dua. No,
The streame of my forein sorrow runs not that way:
For could I finde him, as I vow to heaven
It shall be my first care to seek him out,
I would with thankes acknowledge that his friend,
In opening my veines, which proud blood poisond,
Gave the first symptomes of true health.
Doct. 'Tis in you
A Christian resolution: that you live
Is by the Governours, your Uncles charge
As yet conceal'd. And though a sons losse never
Was solemniz'd with more teares of true sorrow
Then have been paid by your unequald Mother
For your supposed death; shee's not acquainted
With your recovery.
Dua. For some few dayes
Pray let her so continue: thus disguis'd
I may abroad unknown.
Doct. Without suspition
Of being discovered.
Dua. I am confident.
No moisture sooner dies then womens teares,
And therefore though I know my Mother vertuous,
Yet being one of that fraile sex I purpose
Her farther tryall.
Doct. That as you thinke fit——He not betray you
Dua. To finde out this stranger
This true Phisician of my mind and manners
Were such a blessing. He seem'd poore, and may
Perhaps be now in want; would I could finde him.
The Innes I'le search first, then the publique Stewes
He was of Italy, and that Country breeds not
Precisians that way; but hee I shortlines;
And such the most are: 'tis but a little travaile:
I am unfurnisht too, pray Mr. Doctor,
Can you supply me?
Doct. With what summe you please.
Dua. I will not be long absent.
Doct. That I wish too;
For till you have more strength, I would not have you
To be too bold.
Dua. Feare not, I will be carefull. Exeunt.

Enter Leopold, Zabulon, Bravo.

Zab. I have brought him Sir, a fellow that will do it
Though Hell stood in his way, ever provided
You pay him for't.
Leop. He had a strange aspect
And lookes much like the figure of a hang-man
In a table of the Passion.
Zab. He transcends,
All presidents believe it, a bred ruffian,
That hath so often taken the Strappado,
That 'tis to him, but as a lofty tricke
Is to a tumbler: he hath perused too,
All Dungeons in Portugall, thrice seven yeares
Rowed in the Galleys for three severall murthers,
Though I presume that he has done a hundred,
And scapt unpunisht.
Leop. He is much indebt to you,
You set him off so well. What will you take Sir
To beate a fellow for me, that has wronged me?
Bra. To beate him Sir you?
Leop. Yes, beate him to lamenesse,
To cut his lips or nose off; any things,
That may disfigure him.
Bra. Let me consider?
Five hundred pistollets for such a service
I thinke were no deare pennyworth.
Zab. Five hundred!——
Why there are of your brother-hood in the Citie,
Ile undertake shall kill a man for twenty.
Bra. Kill him? I think so, he kill any man
For halfe the money.
Leop. And will you aske more
For a sound beating then a murther?
Bra. I Sir,
And with good reason, for a dog that's dead
The Spanish proverb saies, will never bite:
But should I beate or lame him only, he may Recover, and kill me.
Leop. A good conclusion,
The obduracie of this rascall makes me tender.
I'le runne some other course, there's your reward,
Without the employment.
Bra. For that as you please Sir;
When you have need to kill a man, pray use me,
But I am out at beating. Exit.
Zab. What's to be done then?
Leop. I'le tell thee Zabulon, and make thee privy
To my most neare designes: this stranger, which Hippolito so doates on, was my prisoner——
When the last Virgin, I bestowed upon her,
Was made my prize: how he used me, hereafter
I'le let thee know; and it may be the love
He beares the servant, makes him shoot me the shafts is.
Zab. 'Tis not unlike; for the first time he saw her
His lookes expresst so much, and for more proofe
Since he came to my Ladies house, though yet
He never knew her, he hath practis'd with me
To help him to a conference, without
The knowledge of Hippolito, which I promis'd.
Leop. And by all meanes pursue it for their meeting,
But worke it so, that my disdainfull Mistris

(Whom

(Whom, notwithstanding all her injuries
'Tis my hard fate to love) may see and heare them.
Zab. To what end Sir?
Leop. This Zabulon: when she sees
Who is her rivall, and her Lovers baseneſſe
To leave a Princeſſe for her bondwoman,
The ſight make her ſcorne, what now ſhe doates on,
I'le double thy reward.
Zab. You are like to ſpeed then:
For I confeſſe what you will ſoone beleeve,
We ſerve them beſt that are moſt apt to give. (unobſerv'd.
For you I'le place you where you ſhall ſee all, and yet be Leop. Tat I deſire too. Exit.

Enter Arnoldo.

Arn. I cannot ſee her yet, how it afflicts me:
The poyſon of this place, ſhould mixe it ſelfe
With her pure thoughts? 'Twas ſhe that was commanded
Or my eyes failed me groſly; that youth, that face
And all that noble ſweetneſſe. May ſhee not live here,
And yet be honeſt ſtill?

Enter Zenocia.

Zen. It is Arnoldo,
From all his dangers free; fortune I bleſſe thee,
My noble husband! how my joy ſwells in me,
But why in this place? what buſineſſe hath he here?
He cannot heare of me, I am not known here.
I left him vertuous; how I ſhake to thinke now?
And how that joy I had, cooles, and forſakes me?

Enter above Hyppolita and Zabulon.

This Lady is but faire, I have beene thought ſo
Without compare admired; Shee has bewitched him
And he forgot——
Arn. 'Tis ſhe againe, the ſame——the ſame Zenocia.
Zab. There they are together.——Now you may mark
Hyp. Peace let 'em parly.
Arn. That you are well Zenocia; and once more,
Bleſſe my deſpairing eyes, with your wiſht preſence,
I thanke the gods; but that I meete you here——
Hip. They are acquainted,
Zab. I found that ſecret Madam,
When you commanded her goe home: pray heare 'em.
Zen. That you meet me here, ne're bluſh at that Arnoldo.
Your comming comes too late: I am a woman,
And one woman with another may be truſted;
Do you feare the houſe?
Arn. More then a feare, I know it,
Know it not good, not honeſt.
Zen. What do you here then?
I'th name of vertue why doe you approach it?
Will you confeſſe the doubt and yet purſue it?
Where have your eyes been wandring my Arnoldo?
What conſtancy, what faith do you call this? Fie,
Aime at one wanton marke, and wound another?
I doe confeſſe, the Lady faire, moſt beauteous, Leopold
And able to betray a ſtrong mans liberty, places him-
But you that have a love, a wife——you do well ſelf unſeen
To deale thus wiſely with me: yet Arnoldo, below.
Since you are pleas'd to ſtudie a new beauty,
And think this old and ill, beaten with miſery.
Studie a nobler way for ſhame to love me,
Wrong not her honeſty.
Arn. You have confirm'd me. (you,
Zen. Who though ſhee be your wife, will never hinder
So much I reſt a ſervant to your wiſhes,
And love your Loves, though they be my deſtructions,
No man ſhall know me, nor the ſhare I have in thee,
No eye ſuſpect, I am able to prevent you,
For ſince I am a ſlave to this great Lady,
Whom I perceive you follow
Arn. Be not blinded.
Zen. Fortune ſhall make me uſeful to your ſervice,
I will ſpeake for you.
Arn. Speake for me? you wrong me.
Zen. I will endeavour all the wayes I am able
To make her think well of you; will that pleaſe,
To make her dote upon you, dote to madneſſe,
So far againſt my ſelfe I will obey you.
But when that 's done, and I have ſhewed this duty
This great obedience, few will buy it at my price,
Thus will I ſhake hands with you, wiſh you well,
But never ſee you more, nor receive comfort
From any thing, Arnoldo.
Arn. You are too tender;
I neither doubt you, nor deſire longer
To be a man, and live, then I am honeſt
And only yours; our infinite affections
Abus'd us both.
Zab. Where are your favours now?
The courteſies you ſhew'd this ſtranger, Madam?
Hip. Have I now found the cauſe?
Zab. Attend it further.
Zen. Did ſhe invite you doe you ſay?
Arn. Moſt cunningly,
And with a preparation of that ſtate
I was brought in and welcom'd.
Zen. Seem'd to love you?
Arn. Moſt infinitly, at firſt ſight, moſt dotingly.
Zen. Shee is a goodly Lady;
Arn. Wondrous handſome:
At firſt view, being taken unprepar'd,
Your memory, not preſent then to aſſiſt me,
Shee ſeem'd ſo glorious ſweet, and ſo far ſtird me,
Nay be not jealous, there's no harme done.
Zen. Prethee——didſt thou not kiſſe Arnoldo?
Arn. Yes faith did I.
Zen. And then——
Arn. I durſt not, did not——
Zen. I forgive you,
Come tell the truth.
Arn. May be I lay with her.
Hip. He mocks me too, moſt baſely.
Zen. Did yee faith? did ye forget ſo far?
Arn. Come, come, no weeping;
I would have lyen firſt in my grave, beleeve that.
Why will you aske thoſe things you would not heare?
Shee is too untemperate to betray my vertues
Too openly laſcivious: had ſhe dealt
But with that ſeeming modeſty ſhe might,
And flung a little Art upon her ardor,
But 'twas forgot, and I forgot to like her,
And glad I was deceiv'd. No my Zenocia,
My firſt love here begun, reſts here unreapt yet,
And here for ever.
Zen. You have made me happy,
Even in the midſt of bondage bleſt.
Zab. You ſee now
What rubs are in your way.
Hipo. And quickly Zabulon
I'le roote 'em out.——Be ſure you do this preſently.
Zab. Doe not you alter then.
Hipo. I am reſolute. Exit Zab.
Arn. To ſee you only I came hither laſt,
Drawne by no love of hers, nor baſe allurements,
For by this holy light I hate her heartily.
Leop. I am glad of that you have ſav'd me ſo much ven-
And ſo much feare (geance
From

From this houre, faire befall you.
Arn. Some meanes I shall make shortly to redeeme you,
Till when, observe her well, and fit her anger.
Only her lust consume.
Zen. When shal I see you?
Arn. I will live here about, and hear her faire fit,
Till I can finde a fit houre to redeeme you.
Hyp. Shut all the doores.
Arn. Who's that?
Zen. We are betray'd,
The Lady of the house has heard our parley,
Seene us, and seen our Loves.
Hyp. You courteous Gallant,
You that scorn all I can bestow, that laugh at
The afflictions, and the groanes I suffer for you,
That slight and jeere my love, contemn the fortune
My favour can fling on you, have I caught you?
Have I now found the cause? see foole, my wishes
Is mine own slave, my hand? I nourish that
That sucks up my content. I'le pray, no more,
Nor woe no more; thou shalt see foolish man,
And to thy bitter paine and anguish, looke on
The vengeance I shall take, provok'd and sleighted:
Redeem her then, and steale her hence: ho Zabulon
Now to your worke.
Enter Zabulon and servants, some holding Arnoldo, some ready with a cord to strangle Zenocia.
Arn. Lady, but heare me speake first,
As you have pitty.
Hyp. I have none. You caught me,
When I even hung about your necke, you scorn'd me.
Zab. Shall we pluck yet?
Hyp. No, hold a little Zabulon,
I'le pluck his heart-strings first: now am I worthy
A little of your love?
Arn. I'le be your servant,
Command me through what danger you shall aime at,
Let it be death.
Hyp. Be sure Sir, I shall fit you.
Arn. But spare this Virgin;
Hyp. I would spare that villain first,
Had cut my Fathers throate.
Arn. Bounteous Lady,
If in your sexe there be that noble softnesse,
That tendernesse of heart, women are crown'd for——
Zen. Kneele not Arnoldo, doe her not that honour,
Shes not worthy such submission,
I scorne a life depends upon her pitty.
Proud woman do thy worst, and arme thy anger,
With thoughts as blacke as hell, as hot and bloody,
I bring a patience here, shall make 'em blush,
An innocence, shall outlook thee, and death too.
Arn. Make me your slave, I give my freedome to ye,
For ever to be fetterd to your service;
'Twas I offended, be not so unjust then,
To strike the innocent, this gentle maid,
Never intended feare and doubt against you:
Shee is your servant, pay not her observance
With cruell looks, her duteous faith with death.
Hyp. Am I faire now? now am I worth your liking?
Zen. Not faire, not to be liked, thou glorious Divell,
Thou vernisht piece of lust, thou painted fury.
Arn. Speake gently sweet, speak gently;
Zen. I'le speak nobly.
'Tis not the saving of a life I aime at,
Marke me lascivious woman, mark me truly,
And then consider, how I weigh thy angers.
Life is no longer mine, nor deare unto me,
Then usefull to his honour, I prefer it
If thou hadst studied all the courtesies,
Humanity and noble bloody art linkt too,
Thou couldst not have propounded such a benefit,
Nor dar'st upon the suchum looke for honour
As dying for his sake, to be his Martyr,
'Tis such a grace.
Hyp. You shall not want that favour,
Let your bones worke miracles.
Arn. Deare Lady
By those faire eyes——
Hyp. There is but this way left ye
To save her life.——
Arn. Speake it, and embrace it.
Hyp. Come to my private chamber presently
And there, what love and I command——
Arn. I'le doe it,
——Be comforted Zenocia.
Zen. Do not do this,
To save me, do not loose your self I charge you,
I charge you by your love, that love you beare me;
That love, that constant love you have twin'd to me,
By all your promises, take heed you keep 'em,
Now is your constant tryall. If thou dost this,
Or mov'st one foote, to guide thee to her lust,
My curses and eternall hate pursue thee.
Redeem me at the base price of disloyalty?
Must my undoubted honesty be thy bawd too?
Goe and intwine thy selfe about that body?
Tell her, for my life thou hast lost thine honour,
Pulld all thy crowne from heaven, basely, most basely
To add an houre to me that hate thee for it,
Stoop'd to the servile flames of that foule woman
Know thee againe, nor name thee for a husband.
Arn. What shall I doe to save her?
Hyp. How now, what hast there?
Enter a Servant.
Ser. The Governour, attended with some Gentlemen,
Are newly entered, to speake with your Ladiship.
Hyp. Poxe o' their businesse, reprieve her for this hour,
I shall have other time.
Arn. Now fortune help us.
Hyp. I'le meete 'em presently: retire a while all. Exit.
Zab. You rise to day upon your right side Lady;
You know the danger too, and may prevent it,
And if you suffer her to perish thus,
As she must doe, and suddenly beleeve it,
Unlesse you stand her friend; you know the way on't,
I ghesse you poorely love her, lesse your fortune.
Let her know nothing, and performe this matter,
There are hours ordained for severall businesses,
You understand.
Arn. I understand you bawd Sir,
And such a Councellour I never car'd for.
Enter the Governour, Clodio, Leopold, Charino and Attendants at one doore, Hyppolita at the other.
Hyp. Your Lordship does me honour.
Gover. Faire Hyppolita,
I am come to ease you of a charge.
Hyp. I keepe none,
I count a burthen Sir: and yet I lye too.
Gover. Which is the maides is she here?
Clod. Yes Sir,
This is she, this is Zenocia,
The very same I sued to your Lordship for.
Zen. Clodio againe? more misery? more ruine?
Under what angry starre is my life govern'd.
Gover. Come hither maid, you are once more a free woman

Here I diſcharge your bonds.
Arn. Another ſmile,
Another tricke of fortune to betray us!
Hyp. Why do's your Lordſhip uſe me ſo unnobly?
Againſt my will, to take away my bond-woman? (man:
Gov. She was no lawfull prize, therefore no bond-wo-
She's of that Countrey we hold friendſhip with,
And ever did, and therefore to be uſed
With entertainment, faire and courteous.
The breach of league in us gives foule example,
Therefore you muſt be pleas'd to think this honeſtly
Did you know what ſhe was?
Leop. Not till this inſtant; ——
For had I known her, ſhe had been no priſoner. (now,
Gover. There, take the maid, ſhe is at her owne diſpoſe
And if there be ought elſe to do your honour
Any poore ſervice in——
Clod. I am vowed your ſervant;
Arn. Your Father's here too, that's our only comfort,
And in a Countrey now, we ſtand free people,
Where Clodio has no power, be comforted.
Zen. I feare ſome trick yet.
Arn. Be not ſo dejected.
Gover. You muſt not be diſpleas'd; ſo farewell Lady.
Come Gentlemen; Captain, you muſt with me too,
I have a little buſineſſe.
Leop. I attend your Lordſhip:
Now my way's free, and my hopes. Lords againe.

Exeunt all but Hyp. & Zab.

Hyp. Dy'e joere me now ye are going?
I may live yet —— to make you howle both.
Zab. You might have done; you had power then,
But now the chaines are off, the command loſt,
And ſuch a ſtory they will make of this
To laugh out lazie time.
Hyp. No meanes yet left me?
For now I burſt with anger: none to ſatisfie me?
No comfort? no revenge?
Zab. You ſpeake too late;
You might have had all theſe, your uſefull ſervants
Had you been wiſe, and ſuddain; What power, or will
Over her beauty, have you now? by violence
To conſtrain his love; ſhe is as free as you are,
And no law can impeach her liberty,
And whilſt ſhe is ſo, Arnolds will deſpiſe you.
Hyp. Either my love or anger muſt be ſatisfied,
Or I muſt dye.
Zab. I have a way woo'd do it,
Woo'd do it yet, protect me from the Law.
Hyp. From any thing: thou knoweſt what power I have
What money, and what friends.
Zab. 'Tis a divelliſh one:
But ſuch muſt now be us'd: walke in, I'le tell you;
And if you like it, if the Divell can doe any thing.
Hyp. Divell, or what thou wilt, ſo I be ſatisfied. Exeunt.

Enter Sulpitia, Jaques.

Sulp. This is the rareſt, and the luſtieſt fellow,
And ſo beſtirs himſelfe——
Jaq. Give him breath Miſtris
You'l melt him elſe.
Sulp. He does perform ſuch wonders——
The women are mad on him.
Jaq. Give him breath I ſay;
The man is but a man, he muſt have breath.
Sulp. How many had he yeſterday?
And they paid bravely too.
Jaq. About fourteene.
But ſtill I cry give breath, ſpare him and have him.
Sulp. Five Dames to day; this was a ſmall ſtage
He may endure five more.
Jaq. Breath, breath I cry ſtill;
Body ô me give breath, the man's a loſt man elſe.
Feede him and give him breath. Enter 2. Gentlewomen
Sulp. Welcome Gentlewomen,
Y'are very welcome (fellow
1 Gen. We heare you have a luſty & wel-complexion'd
That does rare tricks, my ſiſter and my ſelfe here,
Would triſle out an houre or two ſo, pleaſe you.
Sulp. Jaques, conduct 'em in.
Both. There's for your courteſie. Exeunt Jaqu. and Gent.
Sulp. Good pay ſtil, good round pay, this happy fellow
Will ſet me up againe; he brings in gold
Faſter then I have leiſure to receive it.
O that his body were not fleſh and fading;
But I'le ſo pamp him up ——nothing too deare for him;
What a ſweete ſent he has!——Now what newes Jaques?
Jaq. He cannot laſt, I pitty the poor man
I ſuffer for him; two coaches of young City dames,
And they drive as the Divell were in the wheeles,
Are ready now to enter: and behind theſe
An old dead-palſied Lady in a litter,
And ſhe makes all the haſt ſhe can: the man's loſt,
You may gather up his dry bones to make nine-pins,
But for his fleſh.
Sulp. Theſe are but eaſie labours,
Yet, for I know he muſt have reſt. (ſently.
Jaq. He muſt:——you'l beate him off his legge elſe pre-
Sulp. Goe in, and bid him pleaſe himſelfe, I am pleas'd
To morrow's a new day; but if he can (too:
I would have him take pity ô the old Lady.
Alas 'tis charity.
Jaq. I'le tell him all this
And if he be not too fool-hardy.

Enter Zabulon.

Sulp. How now?
What newes with you?
Zab. You muſt preſently
Shew all the art you have, and for my Lady.
Sulp. She may command.
Zab. You muſt not dream nor triffle.
Sulp. Which way?
Zab. A ſpell you muſt prepare, a powerfull one,
Peruſe but theſe directions, you ſhall find all;
There is the picture too, be quicke, and Faithfull,
And do it with that ſtrength ——When 'tis perform'd
Pitch your reward at what you pleaſe, you have it.
Sulp. Ile do my beſt, and ſuddainly: but hark ye,
Will you never lye at home againe?
Zab. Excuſe me,
I have too much buſineſſe yet.
Sulp. I am right glad on't.
Zab. Think on your buſineſſe, ſo farewell.
Sulp. I'le do it.
Zab. Within this houre I'le viſit you againe
And give you greater lights.
Sulp. I ſhall obſerve ye;
This brings a brave reward, bravely I'le do it
And all the hidden art I have, expreſs in't. Ex. at both dores.

Enter Rutillio with a night-cap.

Rut. Now do I look as if I were Crow-trodden,
Fy how my hams ſhrinke under me; ô me,
I am broken-winded too; Is this a life?
Is this the recreation I have aimd at,
I had a body once, a handſome body,
And wholſome too. Now I appeare like a raſcall
That had been hung a yeare or two in gibbets.

Fy

Fye how I faint; Women? keep me from women;
Place me before a Cannon, 'tis a pleaſure;
Stretch me upon a rack, a recreation;
But women? women? ô the Divell! women?
Curtius gulfe was never halfe ſo dangerous.
Is there no way to finde the trap-dore againe,
And fall into the Cellar, and be taken?
No lucky fortune to direct me that way?
No galleys to be got, nor yet no gallows?
For I feare nothing now, no earthly thing
But theſe unſatisfied Men-leeches, women.
How divelliſhly my bones ake: ô the old Lady!
I have a kind of waiting-woman, lyes croſſe my back too,
O how ſhe ſtings! no treaſon to deliver me?
Now what are you? do you mock me?

Enter 3. with night-caps very faintly.

1. No Sir, no,
We were your Predeceſſors in this place,
2. And come to ſee you beare up.
Rut. Good Gentlemen;
You ſeem to have a ſnuffing in your head Sir,
A parlous ſnuffling, but this ſame dampiſh aire——
2. A dampiſh aire indeed.
Rut. Blow your face tenderly,
Your noſe will ne're endure it: mercy ô me,
What are men change'd to here? is my noſe faſt yet?
Mee thinks it ſhakes it'h hilts: pray tell me Gentlemen,
How long is't ſince you flouriſht here?
3. Not long ſince.
Rut. Move your ſelfe eaſily, I ſee you are tender,
Nor long endured.
2. The labour was ſo much Sir
And ſo few to perform it——
Rut. Muſt I come to this?
And draw my legs after me like a lame dog?
I cannot run away, I am too feeble:
Will you ſue for this place againe Gentlemen? (plations.
1. No truly ſir, the place has been too warm for our coun-
2. We have enough on't, reſt you merry ſir,
We came but to congratulate your fortune,
You have abundance.
3. Beare your fortune ſoberly,
And ſo we leave you to the next faire Lady. Exit the 3.
Rut. Stay but a little, and I'le meet you Gentlemen,
At the next Hoſpitall: ther's no living thus,
Nor am I able to endure it longer,
With all the helps and heates that can be given me,
I am at my trot already; they are faire and young
Moſt of the women that repaire unto me,
But they ſtick on like burs, ſhake me like feathers.

Enter Sulpitia.

More women yet?
Would I were honeſtly married,
To any thing that had but halfe a face,
And not a groate to keep her, nor a ſmocke,
That I might be civilly merry when I pleaſed,
Rather then labouring in theſe fulling mills.
Sulp. By this the ſpell begins to worke: you are luſty,
I ſee you beare up bravely yet.
Rut. Doe you heare Lady,
Do not make a game-beare of me, to play me hourly,
And fling on all your whelps; it will not hold;
Play me with ſome diſcretion; to day one courſe,
And two dayes hence another.
Sulp. If you be ſo angry
Pay backe the money I redeem'd you at
And take your courſe; I can have men enough: (hither,
You have loſt me an hundred crowns ſince you came
In broths and ſtrengthning caudles; till you do pay me
If you will eate and live, you ſhall endeavour,
I'le chain you to't elſe.
Rut. Make me a dog——
I'le keep your houſe——on bare bones,
And be whipt out a doores.
Doe you mark me Lady? whipt,
I'le eate old ſhoes. Enter Duart.
Dua. In this houſe, I am told
There is a ſtranger, of a goodly perſon,
And ſuch a one there was; if I could ſee him,
I yet remember him.
Sulp. Your buſineſſe Sir,
If it be for a woman, ye are cozend,
I keepe none here. Exit.
Dua. Certain this is the Gentleman,
The very ſame.
Rut. Death, if I had but money,
Or any friend to bring me from this bondage,
I would thraſh, ſet up a Coblers ſhop, keepe hogs,
And feede with 'em, ſell tinder boxes,
And Knights of Ginger-bread, thatch for three
Halfe pence a day, and thinke it Lordly,
From this baſe ſtallion trade: Why does he ey me,
Eye me ſo narrowly?
Dua. It ſeemes you are troubled Sir,
I heard you ſpeak of want;
Rut. 'Tis better hearing
Far, then releiving Sir.
Dua. I do not think ſo; you know me not.
Rut. Not yet that I remember.
Dua. You ſhall, and for your friend: I am beholding to Greatly beholding Sir, If you remember, (yee
You fought with ſuch a man, they cal'd Duart,
A proud diſtempered man: he was my enemie,
My mortall foe, you ſlew him fairly, nobly.
Rut. Speake ſoftly Sir, you do not meane to betray me
I wiſht the Gallows, now th'are cunning fairely.
Dua. Be confident, for as I live, I love you,
And now you ſhall perceive it: for that ſervice
Me, and my purſe command: there, take it to ye,
'Tis gold, and no ſmall ſum, a thouſand duckets,
Supply your want.
Rut. But do you do this faithfully?
Dua. If I mean ill, ſpit in my face and kicke me,
In what elſe I may ſerve you, Sir——
Rut. I thanke you,
This is as ſtrange to me as Knights adventure.
I have a project, 'tis an honeſt one,
And now I'le tempt my fortune.
Dua. Truſt me with it.
Rut. You are ſo good and honeſt I muſt truſt ye,
'Tis but to carry a letter to a Lady
That ſav'd my life once.
Dua. That will be moſt thankfull,
I will do't with all care.
Rut. Where are you, white-broth?
Now luſty blood,
Come in, and tell your money:
'Tis ready here, no threats, nor no orations,
Nor prayers now.
Sulp. You do not meane to leave me——
Rut. I'le live in hell ſooner then here, and cooler.
Come quickly come, diſpatch, this ayers unwholſome:
Quickly good Lady, quickly ſee.
Sulp. Well, ſince it muſt be,
The next, I'le fetter faſter ſure, and cloſer. (take ye.
Rut. And picke his bones, as y'ave done mine, poxe

Dua. At my lodging for a while, you shall be quartred,
And there take physick for your health.
Rut. I thanke ye
I have found my Angel now too, if I can keepe him.
Exeunt omnes.

Actus quinti, Scena Prima.

Enter Ruillio and Duart.

Rut. You like the Letter.
Dua. Yes, but I must tell you,
You tempt a desperate hazard, to sollicite
The mother, (and the grieved one too, 'tis rumour'd)
Of him you slew so lately.
Rut. I have told you
Some proofes of her affection, and I know not
A neerer way to make her satisfaction
For a lost Sonne, then speedily to help her
To a good husband; one that will beget
Both sons and daughters, if she be not barren.
I have had a breathing now, and have recover'd
What I lost in my late service, 'twas a hot one:
It fir'd and fir'd me; but all thanks to you Sir,
You have both freed and cool'd me.
Dua. What is done Sir
I thought well done, and was in that rewarded,
And therefore spare your thanks.
Rut. I'le no more whoring;
This fencing twixt a paire of sheets, more wearys one
Then all the exercise in the world besides.
To be drunk with good Canary, a meere Julip
Or like gourd-water to't; twenty surfets
Come short of one nights work there. If I get this Lady
As ten to one I shall; I was ne're denied yet,
I will live wondrous honestly; walk before her
Gravely, and demurely
And then instruct my family; you are sad,
What do you muse on Sir?
Dua. Truth I was thinking
What couldst be made for the delivery of your letter,
And now I have it; but faith did this Lady
(For do not gull your selfe) for certain know,
You kild her sonne?
Rut. Give me a booke, I'le swear't;
Denyed me to the Officers, that pursued me,
Brought me her selfe to'th dore, then gave me gold
To beare my charges, and shall I make doubt then
But that she lov'd me? I am confident
Time having tane her griefe off, that I shall be
Most welcome to her: for then to have wooed her
Had been unseasonable.
Dua. well Sir, there's more money,
To make you handsome; I'le about your businesse;
You know where you must stay.
Rut. There you shall finde me:
Would I could meete my brother now, to know,
Whither the Jew, his Genius, or my Christian,
Has prov'd the better friend. Exit.
Dua. O who would trust
Deceiving woman! or beleeve that one
The best, and most canoniz'd ever was
More then a seeming goodnesse! I could raile now
Against the sexe, and curse it; but the theame
And way's too common: yet that Guismar
My mother; (nor let that forbid her to be The wonder of our nation) she that was
Mark'd out the great example, for all Matrons
Both wife and Widow; shee that in my breeding
Expresst the utmost of a mothers care,
And tendernesse to a Sonne; she that yet faines
Such sorrow for me; good God, that this mother,
After all this, should give up to a stranger,
The wreake she owed her Sonne; I feare her honour.
That he was sav'd, much joyes me, and grieves only
That she was his preserver. I'le try further,
And by this English, find whether the teares,
Of which, she is so prodigall, are for me,
Or us'd to cloake her base hypocrisy. Exit.

Enter Hypolita and Sulpitia.

Hyp. Are you assur'd the charme prevailes?
Sulp. Do I live?
Or you speake to me? Now, this very instant
Health takes its last leave of her; manure paleneſſe
Like winter, nips the Roses and the lillies;
The Spring that youth, and love adorn'd her face with.
To force affection, is beyond our care,
For I have prov'd all maimes that hell has taught me,
Or the malice of a woman, which exceeds it,
To change Arnolde's love, but to no purpose:
But for your honest woman.
Hyp. Let her pine and dye;
She remov'd; which like a brighter sun,
Obscures my beames; I may shine one againe,
And as I have been, be admir'd and sought to:
How long has she to live?
Sulp. Lady, before
The Sun twice rise and fix, be confident,
She is but dead; I know my Charmes hath found her
Nor can the Governours guard; her lovers sorrow;
Her Fathers sorrow, or his power that freed her,
Defend her from it.

Enter Zabulon.

Zab. All things have succeeded,
As you could wish; I saw her brought sick home;
The image of pale death, stampt on her fore-head.
Let me adore this second Hecate,
This great Commandresse, of the fatall fires,
That as she pleases, can cut short, or lengthen
The thread of life.
Hyp. Where was she, when the inchantment
First ceas'd upon her.
Zab. Taking the fresh aire,
In the company of the Governour, and Count Clodio
Arnolde too, was present with her Father,
When, in a moment (so the servants told me)
As she was giving thanks to the Governour,
And Clodio, for her unexpected freedome,
As if she had been blasted, she sunk downe,
To their amazement.
Hyp. 'Tis thy masters piece
Which I will so instruct, that thou shalt fast here,
And with the hazard of thy life, not move
Make triall of thy powerfull Art; which known
Our Lawes call death: off with this Magicall robe,
And be thy selfe.

Enter Governour, Clodio, and Charino.

Sulp. Stand close, you shall heare more.
Gov. Mon. You must have patience; all rage is vain now,
And piety forbids, that we should question
What is decreed above, or aske a reason
Why heaven determines this or that way of us.
Clod. Heaven has no hand in't; 'tis a work of hell.
Her life hath been so innocent, all her actions

So

So free from the suspition of crime,
As rather she deserves a Saints place here,
Then to endure, what now her sweetenesse suffers.
Charin. Not for her fault, but mine Sir; Zenocia suffers,
The sin I made, when I sought to raise downe
Arnoldos love, built, on a Rock of truth,
Now to the height is punish'd. I professe,
Had he no birth, nor parts, the present sorrowes
He now expresses for her, does deserve her
Above all Kings, though such had been his riuals.
Clod. All Ancient stories, of the love of husbands
To vertuous wives, be now no more remembred.
Char. The tales of Turtles, ever be forgotten,
Or, for his sake beleev'd.
Man. I have heard, there has been
Betweene some married paires, such sympathy,
That th' husband, has felt really, the throwes
His wife then teeming suffers, this true griefe,
Confirms, 'tis not impossible.
Clod. Wee shall finde
Fit time for this hereafter; lets use now
All possible meanes to help her.
Man. Care, nor cost,
Nor what Physitians can do, shall be wanting;
Make use of any meanes, or men.
Char. You are noble. Exeunt. Man. Clod. Charino.
Sulp. Ten Colledges of Doctors shall not save her.
Her fate is in your hand.
Hipo. Can I restore her?
Sulp. If you command my Art.
Hip. I'le dye my selfe first.
And yet I'le goe visit her, and see
This miracle of sorrow in Arnoldo:
And 'twere for me, I should change places with her,
And dye most happy, such a lovers teares,
Were a rich monument, but too good for her;
Whose misery I glory in: come Sulpitio,
You shall along with me, good Zabulon
Be not farr off.
Zab. I will attend you Madam. Exeunt
Enter Duarte. and a Servant
Ser. I have serv'd you, from my youth, and ever
You have found me faithfull: that you lives a treasure
I'le locke up here; nor shall it be let forth,
But when you give me warrant.
Dua. I rely,
Upon thy faith; nay, no more protestations,
Too many of them, will call that in question,
Which now I doubt not, she is there.
Ser. Alone too.
But take it on my life your entertainment,
Appearing as you are, will bee but course
For the displeasure, I shall undergoe;
I am prepar'd.
Dua. Leave me, I'le stand the hazard. Exit Servant.
The silence that's observ'd, her close retirements
No visitance admitted, not the days
These sable colours, all signes of true sorrow,
Or hers is deeply counterfeit. I'le looke nearer,
Manners give leave—she sits upon the ground,
By heaven she weepes my picture in her hand too;
She kisses it and weepes againe.
Enter Guiomar.
Guio. Whose there?
Dua. There is no starting back now Madam.
Guio. Ha, another murderer, I'le not protect thee,
Though I have no more Sonnes.
Dua. Your pardon Lady,
Ther's no such foule fact taints me
Guio. What makes thou here then?
Where are my Servants, do none but my sorrowes
Attend upon me? speake, what brought thee hither?
Dua. A will, to give you comfort.
Guio. Thou art but a man.
And 'tis beyond a humane reach to do it
If thou could raise the dead out of their graues.
Bid time run back, make me now what I was,
A happy Mother: gladly I would heare thee,
But that's impossible.
Dua. Please you but to read this;
You shall know better there, why I am sent;
Then if I should deliver it
Guio. From whom comes it?
Dua. That will instruct you; I suspect this stranger,
Yet she spake something, that holds such alliance,
With his reports I know not what to thinke on't;
What a frown was there she looks me through, & through,
Now reades againe, now pauses, and now smiles;
And yet there's more of anger in't then mirth,
These are strange changes; oh I understand it
She's full of serious thoughts.
Guio. You are just you Heavens,
And never do forget to heare their prayers,
That truly pay their vowes, the dear'd vengeance,
For you, and my words sake so long defer'd,
Under which as a mountaine, my heart groanes yet
When 'twas dispair'd of, now is offerd to me;
And if I loose it, I am both wayes guilty,
The womans maske, dissimulation help me;
Come hither freind, I am sure you know the Gentleman,
That sent these charms.
Duar. Charms Lady?
Guio. These charms;
I well may call them so, th'ave won upon me,
More then ere letter did; thou art his freind,
(The confidence he has in thee, confirmes it)
And therefore I'le be open breasted to thee,
To heare of him, though yet, I never saw him,
Was most desir'd of all men; let me blush,
And then I'le say I love him.
Dua. All men see,
In th is a womans vertue.
Guio. I expected
For the courtesie I did, long since to have seene him,
And though I then forbad it, you men know,
Betweene our harts and tongues, there's a large distance;
But I'le excuse him, may be hitherto,
He has forborne it, in respect my Sonne
Fell by his hand.
Dua. And reason Lady.
Guio. No, he did me a pleasure in't, a riotous fellow,
And with that insolent, not worth the owning;
I have indeed kept a long solemne sorrow,
For my freinds sake partly; but especially
For his long absence.
Dua. O the Devill!
Guio. Therefore,
Bid him bee speedy; a Priest shall be ready
To tye the holy knot; this title I find him,
Deliver that and bring him.
Dua. I am dumbe.
A good cause I have now, and a good (wom)an,
And something I shall do, I waite upon you. Exeunt.
Enter Mamma. Charino. Arnoldo. Zenocia, in a chaire.
2. Doctors. Child.
Doct. Give her more ayre shee dyes else.

Arn. O thou dread power,
That mad'ſt this all, and of thy workemanſhip,
This virgin wife, the Maſter peice, looke downe on her;
Let her minds virtues, cloth'd in this faire garment,
That worthily deſerves, a better name
Then fleſh and bloud, now ſue, and prevaile for her.
Or if thoſe are denyed, let innocence,
To which, all paſſages in heaven ſtand open,
Appeare in her white robe, before thy throne;
And mediate for her: or if this age of ſinne,
Be worthy of a miracle, the Sun
In his diurnall progreſſe never ſaw,
So ſweete a ſubject to imploy it on. (meanes,
Man. Wonders are ceas'd Sir, we muſt worke by
Arno. 'Tis true and ſuch reverend Phyſitians are,
To you——thus low I fall then; ſo may you ever
Be ſtil'd the hands of heaven, natures reſtorers;
Get wealth and honours; and by your ſucceſſe,
In all your undertakings, propagate
Your great opinion in the world, as now
You uſe your ſaving Art; for know good Gentlemen,
Beſides the fame, and all that I poſſeſs,
For a reward, poſterity ſhall ſtand
Indebted to you, for(as heaven forbid it)
Should my Zenocia dye, robbing this age,
Of all that's good or graceſull, times ſucceeding,
The ſtory of her pure life not yet perfect,
Will ſuffer in the want of her example.
Doct. Were all the world to periſh with her, wee
Can do no more; then what art and experience
Gives us aſſurance of, we have uſ'd all meanes
To finde the cauſe of her diſeaſe, yet cannot;
How ſhould we then, promiſe the cure?
Arn. Away,
I did bely you, when I charg'd you with
The power of doing; yee are meere names only,
And even your beſt perfection, accidentall;
What ever malady thou art, or ſpirit,
As ſome hold, all diſeaſes that afflict us,
As love, already makes me ſenſible
Of halfe her ſufferings, eaſe her of her part,
And let me ſtand the butt, of thy fell malice,
And I will ſweare th'art merciſull.
Doct. Your hand Lady;
What a ſtrange heat is heare? bring ſome warme water.
Arn. She ſhall uſe nothing that is yours; my ſorrow,
Provides her of a better bath, my teares,
Shall do that office.
Zeno. O my beſt Arnoldo!
The trueſt of all lovers! I would live
Were heaven ſo pleaſ'd, but to reward your ſorrow,
With my true ſervice; but ſince that's denied me,
May you live long and happy: do not ſuffer,
(By your affection to me I conjure you)
My ſickneſſe to infect you; though much love
Makes you too ſubject to it.
Arn. In this onely
Zenocia Wrongs her ſervant; can the body
Subſiſt, the ſoule departed? 'tis as eaſy
As I to live without you; I am your husband,
And long have been ſo, though our adverſe fortune,
Banding us, from one hazard to another;
Would never grant me ſo much happineſſe,
As to pay a husbands debt; deſpite of fortune,
In death I'le follow you, and guarde mine owne;
And there enjoy what heere my fate forbids me.
Clod. So true a ſorrow, and ſo feelingly
Expreſt, I never read of.
Man. I am ſtrooke
With wonder to behold it, as with pitty
Char. If you that are a ſtranger, ſuffer for them,
Being tied no further then humanity
Leades you to ſoft compaſſion; thinke great Sir,
What of neceſſity I muſt endure,
That am a Father?
Hypolita. Zabulon and Sulpitia at the dore.
Zab. Waite me there, I hold it
Unfit to have you ſeene; as I finde cauſe,
You ſhall proceed,
Man. You are welcome Lady.
Hypo. Sir, I come to do a charitable office,
How does the patient?
Clod. You may enquire
Of more then one; for two are ſick, and deadly,
He languiſhes in her, her healths, deſpaird of,
And in hers, his.
Hypo. 'Tis a ſtrange ſpectacle,
With what a patience, they ſit unmov'd
Are they not dead already?
Doct. By her pulſe,
She cannot laſt a day.
Arn. Oh by that ſummons,
I know my time too!
Hypo. Looke to the man.
Clod. Apply
Your Art, to ſave the Lady, preſerve her,
A towne is your reward.
Hypo. I'le treble it,
In ready gold, if you reſtore Arnoldo;
For in his death I dye too.
Clod. without her,
I am no more.
Arn. Are you there Madam? now
You may feaſt on my miſeries; my coldneſſe
In anſwering your affections; or hardneſſe,
Give it what name you pleaſe, you are reveng'd of;
For now you may perceive, our thred of life
Was ſpun together, and the poore Arnoldo,
Made only to enjoy the beſt Zenocia,
And not to ſerve the uſe of any other;
And in that ſhe may equall, my Lord Clodio,
Had long ſince elſe enjoyed her, nor could I
Have been ſo blinde, as not to ſee your great
And many excellencies farr, farr beyond
Or my deſervings, or my hopes; we are now
Going our lateſt journey, and together,
Our onely comfort we deſire, pray give it
Your charitie to our aſhes, ſuch wee muſt be,
And not to curſe our memoryes.
Hypo. I am much mov'd.
Clod. I am wholly overcome, all love to women,
Farewell for ever, ere you dye, your pardon;
And yours Sir; had ſhe many yeares to live,
Perhaps I might looke on her, as a Brother,
But as a lover never; and ſince all
Your ſad misfortunes, had originall
From the barbarous cuſtome practis'd in my Country,
Heaven witneſſe, for your ſake I here releaſe it;
So to your memory, chaſt Wives and Virgins
Shall ever pay their vowes. I give her to you;
And wiſh, ſhe were ſo now, as when my luſt
Forc'd you; to quite the Country.
Hypo. It is in vaine,
To ſtrive with deſtiny, here my dotage ends,
Looke up Zenocia, health in me ſpeakes to you;
She giues him to you, that by divers wayes,

So

So long has kept him from you; and repent not,
That you were once my ſervant, for which health
In recompence of what I made you ſuffer,
The hundred thouſand Crownes, the Citie owes me,
Shall be your dower.
Man. 'Tis a magnificent guift,
Had it beene timely given.
Hyp. Is it beleeve it; Sulpitia?
Enter. a Servant. and Sulpitia.
Sulp. Madam
Hyp. Quicke, undoe the charmes;
Aske not a reaſon why; let it ſuffice,
It is my will.
Sulp. Which I obey and gladly. Exit.
Man. Is to be married ſayeſt thou?
Ser. So ſhe ſayes ſir,
And does deſire your preſence. They are borne off
Man. And tell her I'le come. in chaires
Hyp. Pray carry them to their reſt; for though already,
They do appeare as dead, let my life pay for't,
If they recover not.
Man. What you have warranted,
Aſſure your ſelfe, will be expected from you;
Looke to them carefully; and till the tryall,
Hyp. Which ſhall not be above foure howers.
Man. Let me
Intreate your companies: there is ſomething
Of waight, invites me hence.
All. weell waite upon you. Exeunt.
Enter. Guiomar. and Servants.
Guio. You underſtand what my directions are,
And what they guide you to; the faithfull promiſe,
You have made me all.
All. We do and will performe it. (ſently
Guio. The Governour will not faile to be here pre-
Retire a while, till you ſhall finde occaſion,
And bring me word, when they arrive.
All. Wee ſhall Madam.
Guio. Onely ſtay you to entertaine;
1. Ser. I am ready
Guio. I wonder at the bold, and practis'd malice,
Men ever haue a foote, againſt our honours,
That nothing we can do, never ſo verteous,
No ſhape put on ſo pious, no not thinke
What a good is, be that good ne're ſo noble,
Never ſo Laden with admir'd ſtample,
But ſtill we end in luſt; our aimes our actions,
Nay, even our charities, with luſt are branded;
Why ſhould this ſtranger elſe, this wretched ſtranger,
Whoſe life I ſav'd at what deare price, ſtick here yet?
Why ſhould he hope, he was not here an hower,
And certainly in that time, I may ſweare it
I gave him no looſe looke, I had no reaſon;
Unleſſe my teares were flames, my curſes courtſhips;
The killing of my Sonne, a kindneſſe to me,
Why ſhould he ſend to me, or with what ſafety
(Examining the ruine he had wrought me)
Though at that time, my pious pitty found him,
And my word fixt; I am troubled, ſtrongly troubled.
Enter. a Servant.
Ser. The Gentlemen are come,
Guio. Then bid 'em welcome——I muſt retire. Exit.
Enter. Rutillio. and Duarte.
You are welcome home Gentlemen.
Rut. I thank you freind, I would ſpeak with your Lady.
Ser. I'le let her underſtand. Exit.
Rut. It ſhall befit you,
How do I looke Sir, in this handſome trim? Exit. Servant.
Me thinks I am woundrous brave.
Duar. You are very decent. (tire,
Rut. Theſe by themſelves, without more helps of ma-
Would ſet a woman hard; I know 'em all,
And where their firſt aimes lights; I'le lay my head on't,
I'le take her eye, as ſoone as ſhe lookes on me,
And if I come to ſpeake once, woe be to her,
I have her in a nooze, ſhe cannot ſcape me;
I have their ſeverall laſts.
Dua. You are throughly ſtudied,
But tel me Sir, being unacquainted with her,
As you confeſſe you are——
Rut. That's not an howers worke,
I'le make a nun forget her beades in two houres.
Dua. She being ſet in yeares next, none of thoſe luſters
Appearing in her eye,, that warme the fancy;
Nor nothing in her face, but handſome ruines.
Rut. I love old ſtoryes; thoſe live beleev'd, Authentique,
When 20. of your moderne faces, are cald in,
For new opinion paintings, and corruptions,
Give me an old confirm'd face; beſides ſhe ſav'd me,
She ſav'd my life, have I not cauſe to love her?
Shee's rich and of a conſtant ſtate, a faire one
Have I not cauſe to wooe her? I have tryed ſufficient,
All your young Phillies, I thinke this back has tryed 'em,
And ſmarted for it too: they run away with me,
Take bitt betweene the teeth, and play the Divels;
A ſtaied pace now becomes my yeares; a ſure one,
Where I may ſit and cracke no girthes.
Dua. How miſerable,
If my Mother ſhould confirme, what I ſuſpect now,
Beyond all humane cure were my condition?
Then I ſhall wiſh, this body had been ſo too,
Here comes the Lady Sir.
Enter. Guiomar.
Rut. Excellent Lady,
To ſhew I am a creature, bound to your ſervice,
And onely yours——
Guio. Keepe at that diſtance Sir;
For if you ſtir——
Rut. I am obedient,
She has found already, I am for her turne;
With what a greedy hawkes eye ſhe beholds me?
Marke how ſhe muſters all my parts.
Guio. A goodly Gentleman,
Of a more manly ſet, I never look'd on. (of 'em
Rut. Marke, marke her eye ſtill; marke but the carriage
Guio. How happy am I now; ſince my Sonne fell,
He fell not, by a baſe unnoble hand?
As that ſtill troubled me; how farr more happy
Shall my revenge be, ſince the ſacrifice,
I offer to his grave, ſhall be both worthy,
A Sonnes untimely loſſe, and a Mothers ſorrow?
Rut. Sir, I am made beleeve it; ſhe is mine owne,
I told you what a ſpell I carried with me,
All this time does ſhe ſpend, in contemplation,
Of that unmatch'd delight: I ſhall be thankfull to yee;
And if you pleaſe to know my houſe, to uſe it;
To take it for your owne.
Guio. Who waites without there?
Enter. Guard. and Servants. they ſeize upon Rut. & bind him.
Rut. How now? what meanes this, Lady?
Guio. Binde him faſt.
Rut. Are theſe the bride-laſes you prepare for me?
The colours that you give?
Dua. Fy gentle Lady,
This is not noble dealing.
Guio. Be you ſatiſfied,

It

It seemes you are a stranger to this meaning,
You shall not be so long, (mens persecutions?
Rut. Do you call this wooing—Is there no end of wo-
Must I needs foole into mine owne destruction?
Have I not had faire warnings, and enough too?
Still pick the Divells teeth? you are not mad Lady;
Do I come fairely, and like a Gentleman,
To offer you that honour?
Guio. You are deceiv'd Sir
You come besotted, to your owne destruction:
I sent not for you, what honour can ye add to me,
That brake that staffe of honour, my age lean'd on?
That robd me of that right, made me a Mother?
Heare me thou wretched man, heare me with terrour,
And let thine owne bold folly shake thy soule,
Heare me pronounce thy death, that now hangs o're thee,
Thou desperate foole; who bad thee seeke this ruine?
What mad unmanly fate, made thee discover
Thy cursed face to me againe? wast not enough
To have the faire protection of my house,
When misery and justice, cloose persued thee?
When thine owne bloudy sword, cryed out against thee,
Hatcht in the life of him? yet I forgave thee;
My hospitable word, even when I saw
The goodliest branch of all my blood, lopt from me,
Did I not Seale still to thee?
Rut. I am gon.
Guio. And when thou went'st to Impe thy miserie,
Did I not give thee meanes? but harke ingratefull,
Was it not thus? to hide thy face and fly me?
To keep thy name for ever from my memory?
Thy cursed blood and kindred; did I not sweare then
If ever, (in this wretched life thou hast left me, Short and unfortunate,) I saw thee againe,
Or came but to the knowledge, where thou wanderdst,
To call my vowe back, and pursue with vengance
With all the miseryes a Mother suffers?
Rut. I was borne to be hang'd, there's no anoyding it. (here?
Guio. And dar'st thou with this impudence appeare
Walke like the winding sheete my Sonne was put in,
Stand with those wounds?
Dua. I am happy now againe;
Happy the hower I fell, to finde a Mother,
So pious good, and excellent in sorrowes.

Enter. a Servant.

Ser. The Governours come in.
Guio. O let him enter. (tunes,
Rut. I have fool'd my selfe a faire thred of all my for-
This strikes me most; not that I feare to perish,
But that this unmanerly boldnesse, has brought me to it.

Enter. Governour. Clodio. Charino.

Gov. Are these fit preparations for a wedding Lady?
I came prepar'd a guest.
Guio. O give me justice;
As ever you will leave a vertuous name,
Do justice, justice, Sir.
Gou. You need not aske it,
I am bound to it.
Guio. Iustice upon this man
That kild my Sonne.
Gove. Do you confesse the act?
Rut. Yes Sir.
Clod. Rutillio?
Char. 'Tis the same.
Clod. How fell he thus?
Here will be sorrow for the good Arnolde.
Gover. Take heed Sir what you say.
Rut. I have weigh'd it well,
I am the man, nor is it life I start at;
Onely I am unhappy I am poore,
Doore in expence of lives, there I am wretched,
That I have not two lives lent me for his sacrifice;
One for her Sonne, a nother for her sorrowes.
Excellent Lady, now rejoyce againe,
For though I cannot thinke, y'are pleas'd in blood,
Nor with that greedy thirst pursue your vengeance;
The tendernesse, even in those teares denies that;
Yet let the world beleeve, you lov'd Duarte;
The unmatcht courtesies you have done my miseries,
Without this forfeite to the law, would charge me
To tender you this life, and proudt would please you.
Guio. Shall I have justice?
Gou. Yes.
Rut. I'le aske it for ye,
I'le follow it my selfe, against my selfe.
Sir, 'Tis most fit I dye; dispatch it quickly,
The monstrous burthen of that griefe she labours with
Will kill her else, then blood on blood lyes on me;
Had I a thousand liues, I'd give 'em all,
Before I would draw one teare more from that vertue.
Guio. Be not too cruell Sir, and yet his bold sword—
But his life cannot restore that he's a man too—
Of a faire promise, but alas my Sonnes dead;
If I have justice, must it kill him?
Gov. Yes.
Guio. If I have not, it kills me, strong and go odly!
Why should he perish too?
Gou. It lies in your power,
You onely may accuse him, or may quite him.
Clod. Be there no other witnesses?
Guio. Not any.
And if I save him, will not the world proclaime,
I have forgot a Sonne, to save a murderer?
And yet he lookes not like one, he lookes manly.
Hyp. Pitty so brave a Gentleman should perish.
She cannot be so hard, so cruell harted.
Guio. Will you pronounce? yet stay a little Sir.
Rut. Rid your selfe Lady, of this misery;
And let me go, I do but breed more tempests,
With which you are already, to much shaken.
Guio. Do now, pronounce; I will not heare.
Duar. You shall not,
Yet turne and see good Madam.
Gov. Do not wonder.
'Tis he, restor'd againe, thanke the good Doctor,
Pray do not stand amaz'd, it is Duarte;
Is well, is safe againe.
Guio. O my sweete Sonne.
I will not presse my wonder now with questions—
Sir, I am sorry for that cruelty,
I urg'd against you.
Rut. Madam it was but justice.
Duar. 'Tis true, the Doctor heald this body againe,
But this man heald my soule, made my minde perfect,
The good sharp lessons his sword read to me, sav'd me;
For which, if you lov'd me deare Mother,
Honour and love this man.
Guio. You sent this letter,
Rut. My boldnesse makes me blush now.
Guio. I'le wipe of that,
And with this kisse, I take you for my husband,
Your woings done Sir; I beleeve you love me,
And that's the wealth I looke for now.
Rut. You have it.
Duar. You have ended my desire to all my wishes.
Gover. Now 'tis a wedding againe. And if Hyppolite,

Make

Make good, what with the hazard of her life,
She undertooke, the evening will ſett cleare.

Enter. Hypollita. leading Leopold. Arnoldo. Zenocia. in either hand. Zabulon. Sulpitia.

After a ſtormy day.
Char. Here comes the Lady.
Clod. With faire Zenocia,
Health with life againe,
Reſtor'd unto her.
Zen. The guiſt of her goodneſſe.
Rut. Let us embrace, I am of your order too,
And though I once deſpair'd of women, now,
I finde they relliſh much of Scorpions,
For both have ſtings, and both can hurt, and cure too;
But what have been your fortunes?
Arn. Wee'le defer
Our ſtory, and at time more fit, relate it.
Now all that reverence vertue, and in that
Zenocias conſtancy, and perfect love,
Or for her ſake Arnoldo, joyne with us
In th' honour of this Lady.
Char. She deſerves it.
Hypo. Hypollitas life, ſhall make that good hereafter,
Nor will I alone, better my ſelfe but others:
For theſe whoſe wants perhaps, have made their actions
Not altogether innocent, ſhall from me
Be ſo ſupplied; that need ſhould not compell them,
To any courſe of life, but what the law
Shall give allowance to.
Zab. Sulp. Your Ladiſhipps creatures.
Rut. Be ſo and no more, you man-huckſter.
Hypo. And worthy Leopold, you that with ſuch fervour,
So long have ſought me, and in that deſerv'd me,
Shall now finde full reward, for all your travelles,
Which you have made more deare, by patient ſufferance.
And though my violent dotage did tranſport me,
Beyond thoſe bounds, my modeſty ſhould have kept in,
Though my deſires were looſe, from unchaſt art,
Heaven knows I am free.
Leop. The thought of that's dead to me;
I gladly take your offer.
Rut. Do ſo Sir,
A peice of crackt gold, ever will weigh downe
Siluer that's whole.
Gov. You ſhall be all my gueſts,
I muſt not be denyed.
Arno. Come my Zenocia.
Our barke at length has found a quiet harbour;
And the unſpotted progreſſe of our loves
Ends not alone in ſafety but reward,
To inſtruct others, by our faire example;
That though good purpoſes, are long withſtood,
The hand of Heaven ſtill guides ſuch as are good.

Ex. omnes.

The Prologue.

SO free this worke is, Gentlemen, from offence,
That we are confident, it needes no defence
From us, or from the Poets —— wee dare looke.
On any man, that brings his Table-booke
To write downe, what againe he may repeate
At ſome greate Table, to deſerve his meate.
Let ſuch come ſweld with malice, to apply
What is mirth here, there for an injurie.
Nor Lord, nor Lady we have tax'd; nor State,
Nor any private perſon, their poore hate
Will be ſtarv'd heere, for envy ſhall not finde,
One touch that may be wreſted to her minde.
And yet deſpaire not Gentlemen, The play
Is quicke and witty; ſo the Poets ſay,
And we believe them; the plott neate, and new,
Faſhiond like thoſe, that are approv'd by you.
Onely 'twill crave attention, in the moſt;
Becauſe one point unmark'd, the whole is loſt
Heare firſt then, and judge after, and be free,
And as our cauſe is, let our cenſure be.

Epilogue.

WHy there ſhould be an Epilogue to a Play.
I know no cauſe, the old and uſuall way,
For which they were made, was to entreat the grace
Of ſuch as were ſpectators in this place,
And time, 'tis to no purpoſe; for I know
What you reſolve already to beſtow,
Will not be alterd, what ſo ere I ſay,
In the behalfe of us, and of the Play:
Onely to quitt our doubts, if you thinke fit,
You may, or cry it up; or ſilence it.

Another Prologue for the Cuſtome of the Countrey.

For my Sonne Clarke.

WEe wiſh, if it were poſſible, you knew
What we would give for this nights looke, if new?
It being our ambition to delight
Our kinde ſpectators with what's good, and right.
Yet ſo farre know, and credite me, 'twas made
By ſuch, as were held work-men in their Trade,
At a time too, when they as I divine,
Were truly merrie, and dranke luſty wine.
The nectar of the Muſes; Some are here
I dare preſume, to whom it did appeare.
A well-drawne piece, which gave a lawfull birth
To paſſionate Scænes mixt with no vulgar mirth.
But unto ſuch to whom 'tis knowne by fame
From others, perhaps only by the name.
I am a ſuitor, that they would prepare
Sound palats, and then judge their bill of fare.
It were injuſtice to decry this now
For being like'd before, you may allow
(Your candor ſafe) what's taught in the olde ſchooles,
All ſuch as liv'd before you, were not fooles.

The Epilogue.

I Spake much in the Prologue for the Play,
To its deſert I hope, yet you might ſay
Should I change now from that, which then was meant,
Or in a ſyllable grow leſſe confident.
I were weake-hearted. I am ſtill the ſame
In my opinion, and forbeare to frame
Qualification, or excuſe: If you
Concur with me, and bold my judgement true.
Shew it with any ſigne, and from this place,
Or ſend me off exploded, or with grace.

THE NOBLE GENTLEMAN.

Actus Primus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Gentleman and Jaquet.

Gent. WHat happineſs waits on the life at Court,
What dear content, greatneſs, delight & eaſe?
What ever-ſpringing hopes, what tides of honour,
That raiſe their fortunes to the height of wiſhes?
What can be more in man, what more in nature,
Then to be great and fear'd? A Courtier,
A noble Courtier, 'Tis a name that drawes
Wonder, and dutie, from all eyes and knees.
Jaq. And ſo your Worſhips land within the walls,
Where you ſhall have it all inclos'd and ſure. (ſmoke,
Gent. Peace knave, dull creature, bred of ſweate and Theſe myſteries are far above thy faith:
But thou ſhalt ſee——
Jaq. And then I ſhall believe;
Your faire revenues, turn'd into faire ſuites,
I ſhall believe your Tenants bruis'd and rent
Under the weight of Coaches, all your ſtate
Drawn through the ſtreets in triumph, ſuits for places
Plied with a mine of gold, and being got
Fed with a great ſtreame, I ſhall believe all this.
Gent. You ſhall believe, and know me glorious.
Cozin good day and health. Enter Cozen.
Couzen. The ſame to you Sir,
And more, without my wiſhes, could you know
What calm content dwels in a private houſe:
Yet looke into your ſelfe, retire: this place
Of promiſes, and proteſtations, fits
Minds only bent to ruine, you ſhould know this,
You have their language perfect, you have tutors
I doe not doubt ſufficient: but beware.
Gent. You are merry Couzin:
Cozen. Yet your patience,
You ſhall learn that too, but not like it ſelfe
Where it is held a vertue; tell me Sir,
Have you caſt up your ſtate, rated your land,
And finde it able to endure the change
Of time and faſhion? is it alwayes harveſt?
Alwayes vintage? have you ſhips at Sea
To bring you gold, and ſtone from rich Peru
Monthly returning treaſure? doth the King
Open his large Exchequer to your hands
And bid you be a great man? can your wife
Coyne off her beauty? or the weeke allow
Suites to each day? and know no ebb in honour?
If theſe be poſſible, and can hold out,
Then be a Courtier ſtill, and ſtill be waſting,
Gen. Cozen, pray give me leave:
Couſ. I have done.
Gen. I could requite your gall, and in a ſtraine
As bitter, and as full of Rubarb, preache
Againſt your Countrey life, but 'tis below me
And only ſubject to my pitty, know
The eminent court, to them that can be wiſe,
And faſten on her bleſſings, is a ſunne
That drawes men up from courſe and earthly being,
I meane theſe men of merit that have power
And reaſon to make good her benefits,
Learns them a manly boldneſſe, gives their tongues
Sweetneſſe of language, makes them apt to pleaſe;
Files of all rudeneſſe, and uncivill haviour,
Shews them as neat in carriage as in cloaths;
Cozen have you ever ſeen the Court?
Couſ. No Sir,
Nor am I yet in travaile with that longing.
Gent. O the ſtate, and greatneſſe of that place
Where men are found
Only to give the firſt creation glory!
Thoſe are the models of the ancient world
Left like the Roman ſtatues to ſtir up
Our following hopes, the place it ſelfe puts on
The brow of Majeſtie, and flings her luſtre
Like the aire newly lightned, forme, and order,
Are only there themſelues, unforc't, and ſound,
As they were firſt created to this place.
Couſ. You nobly came, but will goe from thence baſe.
Gent. 'Twas very pretty, and a good conceite;
You have a wit good Cozen, I do joy in't,
Keep it for Court: but to my ſelfe againe,
When I have view'd theſe pieces, turn'd theſe eyes,
And with ſome taſte of ſuperſtition,
Lookt on the wealth of Nature, the faire dames,
Beauties, that lights the Court, and makes it ſhew
Like a faire heaven, in a froſty night:
And mongſt theſe mine, not pooreſt, 'tis for tongues
Of bleſſed Poets, ſuch as Orpheus was,
To give their worth and praiſes; O deare Cozen:
You have a wife, and faire, bring her hither,
Let her not live to be the Miſtris of a Farmers heir
And be confined ever to a ſerge,
Farre courſer then my horſe-cloath.
Let her have Velvets, Tiſſinies, Jewels, Pearls,
A Coach, an Uſher, and her two Lacquies,
And I will ſend my Wife to give her rules,
And trade the rudiments of Court to her.
Couſ. Sir I had rather ſend her to Virginia
To help to propagate the Engliſh nation. Enter Servant.
Gen. Sirra, how ſlept your Miſtris, and what viſitants
Are to pay ſervice?
Ser. Sir as I came out,
Two Counts were newly entered.
Gent. This is greatneſſe,
But few ſuch ſervants waite a Countrey beauty.
Couſ. They are the more to thank their modeſty,
God keep my wife, and all my Iſſue female
From ſuch uprisings. Enter a Doctor.
Gent. What? my learned Doctor?
You will be welcome, give her health and youth
And I will give you gold. Exit Doctor.
Cozen, how ſavours this? is it not ſweet?
And very great, taſts it not of Nobleneſſe?
Couſ. Faith Sir my pallat is too dull and lazie
I cannot taſte it, 'tis not for my reliſh,
But be ſo ſtill.
Since your own miſery muſt firſt reclaime ye,
To which I leave you Sir,
If you will yet be happy, leave the humour
And baſe ſubjection to your Wife, be wiſe,
And let her know with ſpeed you are her husband,
I ſhall be glad to heare it.
My horſe is ſent for, Exit.

Even ſuch another countrey thing as this
Was I, ſuch a piece of durt, ſo heavy,
So provident to heap up ignorance,
And be an aſſe: ſuch muſty cloaths wore I,
So old and threed-bare: I do yet remember
Divers young Gallants lighting at my gate,
To ſee my honoured wife, have offered pence,
And bid me walk their horſes, ſuch a ſlave
Was I in ſhew then: but my eyes are open'd.

Enter Gent. Wife.

Many ſweet morrows to my worthy Wife.

Wife. 'Tis well, and aptly given, as much for you,
But to my preſent buſineſſe, which is money——

Gent. Lady I have none left. (and lowe,

Wife. I hope you dare not ſay ſo, nor imagin ſo baſe
A thought: I have none left.
Are theſe words fitting for a man of worth,
And one of your full credite? Do you know
The place you live in? me, and what I labour
For, you? and your advancement?

Gent. Yes my deareſt.

Wife. And do you pop me off with this ſlight anſwer,
In troth I have none left: in troth you muſt have;
Nay ſtare not, 'tis moſt true, ſend ſpeedily
To all that love you, let your people flye
Like thunder through the Citie,
And not return under five thouſand crownes. (ted
Try all, take all, let not a wealthy merchant be untemp-
Or any that hath the name of money,
Take up at any uſe, give band, or land,
Or mighty ſtatutes able by their ſtrength
To tye up Sampſon were he now alive,
There muſt be money gotten; for be perſwaded,
If we fall now, or be but ſeen to ſhrinke,
Under our faire beginnings, 'tis our ruine,
And then good-night to all, (but our diſgrace)
Farewell the hope of comming happineſſe,
And all the aimes we levied at ſo long.
Are ye not mov'd at this? no ſenſe of want,
Toward's your ſelfe yet breeding? be old,
And common; jaded to the eyes
Of groomes, and pages, chamber-maides, and garders,
And when you have done, put your poor houſe in order
And hang your ſelfe, for ſuch muſt be the end
Of him that willingly forſakes his hopes
And hath a joy to tumble to his ruine.
All that I ſay is certaine, if ye faile
Do not impute me with it, I am cleare.

Gent. Now heaven forbid I ſhould do wrong to you
My deareſt Wife, and Madam; yet give leave
To your poore creature to unfold himſelfe.
You know my debts are many more then meanes,
My bands not taken in, my friends at home
Drawn dry with theſe expences, my poore Tenants
More full of want then we, then what new courſe
Can I beget to raiſe thoſe crowns by? ſpeake,
And I ſhall execute.

Wife. Pray tell me true,
Have you not land in the Countrey?

Gent. Pardon me, I had forgot it.

Wife. Sir, you muſt remember it,
There is no remedy, this land muſt be
In Paris ere to morrow night.

Gent. It ſhall, let me conſider, ſome 300. acres
Will ſerve the turne.

Wife. 'Twill furniſh at all poines,
Now you ſpeak like your ſelfe, and know like him,
That meanes to be man, ſuſpect no leſſe
For the return will give ye five for one,
You ſhall be great to morrow, I have ſaid it.
Farewell, and ſee this buſineſſe be a-foote
With expedition. Exit Wife.

Gent. Health, all joy, and honour
Waite on my lovely wife. What? Jaques, Iaques.

Enter Jaques.

Ja. Sir did you call?

Gent. I did ſo, hie the Iaques.
Downe to the Bancke, and there to ſome good Merchant
(Conceive me well good Iaques, and be private)
Offer 300. acres of my land:
Say it is choiſe, and fertile, aske upon it
Five thouſand Crowns, this is the buſineſſe
I muſt employ thee in, be wiſe and ſpeedy.

Ja. Sir do not do this.

Gent. Knave I muſt have money.

Ia. If you have money thus, your knave muſt tell ye
You will not have a foote of land left, be more warie
And more friend to your ſelfe, this honeſt land
Your Worſhip has diſcarded, has been true,
And done you loyall ſervice.

Gent. Gentle Iaques,
You have a merry wit, employ it well
About the buſineſſe you have now in hand.
When ye come backe, enquire me in the preſence,
If not, in the Tennis-Court, or at my houſe. Exit.

Ia. If this vaine hold, I know where to enquire ye.
Five thouſand crowns, this with good husbandry
May hold a month out, then 5000. more,
And more land a bleeding for't, as many more
And more land laid aſide. God and St. Dennis
Keep honeſt minded young men Bachellers.
'Tis ſtrange My Mr. ſhould be yet ſo young
A puppy, that he cannot ſee his fall
And got ſo neare the ſun. I'le to his Cozen
And once more tell him on't, if he faile,
Then to my mortgage, next unto my ſale. Exit.

Enter Longeville, Bewford, and the Servant.

Serv. Gentlemen, hold on diſcourſe a while,
I ſhall return with knowledge how, and where
We ſhall have beſt acceſſe unto my Miſtris
To Tender your devotions. Exit

Long. Be it ſo:
Now to our firſt diſcourſe.

Bew. I prethee peace;
Thou canſt not be ſo bad, or make me know
Such things are living, doe not give thy ſelfe
So common and ſo idle, ſo open vile,
So great a wronger of thy worth, ſo low,
I cannot, nor I muſt not credite thee.

Lon. Now by this light I am a Whore-maſter,
An open and an excellent Whore-maſter,
And take a ſpeciall glory that I am ſo:
I thank my ſtars I am a Whore-maſter,
And ſuch a one as dare be known and ſeen,
And pointed at to be a noble wencher.

Bew. Do not let all eares heare this, harke ye Sir,
I am my ſelfe a Whore-maſter, I am
Believe it Sir (In private be it ſpoken)
I love a VVhore directly, moſt men are Wenchers,
And have profeſt the ſcience, few men
That looks upon ye now, but Whore-maſters,
Or have a full deſire to be ſo.

Lon. This is noble.

Bew. It is without all queſtion, being private,
And held as needfull as intelligence,
But being once diſcover'd, blown abroad,

And

And known to common ſenſes, 'tis no more
Then geometrical rules in Carpenters
That only know ſome meaſure of an art,
But are not grounded: be no more deceived,
I have a conſcience to reclaim you, Sir.
Miſtake me not: I do not bid you leave your whore
Or leſſe to love her; forbid it
I ſhould be ſuch a villain to my friend,
Or ſo unnaturall: 'twas never harbor'd here,
Learn to be ſecret firſt, then ſtrike your Deere.
Long. Your faire inſtructions Monſieur I ſhall learn.
Bew. And you ſhall have them: I deſire your care.
Long. They are your ſervants.
Bew. You muſt not love.
Long. How Sir?
Bew. I meane a Lady, theres danger
Shee hath an Uſher and a Waiting-Gentlewoman,
A page, a Coach-man, theſe are feed, and fee'd
And yet for all that will be prating.
Long. So.
Bew. You underſtand me Sir, they will diſcover't,
And there is a loſſe of credite: table talke
Will be the end of this, or worſe, then that;
Will this be worthy of a Gentleman?
Long. Proceed good Sir.
Bew. Next leave your City Dame;
The beſt of that tribe are moſt meerly coy,
Or moſt extreamely fooliſh, both which vices
Are no great ſtirrers up, unleſſe in husbands
That owe this Cattle, fearing her thats coy
To be but ſeeming, her that's foole too forward.
Long. This is the rareſt fellow, and the ſoundeſt
I meane in knowledge, that ere wore a Codpiece,
H'as found out that will paſſe all Italy,
All France and England, to their ſhames I ſpeake
And to the griefes of all their Gentlemen
The noble theory of luxury.
Bew. Your patience,
And I will lay before your eyes a courſe
That I my ſelfe found out, 'tis excellent,
Eaſy, and full of freedome.
Long. O good Sir,
You rack me till I know it.
Bew. This it is,
When your deſire is up, your blood well heated
And apt for ſweet encounter, chuſe the night
And with the night your wench the ſtreets have ſtore,
There ſeize upon her, get her to your chamber,
Give her a cardecew, 'tis royall payment
When ye are dull, diſmiſſe her, no man knows
Nor ſhe her ſelfe, who hath encountred her.
Lon. O but their faces.
Bew. Nere talke of faces:
The night allows her equall with a Dutches,
Imagination doth all think her faire,
And great, clapt in velvet, ſhe is ſo
Sir, I have tryed thoſe, and do find it certaine
It never failes me, 'tis but twelve nights ſince
My laſt experience.
Lon. O my meiching varlet, I'le fit ye as I live.
'Tis excellent, I'le be your Scholler Sir.

Enter Lady and Servant.

Wife. You are fairly welcome both: troth Gentlemen
You have been ſtrangers, I could chide you for't,
And taske ye with unkindneſs, what's the news?
The towne was never empty of ſome novelty;
Servant, what's your intelligence?
Ser. Faith nothing.
I have not heard of any worth relating
Bew. Nor I ſweet Lady.
Lon. Then give me attention,
Monſieur Shattillion's mad.
Wife. Mad?
Lon. Mad as May-butter,
And which is more, mad for a wench.
Lady. 'Tis ſtrange, and full of pitty.
Lon. All that comes neare him
He thinks are come of purpoſe to betray him,
Being full of ſtrange conceite: the wench he loved
Stood very near the Crowne.
Lady. Alas good Monſieur;
A' was a proper man, and faire demean'd,
A perſon worthy of a better temper.
Lon. He is ſtrong opinion'd that the wench he loved
Remaines cloſe priſoner by the Kings command:
Fearing her title, when the poore grieved Gentlewoman
Follows him much lamenting, and much loving
In hope to make him well, he knows her not,
Nor any elſe that comes to viſite him.
Lady. Let's walk in Gentlemen, and there diſcourſe
His further miſeries, you ſhall ſtay dinner,
In truth you muſt obey.
Om. We are your ſervants. Exeunt.

Enter Couzen.

Couſ. Ther's no good to be done, no cure to be wrought
Upon my deſperate kinſman: I'le to horſe
And leave him to the fooles whip, miſery.
I ſhall recover twenty miles this night,
My horſe ſtands ready, I'le away with ſpeed.

Enter Shattillion.

Shat. Sir, may I crave your name?
Couſ. Yes Sir you may:
My name is Cleremon.
Shat. 'Tis wel, your faction?
What party knit you with?
Couſ. I know no parties,
Nor no factions Sir.
Shat. Then weare this croſſe of white:
And where you ſee the like they are my friends,
Obſerve them well, the time is dangerous. (fellow
Couſ. Sir keep your croſſe, I'le wear none, ſure this
Is much beſide himſelfe, grown mad.
Shat. A word Sir;
You can pick nothing out of this, this croſſe
Is nothing but a croſſe, a very croſſe,
Plaine without ſpell or witch-craft, ſearch it,
You may ſuſpect, and well, there's poyſon in't,
Powder, or wild-fire, but 'tis nothing ſo.
Couſ. I do beleeve you Sir, 'tis a plain croſſe.
Shat. Then do your worſt, I care not, tell the King,
Let him know all this, as I am ſure he ſhall;
When you have ſpit your venome, then will I
Stand up a faithfull, and a loyall ſubject,
And ſo God ſave His Grace, this is no Treaſon.
Couſ. He is March mad, farewell Monſieur. Exit Couzen.
Shat. Farewell;
I ſhall be here attending, 'tis my life
They aime at, there's no way to ſave it, well
Let 'em ſpread all their nets: they ſhall not draw me
Into any open Treaſon, I can ſee,
And can beware, I have my wits about me,
I thanke heaven for't.

Enter Love.

Love. There he goes,
That was the faireſt hope the French Court bred,
The worthieſt and the ſweeteſt temper'd ſpirit,

The truest, and the valiantest, the best of judgment,
Till most unhappy I: sever'd those vertues
And turn'd his wit wild with a coy deniall,
Which heaven forgive me, and be pleas'd, O heaven
To give againe his senses: that my love
May strike off all my follies.
Shat. Lady.
Lov. I Sis
Shat. Your will with me sweete Lady.
Lov Sir I come.
Shat. From the dread sourayne King, I know it Lady,
He is a gracious Prince, long may he live,
Pertaine you to his chamber?
Lov. No indeed Sir,
That place is not for women, do you know me?
Shat. Yes, I do know you.
Lov. Whats my name? pray you speake.
Shat. Thats all one, I do know you and your businesse,
You are discovered Lady, I am warie,
It stands upon my life; pray excuse me,
The best man of this kingdome sent you hither,
To dive into me, have I toucht you? ha?
Lov. You are deceiv'd Sir, I come from your love,
That sends you faire commends, and many kisses.
Shat. Alas poore soule how does she? is she living?
Keepes she her bed still?
Lov. Still Sir, She is living,
And well, and shall do so.
Shat. Are ye in counsell?
Lov. No Sir, nor any of my sex.
Shat. Why so,
If you had been in counsell, you would know,
Her time to be but slender; she must die.
Lov. I do believe it Sir.
Shat. And suddainely,
She stands too neare a fortune.
Lov. Sir?
Shat. 'Tis so,
There is no jesting with a Princes title,
Would we had both been borne of common parents
And liv'd a private and retired life,
In homely cottage, we had then enjoyed,
Our loves, and our embraces, these are things,
That cannot tend to treason—
Lov. I am wretched.
Shat. O I pray as often for the King as any,
And with as true a hart, for's continuance,
And do moreover pray his heires may live;
And their faire issues, then as I am bound
For all the states and commons, if these prayers
Be any wayes ambitious, I submit,
And lay my head downe let 'em take it off;
You may informe against me, but withall
Remember my obedience to the crowne,
And service to the state.
Lov. Good Sir, I love yee.
Shat. Then love the gratious King, and say with me
Lov. Heaven save his grace.
Shat. This is strange——
A woman should be sent to undermine me,
And but love into me to try my spirit;
Offer me kisses and enticing follies,
To make me open and betray my selfe;
It was a subtle and a dangerous plot,
And very soundly followed, farewell Lady,
Let me have equall hearing, and relate
I am an honest man. Heaven save the King. Exit.
Love. I'le never leave him, till by art or prayer
I have restorde his senses, If I make Him perfect man againe, he's mine still, when
I here abjure all loves of other men. Exit

Enter. Cozen, and Jaques.

Jaques. Nay, good Sir be perswaded, go but back,
And tell him hee's undone, say nothing else;
And you shall see how things will worke upon't.
Cozen. Not so good Jaques, I am held an asse
A country foole, good to converse with durte
And eate course bread, weare the worst woll,
Know nothing but the high way to Paris,
And wouldst thou have me bring these staynes,
And imperfections to the rising veiw
Of the right worshipfull thy worthy Master?
They must be bright and shine, their cloathes
Soft velvet and the trojan purple
Like the Arabian gums, hung like the Sun,
Their golden beames on all sides;
Such as these may come and know,
Thy Master, I am base and dare not speake unto him,
Hee's above me.
Ja. If ever you did love him, or his fame,
His name, his issue, or your selfe, go backe:
'Twill be an honest and a noble part
Worthy a kinsman, save 300 acres
From present executions they have had sentence,
And cannot be repriev'd, but mercifull.
Co. Have I not urg'd already all the reasons,
I had to draw him from his will? his ruine?
But all in vaine, no counsell will prevaile,
Has fixt himselfe, ther's no removing Jaques,
'Twil prove but breath and labour spent in vaine,
I'le to my horse, farewell.
Ja. For Gods sake Sir,
As ever you have hope of joy turne backe;
I'le be your slave for ever, do but go,
And I will lay such faire directions to you
That if hee be not doting on his fall,
He shall recover sight, and see his danger,
And ye shall tell him of his wives abuses,
I feare, to foule against him; how she plots,
With our young Mounsiers, to milke dry her husband,
And lay it on their backs, the next her pride,
Then what his debts are, and how infinite
The curses of his tenants; this will worke
I'le pawne my life and head, he cryes away,
I'le to my house in the Countrey.
Co. Come I'le go, and once more try him,
If he yeild not, so,
The next that tryes him shall be want and woe. Exeunt

Actus Secundus.

Enter. Gentleman Solus.

Gent. Jaques.
Jaq. Sir. within.
Gent. Rise Jaques 'tis growne day,
The country life is best, where quietly
Free from the clamour of the troubled Court,
We may enjoy our own greene shadowed walkes,
And keepe a moderate diet without art.
Why did I leave my house and bring my wife,
To know the manner of this subtile place?
I would when first the lust to fame in honour,
Possest me, I had met with any evill.

But

But that, had I been tyed to ſtay at home
And earn the bread for the whole family
With my own hand happy had I been.

Enter Jaques.

Ja. Sir this is from your wonted courſe at home,
When did ye there keep ſuch inordinate hours?
Goe to bed late? ſtart thrice and call on me?
Would you were from this place; our Country ſleepes,
Although they were but of that moderate length
That might maintain us in our daily worke,
Yet were they ſound and ſweet. (ly together;
Gent. I Jaques, there we dreamt not of our wives, nee
And needed not; now at length my Cozins words,
So truly ment, mixt with thy timely prayers
So often urged, to keepe me at my home,
Condemne me quite.
Ja. 'Twas not your fathers courſe:
He liv'd and dy'd in Orleance, where he had
His Vines as fruitfull as experienced
(Which is the art of husbandry) could make;
He had his preſſes for 'em, and his wines
Were held the beſt, and out-ſold other mens,
His corne and cattell ſerv'd the neighbour Townes
With plentifull proviſion, yet his thrift
Could miſſe one beaſt amongſt the heard,
He rul'd more where he liv'd, then ever you will here.
Gent. 'Tis true, why ſhould my wife then gainſt my Perſwade me to continue in this courſe? (good,
Ja. Why did you bring her hither at the firſt,
Before you warm'd her blood with new delights!
Our countrey ſports could have contented her,
When you firſt married her; a puppet-play
Pleas'd her as well as now the tilting doth.
She thought her ſelfe brave in a bugle chaine,
Where Orient pearle will ſcarce content her now.
Gent. Sure Jaques, ſhe ſees ſomething for my good
More then I doe, ſhe oft will talk to me
Of offices, and that ſhe ſhortly hopes
By her acquaintance with the friends ſhe hath
To get a place ſhall many times outway
Our great expences, and if this be ſo ——
Ja. Think better of her words, ſhe doth deceive you,
And only for her vaine and ſenſuall ends
Perſwade ye thus. Let me be ſet to dwell
For ever naked in the bareſt ſoile
So you will dwell from hence.
Gent. I ſee my folly,
Packe up my ſtuffe, I will away this morne.
Haſte—haſte.
Ja. I, Now I ſee your Fathers honours
Trebling upon you, and the many prayers
The countrey ſpent for him, which almoſt now
Begun to turn to curſes, turning backe,
And falling like a timely ſhower
Upon ye.
Gent. Goe, call up my wife.
Ja. But ſhall ſhe not prevaile,
And ſway you, as ſhe oft hath done before?
Gent. I will not heare her, but raile on her
Till I be ten miles off.
Ja. If you be forty,
'Twill not be worſe Sir.
Gent. Call her up,
Ja. I will Sir. Exit.
Gent. Why what an Aſſe was I that ſuch a thing
As a wife is could rule me?
Know not I that woman was created for the man,
That her deſires, nay all her thoughts ſhould be
As his are? is my ſenſe reſtor'd at length?
Now ſhe ſhall know, that which ſhe ſhould deſire,
She hath a husband that can govern her.

Enter Wife.

If her deſires leades me againſt my will;
Are you come?
Wife. What did unwonted courſe
Makes you riſe ſo ſoone, that went to bed
So late laſt-night.
Gent. O you ſhall goe to bed ſooner hereafter,
And be rais'd againe at thriftie hours,
In Summer-time wee'l walke
An houre after our ſupper, and to bed,
In winter you ſhall have a ſet at Cards,
And ſet your maids to worke.
Wife. What do you meane?
Gent. I wil no more of your new tricks, your honours,
Your offices, and all your large preferments,
Which ſtill you beate into my eares, hang ore me.
I'le leave behind for others, the great ſway
Which I ſhall beare at Court; my living here
With countenance of your honoured friends,
I'le be content to looſe: for you ſpeake this
Only that you may ſtill continue here
In wanton eaſe; and draw me to conſume
In cloaths and other things idle for ſhew
That which my Father got with honeſt thrift.
Wife. Why, who hath been with you Sir,
That you talke thus out of Frame.
Gent. You make a foole of me:
You provide one to bid me forth to ſupper
And make me promiſe; then muſt ſome one or other
Invite you forth, if you have borne your ſelfe
Looſely to any Gentleman in my ſight
At home, you aſk me how I like the carriage,
Whether it were not rarely for my good,
And open'd not a way to my preferment?
Come I perceive all: talke not, we'le away.
Wife. Why Sir, you'le ſtay till the next triumph
Day be paſt?
Gent. I, you have kept me here triumphing
This ſeven yeares, and I have ridden through the ſtreetes,
And bought embroyderd hoſe and foote-cloths too,
To ſhew a ſubjects zeale, I rode before
In this moſt gorgeous habit, and ſaluted
All the acquaintance I could eſpie
From any window, theſe were wayes ye told me
To raiſe me; I ſee all: make you ready ſtraight,
And in that gowne which you came firſt to Town in,
Your ſafe-guard, cloake, and your hood ſuitable:
Thus on a duble gelding ſhall you amble,
And my man Jaques ſhall be ſet before you.
Wife. But will you goe?
Gent. I will.
Wife. And ſhall I too?
Gen. And you ſhall too.
Wife. But ſhall I by this light?
Cen. Why by this light you ſhall.
Wife. Then by this light
You have no care of your eſtate, and mine.
Have we been ſeven years venturing in a ſhip,
And now upon return with a faire winde
And a calme ſea, full fraught with our own wiſhes
Laden with wealth and honour to the brim,
And ſhall we ſhye away and not receive it?
Have we been tilling, ſowing, labouring
With paine and charge a long and tedious winter,
And when we ſee the corne above the ground,

Youthful!

Youthfull as is the morne and full eare
That promiſes to ſtuffe our ſpatious garners,
Shall we then let it rot, and never reap it?
1 Gent. Wife talke no more, your Retoricke comes too late,
am inflixable; and how dere you
Adventure to direct my courſe of life?
Was not the husband mad to rule the wife?
Wife. 'Tis true but where the man doth miſſe his way,
It is the womans part to ſet him right;
So Fathers have a power to guide their Sonnes
In all their courſes, yet you oft have ſeene
Poore litle children that have both their eyes
Lead their blind Fathers.
Gen. She has a plaguy witt,
I ſay you'r but a little piece of man.
Wife. But ſuch a peice, as being taneaway
Man cannot laſt: the faireſt and talleſt ſhip,
That ever ſaild, is by a little peice of the ſame
Wood, ſteerd right, and turnd about.
Gen. 'Tis true ſhe ſayes, her anſwers ſtand with reaſon.
Wife. But Sir, your Cozin put this in your head
Who is an enemie to your preferment,
Becauſe I ſhould not take place of his wife;
Come by this kiſſe thou ſhalt not go ſweete heart.
Gen. Come, by this kiſſe I will goe Sweet-heart,
On with your riding ſtuffe; I know your tricks,
And if preferment fall ere you be ready,
'Tis welcome, elſe adue the Citie life.
Wife. Well Sir I will obey.
Gent. About it then,
Wife. To pleaſe your humour I would dreſſe my ſelfe,
In the moſt loathſome habit you could name
Or travell any whether ore the world
If you command me, it ſhall neere be ſaid
The fraylty of a woman whoſe weake minde,
Is often ſet on looſe delights and ſhewes,
Hath drawne her husband to conſume his ſtate,
In the vaine hope of that which never fell.
Gen. About it then, women are pleaſant creatures,
When once a man begins to know himſelfe.
Wife But harke you Sir becauſe I wilbe ſure,
You ſhall have no excuſe, no word to ſay
In your defence hereafter; when you ſee
What honours were preparde for you and me
Which you thus willingly have throwne away,
I tell you I did looke for preſent honour,
This morning for you, which I know had come
But if they do not come ere I am ready
(Which I will be the ſooner leaſt they ſhould)
When I am once ſet in a countrey life,
Not all the power of earth ſhall alter me,
Not all your prayers or threats ſhall make me ſpeak
The Leaſt words to my honourable freinds
To do you any grace.
Gent. I will not wiſh it.
Wife. And never more hope to be honourable,
Gent. My hopes are lower.
Wife. As I live you ſhall not,
You ſhall be ſo farr from the name of noble
That you ſhall never ſee a Lord againe;
You ſhall not ſee a maske, or Barriers,
Or tilting or a ſolemn chriſtning,
Or a great marriage, or new fire-works,
Or any bravery; but you ſhall live
At home beſpotted with your owne loved durt
In ſcurvy cloathes as you were wont to doe,
And to content you I will live ſo too.
Gen. 'Tis all I wiſh, make haſt the day drawes on,
It ſhall be my care to ſee your ſtuffe pact up.
Wife. It ſhal be my care to gul you: you ſhal ſtay. Ex. Gen.
And more then ſo intreat me humbly too
You ſhall have honours preſently; Maria.

Enter Maria.

Mar. Madam.
Wife. Bring hither, pen, Inke, and paper.
Ma. 'Tis here.
Wife. Your Maſter Will not ſtay,
Unleſſe preferment come within an houre.
Mar. Let him commande one of the Citie gates
In time of mutiny, or you may provide him,
To be one of the counſell for invading,
Some ſavage countrey to plant chriſtian faith.
Wife. No, no, I have it for him, call my page
Now my deare husband there it is will fit you. Exit Maria
And when the world ſhall ſee what I have done,
Let it not move the ſpleene of any wife,
To make an aſſe of her beloved husband
Without good ground, but if they will be drawne
To any reaſon by you, do not gull them;
But if they grow conceited of themſelves,
And be fine Gentlemen, have no mercie,
Publiſh them to the world, 'twill do them good
When they ſhall ſee their follies underſtood,
Go beare theſe letters to my ſervant,
And bid him make haſt, I will dreſſe my ſelfe,
In all the journey cloathes I uſed before
Not to ride but to make the laughter more. Exit.

Enter. Gentleman. and Jaques.

Gent. Is all pact up?
Ja. All, all Sir, there is no tumbler,
Runs throw his hoop with more dexteritie
Then I aboute this buſineſſe: tis a day
That I have long longd to ſee.
Gent. Come wheres my ſpurs?
Ja. Here Sir, and now 'tis come.
Gent. I Jaques now
I thanke my fates, I can command my wife.
Ja. I am glad to ſee it Sir.
Gent. I do not love alwayes,
To be made a puppie, Iaques.
Ja. But yet me thinkes your worſhip does not looke,
Right like a countrey Gentleman.
Gent. I will, give me my tother hat.
Ja. Here.
Gen. So, my Ierkin.
Ja. Yes Sir.
Gent. On with it Jaques, thou and I
Will live ſo finely in the countrey, Jaques,
And have ſuch pleaſant walks into the woods
A mornings, and then bring whom riding rods,
And walking ſtaves.—
Ja. And I will beare them Sir,
And skurdge-ſticks for the children.
Gen. So thou ſhalt,
And thou ſhalt do all, over ſee my worke folkes
And at the weekes end pay them all their wages.
Ja. I will Sir, ſo your worſhip give me mony.
Gent, Thou ſhalt receive all too: give me my drawers
Ja. They are ready Sir.
Gent. And I will make thy Miſtriſs,
My wife, looke to her landrie and her dayry,
That we may have our linnen cleane on Sundayes.
Ja. And holy dayes.
Gent. I and ere we walke about the grounds
Provide our breake-faſt,
Or ſhe ſhall ſmoke, I'le have her a good huswife

And

She ſhall not make a voyage to her ſiſters,
But ſhe ſhall live at home,
And feed her pullen fat, and ſee her maides
In bed before her, and locke all the doores
Ja. Why that will be a life for Kings and Queenes.
Gen. Give me my Scarfe with the great button quickly.
Ia. 'Tis done Sir.
Gen. Now my Mittens.
Ia. Here they are Sir.
Gen. 'Tis well? now my great dagger.
Ia. There.
Gen. Why ſo; thus it ſhould be, now my riding rod.
Iaq. There's nothing wanting Sir.
Gen. Another, man, to ſticke under my girdle.
Ia. There it is.
Gen. All is well.
Ia. Why now me thinks your Worſhip looks
Like to your ſelfe, a man of meanes and credit,
So did your grave and famous Anceſtors,
Ride up and down to faires, and cheapen cattell.
Gent. Goe, haſten your Miſtriſſe, Sirra.
Ia. It ſhall be done. Exit Iaques.

Enter ſervant and Page.

Ser. Who's that? who's that boy?
Page. I thinke it be my Maſter. (rod?
Ser. Who, he that walkes in gray whiſking his riding
Page. Yes Sir, 'tis he.
Ser. 'Tis he indeed; he is prepar'd
For his new journey; when I wink upon you
Runne out and tell the Gentleman 'tis time——
Monſieur good day. (dy.
Gen. Monſieur your Miſtriſſe is within, but yet not rea-
Ser. My buſineſſe is with you Sir; 'tis reported,
I know not whether by ſome enemie
Maliciouſly that envies your great hopes,
And would be ready to ſow diſcontents
Betwixt his Majeſty and you, or truly,
Which on my faith I would be ſorry for,
That you intend to leave the Court in haſt.
Gen. Faith Sir within this halfe houre. Iaques?
Iaques within: Sir?
Gen. Is my wife ready?
Ia. Preſently.
Ser. But Sir,
I needs muſt tell you as I am your friend,
You ſhould have tane your journey privater
For 'tis already blaz'd about the Court.
Gen. Why Sir, I hope it is no Treaſon, is it?
Ser. 'Tis true Sir, but 'tis grown the common talk,
There's no diſcovery elſe held, and in the preſence
All the Nobility and Gentry
Have nothing in their mouths but only this,
Monſieur Marine that noble Gentleman,
Is now departing hence, every mans face
Looks ghaſtly on his fellows, ſuch a ſadneſſe
(Before this day) I nere beheld in Court,
Mens hearts begin to faile them when they heare it,
In expectation of the great event
That needs muſt follow it, pray heaven it be good!
Gen. Why I had rather all their hearts ſhould faile
Then I ſtay here untill my purſe faile me.
Ser. But yet you are a Subject, and beware
I charge you by the love I beare to you
How you doe venture raſhly on a courſe
To make your ſoveraign jealous of your deeds
For Princes jealouſies where they love moſt,
Are eaſily found, but they be hardly loſt.
Gen. Come theſe are tricks, I ſmell 'em, I will goe.
Ser. Have I not ſtill profeſt my ſelfe your friend?
Gen. Yes, but you never ſhewd it to me yet.
Ser. But now I will, becauſe I ſee you wiſe,
And give ye thus much light into a buſineſſe
That came to me but now, be reſolute,
Stand ſtiffly to it that you will depart,
And preſently.
Gen. Why ſo I meane to doe.
Ser. And by this light you may be what you will;
Will you be ſecret Sir?
Gen. Why? what's the matter?
Ser. The King does feare you.
Gent. How?
Ser. And is now in Counſell;
Gent. About me;
Ser. About you, and you be wiſe,
You'l finde hee's in Counſell about you?
His Councellours have told him all the truth.
Gent. What truth?
Ser. Why? that which now he knows too well.
Gent. What is't?
Ser. That you have followed him ſeven years
With a great traine: and though he have not grac't you,
Yet you have div'd into the hea ts of thouſands,
With liberality and noble carriage;
And if you ſhould depart home unprefer'd
All diſcontented, and ſeditious ſpirits
Would flocke to you and thruſt you into action:
With whoſe help, & your Tenants, who doth not know
(If you were ſo diſpos'd:)
How great a part of this yet fertile peaceful realm of Fran.
You might make deſolate? but when the King
Heard this ——
Gent. what ſaid he?
Ser. Nothing, but ſhook,
As never Chriſtian Prince did ſhake before.
And to be ſhort you may be what you will?
But be not ambitious Sir, ſit downe
With moderate honours, leaſt you make your ſelfe
More feard.
Gent. I know Sir what I have to doe
In mine own buſineſſe. Enter Longavile.
Long. Where's Monſieur Mount Marine.
Ser. Why there he ſtands, will you ought with him?
Long. Yes: Good day Monſieur Marine.
Gent. Good day to you.
Long. His Majeſty doth commend himſelfe,
Moſt kindly to you Sir, and hath by me,
Sent you this favour: kneele downe, riſe a Knight.
Gent. I thank his Majeſty.
Long. And he doth further requeſt you,
Not to leave the Court ſo ſoone,
For though your former merits have been ſlighted,
After this time there ſhall no Office fall;
Worthy your ſpirit, as he doth confeſſe
There's none ſo great, but you ſhall ſurely have it.
Ser. Do you heare, if you yield yet you are an aſſe.
Gent. I'le ſhew my ſervice to his Majeſty
In greater things then theſe, but for this ſmall one
I muſt intreat his Highneſſe to excuſe me.
Long. I'le beare your Knightly words unto the King,
And bring his Princely anſwer backe againe. Exit Long.
Ser. VVell ſaid, be reſolute a while, I know
There is a tide of honours comming on.
I warrant you.

Enter Bewford.

Bew. VVhere is this new made Knight?
Gent. Here Sir.

Bew. Let me enfold you in my arms,
Then call you Lord, the King will have it ſo,
Who doth entreat your Lordſhip to remember
His meſſage ſent to you by Longavile.
Ser. If ye be durty, and dare not mount aloft;
You may yield now, I know what I would do.
Gent. Peace, I will fit him; tell his Majeſty
I am a Subject, and I do confeſſe
I ſerve a gracious Prince, that thus hath heapt
Honours on me without deſert, but yet
As for the meſſage, buſineſſe urgeth me,
I muſt be gone, and he muſt pardon me,
Were he ten thouſand Kings and Emperours.
Bew. I'le tell him ſo.
Ser. Why, this was like your ſelfe.
Bew. As he hath wrought him, 'tis the fineſt fellow
That ere was Chriſtmas Lord, he carries it
So truly to the life, as though he were
One of the plot to gull himſelfe. Exit Bewf.
Ser. Why ſo, you ſent the wiſeſt and the ſhrewdeſt
Unto the King, I ſwear, my honoured friend
That ever any Subject ſent his Liege.
Gent. Nay now I know I have him on the hip,
I'le follow it.

Enter Longavile.

Long. My honourable Lord,
Give me your noble hand right courteous Peer,
And from henceforth be a courtly Earl;
The King ſo wills, and Subjects muſt obey:
Only he doth deſire you to conſider
Of his requeſt.
Ser. Why faith you'r well my Lord, yield to him.
Gent. Yield? why 'twas my plot.
Ser. Nay 'twas your wives plot.
Gent. To get preferment by it,
And thinks he now to pop me ith mouth
But with an Earldome, Ile be one ſtep higher.
Ser. 'Tis the fineſt Lord, I am afraid anon
He will ſtand upon't to ſhare the Kingdome with him.

Enter Bewford.

Bew. Wher's this Courtly Earle?
His Majeſty commends his love unto you;
And will you but now grant to his requeſt,
He bids you be a Duke, and chuſe of whence.
Ser. Why if you yield not now, you are undone,
What can you wiſh to have more, but the Kingdome?
Gent. So pleaſe his Majeſty, I would be Du. of Burgundy
Becauſe I like the place.
Bew. I Know the King is pleas'd.
Gen. Then will I ſtay and kiſſe his Highneſſe hand.
Bew. His Majeſty wil be a glad man when he hears it.
Lon. But how ſhall we keep this from the worlds eare
That ſome one tell him not, he is no Duke?
Ser. Wee'l think of that anon.
Why Gentlemen, is this a gracious habit for a Duke?
Each gentle body ſet a finger to
To pluck the clouds of this his riding weeds
From off the orient ſunne of his beſt cloths;
I'le pluck one boot and ſpur off.
Long. I another.
Bew. Ile pluck his Jerkin off.
Ser. Sit down my Lord;
Both his ſpurs off at once good Longavile
And Bewford take that ſcarfe off, and that hat
Doth not become his largely ſprouting fore-head.
Now ſet your gracious foot to this of mine,
One pluck will do it, ſo, off with the other.
Lon. Loe thus your ſervant Longavile doth pluck
The trophy of your former gentry off,
Off with his Jerkin Bewford.
Ser. Didſt thou never ſee
A nimble footed Taylor ſtand ſo in his ſtockings,
Whilſt ſome friend help to pluck his Jerkin off,
To dance a Jigg?

Enter Jaques.

Lon. Here's his man Jaques come
Booted and ready ſtill.
Ja. My Miſtris ſtayes;
Why how now Sir? what do your Worſhip mean,
To plucke your grave and thrifty habit off?
Gent. My ſlippers, Jaques.
Lon. O thou mighty Duke
Pardon this man,
That thus hath treſpaſſed in ignorance.
Gent. I pardon him.
Lon. His Graces ſlippers, Jaques.
Ia. Why what's the matter?
Lon. Foot-man, hee's a Duke:
The King hath rais'd him above all his land.
Ja. I'le to his Couzen preſently, and tell him ſo;
O what a dung-hill countrey rogue was I! Exit Iaques.

Enter Wife.

Ser. See, ſee, my Miſtriſſe.
Lon. Let's obſerve their greeting.
Wife. Unto your will as every good wife ought,
I have turnd all my thoughts, and now am ready.
Gent. O Wife I am not worthy to kiſſe the leaſt
Of all thy toes, much leſſe thy thumb,
Which yet I would be bold with; all thy counſell
Hath been to me Angelicall, but mine to thee
Hath been moſt durty like my mind:
Deare Ducheſſe I muſt ſtay.
Wife. What are you mad to make me
Dreſſe, and undreſſe, turne and winde me,
Becauſe you find me pliant? ſaid I not
The whole world ſhould not alter me, if once
I were reſolv'd? and now you call me Ducheſſe:
Why what's the matter?
Gent. Loe a Knight doth kneel.
Wife. A Knight?
Gent. A Lord.
Wife. A foole.
Gent. I ſay doth kneele an Earle, a Duke.
Long. In drawers.
Bew. Without ſhoes.
Wife. Sure you are lunatick.
Ser. No honoured Ducheſſe
If you dare but believe your ſervants truth,
I know he is a Duke.
Long. God ſave his Grace.
Wife. I aske your Graces pardon.
Gent. Then I riſe,
And here in token that all ſtrife ſhall end
'Twixt thee and me, I let my drawers fall
And to thy hands I do deliver them:
Which ſignifies, that in all acts and ſpeeches,
From this time forth my wife ſhall wear the breeches.
Ser. An honourable compoſition. Exeunt omnes.

Actus Tertius.

Enter Couſen and Iaques.

Couſ. Shall I beleeve thee Iaques.

Ia. Sir

Ja. Sir you may.
Couſ. Didſt thou not dreame?
Ja. I did not.
Coz. Nor imagine?
Ja. Neither of both: I ſaw him great and mighty,
I ſaw the Monſieurs bow, and heard them cry
Good health and fortune to my Lord the Duke.
Couſ. A Duke art ſure? a Duke?
Ja. I am ſure a Duke,
And ſo ſure as I know my ſelfe for Jaques.
Couſ. Yet the ſun may dazell? Jaques, was it not
Some leane Commander of an angry Block-houſe
To keep the ſleamiſh Eele-boats from invaſion,
Or ſome bold Baron able to diſpend
His fifty pounds a yeare, and meet the foe
Upon the Kings command in gilded canvas,
And do his deeds of worth? or was it not
Some place of gaine, as Clerk to the great Band
Of maribones, that people call the Switzers?
Men made of beefe, and ſarcenet? (preſence?
Ja. Is a Duke his chamber hung with Nobles like a
Couſ. I am ſomething wavering in my faith;
Would you would ſettle me, and ſweare 'tis ſo,
Is he a Duke indeed?
Ja. I ſweare he is.
Couſ. I am ſatisfied, he is my Kinſman Jaques,
And I his poor unworthy Couzen.
Ja. True Sir.
Couſ. I might have been a Duke too, I had meanes,
A wife as faire as his, and as wiſe as his;
And could have brookt the Court as well as his,
And laid about her for her husbands honour:
O Jaques had I ever dreamt of this,
I had prevented him.
Ja. Faith Sir it came
Above our expectation, we were wiſe
Only in ſeeking to undoe this honour;
Which ſhewed our dung-hill breeding and our durt.
Couſ. But tell me Iaques,
Why could we not perceive? what dull Divell
Wrought us to croſſe this noble courſe, perſwading
Twould be his overthrow? for me a Courtier
Is he that knows all, Iaques, and does all,
'Tis as his noble Grace hath often ſaid,
And very wiſely, Jaques, we are fooles,
And underſtand juſt nothing.
Ia. I, as we were, I confeſſe it.
But riſing with our great Maſter,
We ſhall be call'd to knowledge with our places,
'Tis nothing to be wiſe, not thus much there,
Ther's not the leaſt of the billet dealers,
Nor any of the Paſtry, or the Kitchin,
But have it in meaſure delicate.
Coz. Me thinks this greatneſs of the Dukes my Couzens
(I aske you mercy, Iaques, that near name
Is too familiar for me) ſhould give promiſe
Of ſome great benefits to his attendants.
Ja. I have a ſuite my ſelfe, and it is ſure,
Or I miſtake my ends much.
Couſ. What is't Iaques,
May I not crave the place?
Ja. Yes Sir you ſhall,
'Tis to be but his Graces Secretary,
Which is my little all, and my ambition,
Till my known worth ſhall take me by the hand
And ſet me higher; how the fates may do
In this poor threed of life is yet uncertaine;
I was not born I take it for a trencher,
Nor to eſpouſe my Miſtris Dairy-maid.
Couſ. I am reſolv'd my wife ſhall up to Court;
I'le furniſh her, that is a ſpeeding courſe,
And cannot chuſe but breed a mighty fortune;
What a fine youth was I, to let him ſtart,
And get the riſe before me? I'le diſpatch
And put my ſelfe in moneys.
Ja. Maſſe 'tis true,
And now you talke of money, Sir my buſineſſe
For taking thoſe Crowns muſt be diſpatcht;
This little plot in the Countrey lies moſt fit
To do his Grace ſuch ſerviceable uſes,
I muſt about it.
Couſ. Yet before you goe
Give me your hand, and bear my humble ſervice
To the great Duke your Maſter, and his Ducheſſe,
And live your ſelfe in favour: ſay my wife
Shall there attend them ſhortly, ſo farewell.
Ja. I'le ſee you mounted Sir.
Couſ. It may not be,
Your place is far above it, ſpare your ſelfe,
And know I am your ſervant, fare ye well. Exit Couſen.
Ja. Sir I ſhall reſt to be commanded by you;
This place of Secretary will not content me,
I muſt be more and greater, let me ſee,
To be a Baron is no ſuch great matter
As people take it: for ſay I were a Count,
I am ſtill an under perſon to this Duke,
Which me thinks ſounds but harſhly: but a Duke?
O I am ſtrangely taken, 'tis a Duke
Or nothing, I'le adviſe upon't, and ſee
What may be done by wit and induſtry. Exit.

Enter Wife, Longoveil, Bewford, Servants.

Wife. It muſt be carried cloſely with a care
That no man ſpeak unto him, or come near him
Without our private knowledge, or be made
Afore-hand to our practice:
My good husband
I ſhall entreat you now to ſtay a while,
And prove a noble coxcomb:
Gentlemen,
Your counſell and advice about this carriage.
Ser. Alas good man, I do begin to mourn
His dire maſſacre: what a perſecution
Is pouring down upon him? ſure he is ſinfull.
Long. Let him be kept in's chamber under ſhew
Of ſtate and dignity, and no man ſufferd
To ſee his noble face, or have acceſſe,
But we that are Conſpirators. (his Tenants,
Bew. Or elſe down with him into the countrey amongſt
There he may live far longer in his greatneſſe,
And play the foole in pompamongſt his fellows.
Wife. No, he ſhall play the foole in the City, and ſtay
I will not looſe the greatneſſe of this jeſt
That ſhal be given to my wit for the whole revenues.
Ser. Then thus wee'l have a guard about his perſon,
That no man come too neare him, and our ſelves
Alwayes in company; have him into the City
To ſee his face ſwell; whilſt in divers corners,
Some of our own appointing ſhall be ready
To cry heaven bleſſe your Grace, long live your Grace.
Wife. Servant, your counſells excellent good,
And ſhall be followed, 'twill be rarely ſtrange
To ſee him ſtated thus, as though he went
A ſhroving through the City, or intended
To ſet up ſome new ſtake:
I ſhall not hold
From open laughter when I heare him crye

Come hither my ſweet Dutcheſſe: let me kiſſe
Thy gracious lips: for this will be his phraſes?
I feare me nothing but his legs will breake
Under his mighty weight of ſuch a greatneſſe.
Bew. Now me thinks deareſt Lady you are too cruell;
His very heart will freeze in knowing this.
Wife. No, no, the man was never of ſuch deepneſſe
To make conceite his Maſter: Sir I'le aſſure ye
He will out-live twenty ſuch pageants.
Were he but my Cozen or my Brother,
And ſuch a deſperate killer of his fortune,
In this beliefe he ſhould dye, though it coſt me
A thouſand crowns a day to hold it up;
Or were I not known his wife, and ſo to have
An equall feeling of this ill he ſuffers,
He ſhould be thus till all the boyes i'th Towne
Made ſute to weare his badges in their hats,
And walke before his Grace with ſticks and noſe-gayes,
We married women hold——
Ser. 'Tis well, no more.
The Duke is entring, ſet your faces right,
And bow like Countrey prologues: here he comes.
Make roome afore, the Duke is entring.

Enter Duke.

Long. The choiceſt fortunes waite upon our Duke,
Ser. And give him all content and happineſſe.
Bew. Let his great name live to the end of time.
Duke. We thank you, and are pleas'd to give you notice
We ſhall at fitter times wait on your Loves,
Till when, be neare Us.
Long. 'Tis a valiant purge, and works extreamly;
'Tas delivered him
Of all Right worſhipfull and gentle humours,
And left his belly full of nobleneſſe.
Du. It pleaſed the King my Maſter
For ſundry vertues not unknown to him,
And the all-ſeeing ſtate, to lend his hand
And raiſe me to this Emminence, how this
May ſeeme to other men, or ſtir the mindes
Of ſuch as are my fellow Peers, I know not,
I would deſire their loves in juſt deſignes.
Wife. Now by my faith he does well, very well:
Beſhrew my heart I have not ſeen a better
Of a raw fellow, that before this day
Never rehearſt his ſtate: 'tis marvellous well.
Ser. Is he not Duke indeed, ſee how he lookes
As if his ſpirit were a laſt, or two Above his veines, and ſtretcht his noble hide. (not.
Long. Hee's high brac't like a drum, pray God he breake
Bew. Why let him break, ther's but a Calves-skin loſt.
Long. May it pleaſe your Grace to ſee the City,
Twill be to the minds and much contentment
Of the doubtfull people.
Du. I am determin'd ſo, till my returne
I leave my honoured Dutcheſſe to her chamber.
Be carefull of your health, I pray you be ſo.
Ser. Your grace ſhall ſuffer us your humble ſervants
To give attendance fit ſo great a perſon
Upon your body.
Duke. I am pleaſed ſo.
Long. Away good Bewford, raiſe a guard ſufficient
To keep him from the reach of tongues, be quicke;
And do you heare, remember how the ſtreets
Muſt be diſpos'd with for cryes, and ſalutations.
Your grace determines not to ſee the King——
Du. Not yet, I ſhall be ready ten dayes hence
To kiſſe his highneſſe hand, and give him thanks,
As it is fit I ſhould for his great bounty
Set forward Goentlemen.
Groom. Room for the Duke there. Exeunt Duke & traine.
Wife. 'Tis fit he ſhould have room to ſhew his mighti-
He ſwels ſo with his poyſon, (neſſe,
'Tis better to reclaim ye thus, then make
A ſheeps-head of you, it had been but your due;
But I have mercy Sir, and mean to reclaim you
By a directer courſe.
That woman is not worthy of a ſoule
That has the ſoveraign power to rule her husband,
And gives her title up, ſo long provided
As there be faire play, and his ſtate not wronged.

Enter Shatillion.

Shat. I would be glad to know whence this new Duke (ſpring,
The people buz abroad, or by what title
He received his dignity, 'tis very ſtrange
There ſhould be ſuch cloſe jugling in the State,
But I am tyed to ſilence, yet a day
May come, and ſoone to perfect all theſe doubts.
Wife. It is the mad Shatillion by my ſoule
I ſuffer much for this poor Gentleman;
I'le ſpeake to him, may be he yet knows me.
Monſieur Shatillion.
Shat. Can you give me reaſon from whence
This great Duke ſprang that walkes abroad?
Wife. Even from the King himſelfe.
Shat. As you are a woman, I think you may be cover'd
Yet your prayer would do no harm good woman.
Wife. God preſerve him.

Enter Shatillions Love.

Shat. I ſay Amen, and ſo ſay all good ſubjects.
Love. Lady as ever you have lov'd, or ſhall,
As you have hope of heaven lend your hand,
And wit to draw this poore diſtracted man
Under your roofe from the broad eyes of people,
And wonder of the ſtreets.
Wife. With all my heart;
My feeling of his griefe and loſſe is much.
Love. Sir now you are come ſo neare the priſon, wil ye
Goe in, and viſit your fair Love: poore ſeule
She would be glad to ſee you.
Shat. This ſame Duke is but
Apocryphall, there's no creation
That can ſtand where titles are not right.
Love. 'Tis true ſir.
Shat. This is another draught upon my life;
Let me examine well the words I ſpake.
The words I ſpake were, that this novell Duke
Is not ot'h true making, 'tis to me moſt certaine.
Wife. You are as right Sir as you went by line.
Shat. And to the griefe of many thouſands more.
Wife. If there be any ſuch, God comfort them. (pleaſe;
Shat. Whoſe mouths may open when the time ſhall
I'me betraid, commend me to the King,
And tell him I am ſound, and crave but juſtice;
You ſhall not need to have your guard upon me,
Which I am ſure are plac'd for my attachment;
Lead on; I'm obedient to my bonds.
Love. Good Sir be not diſpleaſed with us;
We are but ſervants to his highneſſe will,
To make that good.
Shat. I doe forgive you even with my heart;
Shall I entreat a favour?
Wife. Any thing.
Shat. To ſee my love before that fatall ſtroake,
And publiſh to the world my chriſtian death,
And true obedience to the Crown of France.
Love. I hope it ſhall not need Sir, for there is mercy

As

As well as justice in his Royall heart. Exeunt.

Enter three Gentlemen.

1 Gen. Every man take his corner, here and,
You there, and you in that place, so be perfect,
Have a great care your cryes be loud, and faces
Full of dejected feare and humblenesse.
He comes.

Enter Jaques.

Ja. Fye how these streets are charg'd and swell'd
With these same rascally people? give more roum,
Or I shall have occasion to distribute
A martial almes amongst you; ha! I am a Gentleman
I have not seen such rude disorder,
They follow him like a prize, there's no true gaper
Like to your Citizen, he will be sure
The beares shall not passe by his door in peace,
But he and all his family will follow.
Roome there afore? Sound?

Enter Duke and his company.

Ja. Give roome, and keep your places
And you may see enough; keep your places.

Long. These people are too far unmannerd, thus
To stop your Graces way with multitudes.

Du. Rebuke them not good Monsieur 'tis their loves
Which I will answer, if it please my stars
To spare me life and health.

2 Gen. Blesse your Grace.

Du. And you with all my heart.

1 Gen. Now heaven preserve your happy days:

Du. I thank you too:

3 Gen. Now heaven save your Grace.

Du. I thanke you all.

Bew. On there before.

Du. Stand Gentlemen, stay yet a while,
For I am minded to impart my love
To these good people, and my friends
Whose love and prayers for my greatnesse,
Are equall in abundance, note me well,
And with my words; my heart? for as the tree——

Long. Your Grace had best be ware, 'twil be inform'd
Your greatnesse with the people.

Duke. I had more
My honest and ingenious people.——But
The weight of businesse hath prevented me.
I am call'd from you: but this tree I spake of
Shall bring forth fruit I hope to your content,
And so I share my bowels amongst you all.

Omnes. A noble Duke, a very noble Duke.

Enter a Gentleman.

Ser. Afore there Gentlemen.

Gen. You're faithfully met good Monsieur Mount Martire!

Ser. Be advis'd, the time is alter'd.

Gen. Is he not the same man he was afore?

Duke. Still the same man to you Sir.

Long. You have received mighty grace, be thankfull.

Gen. Let me not dye in ignorance;

Long. You shall not.
Then know the King out of his loue hath pleased
To stile him Duke of Burgundy.

Gen. O great Duke,
Thus low, I plead for pardon, and desire
To be enrol'd amongst your poorest slaves.

Du. Sir you have mercy, and withall my hand,
From henceforth let me call you one of mine.

Ser. Make room afore there, and dismisse the people.

Du. Every man to his house in peace and quiet. (Duke.

Peop. Now heaven preserve the Duke, heaven blesse the

Exeunt Omnes.

Enter Wife.

Wife. This letter came this morn from my Cozen
To the great Lady, high and mighty Duchesse
Of Burgundy, be these delivered! O,
For a stronger lace to keep my breath
That I may laugh the nine dayes till the wonder
Fall to an ebb: the high and mighty Duchesse!
The high and mighty God what a stile is this?
Methinks it goes like a Duchy lope-man,
A ladder of 100 rounds will faile
To reach the top on't, well my Gentle Cozen
I know by these contents your itch of honour;
You must to the Court, you say, and very shortly;
You shall be welcome; and if your wife have wit
I'le put her in a thriving course, if not
Her own sin on her owne head, now a bloe
Shall staine my reputation, only this
I must for health sake sometimes
Make an ass of the same mo'le my husband;
'Twill do him good, and give him fresher breath,
Me fresher blood.
Now for the noble Duke, I heare him coming.

Enter Duke, his traine.

Your Grace is well return'd.

Du. As well as may be:
Never in younger health, never more able:
I meane to be your bed-fellow this night,
Let me have good encounter.

Bew. Bless us heaven
What a hot meat this greatnesse is?

Long. It may be so,
For I'le be sworn he hath not got a snap
This two months on my knowledge, or her woman
Is damd for swearing it.

Du. I thank you Gentlemen for your attendance
And also your great pains, pray know my lodgings
Better and oftner, do so Gentlemen.
Now by my honour, as I am a Prince,
I speake sincerely, know my lodgings better,
And beside strangers, I shall use your service
And your deservings, when you least expect.

Om. We humbly thank your Grace for this great favor.

Du. Jaques?

Ja. Your Grace.

Du. Be ready for the Country,
And let my Tenants know the kings great love:
Say I would see them, but the waight at Court
Lyes heavy on my shoulders: let them know
I do expect their duties in attendance
Against the next feast, wait for my comming
To take up post horse, and be full of speed. Exit Jaques.

Wife. I would desire your Grace——

Du. You shall desire, and have your
Full desire, sweet Duchesse speak.

Wife. To have some conference with a Gentleman
That seems not altogether void of reason;
He talks of titles, and things neare the Crown,
And knowing none so fit as your good Grace,
To give the difference in such points of State——

Du. What is he? If he be noble, or have any part
That's worthy our converse, We do accept him.

Wife. I can assure your Grace his straine is noble,
But he's very subtle.

Duke. Let him be so.
Let him have all the braines, I shall demonstrate
How this most Christian Crown of France can beare
No other shew of title then the Kings.
I will goe in and meditate for halfe an houre,

And then be ready for him presently,
I will convert him quickly or confound him.
Ser. Is mad Shatrillion here?
Wife. Is here, and's Lady,
I prethee servant fetch him hither.
Ser. Why, what do you meane to put him to?
Wife. To chat with the mad lad my husband;
'Twill be brave to heare them speake, laugh,
Stare, and prate.
Eew. But what shall be the end of all this, Lady?
Enter Shatrillion, and Servant.
Wife. Leave that to me, now for the grand dispute,
For see here comes Shatrillion as I live me thinks
All France should beare part of his griefes.
Long. I le fetch my Lord the Duke.
Shat. Where am I now, or whether will you lead me?
To my death? I crave my priviledge,
I must not dye but by just course of law.
Ser. His Majesty hath sent by me your pardon,
He meant not you should dye, but would intreate you
To lay the full state of your Title open,
Unto a grave and noble Gentleman.
Enter Duke, and Longovile.
The Duke of Burgundy who here doth come,
Who either by his wisedome will confute you,
Or else informe and satisfie the King.
Bew. May't please your grace, this is the Gentleman.
Duke. Is this he that chops Logicke with my liege?
Shat. D'ee mocke me? you are great, the time will come
When you shall be as much contemned as I,
Where are the ancient complements of Fraunce,
That upstarts brave the Princes of the bloud?
Duke. Your title Sir, in short.
Shat. He must Sir,
Be a better states man then your selfe, that can
Trip me in any thing, I will not speake
Before these witnesses.
Duke. Depart the roome, for none shall stay,
No not my dearest Dutches.
Wife. Wee'le stand behind the Arras & heare all. Exeunt.
Duke. In that chaire take your place, I in this,
Discourse your title now.
Shat. Sir you shall know,
My loves true title, mine by marriage,
Setting aside the first race of French Kings
Which will not here concerne us, as Pharamond,
With Clodian, Meron, and Childerik,
And to come downe unto the second race,
Which we will likewise slip——
Duke. But take me with you.
Shat. I pray you give me leave, of Martell Charles,
The Father of King Pippin, who was, Sir,
To Charles the great and famous Charlemaine.
And to come to the third race of French Kings,
Which will not be great ly pertinent in this cause,
Betwixt the King and me, of which you know
Hugh Capet was the first,
Next his Sonne Robert, Henry then, and Phillip
With Lewis, and his Sonne a Lewis too,
And of that name the seventy, but all this
Springs from a female as it shall appeare.
Duke. Now give me leave, I grant you this your title
At the first sight carryes some shew of truth;
But if ye weigh it well ye shall finde light.
Is not his Majestie possest in peace,
And justice executed in his name,
And can you thinke the most Christian King
Would do this if he saw not reason for it?
Shat. But had not the tenth Lewis a sole daughter?
Duke. I cannot tell.
Shat. But answer me directly.
Duke. It is a most seditious question.
Shat. Is this your justice?
Duke. I stand for my King.
Shat. Was ever heire apparant thus abus'd?
I'le have your head for this.
Duke. Why, do your worst.
Shat. Will no one stir to apprehend this traytor?
A guard about my person will none come?
Must my owne royall hands performe the deede?
Then thus I do arrest you.
Duke. Treason, help.
Enter Wife, Long, and Bew. and Servant.
Wife. Help, help, my Lord and husband.
Duke. Help thy Duke.
Long. Forbeare his graces person.
Shat. Forbeare you to touch him that,
Your heire apparant weds,
But by this hand I will have all your heads. Exit.
Ser. How doth your grace?
Duke. Why? well.
Ser. How do you finde his title?
Duke. 'Tis a dangerous one,
As can come by a female.
Ser. I 't is true,
But the law Salicke, cuts him off from all.
Long. I do beseech your grace how stands his title? (all
Duke. Pew, nothing, the law Shallicke cuts him off from Wife. My gracious husband you must now prepare,
In all your graces pomp to entertaine
Your cozen, who is now a convertite,
And followes here, this night he will be here.
Duke. Be ready all in hall, I do intend,
To shew before my cozens wondring face (Exeunt
The greatnesse of my pomp, and of my place. omnes.

Actus quartus.

Enter Cozen. his Wife.

Co. Sirra is all things carried to the Taylor,
The measure and the fashion of the gowne
With the best trim?
Man. Yes Sir & 'twill be ready within this two dayes.
Co. For my selfe I care not,
I have a suite or two of ancient velvet;
Which with some small correcting and addition
May steale into the presence. (my life,
Wife. Would my Gowne were ready husband, I'le lay
To make you something ere to morrow night.
Co. It must not bee
Before we see the Duke, and have advice,
How to behave our selves: lets in the while,
And keep our selves from knowledge till time shall call us
Enter Long. and Bewford. Exeunt.
Long. I much admire the fierce masculine spirit,
Of this dread Amazon.
Bew. This following night I'le have a wench in solace.
Long. Sir, I heare you,
And will be with you if I live, no more.
Enter Maria.
Ma. My Lady would intreate your presence Gentlman.
Bew. We will obey your Lady, she is worthy.
Long. You light alone, a word, or two.

Ma. Your

Ma. Your will Sir.
Long. Harke in your eare, wilt thou be maried? ſpeake,
Ma. Maried? to whom Sir? (wilt thou marry?
Long. To a proper fellow, landed, and able bodied,
Ma. Why do you flout me Sir? (be free,
Long. I ſweare I do not, I love thee for thy Ladies ſake,
Ma. If I could meet ſuch matches as you ſpeake of,
I were a very child to looſe my time, Sir.
Long. What ſaieſt thou to Mounſier Bewford.
Mar. Sir I ſay hee's a proper Gentleman, and far
Above my meanes to looke at.
Long. Doſt thou like him?
Ma. Yes Sir, and ever did.
Long. He is thine owne.
Mar. You are too greate in promiſes.
Long. Be rul'd and follow my advice, he ſhall be thine
Mar. Would you would make it good Sir.
Long. Do but thus,
Get thee a cuſhion underneath thy cloathes,
And leave the reſt to me.
Mar. I'le be your ſcholler,
I cannot looſe much by the venture ſure.
Long. Thou wilt looſe a prettie maiden head, my rogue,
Or I am much o'th bow hand, you'le remember
If all this take effect, who did it for you,
And what I may deſerve for ſuch a kindneſſe.
Ma. Yours Sir. Exeunt.

Enter Jaques and Shatillion ſeverally.

Ja. Save ye Sir.
Sha. Save the King.
Ja. I pray you Sir, which is the neareſt way?
Sha. Save the King, this is the neareſt way.
Ja. Which is the neareſt way to the poſt houſe?
Sha. God ſave the King and his poſt horſe.
Ja. I pray Sir direct me to the houſe;
Sha. Heaven ſave the King, you cannot catch me Sir.
Ja. I do not underſtand you Sir.
Sha. You do not, I ſay you cannot catch me Sir.
Ja. Not catch you Sir?
Sha. No Sir, nor can the King,
With all his ſtratagems, and his forced tricks,
Although he put his nobles in diſguiſe,
Never ſo oft to ſift into my words,
By courſe of law, lay hold upon my life.
Ja. It is buſineſſe that my Lord the Duke
Is by the King imployed in, and he thinks
I am acquainted with it.
Sha. I ſhall not need to ripp the cauſe up,
From the firſt to you,
But if his Majeſty had ſuffered me
To marry her, though ſhe be after him,
The right heire generall to the Crowne of France.
I would not have convayed her into Spaine,
As it was thought, nor would I ere have joyn'd,
With the reformed Churches to make them,
Stand for my cauſe.
Ja. I do not thinke you would.
Shat. I thanke you Sir,
And ſince I ſee you are a favorer
Of vertues, kept in bondage;
Tell directly to my ſoveraigne King,
For ſo I will acknowledge him for ever,
How you have found my ſtaid affections
Setled for peace, and for the preſent ſtate.
Ja. Why Sir?
Sha. And good Sir tell him further this,
That notwithſtanding all ſuggeſtions
Brought to him againſt me and all his ſuſpitions,
Which are innumerall to my treaſons,
If he will warrant me but publique tryall,
I'le freely yeild my ſelfe into his hands;
Can he have more then this?
Ja. No by my troth.
Sha. I would his Majeſty would heare but reaſon,
As well as you.
Ja. But Sir you do miſtake me,
For I never ſaw the King
In all my life but once, therefore good Sir,
May it pleaſe you to ſhew me which is the poſt houſe.
Sha. I cry you mercie Sir, then you'r my freind.
Ja. Yes Sir.
Sha. And ſuch men are very rare with me,
The poſt houſe is hard by, farewell;
Ja. I thanke you Sir, I muſt ride hard to night,
And it is darke already.
Shat. I am cruell to ſend this man directly to his death
That is my freind, and I might eaſily ſave him,
He ſhall not dye, come backe my freind, come backe.
Ja. What is your will?
Sha. do you not know?
Ja. Not I.
Sha. And do you gather nothing by my face?
Ja. No Sir.
Sha. Vertue is ever innocent,
La not the faule on me, I greive for you,
And wiſh that all my teares might win your ſafety.
Ja. Why Sir?
Sha. Alas good freind you are undone,
The more ill fortune, mine to be the meanes
Of your ſad overthrow: you know not me.
Ja. No truely Sir.
Sha. Would you had never ſeene me,
I am a man purſu'd by the whole ſtate
And ſure ſome one hath ſeene me talke with you.
Ja. Yes divers Sir.
Sha. Why then your head is gon.
Ja. I'le out of towne.
Sha. Would it were ſoone enough,
Stay if you love your life, or elſe you are taken.
Ja. What ſhall I do?
Sha. I'le venture deeply for him,
Rather then to caſt away an innocent,
Take courage friend, I will preſerve thy life,
With hazard of mine owne.
Ja. I thanke you Sir.
Sha. This night thou ſhale be lodg'd within my doores,
Which ſhall be all lookt faſt, and in the morne
I'le ſo provide, you ſhall have free acceſſe,
To the Sea ſide and ſo be ſhipt away,
Ere any know it.
Ja. Good Sir ſuddainly I am afraide to dye.
Sha. Then follow me. Exeunt.

Enter Shatillion Love.

Love. This way he went, and there's the houſe I hope,
His better Angell hath directed him,
To leave the wandring ſtreetes, poore Gentleman.
Would I were able with as free a hart,
To ſet his ſoule right, as I am to grieve,
The ruine of his fame, which God forgive me,
Sir if you be within, I pray Sir ſpeake to me.
Shat. I am within and will be, what are you?
Love. A friend.
Shat. No Sir you muſt pardon me,
I am acquainted with none ſuch: be ſpeedy,
Friend there is no other remedy.
Love. A word Sir I ſay I am your friend.

Shat. You

Shat. You cannot ſcape by any other meanes,
Be not feareful, God ſave the King,
What's your buſineſſe Sir?
Lov. To ſpeake with you.
Shat. Speake out then?
Lov. Shall I not come up?
Shat. Thou ſhalt not: flye if thou beeſt thin own friend,
There lyes the ſute and all the furniture
Belonging to the head, on with it friend.
Lov. Sir do you heare?
Shat. I do, God bleſſe the King,
It was a habit I had laid aſide,
For my owne perſon if the ſtate had forced me.
Love. Good Sir unlocke your dore. buſh,
Shat. Be full of ſpeede, I ſee ſome 20 Musketeeres in am-
What ere thou art, know I am here and will be,
Seeſt thou this bloody ſword that cryes revenge?
Shake not my friend, through millions of theſe foes
I'le be thy guard and ſet thee ſafe a board.
Lov. Dare you not truſt me Sir?
Shat. My good be fore me,
And my alleagance to the King I tell thee
Captaine (for ſo I gueſſe thee by thy armes)
And the looſe flancks of halberdeeres about thee,
Thou art too weake and fooliſh to attempt me.
If you be ready follow me, and harke you
Upon your life ſpeake to no living wight,
Except my ſelfe.
Love. Monſieur Shattillion?
Shat. Thou ſhalt not call agen; thus with my ſword,
And the ſtrong faith I beare unto the King;
Whom God preſerve, I will deſcend my chamber,
And cut thy throate, I ſweare I'le cut thy throate,
Steale after me and live.
Love. I will not ſtay.
The furie of a man ſo farr diſtracted. Exit Love.

Enter Shattillion.

Where's the Officer that dares not enter,
To intrap the life of my diſtreſſed friend?
I, have you hid your ſelfe? you muſt be found,
What do you feare? is not authority on your ſide
Nay, I know the Kings command
Will be your warrant, why then feare you? ſpeake
What ſtrange deſignes are theſe? Shattillion,
Be reſolute and beare thy ſelfe upright,
Though the whole world deſpiſe thee: ſoft, me thinks.
I heard a ruſhing which was like the ſhake
Of a diſcovered Officer, I'le ſearch
The whole ſtreete over, but I'le finde thee out. Exit.

Enter Jaques: in womens a parrell.

Ja. How my joyntes do ſhake, where had I been
But for this worthy Gentleman, that
Hath ſome touch of my infortunes: would I were Safe under hatches once for Callicut,
Farewell the pomp of Court, I never more
Can hope to be a Duke or any thing,
I never more ſhall ſee thy glorious face;
Of my faire ſpreading Lord that loved me well.

Enter Shattillion.

Shat. Flye you ſo faſt? I had a ſight of you,
But would not follow you; I was too wiſe,
You ſhall not lead me with a cunning tricke,
Where you may catch me; poore Shatillion;
Hath the Kings anger left thee never a friend?
No, all mens loves move by the breath of Kings.
Ja. It is the Gent. that ſav'd my life, Sir.
Shat. Bleſſe Shatillion, another plot.
Ja. No Sir, 'tis I.
Shat. Why, who are you?
Ja. Your friend whom you preſerved.
Shat. Whom I preſerved?
My friend? I have no woman friend but one,
Who is to cloſe in priſon to be here;
Come neere let me looke on you.
Ja. 'Tis I.
Shat. You ſhould not be a woman by your ſtature.
Ja. I am none Sir.
Shat. I know it, then keepe off,
Strange men and times! how I am ſtill preſerv'd?
Here they have ſent a yeoman of the guard
Diſguis'd in womans cloathes to worke on me,
To make love to me; and to trap my words,
And ſo inſnare my life, I know you Sir,
Stand back upon your perill, can this bee
In chriſtian common weales? from this time forth
I'le cut off all the meanes to worke on me.
I'le nere ſtirr from my houſe: and keep my doores
Lockt day and night, and cheapen meat and drink
At the next ſhops by ſignes, out of my window,
And having bought it draw it up in my garters.
Ja. Sir, will you help me?
Shat. Do not follow me,
I'le take a courſe to live deſpight of men. Exit Shat.
Ja. He dares not venture for me, wretched Jaques
Thou art undone for ever and for ever,
Never to riſe againe: what ſhall I do?

Enter Bew.

Where ſhall I hide me? heres one to take me,
I muſt ſtand cloſe, and not ſpeake for my life.
Bew. This is the time of night, and this the haunte,
In which I uſe to catch my waſcoatieres,
It is not very darke, no I ſhall ſpie 'em,
I have walkt out in ſuch a pitchy night.
I could not ſee my fingers this farr off,
And yet have brought whom venſon by the ſmell,
I hope they have not left their old walke, ah?
Have I ſpied you ſitting by this light?
To me theres no ſuch fine ſight in the world,
As a white-apron twixt twelve and one;
See how it gliſters? do you thinke to ſcape?
So now I have you faſt; come and do not ſtrive,
It takes away the edge of appetite,
Come I'le be liberall every way, Exeunt
Take heed you make no noyſe for waking of the watch.

Enter Cozen and his Wife.

Coz. Now the bleſſing of ſome happy guide,
To bring us to the Duke and we are ready.

Enter Long. and Servant.

Come forward ſee the doore is opend,
And two of his Gent. I'le ſpeake to them,
And marke how I behave my ſelfe, God ſaue yee;
For leſſe I cannot wiſh to men of ſort, & of your ſeeming
Are you of the Dukes?
Long. We are Sir, and your ſervants, your ſalutes,
We give you backe againe with many thankes.
Co. When did you heare ſuch words before wife? peace,
Do you not dare to anſwer yet; s't fit
So meane a Gentleman as my ſelfe ſhould crave,
The preſence of the great Duke your Maſter?
Ser. Sir you may.
Long. Shall we deſire your name and buſineſſe Sir,
And wee will preſently informe him of you.
Co. My name is Cleremont
Ser. You are his graces kinſman,
Or I am much miſtaken;
Co. You are right,

Some

Some of his noble blood runs through theſe veines,
Though far unworthy of his graces knowledge.
Long. Sir we muſt all be yours; his graces kinſman,
And we ſo much forgetfull? 'twas a rudeneſſe,
And muſt attend your pardon, thus I crave it:
Firſt to this beauteous Lady, whom I take
To be your wife Sir, next your mercie.
Couſ. You have it Sir, I do not like this kiſſing,
It lyes ſo open to a world of wiſhes.
Ser. This is the merry fellow, this is he
That muſt be noble too.
Long. And ſo he ſhall.
If all the art I have can make him noble,
I'le dub him with a Knight-hood; if his wife
VVill be but forward, and joyne iſſue,
I like her above excellent.
Ser. VViſt pleaſe you
To walke a turne or two, whilſt to the Duke
VVe make your comming known? Exit Ser. & Long.
Couſ. I ſhal attend, Sir.
Wife. Theſe Gentlemen are very proper men,
And kiſſe the beſt that ere I taſted.
For goodneſſe-ſake husband let us never more
Come neare the Countrey, what ſo ere betide us;
I am in malice with the memory
Of that ſame ſtinking dung-hill.
Couſ. VVhy now you are my chicken and my dear,
Love where I love, hate where I hate, now
You ſhall have twenty gownes, and twenty chaines,
See, the doore is opening.
Groom. Roome afore there, the Duke is entring.
Enter Duke, Wife, Long. ſervant, Maria.
Couſ. 'Tis the Duke, even he himſelfe, be merry,
This is the golden age the Poet ſpeaks on.
Wife. I pray it be not brazen'd, by their faces,
And yet me thinks they are the neateſt pieces
For ſhape and cutting that ere I beheld.
Couſ. Moſt gracious Duke, my poor Spouſe & my ſelfe
Do kiſſe your mighty foote, and next to that
The great hand of your Ducheſſe, ever wiſhing
Your honours ever-ſpringing, and your yeares.
Du. Cozen?
Couſ. Your Graces vaſſall, far unworthy
The nearneſſe of your blood.
Du. Correct me not, I know the word I ſpeake,
And know the perſon.
Though I be ſomething higher then the place
VVhere common men have motion, and diſcending
Down with my eye, their formes are leſſened to me,
Yet from this pitch can I behold my owne,
From millions of thoſe men that have no marke,
And in my fearfull ſtoop, can make them ſtand.
VVhen others feele my ſoule and periſh, Cozen
Be comforted, you are very welcome, ſo
Is your faire wife: the charge of whom I give
To my own deareſt and beſt beloved.
Tell me, have you reſolv'd your ſelfe for Court,
And utterly renounce the ſlaviſh Countrey,
VVith all the cares thereof?
Couſ. I have ſir.
Du. Have you diſmiſt your eating houſhold, (were,
Sold your hangings of Nebuchadnezar, for ſuch they
As I remember, with the furnitures
Belonging to your beds and chambers?
Couſ. I Sir.
Du. Have you moſt carefully tane off the lead,
From your roofe weake with age, and ſo prevented
The ruine of your houſe, and clapt him
In a ſummer ſuite of thatch to keepe him coole?
Couſ. All this I have perform'd. (Cozen
Du. Then lend me all your hands, I will embrace my VVho is an underſtanding Gentleman,
And with a zeale mighty as is my name,
Once more I bid you welcome to the Court;
My ſtate againe.
Duch. As I was telling you your husband
Muſt be no more Commander, looke to that,
Be ſeverall at meate, and lodging, let him have
Boord-wages and dyet 'mongſt his men it'h towne
For pleaſure if he be given too't let him have it,
Elſe as your own fancie ſhall direct you.
Cozen, you ſee this mighty man here: he was an aſſe
When he came firſt to towne: indeed he was
Juſt ſuch another coxcomb as your husband,
God bleſſe the mark and every good mans childe!
This muſt not ſtir you Cozen.
Wife. Heaven forbid?
Long. Sweet Maria, provide the cuſhion ready for it.
Mar. It ſhall be done.
Du. Receive all your advices from our ſelfe,
Be once a day with us, and ſo farewell
For this time, my faire Cozen; Gentlemen
Conduct him to his lodging.
Duch. Farewell, and think upon my words.
Wife. I ſhall obſerve them. Exit Duke and Ducheſſe.
Couſ. Health, and the Kings continuall love attend you.
Ser. O for a private place to eaſe my lungs!
Heaven give me patience, ſuch a paire of Jades
Were never better ridden to this houre,
Pray heaven they hold out to the journeys end.
Long. Twitch him aſide good Monſieur, whilſt I breake
Upon the body of his ſtrength, his wife,
I have a conſtant promiſe: ſhe is my own.
Ser. Ply her to wind-ward Monſieur, you have taken
The moſt compendious way to raiſe your ſelfe,
That could have been delivered by a councell.
Couſ. I have ſome certaine aimes Sir: but my wife——
Ser. Your wife? you muſt not let that trouble you.
Couſ. It will Sir, to ſee her in a ſtrangers armes. (foot
Ser. What mean you? let her alone, be wiſe, ſtir not a
For if you do, all your hopes are buryed:
I ſweare you are a loſt man if you ſtir.
Couſ. I thanke you Sir, I will be more advis'd.
Ser. But what great Office do you levell at?
Couſ. Sir, they are kiſſing.
Ser. Let them kiſſe,
And much may do their good hearts; they muſt kiſſe
And kiſſe, and double kiſſe, and kiſſe againe,
Or you may kiſſe the poſt for any riſing:
Had your noble Kinſman ever mounted
To theſe high Spheres of honour, now he moves in,
But for the kiſſes of his wife?
Couſ. I Know not.
Ser. Then I doe; credite me, he had been loſt,
A fellow of no mark, and no repute,
Had not his wife kiſt ſoone, and very ſweetly
She was an excellent woman, and diſpatcht him
To his full, being in a moment Sir— Exit Long. & Wife.
Couſ. But yet me thinks he ſhould not take her Sir
Into a private roome.
Ser. Now ſtand and flouriſh,
You are a made man for ever.
I doe envy you if you ſtand your fortunes up,
You are the happieſt man: but your great Cozen
This day in Court: well I will marry ſurely,
And not let every man out-run me thus.

'Tis time to be mine owne friend, I live
In towne here, and direct the readieſt way,
To other men, and be a ſlave my ſelfe.
Co. Nay good Sir be not mov'd, I am your ſervant,
And will not be ungratefull for this knowledge.
Ser. Will you be walking home?
Co. I would deſire to have my wife a long.
Ser. You are too raw,
Be gon and take no notice where you left her,
Let her returne at leiſure, if ſhe ſtay
A moneth 'twill be the better, underſtand me
This Gentleman can doe't. (Exit Cozen.
Co. I will Sir, & wife remember me a Duke, a Duke wife.
Ser. Aboard her Longaveile ſhee's thine owne,
To me the fooling of this foole, is venerie. Exit Servant.

Enter Bewford and Jaques.

Bew. Come, preethe come, have I not crownes? behold
And follow me, here; not a word, go in
Grope by the walls, and you ſhall finde a bed,
Lye downe there, ſee, ſee, a turne or two to give
My blood ſome heate; and I am preſently
For action, darkneſſe by thy leave I come. Exit Bew.

Enter Maria.

Ma. I am perfect in my leſſon, be my ſpeed,
Thou God of marriage, this is the doore, I'le knock.
Bew. within. Whoſe there? I cannot come yet.
Ma. Mounſier Bewford?
Bew. Stay 'till I light a candle, who are ye?
Mar. Sir? a poore Gentlewoman.

Enter Bewford. (loocke.

Bew. O come in, I'le finde a time for you too, be not
Mar. Sir you have found that time already, ſhame
On my ſoule therefore.
Bew. Why? what's the matter?
Mar. Do you not ſee Sir, is your light ſo dim?
Bew. Do you not waite on the Lady Mount Marine?
Mar. I do Sir, but my love on you.
Bew. Poore ſoule! how cam'ſt thou by this big belly?
Mar. By your ſelfe.
Bew. By heaven I ne're toucht your body.
Mar. Yes, unſweare that oath agen, I'le tell you all;
Theſe two yeares I have lov'd you, but the meanes
How to enjoy you, I did never know
Till twelfe night laſt, when hearing of your game
To take up wenches private in the night,
I apprehended ſtraight this courſe to make
My ſelfe as one of them, and waite your coming;
I did ſo, and enjoyed you, and now this child
That now is quicke within me: hide my ſhame,
And marry me: or elſe I muſt be forc't——
Long within. Monſieur Bewford, Monſieur Bewford.
Bew. Whoſe that calls?
Long. Are you a bed?
Bew. No Sir, the hangings.

Enter Long. (play

Long. Nay Mounſieur, I'le forbid that, we'le have faire
Lend me your candle, are you taken Bewford?
A lecher of your practice, and cloſe carriage
To be diſcovered thus? I am a ſham'd
So great a Maſter in his art ſhould faile,
And ſtagger in his grounds.
Bew. Your wide,
This woman and my ſelfe are man and wife,
And have been ſo this halfe yeare,
Where are you now? have I been diſcovered?
You cannot breake ſo eaſily on me Sir,
I am to wary to be opend by you.
Long. But theſe are but illuſions to give couler
To your moſt miſticke leacherie, but Sir
The belly hath betray'd you all, it muſt out.
Bew. Good Longaville believe me on my faith,
I am her husband.
Long. On my faith I cannot unleſſe I ſaw
Your hands faſt and your hearts.
Bew. Why Longaville when did I give that to your eares
That was not truth? by all the world ſhe's mine,
She is my wife and to confirme you better
I give my ſelfe againe, here take my hand
And I yours, we are once more married,
Will this content you?
Long. Yes, I am believing, and God give you joy.
Bew. My loving wife I will not wrong thee,
Since I am thine and only loved of thee
From this houre I, vow my ſelfe a new man,
Be not jealous: for though I had a purpoſe,
To have ſpent an hower or two in ſolace otherwiſe,
And was provided for it, yet my love
Shall put a better temper to my blood,
Come out thou woman of unholſome life,
Be ſorry for thy ſinnes, and learne to mend,
Nay never hide your face, you ſhall be ſeene.
Long. Jaques, why Jaques, art thou that Jaques,
The very ſtaffe, and right hand of our Duke?
Speake, thou bearded Venus.
Ja. I am he, by miracle preſerv'd to be that Jaques,
Within this two houres Gentlemen, poore Jaques
Was but as coarſe in grave: a man of wiſedome,
That of my conſcience if he had his right
Should have a preety ſtate, but that's all one
That noble Gentleman did ſave this life,
I keepe it for him, 'tis his owne. (the Duke
Long. Oh Bacbus! is all the world drunke? come wee'le to
And give thankes for this deliverey.

Actus quintus.

Enter Duke, and Jaques.

Duke. Not gon unto my Tenants to relate
My grace and honour; and the mightyneſſe
Of my new name which would have ſtruck a terrour
Through their courſe doublets, to their very hearts?
Ja. Alas great Lord and Maſter, I could ſcarce
With ſafety of my life returne againe
Unto your graces houſe, and but for one
That had ſome mercie, I had ſure been hang'd.
Duke. My houſe?
Ja. Yes Sir, this houſe, your houſe 'ith towne.
Duke. Jaques we are diſpleas'd, hath it no name?
Ja. What name?
Duke. Dull rogue; what hath the King beſtowed
So many honours, open'd all his ſpringes,
And ſhowerd his graces downe upon my head,
And has my houſe no name? no title yet?
Burgundy houſe you Aſſe.
Ja. Your graces mercy,
And when I was come off, and had recover'd
Burgundy houſe, I durſt not yet be ſeene,
But lay all night for feare of purſuiuants
In Burgundy privie houſe.
Duke. O Sir, 'tis well,
Can you remember now? but Jaques know
Since thy intended journey is ſo croſſe,

I will go downe my ſelfe this morning.
Ja. Sir?
Duke. Have I not ſaid this morning?
Ja. But conſider,
That nothing is prepared yet for your journey,
Your graces teames not here to draw your cloathes;
And not a carrier yet in town to ſend by.
Duke. I ſay once more go about it,
You'r a wiſe man, you'de have me linger time,
Till I have worne theſe cloathes out: will ye go?
Make ye ready wife. Exit. Jaques.

Enter Wife.

Dutches. I am ſo, mighty Duke.
Duke. Nay for the Countrey.
Dutch. How? for the Countrey? (very
Duke. Yes I am reſolv'd to ſee my Tenants in this bra-
Make them a ſumptuous feaſt, with a ſlight ſhew,
Of Dives, and Lazarus, and a ſquib or two,
And ſo returne.
Dutches. VVhy Sir? you are not mad? (ſpeake.
Duke. How many Dukes have ye known mad? I pray
Dutch. You are the firſt Sir, and I hope the laſt,
But you are ſtark horne mad.
Duke. Forbeare good wife.
Dutch. As I have faith you'r mad: your hornes
Have been to heavy for you, and have broke
Your ſkull in pieces: If you be in earneſt. (whole
Duke. VVell you ſhall know my ſkull and wits are Ere I have done, and yet I am in earneſt.
Dutches. VVhy, do you think I'le go?
Duke. I know you ſhall.
Dutch. I ſhall? by what authority ſhall I?
Duke. I am your husband.
Dutch. True I confeſſe it,
And by that name the world hath given you
A power to ſway me; but Sir you ſhall know
There is a greater bond that tyes me here,
Alleagance to the King; has he not heapt
Thoſe honours on you to no other end,
But to ſtay you here, and ſhall I have a hand
In the offending ſuch a gracious Prince?
Beſides, our owne undoings lyes uppon't,
Were there no other cauſe, I do not ſee,
Why you ſhould go: If I ſhould ſay you ſhould not.
Duke. Do you thinke ſo?
Dutch. Yes faith.
Duke. Now good wife make me underſtand that point.
Dutch. Why that you ſhall, did I not bring you hither?
Duke. Yes. (the fire by me?
Dutch. And were not all thoſe honours wrought out of Duke. By you?
Dutch. By me; how ſtrang you make it?
When you came firſt did you not walke the Town,
In a long cloake halfe compaſſe? an old hat,
Linde with vellure, and on it for a band,
A skeine of crimſon cruell?
Duke. I confeſſe it.
Dutch. And tooke baſe courſes?
Duke. Baſe? (monſtrous baſe.
Dutch. Baſe by this light, extreame baſe, and ſcurvie,
Duke. What were theſe courſes, wife?
Dutch. Why you ſhall know,
Did you not thus attired trot up and down,
Plotting for vild and lowſie offices,
And agreed with the Sergiant of the beares,
To buy his place? deny this if you can.
Duke. Why it is true.
Dutch. And was not that monſtrous baſe?
Duke. Be advis'd wife, a beares a princly beaſt.
Dutch. A beare?
Duke. Yes wife, and one ſide venſon.
Dutch. You'r more then one ſide foole, I'm ſure of that
Duke. But ſince you have vext me wife, know you ſhall
Nor you ſhall never have penny from me. (go
Dutch. Nay I have done. and though I know 'twill be
Your overthrow, I'le not forſake you now.
Duke. Be ready then. Exit Duke.
Dutch. I will.

Enter Bewf. Long. Serua. Maria.

Long. What are you married Bewford? (can make us.
Bew. I as faſt as words, and hearts, and hands & Prieſt
Dutch. O Gentlemen, we are undone.
Long. For what?
Dutch. This Gentleman the Lord of Iorne my husband,
Will be gon downe to ſhew his play fellowes,
Where he is gay.
Bew. What, downe into the Countrey?
Dutch. Yes faith, was ever foole but he ſo croſſe?
I would as faine be gracious to him,
As he could wiſh me, but he will not let me;
Speake faithfully, will he deſerve my mercy?
Long. According to his merits he ſhould weare,
A guarded coate, and a great wooden dagger.
Dutch. If there be any woman that doth knowe,
The duties 'twixt a husband and his wife,
Will ſpeake but one word for him he ſhall ſcape;
Is not that reaſonable? but ther's none,
Be ready therefore, to purſue the plot
We had againſt a pinch, for he muſt ſtay.
Long. VVaite you here for him whilſt I go
And make the King acquainted with your ſport,
For feare he be incens'd for our attempting;
Places of ſo great honour. Exit Long.
Dutch. Go, be ſpeedy.

Enter Duke, Cozen, Wife, Jaques, Man.

Duke. Come let me ſee how all things are diſpoſed of.
Ja. One Cart will ſerve for all your furniture,
With roome enough behinde to eaſe the footman
A capcaſe for your linnen, and your plate,
VVith a ſtrange locke that opens with Amen;
For my young Lord becauſe of eaſie portage,
A quiver of your graces linde with Cunney,
Made to be hang'd about the Nurſes neck,
Thus with a ſcarfe or towell.
Duke. Very good.
Ja. Nay, 'tis well, but had you ſtaid another weeke,
I would have had you, furniſht in ſuch pomp,
As never Duke of Burgundy was furniſht,
You ſhould have had a ſumpter though't had coſt me
The laying on my ſelfe: where now you are faine,
To hire a rippers mare, and buy new doſſers,
But I have got them painted with your armes,
VVith a faire darnex Carpet of my owne
Laid croſſe for the more ſtate.
Duke. Jaques I thanke you: your Carpet ſhall be bruſht
And ſent you home; what, are you ready wife?
Dutch. An houre agoe
Duke. I cannot chuſe but kiſſe thy royall lips,
Deare Dutches mine, thou art ſo good a woman.
Bew. Yould ſay ſo if you knew all, goodman Duckling.
Coz. This was the happieſt fortune could befall me
Now in his abſence will I follow cloſe
Mine owne preferment, and I hope ere long,
To make my meane and humble name ſo ſtrong,
As my great Cozens, when the world ſhall know,
I beare too hot a ſpirit to live low

The next Spring wil I down my wife and houſhold,
I'le have My Uſhers, and my foure Lacquies,
Six ſpare croches too: but mum, no more,
What I intend to do, I'le keep in ſtore.
Duke. Mountye, mountye, Iaques, be our querry.
Groom. To horſe there Gentlemen, and tall in couples.
Duke. Come honoured Ducheſſe. Enter Longavile.
Long. Stand thou proud man.
Duke. Thieves, Iaques, raiſe the people.
Long. No, raiſe no people, 'tis the Kings command,
Which bids thee once more ſtand thou haughty man,
Thou art a monſter, for thou art ungratefull,
And like a fellow of a rebell nature,
Haſt flung from his embraces: and for
His honours given thee, haſt not returnd
So much as thanks, and to oppoſe his will,
Reſolv'd to leave the Court, and ſet the Realm
A fire, in diſcontent, and open action:
Therefore he bids thee ſtand thou proud man,
Whilſt with the whisking of my ſword about
I take thy honours off: this firſt ſad whiske
Takes off thy Duke-dome, thou art but an Earl.
Duke. You are miſtaken, Longavile.
Long. O would I were, this ſecond whiske divides
Thy Earldome from thee, thou art yet a Baron.
Duke. No more whisks if you love me Longavile.
Long. Two whisks are paſt, and two are yet behind,
Yet all muſt come, but not to linger time.
With theſe two whisks I end, now Mount Marine,
For thou art now no more, ſo ſays the King,
And I have done his Highneſſe will with griefe.
Duke. Diſgraced from my honours?
Lon. 'Tis too certaine.
Duke. I am no Traitor ſure that I know of;
Speak Iaques? haſt thou ever heard me utter word
Tending to treaſon, or to bring in the enemy?
Ia. Alas ſir I know nothing,
Why ſhould your Worſhip bring me in to hang me?
God's my judge Gentlemen I never medled
But with the bruſhing of his cloaths, or fetching
In water in a morning for his hands.
Couſ. Are theſe the honours of this place? Antony
Help me to take her gowne off quickly
Or I'le ſo ſwinge ye for't——
Wife. Why husband? Sir?
Couſ. I'le not looſe a penny by this towne. (lodging,
Long. Why what do you meane ſir, have her to her
And there undreſſe her, I will waite upon her.
Couſ. Indeed you ſhall not, your moneth is out I take it,
Get you out before me wife:
Couzen farewell, I told you long agoe,
That pride begins with pleaſure, ends with woe.
Exit with's Wife.
Bew. Goe thy way ſentences, 'twill be thy fortune,
To live and dye a Cuckold and Church-warden.
Duch. O my poor husband! what a heavy fortune
Is fallen upon him?
Bew. Me thinks 'tis ſtrange,
That heaven fore-warning great men of their falls,
With ſuch plaine tokens, they ſhould not avoid them?
For the laſt night betwixt eleven and twelve,
Two great and hideous blazing ſtars were ſeen
To fight a long houre by the clocke, the one
Dreſt like a Duke, the other like a King,
Till at the laſt the crowned ſtar ore-came.
Ser. Why do ye ſtand ſo dead, Monſieur Marine?
Duke. So Cæſar fell when in the Capitoll
They gave his body two and thirty wounds.
Be warned all ye Peers, and by my fall,
Hereafter learn to let your wives rule all.
Ser. Monſieur Marine, pray let me ſpeak with you;
Sir I muſt wave you to conceale this party,
It ſtands upon my utter overthrow;
Seem not diſcontented, nor do not ſtir a foote,
For if you do, you and your hope——
I ſweare you are a loſt man if you ſtir.
And have an eye to Bewford, he'l tempt you.
Bew. Come, come, for ſhame goe downe;
Were I Marine, by heaven I would goe down:
And being there, I would rattle him ſuch an anſwer
Should make him ſmoake.
Duke. Good Monſieur Bewford peace
Leave theſe rebellious words,
Or by the honours which I once enjoyed,
And yet may ſweare by,
I'le tell the King of your proceedings;
I am ſatisfied.
Wife. You talkt of going down when 'twas not fit,
But now let's ſee your ſpirit,
A thouſand and a thouſand will expect it.
Duke. Why wife, are you mad? (ſtrength
Wife. No nor drunk, but I'de have you know your own
Duke. You talk like a moſt fooliſh woman wife;
I tell you I will ſtay, yet I have a
Cratchet troubles me.
Long. More cratchets yet?
Duke. Follow me Jaq. I muſt have thy counſell,
I will returne againe, ſtay you there Wife. (ſtooles
Long. I fear this loſſe of honour will give him ſome ſw
Wife. No, no, he is reſolv'd, he will not
Stir a foote I'le lay my life.
Bew. I but hee's diſcontented, how ſhall we reſolve that
And make him ſtay with comfort?
Wife. Faith Bewford we muſt even let nature work,
For hee's the ſweeteſt temper'd man for that
As one can wiſh, for let men but goe about to foole him,
And hee'l have his finger as deep in't as the beſt;
But ſee where he comes frowning, bleſſe us all!
Enter Duke.
Duke. Off with your hats, for here doth come
The high and mighty Duke of Burgundy.
What ever you may think, I have thought
And thought, and thought upon't, and I finde it plaine,
The King cannot take backe what he has given,
Unleſſe I forfeit it by courſe of Law.
Not all the water in the river Sene,
Can waſh the blood out of theſe Princely veines.
Wife. Godamercy husband, thou art the beſt
To worke out a thing at a pinch, in France.
Duke. I will aſcend my ſtate againe,
Ducheſſe take your place,
And let our Champion enter.
Long. Has he his Champion? that's excellent.
Duke. And let loud muſick ſound before his entrance.
Sound Trumpet.
Enter Iaques in armour, one carrying a Scutchion before him, and a two-handed ſword.
Wife. How well our Champion doth demean himſelfe,
As if he had been made for ſuch an action?
Me thinks his ſturdy trunchion he doth wield,
Like Mars approaching to a bloody field.
Duke. I think ther's no man ſo deſperate
To dare encounter with our Champion,
But truſt me, Iaques, thou haſt pleas'd us well;
Once more our warlike muſick, then proceed. Ex. Sbat.
Sbat. What wondrous age is this? what cloſe proceedings?

I heare the clang of Trumpets in this house,
To what intent do not our States-men search?
O no, they look not into simple truth;
For I am true, and they regard not me,
A man in armour too: God save the King
The world will end, theres nought but treachery.

Ia. I Ja. servant to the high & mighty Godfrey Duke of Burgundy, do come hither to prove by natural strength and activity of my body, without the help of sorcery, inchantment, or negromancy, that the said Godfrey late of Mount Marine, & now of Burgundy, hath perfect right therto, notwithstanding the Kings command to the contrary, & no other person whatsoever: & in token that I wilbe ready to make good the same I throw down my gage, wch is my honour, pronounced the 37. of Feb. stilo novo, God save the D.

Sbat. Of all the plots the King hath laid for me
This was the shrewdest, 'tis my life they seeke,
And they shall have it: if I should refuse
To accept the challenge in the Kings behalfe,
They have some cause to take away my life,
And if I do accept it, who can tell,
But I may fall by doubtfull chance of war?
'Twas shrewd, but I must take the least of evills,
I take thy gauntlet up thou treacherous man,
That stands in armed coate against the King,
Whom God preserve, and with my single sword
Will justifie what ever he commands;
I'le watch him for catching of my words.

Duke. Jaques goe on, defend our Princely title.

Sbat. Why shrinkst thou backe? thou hast an evill cause;
Come forward man, I have a rocke about me,
I fight for my true Liege.

Du. Goe forward Jaques.

Ja. I do beeseech your Grace to pardon me,
I will not fight with him, with any else
I'le shew my resolution speedily.

Sbat. Come do thy worst, for the King shall see
All is not true that is reported of me.

Ja. I may not fight with him by law of armes.

Du. What? shall my title fall? wilt thou not fight?

Ja. Never with him that once hath sav'd my life.

Sbat. Dar'st thou not fight? behold then I doe goe
Strong with the zeale I beare my Soveraign,
And seize upon that haughty man himselfe.
Descend the steps that (thou hast thus usurpt
Against the King and State) downe to the ground,
And if thou doe utter but a syllable
To crosse the Kings intent, thou art but dead;
There, lye upon the earth and pine and dye.
Did ever any man wade through such stormes,
To save his life, as poore Sbattillion?

Long. I feare this challenge hath spoil'd all.

Duch. Ne're feare it, hee'l work it out againe servant.
See where Sbattillions Love, poor Lady, comes. Ex: Love.

Duke. Jaques. (he's gone,

Ja. Lye still sir if you love your life, I'le whistle when

Love. O Gentlemen, I charge you by the love
Which you beare to women, take some pitty
On this distressed man, help to restore
That pretious jewell to him he hath lost.

Bew. Lady what ever power doth lye in us
By art or prayer, or danger, we are yours,

Love. A strange conceite hath wrought this malady,
Conceite againe must bring him to himselfe,
My strict denyall to his will wrought this?
And if you could but draw his wilder thoughts
To know me, he would sure recover sense.

Long. That charge I'le undertake.

Duke. Looke Jaques, look, for Gods sake let me rise,
This greatnesse is a jade, I cannot sit it.

Ja. His sword is up, and yet he watcheth you.

Du. I'le down again, pray for thy Master, Jaques. (true,

Sbat. Now the King may see all the suggestions are not
He hath receiv'd against my loyalty;
When all men else refuse, I fight his battails,
And thrust my body into dangers mouth;
I am become his Champion, and this sword
Has taught his enemies to know themselves;
O that he would no more be jealous of me!

Long. Monsieur Sbattillion, the King assigns you,
That for this valiant loyall act of yours,
He hath forgot all jealousies and feares,
And never more will tempt you into danger.

Sbat. But how shall I believe this? what new token
Of reconcilement will he shew me?
Let him release my poor love from her torment,
From her hard fare and strict imprisonment.

Long. He hath done this to win your after-love,
And see your Lady sent you from the King
By these two Gentlemen: be thankfull for her.

Sbat. She lives, she lives, I know her by the power
Shoots from her eyes.

Love. Rise deare Sbattillion.

Sbat. I Know my duty,
Next unto my King, I am to kneele to you.

Love. I'le have you rise, fetch me a chair, sit down Sbat.

Sbat. I am commanded, and faith tell me Mistris,
What usage have you had? pray be plaine?

Love. O my most lov'd Sbattillion, paine enough,
But now I am free, thanks to my God and King.

Long. His eyes grow very heavy, not a word,
That his weak senses may come sweetly home.

Sbat. The King is honourable.

Duke. When do you whistle Jaques?

Ja. By and by.

Long. Come hither Monsieur, canst thou laugh a little?

Ser. Yes Sir.

Long. So thou shalt then. Bewford how dost thou?

Bew. Why well.

Long. I'me glad on't, and how does thy wife?

Bew. Why you may see her Sir, she stands behind you.

Lon. By the mass she's there indeed, but wher's her belly?

Bew. Belly?

Lon. Her great belly man: what hast thou sent thee?

Ser. A boy I'le lay my life, it tumbled so.

Bew. Catcht by this light.

Long. I'le be a gossip Bewford.

Ser. And I.

Long. I have an odd Apostle spoone.

Bew. S' foote catcht.

Duch. Why what's the matter Gentlemen?

Long. He's married to your woman.

Duch. And I not know it?

Ser. 'Twas a veniall sin.

Bew. Gall, gall, gall.

Duch. Forgive her Monsieur Bewford, 'twas her love.

Bew. You may rise if you please, I must endure it.

Long. See how my great Lord lyes upon the ground
And dare not stir yet?
Jaques, whistles?

Duke. Jaques, Jaq. is the Kings Champion gone yet,

Ja. No, but hee's asleep.

Duke. Is he asleep art sure?

Ia. I am sure he is, I heare him snore.

Duke. Then by your favours Gentlemen I rise,
And know I am a Duke still.

Jaq. And I am his Champion.
Duch. Hold thee there, and all France cannot mend thee.
Du. I am a Prince as great within my thoughts
As when the whole ſtate did adorn my perſon;
What tryall can be made to try a Prince?
I will oppoſe this noble corps of mine
To any danger that may end the doubt.
Duch. Great Duke and husband there is but one way
To ſatisfie the world of our true right,
And it is dangerous.
Duke. What may it be?
Were it to bring the great Turke bound in chaines
Through France in triumph: or to couple up
The Sophie, and great Preſter Iohn together,
I would attempt it Ducheſſe, tell the courſe.
Duch. There is a ſtrong opinion through the world,
And no doubt grounded on experience
That Lyons will not touch a lawfull Prince,
If you be confident then of your right,
Amongſt the Lions beare your naked body,
And if you come off cleare and never winch,
The world will ſay you are a perfect Prince.
Du. I thank you Ducheſſe for your kinde advice,
But now we do not affect thoſe ravenous beaſts.
Long. A Lyon is a beaſt to try a King;
But for the triall of ſuch a ſtate like this
Pliny reports a maſtive dog will ſerve.
Du. We will not deale with dogs at all: but men.
Ser. You ſhall not need to deale with them at all,
Hark you Sir, the King doth know you are a Duke:
Duke. No, does he? (tion,
Ser. Yes, and is content you ſhall be, but with this cau-
That none know it but your ſelfe:
For if ye do, he'l take it away by act of Parliament.
Du. Here's my hand, and whilſt I live or breath,
No living wight ſhall know I am a Duke.
Ser. Marke me directly Sir, your wife may know it.
Du. May not Jaques?
Ser. Yes, he may.
Du. May not my countrey Couzen?
Ser. By no meanes ſir, if you love your life and ſtate.
Du. Well then, know all I am no Duke.
Ser. No I'le ſweare it.
Long. See he wakes.
Sbat. Where am I, or where have I been all this while?
Sleep hath not ſate ſo ſound upon mine eyes
But I remember well that face;
O thou too cruell, leave at length to ſcorne
Him that but looking on thy beauty dyes,
Either receive me, or put out my eyes.
Love. Deareſt Sbattillion ſee upon my knees,
I offer up my love, forget my wrongs.
Sbat. Art thou mine own?
Love. By heaven I am.
Sbat. Then all the world is mine.
Love. I have ſtranger things to tel thee, my deareſt love.
Sbat. Tell nothing but that thou art mine own:
I do not care to know where I have been,
Or how I have liv'd, or any thing,
But that thou art my own. (wed,
Bew. Well wife, though 'twere a trick that made us
Wee'l make our ſelves merry ſoone in bed.
Du. Know all I am no Duke.
Wife. What ſaye?
Du. Jaques?
Ja. Sir.
Du. I am a Duke.
Both. Are yee?
Duke. Yes faith, yes faith.
But it muſt only run amongſt our ſelves,
And Jaques thou ſhalt be my Secretary ſtill.
Wife. Kinde Gentlemen, leade in Sbattillion,
For he muſt needs be weak and ſickly yet.
Now all my labours have a perfect end as I could wiſh,
Let all young ſprightly wives that have
Dull fooliſh Coxcombs to their husbands,
Learn by me their duties, what to doe,
VVhich is to make 'em fooles, and pleaſe 'em too.

The Prologue.

WIt is become an anticke: and puts on
As many ſhapes of variation,
To court the times applauſe, as the times dare,
Change ſeverall faſhions, nothing is thought rare
Which is not new and follow'd, yet we know,
That what was worne ſome twenty yeare agoe,
Comes into grace againe, and we purſue
That cuſtome, by preſenting to your view
A play in faſhion then, not doubting now
But 'twill appeare the ſame, if you allow
Worth to their noble memory, whoſe name,
Beyond all power of death live in their fame.

The Epilogue.

THe Monuments of vertue and deſert,
Appeare more goodly when the gloſſe of art
Is eaten off by time, then when at firſt
They were ſet up, not cenſur'd at the worſt.
We have done our beſt for your contents to fit
With new paines this old monument of wit.

THE

THE CAPTAINE.

Actus primus: Scæna prima.

Enter Lodovico, and Piſo.

Lodovico.

THe truth is Piſo, ſo ſhe be a woman
And rich and holſome, let her be of what Condition & Complection it pleaſe, (fooles
She ſhall pleaſe me I am ſure; Thoſe men are
That make their eyes their chooſers, not their needes.

Piſo. Me thinks I would have her honeſt too, & handſom.

Lod. Yes if I could have both, but ſince they are Wiſhes ſo neare impoſſibilities,
Let me have that that may be.

Piſo. If it were ſo,
I hope your conſcience would not be ſo nice
To ſtart at ſuch a bleſſing.

Lod. No beleeve me,
I doe not thinke I ſhould.

Piſo. But thou would'ſt be
I doe not doubt upon the leaſt ſuſpition
Unmercifully jealous

Lod. No I ſhould not,
For I believe thoſe mad that ſeeke vexations,
A wife, though ſhe be honeſt, is a trouble,
Had I a wife as faire as Hellen was
That drew ſo many Cuckolds to her cauſe,
Theſe eyes ſhould ſee another in my Saddle
Ere I beleeve my beaſt would carry double.

Piſo. So ſhould not I by'r Lady, and I thinke
My patience (by your leave) as good as yours,
Report would ſtirre me mainely, I am ſure on't.

Lod. Report? you are unwiſe; report is nothing;
For if there were a truth in what men talke,
I meane of this kind, this part of the world
I am ſure would be no more cal'd Chriſtendom.

Piſo. What then?

Lod. Why Cuckoldome, for we ſhould looſe
Our old faiths cleane, and hold their new opinions:
If talke could make me ſweat, before I would marry,
I'de tie a ſurer knot, and hang my ſelfe;
I tell thee there was never woman yet,
Nor never hope there ſhall be, though a Saint,
But ſhe has been a ſubject to mens tongues,
And in the worſe ſenſe: and that deſperate husband,
That dares give up his peace, and follow humours
(Which he ſhall find too buſie, if he ſeek 'em)
Beſide the forcing of himſelfe an Aſſe
He dyes in chaines, eating himſelfe with anger.

Piſo. Having theſe Antidotes againſt opinion
I would marry any one; an arrant whore.

Lod. Thou doſt not feele the nature of this phiſick
Which I preſcribe not to beget diſeaſes,
But where they are, to ſtop them.

Piſo. I conceive ye:
What think'ſt thou? thy way of the widow Lelia?

Lod. Faith thou haſt found out one I muſt confeſſe
Would ſtagger my beſt patience: From that woman
As I would bleſſe my ſelfe from plagues and ſurfets
From men a war at Sea, from ſtormes, and quickſands,
From hearing Treaſon and concealing it,
From daring of a Madman, or a Drunkard,
From Hereſie, ill wine, and ſtumbling poſt horſe;
So would I pray each morning, and each night
(And if I ſaid each houre, I ſhould not lye)
To be delivered of all theſe in one,
The woman thou haſt named.

Enter Iulio, Angilo and Father.

Piſo. Thou haſt ſet her in a pretty Letany.

Ang. Pray take my counſell.

Iul. When I am my ſelfe
Ile heare you any way; love me though thus
As thou art honeſt, which I dare not be Leſt I deſpiſe my ſelfe. Farewell. Exit. Iulio.

Piſo. Doe you heare my friend: Sir are you not a ſetter,
For the faire widdow here of famous memory?

Fa. Ha? am I taken for a Bawd? oh God
To mine owne child too? miſery, I thanke thee
That keepes me from their knowledge: Sir beleeve me
I underſtand ye not.

Lod. You love plaine dealing.
Are you not perceil Bawd? confeſſe your Function,
It may be we would uſe it.

Fa. Were ſhe worſe,
As I feare ſtrangely ſhe is ill enough,
I would not heare this tamely.

Piſo. Heer's a ſhilling
To ſtrike good luck withall.

Fa. Heer's a Sword Sir
To ſtrike a Knave withall, thou lyeſt, and baſely.
Be what thou woul't.

Ang. Why how now Gentlemen?

Fa. You are many: I ſhall meete you, Sir, againe,
And make you underſtand, y'ave wrongd a woman
Compard with whom thy Mother was a ſinner. Farewell.

Piſo. He has amazd me. (Exit Fa.

Ang. With a blow?
By'r Lady twas a ſound on; are ye good
At taking knocks? I ſhall know you hereafter:
You weare too blame to tempt a man ſo far
Before you knew him eaſines; has not hurt ye?

Piſo. No I think.

Lod. We were too blame indeed, to goe ſo far,
For men may be miſtaken: if he had ſwinged us
H'ad ſerv'd us right: Beſhrew my heart I think,
We have done the Gentlewoman as much wrong too,
For hang me, if I know her
In my particular.

Piſo. Nor I; this tis to credit
Mens idle tongues; I warrant they have ſed
As much by our two mothers.

Lod. Like enough.

Ang. I ſee a beating now and then does more
Move and ſtir up a mans contrition
Then a ſharpe Sermon, here probatum eſt.

Enter

Enter Fredrick and Servant,

Ser. What shall I tell your Sister?
Fred. Tell her this,
Till she be better conversation'd
And leave her walking by her selfe, and whyning
To her old melancholly Lute, I'le keepe
As far from her as the Gallowes. Exit Servant.
Ang. Who's that Fredrick?
Fred. Yes marry is't. O Angelo how do'ſt thou?
Ang. Save you Sir, how does my Mistris?
Fred. She is in love I thinke, but not with you.
I can assure you, saw ye Fabritio?
Ang. Is he come over?
Fred Yes a weeke agoe: Shall we dyne?
Ang. I cannot:
Fred. Pre'thee doe.
Ang. Beleeve me I have businesse.
Fred. Have you too, gentlemen?
Piso. No sir.
Fred. Why then let's dyne together:
Lod. With all my heart.
Fred. Goe then: Farewell good Angelo,
Commend me to your friend.
Ang. I will. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Franck and Clora.

Clo. Doe not dissemble Franc, mine eyes are quicker
Then such observers, that do ground their faith
Upon one smile or teare; y'ar much alterd,
And are as empty of those Excellencies
That were companions to you; I meane mirth
And free disposure of your blood and Spirit,
As you were borne a mourner.
Fran. How I pre'thee?
For I perceive no such change in my selfe.
Clora. Come, come, this is not wise, nor provident
To halt before a Cripple: If you love
Be liberall to your friend, and let her know it,
I see the way you run, and know how tedious
'Twill prove without a true companion.
Fran. Sure thou wouldst have me love.
Clor. Yes marry would I
I should not please ye else.
Fran. And who for gods sake?
For I assure my selfe, I know not yet:
And pre'thee Clora, since thou'lt have it so
That I must love, and doe I know not what:
Let him behold a pretty handsome fellow,
And young, and if he be a little valiant
Twill be the better; and a little wise
And faith a little honest.
Clo. Well I will sound ye yet for all your craft.
Fra. Heigh ho! I'le love no more.
Clor. Then one; and him
You shall love Franck.
Fran. Which him? thou art so wise
People will take thee shortly for a witch:
But prethee tell me Clora, if I were
So mad as thou wouldst make me, what kind of man
Wouldst thou imagine him?
Clo. Faith some pretty fellow?
Fra. With a cleane strength, that cracks a cudgell well
And dances at a wake, and plaies at nine holes.
O God what pretty commendations thou hast given him'
Faith if were in love, as I thanke God
I doe not thinke I am; this short Epistle
Before my love would make me burne the legend.
Clor. You are too wilde, I meane some gentleman.
Fra. So doe not I, till I can know'em wiser:
Some Gentleman, no Clora, till some Gentleman
Keepe some land, and fewer whores beleeve me
Ile keepe no love for him; I doe not long
To goe a foot yet, and solicite causes.
Clor. What thinke you then of an adventurer?
I meane some wealthy Merchant.
Fra. Let him venture
In some decaid Crare of his owne: he shall not
Rig me out, that's the short on't; out upon't:
What young thing of my yeares would endure
To have her husband in another Country
Within a moneth after she is married
Chopping for rotten Raysons, and lye pining
At home under the mercy of his fore-man? no,
Though they be wealthy, and indifferent wise
I doe not see that I am bound to love'em.
Clor. I see ya're hard to please; yet I will please ye.
Fran. Faith not so hard neither, if considered;
What woman may deserve as? she is worthy:
But why do we bestow our time so idely?
Prethee let us entertaine some other talke,
This is as fickly to me as faint weather.
Clor. Now I believe I shall content you Francke,
What thinke you of a Courtier?
Fra. Faith so ill,
That if I should be full, and speake but truth,
'Twold shew as if I wanted charity,
Prethee good wench let me not raile upon 'em,
Yet I have an excellent stomach, and must do it;
I have no mercie of these infidels;
Since I am put in minde on't, good beare with me,
Can no man fit you? I will finde him out.
Fra. This somer fruite, that you call Courtier,
While you continue cold and frosty to him
Hangs fast, and may be found: but when you fling
Too full a heate of your affections——
Upon his roote and make him ripe too soone,
Youl' finde him rotten 'ith the handling;
His oathes and affections are all one
With his apparrell, things to set him off,
He has as many Mistrisses, as Faithes,
And all appocripha; his true belefe
Is onely in a private Surgeon,
And for my single selfe, I'de sooner venture——
A new conversion of the Indies,
Then to make Courtiers, able men or honest.
Clo. I do believe you love no Courtier,
And by my troth to ghesse you into love
With any I can thinke of; is beyond
Either your will, or my imagination.
And yet I am sure y'ar caught: and I will know him,
Ther's none left now worthy the thinking of;
Unles it be a Souldier, and I am sure,
I would ever blesse my selfe from such a fellow.
Fra. Why preethee?
Clo. Out upon 'em firelockes,
They are nothing 'ith world, but Buff and Scarlet,
Tough unhewne peeces, to hack swords upon;
I had as liev be courted by a Cannon,
As one of those.
Fra. Thou art too malitious,
Upon my faith me thinks they're worthy men.

Clo. Say

Cor. Say ye so? I'le pull ye on a little farther.
VVhat worth can be in those men, whose profession
Is nothing ith' world but drinke and damn me,
Out of whose violence they are possest
VVith legions of unwholsome whores and quarrels;
I am of that opinion, and will dye in't,
There is no understanding, nor can be
In a soust Souldier.
Fra. Now 'tis ignorance
I easily perceive that thus provokes thee,
And not the love of truth; I'le lay my life
If God had made thee man, thou hadst been a coward.
Clo. If to be valiant, be to be a Souldier; I'le tel ye true,
I had rather be a Coward, I am sure with lesse sin. (spread
Fra. This heresie must be look'd too in time: for if it
'Twill grow too pestilent; were I a Scholler
I would so hamper thee for thy opinion,
That ere I left, I would write thee out of credit
VVith all the world, and make thee not beleev'd
Even in indifferent things; that I would leave thee
A reprobate out of the state of honour.
By all good things, thou hast flung aspersions
So like a foole (for I am angry with thee)
Upon a sort of men; (that let me tell thee
Thy mothers mother would have been a Saint
Had she conceiv'd a Souldier) they are people
(I may commend 'em, while I speake but truth)
Of all the old world, only left to keepe
Man as he was, valiant and vertuous:
They are the modell of those men, whose honours
VVe heave our hands at when we heare recited.
Clo. They are, and I have all I sought for, 'tis a souldier
You love, hide it no longer; you have betray'd your selfe;
Come, I have found your way of commendations,
And what I said, was but to pull it from ye.
Fra. 'Twas pretty, are you grown so cunning, Clora?
I grant I love a souldier; But what souldier
VVill be a new taske to ye? But all this
I doe imagine was but laid to draw me
Out of my melancholy.
Clo. I will have the man
Ere I forsake ye.
Fra. I must to my chamber.
Clo. May not I goe along?
Fra. Yes, but good wench
Move me no more with these fond questions,
They worke like Rubarb with me.
Clo. VVell, I will not. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Lelia and her waiting woman.

Lel. How now? who was that you staid to speak withal.
Wom. The old man forsooth.
Lel. VVhat old man? (that you call Father.
Wom. The poor old man that uses to come hither he
Lel. Have you dispatched him?
Wom. No; he would faine speake with you. (in such
Lel. Wilt thou never learn more manners, then to draw
Needy rascalls to disquiet me? goe, answer him I will Not be at leisure. (he weeps so,
Wom. He will needs speak with you; and good old man
That by my troth I have not the heart to deny him, pray let Him speake with you. (you are not in love
Lel. Lord how tender stomach'd you are grown of late?
With him, are ye; if ye be, strike up the match; you shal have
Three, l. & a paire of blankets; will ye goe answer him?
Wom. Pray let him speak with you, he wil not away else.
(God I am
Lel. Well, let him in then if there be no remedy; I thank Able to abuse him, I shal neve come cleer else of him. (thee
Now Sr. what is your business? pray be short; for I have o-
Matters of more moment to call me from ye.

Enter Father.

Fath. If you but looke upon me like a daughter
And keepe that love about ye that makes good
A Fathers hope, you'l quickly finde my businesse,
And what I would say to you, and before
I aske, will be a giver: say that sleepe,
I meane that love, or be but num'd within ye,
The nature of my want is such a seacher,
And of so mighty power, that where he findes
This dead forgetfulnesse, it works so strongly,
That if the least heate of a childes affection
Remaine unperish'd, like another nature,
It makes all new againe; pray do not scorne me,
Nor seeme to make your selfe a greater businesse
Then my relieving.
Lel. If you were not old
I should laugh at ye; what a vengeance ailes ye
To be so childish to imagine me
A founder of old fellows? make him drinke wench,
And if there be any cold meate in the Buttery,
Give him some broken bread and that, and rid him.
Fath. Is this a childs love? or a recompence
Fit for a fathers care? O Lelia,
Had I been thus unkind, thou hadst not been;
Or like me miserable: But 'tis impossible
Nature should dye so utterly within thee,
And loose her promises; thou art one of those
She set her stamp more excellently on,
Then common people, as fore-telling thee
A generall example of her goodnesse;
Or say she could lye, yet religion
(For love to parents is religious)
Would leade thee right againe: Looke well upon me
I am the roote that gave thee nourishment,
And made thee spring faire; do not let me perish
Now I am old and sapielle.
Lel. As I live
I like ye far worse now ye grow thus holy,
I grant you are my father; and I therefore
Bound to consume my selfe and be a begger
Still in relieving you? I doe not feele
Any such mad compassion yet within me.
Fath. I gave up all my state to make yours thus.
Lel. If was as ye ought to do, and now ye cry for't
As children do for babies backe againe.
Fath. How wouldst thou have me live?
Lel. I would not have ye,
Nor know no reason Fathers should desire
To live, and be a trouble, when children
Are able to inherit, let them dye;
'Tis fit, and I doe for, that they should do so.
Fath. Is this your comfort?
Lel. All that I feele yet.
Fath. I will not trouble thee.
Lel. If you do I care not.
Fath. Pray you give me leave to weep.
Lel. Why pray take leave,
If it be for your ease.
Fath. Thy mother dyed,
Sweet peace be with her, in a happy time.
Lel. She did fit, as she ought to do, would you
Would take the paines to follow: what should you
Or any old man do wasting away
In this world with diseases, and debts,
Only to live to make their children scourges to them,
And hoord up mill-money? me thinks a marble

Lyes quieter upon an old mans head
Then a cold fit a'th palsey.
Fa. O good God!
To what an impudence thou wretched woman,
Hast thou begot thy selfe againe! well, justice
Will punish disobedience.
Lel. You mistake Sir;
Twill punish beggers, fye for shame go worke
Or serve, you are grave enough to be a Poster
In some good man of worships house, and give Sententious answers to the commers in,
A pretty place; or be of some good Consort,
You had a pleasant touch 'ath Cithren once,
If idelnesse have not bereft you of it:
Be any thing but old, and beggarly,
Two sinnes that ever do out grow compassion;
If I might see you offer at a course
That were a likely one, and shew'd some profit,
I would not stick for ten groates, or a noble.
Fa. Did I beget this woman?
Lel. Nay, I know not:
And 'till I know, I will not thanke you for't;
How ever, he that got me had the pleasure,
And that me thinkes, is a reward sufficient.
Fa. I am so strangly stroken with amazement,
I know not where I am, nor what I am. (bring ye
Lel. You had best take fresh aire some where else, 'twill
Out of your trance the sooner.
Fa. Is all this
As you meane Lelia?
Lel. Yes believe me is it,
For yet I cannot thinke you are so foolish,
As to imagine you are young enough
To be my heire, or I so old to make
A Nurse at these yeares for you, and attend
While you sup up my State in penny pots
Of Malmsey: when I am excellent at Cawdles,
And Cullices. and have enough spare gold
To boyle away, you shall be welcome to me;
'Till when I'de have you be as merry Sir
As you can make your selfe with that you have,
And leave to trouble me with these relations;
Of what you have beene to me, or you are,
For as I heare them, so I loose them; this
For ought I know yet, is me resolution.
Fa. Well God be with'thee, for I feare thy end
Will be a strange example. Exit Father.
Lel. Fare ye well Sir;
Now would some poore tender hearted foole have wept,
Relented, and have been undone: such children
I thanke my understanding I hate truely,
For by my troth I had rather see their teares;
Then feele their pitties: my desires and ends
Are all the kindred that I have, and friends. Enter Woman.
Is he departed?
Wom. Yes, but heer's another.
Lel. Not of his tribe I hope, bring me no more
I would wish you such as he is, If thou seest
They looke like men of worth, and state, and carry
Ballast of both sides like tall Gentlemen
Admit 'em, but no snakes to poyson us
With poverty; wench you must let me a wife rule,
Looke not upon the youthes of men, and making,
How they descend in blood, nor let their tongues
Though they strike sodainly, and sweet as musique
Corrupt thy fancy: see, and say them faire too,
But ever keep thy selfe without their distance:
Unlesse the love thou swallows be a pill,
Gilded to hide the bitternesse it brings,
Then fall on without feare wench, yet so wisely
That one encounter cloy him not; nor promise
His love hath made thee more his, then his moneyes;
Learne this and thrive,
Then let thine honour ever,
(For that's the last rule) be so stood upon,
That men may fairely see
'Tis want of meanes, not vertue makes thee fall;
And if you weepe 'twill be a great deale better,
And draw on more compassion, which includes
A greater tendernesse of love and bounty;
This is enough at once, digest it well:
Go let him in wench, if he promise proffit,
Not else.

Enter Iulio.

O you are welcome my faire servant,
Upon my troth I have been longing for ye.
Wom. This, by her rule should be a liberall man,
I see the best on's may learne every day.
Lel. Ther's none come with you.
Iul. No.
Lel. You do the wiser,
For some that have been here (I name no man)
Out of their malice, more then truth, have done me
Some few ill offices.
Iul. How, sweete?
Lel. Nay nothing,
Onely have talk't a little wildely of me:
As their unruly youth directed 'em:
Which though they hite me not, I would have wish'd
Had light upon some other that deserv'd 'em.
Iul. Though she deserve this of the loosest tongue,
(Which makes my sinne the more) I must not see it;
Such is my misery: I would I knew him.
Lel. No, no, let him go,
He is not worth your anger; I must chide you
For being such a stranger to your Mistris,
Why would you be so, Servant?
Iul. I should chide,
If chiding would worke any thing upon you:
For being such a stranger to your Servant,
I meane to his desires: when my deare Mistris,
Shall I be made a happy man?
Lel. Fy Servant
What do you meane, unhand me, or by heav'n,
I shall be very angry, this is rudenesse.
Iul. 'Twas but a kisse or two, that thus offends you
Lel. 'Twas more I thinke then you have warrant for.
Iul. I am sorry I deserv'd no more.
Lel. You may,
But not this rough way Servant: we are tender,
And ought in all to be respected so;
If I had been your horse, or whore, you might
Back me with this intemperance; I thought
You had loy'd as worthy men, whose faire affections
Seeke pleasures warranted, not pull'd by violence,
Do so no more.
Iul. I hope you are not angry?
Lel. I should be with another man, I am sure,
That durst appeare but halfe thus violent.
Iul. I did not meane to ravish ye
Lel. You could not.
Iul. You are so willing—
Lel. How?
Iul. Me thinkes this shadow,
If you had so much shame as fits a woman:
At least of your way, Mistris, long ere this

Had

Had been lay'd of to me that understand ye.
Lel. That understand me? Sir ye understand,
Nor shall no more of me then modesty,
Will without feare deliver to a stranger;
You understand I am honest; else I tell yee
(Though you were better far then Iulio)
You, and your understanding are two fooles,
But were we Saints, thus we are still rewarded.
I see that woman had a pretty catch on't,
That had made you the Master of a kindnesses,
She durst not answer openly; o me!
How easily we women may be cozen'd?
I tooke this Iulio as I have a faith,
(This young dissembler with the sober vizard)
For the most modest temper'd Gentleman,
The coolest, quietest, and best companion;
For such an one I could have wish'd a woman.
Iul. You have wish'd me ill enough a conscience,
Make me no worse for shame: I see the more
I worke by way of service to obtaine ye
You worke the more upon me. Tell me truely
(While I am able to believe a woman,
For if you use me thus, that faith will perish)
What is your end, and whether will you pull me?
Tell me, but tell me that I may not start at,
And have a cause to curse ye.
Lel. Blesse me goodnesse!
To curse me did you say Sir? let it be
For too much loving you then, such a curse
Kill me withall and I shall be a Martyr;
You have found a new way to reward my doting,
And I confesse a fit one for my folly,
For you your selfe if you have good within ye,
And dare be Master of it, know how deadly
This hart has held you ever; oh good God!
That I had never seene that false mans eyes,
That dare reward me thus with feares and curses,
Nor never heard the sweetnesse of that tongue,
That will when this is knowne, yet cozen women:
Curse me good Iulio, curse me bitterly,
I do deserve it for my confidence,
And I beseech thee, if thou hast a goodnesse
Of power yet in thee to confirme thy wishes,
Curse me to earth; for what should I do here
Like a decaying flower, still withering
Under his bitter wordes, whose kindly heate
Should give my poore hart life? No, curse me Iulio,
Thou canst not do me such a benefit
As that, and well done, that the heav'ns may heare it.
Iul. Oh faire teares were you but as chast, as subtill,
Like Bones of Saints, ye would worke miracles;
What were these women to a man that knew not
The thousand, thousand wayes of their deceiving?
What riches had he found? Oh he would thinke
Himselfe still dreaming of a blessednesse,
That like continuall spring should flourish ever.
For if she were as good as she is seeming,
Or like an Eagle could renew her vertues,
Nature had made another world of sweetnesse;
Be not so greiv'd sweet Mistris, what I sed
You do, or should know, was but passion;
Pray wipe your eyes and kisse me; take these trifles,
And weare them for me, which are onely rich
When you will put them on; Indeed I love ye,
Beshrew my sicke hart, if I grieve not for ye.
Lel. Will you dissemble still? I am a foole,
And you may easily rule me, if you flatter,
The sin will be your owne.
Iul. You know I doe not.
Lel. And shall I be so childish once againe,
After my late experience of your spight
To credit you? you doe not know how deepe
(Or if you did, you would be kinder to me,)
This bitternesse of yours have strooke my heart.
Iul. I pray no more.
Lel. Thus you would doe I warrant,
If I were married to you.
Iul. Married to me?
Is that your end?
Lel. Yes, Is not that the best end,
And as all hold, the noblest way of love?
Why doe you looke so strange Sir? doe not you
Desire it should be so?
Iul. Stay.
Lel. Answer me.
Iul. Farwell. Exit Iulio
Lel. I, are you there? are all these teares lost then?
Am I so overtaken by a foole
In my best daies and tricks? my wise fellow
Ile make you smart for't as I am a woman,
And if thou beest not timber, yet Ile warme thee:
And is he gon?

Enter Woman.

Wom. Yes.
Lel. He's not so lightly strooke
To be recovered with a base repentance,
I should be sorry then: Fortune I pre'thee
Give me this man but once more in my armes,
And if I loose him, women have no charmes. Exeunt omnes

Actus Secundus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Iacamo and Fabricio.

Iaco. SEigneur, What thinke you of this sound of warre?
Fab. As onely of a sound; they that intend
To doe are like deepe waters that run quietly
Leaving no face of what they were behind'em,
This rumour is too common and too loude
To carry truth.
Iac. Shall we never live to see
Men looke like men againe,
Upon a march?
This cold dull rusty peace makes us appeare
Like empty Pictures, onely the faint shadowes
Of what we should be:
Would to God my Mother
Had given but halfe her will to my begetting
And made me woman, to sit still and sing,
Or be sicke when I list, or any thing
That is too idle for a man to thinke of:
Would I had been a whore 'thad been a course
Certaine, and of my conscience of more gaine
Then two commands, as I would handle it:
Faith I could wish I had been any thing
Rather then what I am, a Soldier
A Carriere, or a Cobler, when I knew
What 'twas to weare a Sword first; for their trades
Are and shall be a constant way of life,
While men send cheeses up, or weare out buskins.
Fab. Thou'rt a little too impatient,
And mak'st thy anger a far more vexation
Then the not having warrs: I am a Soldier
Which is my whole Inheritance, yet I

Though I could wish a breach with all the world
If not dishonourable, I am not so malitious,
To curse the faire peace of my Mother Countrey;
But thou want'st money; and the first supply
Will bury these thoughts in thee.
Jac. Pox, a peace.
It fills the Kingdome full of holydayes,
And onely feedes the wants of whores and pipers;
And make the idle drunken Rogues, get Spinsters.
'Tis true I may want money, and no little,
And almost cloathes too: of which if I had both
In full abundance: yet against all peace,
That brings up mischiefe thicker then a showre,
I would speake louder then a Lawyer;
By heaven it is the surfet of all youth,
That makes the toughnesse, and the strength of nations
Melt into women. 'Tis an ease that broodes
Theeves, and basterds onely.
Fab. This is more,
(Though it be true) then we ought to lay open,
And seasons onely of an indiscretion,
Believe me Captaine such distemper'd spirits
Once out of motion, though they be proofe valiant,
If they appeare thus violent and herie,
Breed but their owne disgraces; and are nearer
Doubt, and suspect in Princes, then rewardes.
Jac. 'Tis well they can be neere 'em any way,
But call you those true spirits, ill affected
That whil'st the warres were, serv'd like walls and ribs,
To girdle in the Kingdome?
And now falne
Through a faint peace into affliction,
Speake but their miseryes? come, come, Fabritio
You may pretend what patience ye please,
And seeme to yoake your wants like passions;
But while I know thou art a Souldier,
And a deserver, and no other harvest
But what thy Sword reapes for thee to come in,
You shall be pleas'd to give me leave to tell ye,
You wish a De'ill of this musty peace:
To which prayer,
As one that's bound in conscience, and all
That love our trade, I cry, Amen.
Fab. Prethee no more, we shall live well enough,
There's wayes enough besides the warres to men
That are not loggs, and lye still for the handes
Of others to remove 'em.
Jac. You may thrive Sir,
Thou art young and handsome yet, and well enough
To please a widdow: thou canst sing, and tell
These foolish love-tales; and indite a little,
And if need be, compile, a pretty matter
And dedicate it to the honourable,
Which may awaken his compassion,
To make ye Clarke a'th kitchen, and at length
Come to be married to my Ladyes woman,
After she's crack't 'ith ring.
Fab. 'Tis very well Sir.
Jac. But what dost thou thinke shall become of me,
With all my imperfections? let me dye
If I thinke I shall ever reach above
A forlorne Tapster, or some frothy fellow,
That stincks of stale beere.
Fab. Captaine Jacamo,
Why should you thinke so hardly of your vertues?
Ja. What vertues? by this light I have no vertue,
But downe right buffeting: what can my face
That is no better then a ragged Map now
Of where I have marcht and traveled profit me?
Unlesse it be for Ladyes to abuse, and say
'Twas spoil'd for want of a Bongrace when I was young,
And now 'twill make a true prognostication
Of what man must be? Tell me of a fellow
That can mend noses, and complaine,
So tall a Souldier should want teeth to his stomach?
And how it was great pitty, that it was,
That he that made my body, was so buried
He could not stay to make my leggs too? but was driven
To clap a paire of cat-skins to my knees, for which I am indebted to two Schoole-boyes? this Must follow necessary.
Fab. Ther's no such matter.
Ja. Then for my morals, and those hidden pieces,
That art bestowes upon me, they are such
That when they come to light: I am sure will shame me.
For I can neither write, nor read, nor speake
That any man shall hope to profit by me,
And for my Languages, they are so many
That put them altogether, they will scarce
Serve to beg single beere in: the plaine truth is,
I love a Souldier, and can lead him on,
And if he fight well I dare make him drunk:
This is my vertue, and if this will do
I'le scramble yet amongst 'em.
Fab. 'Tis your way
To be thus pleasant still; but feare not man
For though the warrs fail, we shall screw our selves
Into some course of life yet.
Ja. Good Fabritio,
Have a quick eye upon me, for I feare
This peace will make me something that I love not;
For by my troth though I am plaine and dudgion,
I would not be an Asse: and to sell parcels,
I can as soone be hang'd prethee bestowe me
And speake some little good, though I deserve not.

Enter Father.

Fab. Come wee'l consider more: stay, this
Should be another winde-fall of the warrs.
Jac. He lookes indeed like an old tater'd Colours,
That every winde would borrow from the Staffe;
These are the hopes we have for all our hurts:
They have not cast his tongue too.
Father. They that say
Hope never leaves a wretched man that seekes her,
I thinke are either patient fooles, or lyers,
I am sure I finde it so, for I am master'd,
With such a misery and griefe together
That that stay'd Anchor men lay hold upon
In all their needs, is to me lead that bowes,
Or breakes, with every strong sea of my sorrowes.
I could now question heaven, (were it well
To looke into their justice) why those soules,
Those heavy sinnes, other provoke 'em with
Should be rewarded on the heads of us,
That hold the least alliance to their vices?
But this would be too curious; for I see
Our suffering, not disputing, is the end,
Reveal'd to us of all these miseryes.
Jac. Twenty such holy Hermits in a Campe,
Would make 'em all Carthusians, I'le be hang'd
If hee know what a whore is: or a health,
Or have a nature liable to learne,
Or so much honest nurture to be drunke.
I do not thinke he has the spleene to sweare
A greater oath then Sempsters utter Sockes with,
S'pur him a question.

Fath. They

Fath. They are ſtrangers both
To me, as I to them I hope: I would not have
Me and my ſhame together known by any,
I'le rather lye my ſelfe unto another.
Fab. I need not aske you Sir your Countrey,
I heare you ſpeake this tongue: pray what more are ye?
Or have you been? if it be not offenſive
To urge ye ſo far, miſery in your yeares,
Gives every thing a tongue to queſtion it.
Fath. Sir, though I could be pleas'd to make my ills
Only mine owne, for grieving other men,
Yet to ſo faire and courteous a demander
That promiſes compaſſion, at worſt, pity,
I will relate a little of my ſtory.
I am a Gentleman, however thus
Poore and unhappy; which beleeve me ſir
Was not borne with me: for I we'll have tri'd
Both the extreams of fortune; and have found
Both dangerous: my younger yeares provok'd me,
Feeling in what an eaſe I ſlept at home,
Which to all ſtirring ſpirits is a ſickneſſe,
To ſee far Countreyes, and obſerve their Cuſtomes.
I did ſo; and I travelld till that courſe
Stor'd me with language, and ſome few ſlight manners,
Scarce worth my money; when an ich poſſeſt me
Of making armes my active end of travell.
Fab. But did you ſo?
Fath. I did; and twenty winters
I wore the Chriſtian Cauſe upon my ſword
Againſt his enemies, at Buda ſiege
Full many a cold night have I lodg'd in armour
When all was frozen in me but mine honour:
And many a day, when both the Sun and Canon
Strove, who ſhould moſt deſtroy us: have I ſtood
Malld up in ſteele, when my tough ſinews ſhrunke,
And this parch'd body ready to conſume
As ſoone to aſhes, as the pike I bore:
Want has been to me as another nature,
Which makes me with this patience ſtill profeſſe it;
And if a Souldier may without vaine-glory
Tell what h'as done, beleeve me Gentlemen
I could turne over annals of my dangers:
With this poor weakneſſe have I wunn'd a breach,
And made it firme with ſo much blood, that all
I had to bring me off alive was anger.
Thrice was I made a ſlave, and thrice redeem'd
At price of all I had; The miſeries
Of which times, if I had a heare to tell,
Would make ye weep like children; But I'le ſpare ye
Ja. Fabritio, we two have been ſouldiers
Above theſe fourteen yeares, yet 'a my conſcience
All we have ſeen, compar'd to his experience
Has been but cudgel-play, or Cock-fighting.
By all the faith I have in armes, I reverence
The very poverty of this brave fellow:
Which were enough it ſelfe, and his to ſtrengthen
The weakeſt towne againſt halfe Chriſtendome.
I was never ſo aſham'd of ſervice
In all my life before, now I conſider
What I have done; and yet the rogues would ſweare
I was a valiant fellow; I do finde
The greateſt danger I have brought my life through,
Now I have heard this worthy, was no more
Then ſtealing of a May-pole, or at worſt,
Fighting at ſingle billet with a Barge-man.
Fab. I do believe him Jacamo.
Jac. Beleeve him?
I have no faith within me, if I doe not.

Fath. I ſee they are ſouldiers?
And if we may judge by affections
Brave and deſerving men: how they are ſtir'd
But with a meer relation of what may be?
Since I have wonne beliefe, and am not known,
Forgive me honour, I'le make uſe of thee.
Fab. Sir would I were a man, or great, or able
To looke with liberall eyes upon your vertue.
Jac. Let's give him all we have, and leave off prating:
Here Souldier, there's even five months pay: be merry,
And get thee handſome cloths.
Fab. What meane you Jacamo?
Jac. Ye are a foole.
The very ſtory's worth a hundred pound.
Give him more money.
Fath. Gentlemen, I know not
How I am able to deſerve this bleſſing.
But if I live to ſee faire dayes againe,
Something I'le doe in honour of your goodneſſe,
That ſhall ſhew thankfulneſſe, if not deſert.
Fab. If you pleaſe Sir, till we procure ye place,
To eate with us, or weare ſuch honeſt garments
As our poor meanes can reach to, you ſhall be
A welcome man; to ſay more, were to feede ye
Only with words; we honour what y'ave been,
For we are ſouldiers, though not neere the worth
You ſpake of lately.
Fath. I do gheſſe ye ſo,
And knew, unleſſe he were a ſouldier,
He could not find the way to know my wants.
Ja. But me thinks all this while y'are too temperate;
Do you not tell me ſometimes of their dulneſſe
When you are gript, as now you are with need?
I do, and let them know thoſe ſilkes they weare
The Warre weaves for 'em: and tho bread they eate
We ſow, and reape again to feed their hunger:
I tell them boldly, they are maſters of
Nothing but what we fight for: their faire women
Lye playing in their armes, whilſt we like Lares
Defend their pleaſures: I am angry too,
And often raile at theſe forgetfull great men
That ſuffer us to ſue for what we ought
To have flung on us, ere we aske.
Fath. I have
Too often told my griefes that way, when all
I reapt, was rudeneſſe of behaviour;
In their opinions men of Warre that thrive,
Muſt thank 'em when they raile: and wait to live.
Fab. Come Sir, I ſee your wants need more relieving,
Then looking what they are: pray goe with us.
Fath. I thanke you Gentlemen: ſince you are pleas'd
To do a benefit, I dare not croſſe it,
And what my ſervice or endeavours may Stand you in need, you ſhall command, not pray. (Exeunt
Ja. So you ſhall us; i'le to the Taylors with you bodily

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Fredericke, Lodovico, and Piſo.

Lod. Well, if this be true; I'le believe a woman
When I have nothing elſe to do.
Piſo. 'Tis certaine; if there be a way of truth,
In bluſhes, ſmiles, and commendations;
For by this light, I have heard her praiſe yon fellow
In ſuch a pitch, as if ſh'ad ſtudied
To croude the worths of all men into him,
And I imagine theſe are ſeldome us'd
Without their ſpeciall ends, and by a maide
Of her deſires and youth.
Fred. It may be ſo.

She's free as you or I am, and may have
By that prerogative, a liberall choiſe
In the bettowing of her love.
Lod Beſtowing?
If it be ſo, ſhe has beſtowed her ſelfe
Upon a trim youth: Piſo, what do you call him?
Piſo. Why, Captain Jacamo.
Lod. O Captaine Jack-boy,
That is the Gentleman.
Fred. I thinke he be
A Gentleman at worſt.
Lod. So think I too,
Would he would mend Sir.
Fred. And a tall one too.
Lod. Yes of his teeth; for of my faith I thinke
They are ſharper then his ſword, and dare do more
If the Beuffe meet him fairely.
Fred. Very well.
Piſo. Now do I wonder what ſhe meanes to doe
When ſhe has married him.
Lod. Why well enough,
Traile his pike under him, and be a Gentlewoman
Of the brave Captaines company.
Fred. Doe you heare me?
This woman is my ſiſter, Gentlemen.
Lod. I am glad ſhe is none of mine: but Frederick,
Thou art not ſuch a foole ſure to be angry
Unleſſe it be with her; We are thy friends man.
Fred. I thinke ye are.
Lod. Yes faith, and do but tell thee
How ſhee will utterly orethrow her credit,
If ſhe continue gracing of this pot-gun.
Piſo. I thinke ſhe was bewitcht, or mad, or blinde,
She would never have taken ſuch a ſcar-crow elſe
Into protection: of my life he lookes
Of a more ruſty ſwarth complexion
Then an old arming doublet.
Lod. I would ſend
His face to the Cutlers then, and have it ſanguin'd,
'Twill looke a great deale ſweeter; then his noſe
I would have ſhorter, and my reaſon is,
His face will be ill mounted elſe.
Piſo. For his body,
I will not be my own Judge, leaſt I ſeeme
A railer, but let others look upon't,
And if they finde it any other thing
Then a trunke-ſeller, to ſend wines downe in,
Or a long walking-bottle, I'le be hang'd for't:
His hide, (for ſure he is a beaſt) is ranker
Then the Muſcovy leather: and grain'd like it.
And by all likeli-hoods he was begotten
Between a ſtubborn paire of winter boots.
His body goes with ſtraps, he is ſo churliſh.
Lod. Hee's poor and beggerly beſides all this:
And of a nature farre uncapable
Of any benefit: for his manners cannot
Shew him a way to thanke a man that does one,
He's ſo uncivill: you may do a part
Worthy a brother, to perſwade your ſiſter
From her undoing: if ſhe prove ſo fooliſh
To marry this caſt Captaine, looke to finde her
Within a month, where you, or any good man
Would bluſh to know her: ſelling cheeſe and prunes,
And retayl'd bottle ale: I grieve to think
Becauſe I lov'd her, what a march this Captaine
Will ſet her into.
Fred. You are both, beleeve me,
Two arrant Knaves; and were it not for taking
So juſt an execution from his hands
You have beli'd thus, I would ſwaddle ye,
Till I could draw off both your skins like ſcaberds.
That man that you wrong'd thus, though to me
He be a ſtranger, yet I know, ſo worthy,
However low in fortune, that his worſt parts,
The very wearing of his cloths, would make
Two better Gentlemen then you dare be,
For there is vertue in his outward things.
Lod. Belike you love him then.
Fred. Yes marry do I.
Lod. And will be angry for him.
Fred. If you talke
Or pull your face into a ſtich againe,
As I love truth I ſhall be very angry.
Do not I know thee, though thou haſt ſome land:
To ſet thee out thus among Gentlemen,
To be a prating and vain-glorious aſſe?
I do not wrong thee now, for I ſpeake truth.
Doe not I know thou haſt been a cudgel'd coward,
That has no cure for ſhame but cloath of ſilver?
And think'ſt the wearing of a gawdy ſuite
Hides all diſgraces?
Lod. I underſtand you not, you hurt not me
Your anger flies ſo wide.
Piſo. Signeur Frederick,
You much miſtake this Gentleman.
Fred. No Sir.
Piſo. If you would pleaſe to be leſſe angry,
I would tell you how.
Fred. You had better ſtudy Sir
How to excuſe your ſelfe if ye be able,
Or I ſhall tell you once againe.
Piſo. Not me Sir;
For I proteſt what I have ſaid, was only
To make you underſtand your ſiſters danger.
Lod. He might if it pleas'd him conceive it ſo.
Fred. I might if it pleas'd me ſtand ſtill and heare
My ſiſter made a may-game, might I not?
And give allowance to your liberall jeſts
Upon his perſon, whoſe leaſt anger would
Conſume a legion of ſuch wretched people,
That have no more to juſtifie their actions
But their tongues ends? that dare lye every way
As a mill grindes? From this houre I renounce
All part of fellowſhip that may hereafter
Make me take knowledge of ye, but for Knaves;
And take heed, as ye love whole ſkins, and coxcombs,
How, and to whom ye prate thus; for this time
I care not if I ſpare ye: do not ſhake,
I will not beat ye, though ye doe deſerve it
Richly.
Lod. This is a ſtrange courſe Frederick;
But ſure you do not, or you would not know us,
Beate us?
Piſo. 'Tis ſomewhat low Sir, to a Gentleman.
Fred. I'le ſpeak but few words, but I'le make 'em truths;
Get you gone both, and quickly, without murmuring,
Or looking big: and yet before you goe
I will have this confeſt, and ſeriouſly,
That you two are two raſcalls.
Lod. How?
Fred. Two Raſcals.
Come ſpeake it from your hearts, or by this light
My ſword ſhall flye among ye; anſwer me,
And to the point directly.
Piſo. You ſhall have
Your will for this time: ſince we ſee y'are grown

So

So far untemperate; Let it be so Sir
In your opinion.
Fred. Do not mince the matter,
But speake the words plaine; and you Ludovick
That stand so tally on your reputation,
You shall be he shall speake it.
Lud. This is pretty,
Fred. Let me not stay upon't.
Lud. Well we are rascalls,
Yes Piso, we are rascals. Exit Lud. and Piso.
Fred. Get ye gone now, not a word more, y'are rascals.
Enter Fabritio.
Fab. That should be Fredericke.
Jac. 'Tis he: Fredericke?
Fred. Who's that?
Jac. A friend Sir.
Fred. It is so, by the voyce
I have sought you Gentlemen, and since I have found you,
So neare our house, I'le force ye stay a while,
I pray let it be so.
Fab. It is too late,
Wee'l come and dine to morrow with your sister,
And do our services.
Jac. Who were those with you?
Fred. We met two came from hence:
Two idle fellows,
That you shall beate hereafter, and I'le tell ye
Some fitter time a cause sufficient for it.
Fabr. But Fredericke, tell me truly; do you thinke
Shee can affect my friend?
Fred. No certainer
Then when I speake of him, or any other,
She entertaines it with as much desire
As others do their recreations.
Fabr. Let not him have this light by any meanes;
He will but thinke he's mockt, and so grow angry,
Even to a quarrell: he's so much distrustfull
Of all that take occasion to commend him——
Women especially: for which he shuns
All conversation with 'em, and beleeves
He can be but a mirth to all their Sex.
Whence is this musique?
Fred. From my sisters chamber.
Fab. The touch is excellent: let's be attentive.
Jac. Harke, are the waights abroad?
Fabr. Be softer prethee,
'Tis private musicke.
Jac. What a dyn it makes?
I had rather hear a Jews-trump then these Lutes,
They crye like Schoole-boyes.
Fabr. Prethee Jacamo.
Jac. Well I heare, or sleepe, I care not whether.

The SONG.

Enter at the window Francke and Clora.

1. TEll me dearest what is Love?
2. 'Tis a lightning from above,
'Tis an arrow, 'tis a fire,
'Tis a boy they call Desire.
Both. 'Tis a grave,
Gapes to have
Those poore fooles that long to prove.

1. Tell me more, are women true?
2. Yes, some are, and some as you.
Some are willing, some are strange,
Since you men first taught to change.
Both. And till truth
Be in both,
All shall love, to love anew.

1. Tell me more yet, can they grieve?
2. Yes, and sicken sore, but live:
And be wise, and delay,
When you men are as wise as they.
Both. Then I see
Faith will be,
Never till they both beleeve.

Franc. Clora, come hither; who are these below there?
Clor. Where?
Fran. There.
Clor. Ha? I should know their shapes
Though it be darkish; there are both our brothers,
What should they make thus late here?
Fran. What's the tother?
Clor. What tother?
Fran. He that lyes along there.
Clor. O, I see him
As if he had a branch of some great Petigree
Grew out on's belly.
Fra. Yes.
Clor. That should be,
If I have any knowledge in proportion.——
Fab. They see us.
Fred. 'Tis no matter.
Fab. What a log
Is this, to sleep such musique out?
Fred. No more let's heare 'em.
Clor. If I have any knowledge in proportion,
The Captaine Jacamo, those are his legs
Upon my conscience.
Fra. By my faith, and neate ones. (nature,
Clor. You mean the boots, I thinke they are neate by
Fra. As thou art knavish, would I saw his face!
Clor. 'Twould scare you in the dark.
Fra. A worse then that
Has never scar'd you Clora to my knowledge.
Clora. 'Tis true, for I never have seen a worse;
Nor while I say my prayers heartily,
I hope I shall not.
Fran. VVell, I am no telltale:
But is it not great pitty, tell me Clora,
That such a brave deserving Gentleman
As every one delivers this to be,
Should have no more respect, and worth flung on him
By able men? VVere I one of these great ones,
Such vertues should not sleep thus.
Clora. VVere he greater
He would sleep more I thinke: Ile waken him.
Franc. Away ye foole.
Clor. Is he not dead already, and they two taking order
About his Blacks? me thinks they are very busie,
A fine cleane coarse he is: I would have him buried
Even as he lyes, crosse legged, like one o'th Templers
(If his west-phaly gammons will hold crossing)
And on his brest, a buckler with a pike in't,
In which I would have some, learned Cutler
Compile an Epitaph, and at his feete
A musquet, with this word upon a Label
VVhich from the cocks mouth thus should be delivered,
I have discharged the office of a Souldier.
Franc. VVell, if thy Father were a Souldier
Thus thou wouldst use him.
Clora. Such a Souldier,
I would indeed.
Fab. If he heare this, not all
The power of man could keep him from the windowes

Till

Till they were downe and all the doores brok open:
For Gods sake, make her cooler; I dare not venture
To bring him else; I know he will goe to bufferts
Within five words with her, if she holds this spirit;
Let's waken him, and away, we shall heare worse else.
Fran. Well if I be not even with thee Clora
Let me be hang'd for this: I know thou dost it
Onely to anger me, and purge your witt
Which would breake out else.
Clora. I have found ye,
Ile be no more crosse, bid'em good night
Fran. No, no, they shall not know, we have seen'em;
Shut the window. Exit Fran. and Clora.
Fab. Will you get up Sir?
Jac. Have you paid the Fidlers?
Fab. You are not left to doe it: Fie upon thee,
Hast thou forsworne manners?
Jac. Yes unlesse
They would let me eate my meate without long graces
Or drinke without a preface to the pledger;
Oft will it please you, shall I be so bold sir
Let me remember your good bedfellow,
And lye and kisse my hand unto my Mistris
As often as an Ape does for an Apple?
These are meere Schismes in Soldiers; wher's my friend?
These are to us as bitter as purgations,
We love that generall freedome we are bred to;
Hang these faint fooleries, they smelt of peace,
Doe they not friend?
Fab. Faith Sir to me they are
As things indifferent, yet I use'em not,
Or if I did, they would not prick my conscience.
Fred. Come, shall we goe? 'tis late.
Jac. Yes any whether,
But no more Musick, it has made me dull.
Fab. Faith any thing but drinking disturbs thee Jacmo
Wee'l ev'n to bed.
Jac. Content.
Fab. Thou wilt dreame of wenches.
Jac. I never thinke of any I thanke God
But when I am drunke, and then tis but to cast
A cheape way how they may be all destroyd
Like vermine; let's away I am very sleepy.
Fab. I, thou art ever so, or angry, come. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius, Scæna Prima.

Enter Julio and Angilo.

Jul. I Will but see her once more Angilo
That I may hate her more, and then I am
My selfe againe.
Ang. I would not have thee tempt lust,
Tis a way dangerous, and will deceive thee
Hadst thou the constancy of all men in thee.
Jul. Having her sins before me, I dare see her
Were she as catching as the plague, and deadly,
And tell her she is fouler then all those
And far more pestilent, if not repentant,
And like a stronge man, chide her well, and leave her.
Ang. Tis easily said, of what complexion is she?
Jul. Make but a curious frame unto thy selfe
As thou wouldst shape an Angell in thy thought
Such as the Poets, when their fancies sweat
Imagine Iuno is, or faire eyde Pallas
And one more excellent, then all those figures
Shalt thou finde her; shees browne, but of a sweetnes,
(If such a poore word may expresse her beauty)
Beleeve me Angilo would doe more mischiefe
With a forc't smile, then twenty thousand Cupids
With their love quivers, full of Ladies eyes,
And twice as many flames, could fling upon us.
Ang. Of what age is she?
Jul. As a Rose at fairest,
Neither a bud, nor blown, but such a one,
Were there a Hercules to get againe
With all his glory, or one more then he
The god would choose out mongst a race of women
To make a mother of; she is outwardly
All that bewitches sense; all that entises,
Nor is it in our vertue to uncharme it.
And when she speakes, oh Angilo, then musick
(Such as old Orpheus made, that gave a soule
To aged mountaines, and made rugged beasts
Lay by their rages; and tall trees that knew
No sound but tempests, to bow downe their branches
And heare, and wonder; and the Sea, whose surges
Shooke their white heads in heaven, to be as midnight
Still, and attentive; steales into our soules
So suddenly, and strangely, that we are
From that time no more ours. but what she pleases.
Ang. Why looke, how far you have thrust your selfe again
Into your old disease? are you that man
With such a resolution, that would venture
To take your leave of folly, and now melt
Even in repeating her?
Jul. I had forgot me.
Ang. As you will still doe.
Jul. No, the strongest man
May have the grudging of an ague on him,
This is no more; let's go, I would faine be fit
To be thy friend againe, for now I am no mans.
Ang. Goe you, I dare not goe, I tell you truely
Nor were it wise I should.
Jul. Why?
Ang. I am well.
And if I can, will keepe my selfe so.
Jul. Ha? thou mak'st me smile, though I have little cause,
To see how prettily thy feare becomes thee;
Art thou not strong enough to see a woman?
Ang. Yes, twenty thousand: but not such a one
As you have made her; Ile not lye for'th matter:
I know I am fraile, and may be cosen'd too
By such a Syren.
Jul. Faith thou shalt goe, Angilo
Ang. Faith but I will not; no I know how far Sir
I am able to hold out, and will not venture
Above my depth: I doe not long to have
My sleepe ta'ne from me; and goe pulingly
Like a poore wench had lost her market money;
And when I see good meat, sit still and figh,
And call for small beere; and consume my wit
In making Anagrams, and faithfull poses;
I doe not like that Itch, I am sure I had rather
Have the maine pox, and safer.
Jul. Thou shalt goe,
I must needs have thee as a witnesse with mee
Of my repentance; as thou lov'st me goe.
Ang. Well I will goe, since you will have it so,
But if I prove a foole too, looke to have me
Curse you continually, and fearefully.
Jul. And if thou seest me fall againe, good Angilo
Give me thy councell quickly least I perish.

Ang. Pray

Ang. Pray God I have enough to save my ſelfe,
For as I have a ſoule, I had rather venture
Upon a ſavage Iſlind, then this woman. Exeunt

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Father and Servant.

Fath. From whom Sir, comes this bounty? for I thinke
You are miſtaken.
Serv. No Sir, 'tis to you,
I am ſure my Miſtris ſent it.
Fath. Whoe's your Miſtris,
That I may give her thanks?
Ser. The vertuous Widow,
Fath. The vertuous widow Sir? I know none ſuch:
Pray what's her name?
Ser. Lælia.
Fath. I knew you err'd
'Tis not to me I warrant ye; there Sir,
Carry it to thoſe ſhe feedes fat with ſuch favours,
I am a ſtranger to her.
Ser. Good Sir take it,
And if you will, I'le ſweare ſhe ſent it to you,
For I am ſure mine eye never went off ye
Since you forſook the Gentlemen you talk'd with Juſt at her doore.
Fath. Indeed I talkt with two
Within this halfe houre in the ſtreet.
Ser. 'Tis you Sir,
And none but you I am ſent to: wiſer men
Would have been thankfull ſooner, and receiv'd it,
'Tis not a fortune every man can brag of,
And from a woman of her excellence.
Fa. Well Sir, I am Chatechiz'd, what more belongs to't?
Ser. This only Sir; ſhe would intreat you come
This evening to her without faile.
Fa. I will.
Ser. You gheſſe where.
Fa. Sir I have a tongue elſe. Exit Ser.
She is down-right D.vill; or elſe my wants
And her diſobedience have provok't her
To looke into her foule ſelfe, and be ſorry.
I wonder how ſhe knew me? I had thought
I had been the ſame to all, I am to them
That chang'd me thus: God pardon me for lying,
For I have paid it home: many a good man
That had but found the profit of my way
Would forſweare telling true againe in haſt.

Enter Ludovico and Piſo.

Here are my praters; now if I did well
I ſhould belabour 'em, but I have found
A way to quiet 'em, worth a thouſand on't.
Lod. If we could get a fellow that would do it.
Fa. What villany is now in hand?
Piſo. 'Twill be hard to be done in my opinion
Unleſſe we light upon an Engliſh-man
With ſeven-ſcore furſets in him.
Lod. Are the Engliſh-men ſuch ſtubborn drinkers?
Piſo. Not a leake at Sea
Can ſucke more liquor; you ſhall have their children
Chriſtned in mull'd ſacke, and at five yeares old, able
To knocke a Dane downe: Take an Engliſh-man
And cry St. George, and give him but a raſher,
And you ſhall have him upon even terms
Defy a hogſhead; ſuch a one would do it
Home boy, and like a work-man: at what weapon?
Lod. Sherry ſack; I would have him drinke ſtark dead,
If it were poſſible: at worſt pull'd porridge.
Piſo. What is the end then?
Lod. Doſt thou not perceive it?
If he be drunke dead, then's a falve end of him.
If not, this is my end, or by ſtratagem,
Or by deceiving, to conduct him where
The foole is, that admires him; and if ſober,
His nature be ſo rugged, what will he
When he is hot with wine? come let's about it,
If this be done but handſomely, I'le pawne
My head ſhe hath done with ſouldiers.
Piſo. This may do well.
Fa. Here's a new way to murther men alive,
I'le choake this traine: God ſave ye Gentlemen.
It is to you, ſtay: yes it is to you.
Lod. What's to me?
Fath. You are fortunate,
I cannot ſtand to tell you more now, meete me
Here ſoone, and you'l be made a man. Exit Father.
Lod. What Viſion's this?
Piſo. I know not.
Lod. Well, I'le meet it,
Think you on't other, and let me a while
Dreame of this fellow.
Piſo. For the Drunkard, Ludwicke,
Let me alone.
Lod. Come, let's about it then. Exeunt

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Clora and Franke.

Clo. Ha, ha, ha, pray let me laugh extreamly.
Fra. Why? prethee why? haſt thou ſuch cauſe?
Clo. Yes faith, my brother will be here ſtraightway, &c—
Fra. What?
Clo. The other party: ha, ha, ha.
Fra. VVhat party?
VVench thou art not drunke.
Clo. No faith.
Fra. Faith thou haſt been among the bottles Clora;
Clo. Faith but I have not Franke. Prethee be handſom,
The Captaine comes along too, wench.
Fra. O is that it?
That tickles ye.
Clo. Yes, and ſhall tickle you too,
You underſtand me?
Fra. By my troth thou art grown
A ſtrange lewd wench: I muſt e'ne leave thy company,
Thou wilt ſpoile me elſe.
Clo. Nay, thou art ſpoil'd to my hand;
Hadſt thou been free, as a good wench ought to be,
VVhen I went firſt a birding for thy Love,
And roundly ſaid, that is the man muſt doe it,
I had done laughing many an houre agoe.
Fra. And what doſt thou ſee in him, now thou knowſt
To be thus laught at? (him,
Clo. Prethee be not angry
And I'le ſpeake freely to thee.
Fra. Doe, I will not.
Clo. Then as I hope to have a handſome husband,
This fellow in mine eye, and Franke I am held
To have a ſhrewd gheſſe at a pretty fellow,
Appeares a ſtrange thing.

Fra. Why how ſtrange for Gods ſake?
He is a man, and one that may content
(For any thing I ſee) a right good woman:
And ſure I am not blinde.
Clo. There lyes the queſtion;
For, but you ſay he is a man, and I
Will credit you, I ſhould as ſoone have thought him
Another of Gods creatures; out upon him,
His body, that can promiſe nothing
But lazineſſe and long ſtrides.
Fra. Theſe are your eyes;
Where were they Clora, when you fell in love
With the old foot-man, for ſinging of Queen Dido?
And ſwore he look'd in his old velvet trucks
And his ſlyc't Spaniſh Jerkin, like Don Iohn?
You had a parlous judgment then, my Clora.
Clo. Who told you that?
Fra. I heard it.
Clo. Come, be friends,
The Souldier is a Mars, no more, we are all
Subject to ſlide away.
Fra. Nay, laugh on ſtill.
Clo. No faith, thou art a good wench, and 'tis pity
Thou ſhouldſt not be well quarred at thy entring,
Thou art ſo high flown for him: Look, whoſe there?

Enter Fabricio and Iacamo.

Iac. Prethee goe ſingle, what ſhould I do there,
Thou knowſt I hate theſe viſitations,
As I hate peace or perry.
Fab. Wilt thou never
Make a right man?
Iac. You make a right foole of me
To lead me up and down to viſit women,
And be abus'd and laugh'd at; let me ſterve
If I know what to ſay, unleſſe I aske 'em
What their ſhooes coſt?
Fab. Fye upon thee, coward,
Canſt thou not ſing?
Iac. Thou knoweſt I can ſing nothing
But Plumpton parke.
Fab. Thou't be bold enough,
When thou art enterd once.
Iac. I had rather enter
A breach: If I miſcarry, by this hand
I will have you by'th eares for't.
Fab. Save ye Ladies.
Clora. Sweet brother I dare ſweare, you're welcome hither,
So is your Friend;
Fab. Come, bluſh not, but ſalute 'em.
Franck. Good Sir beleeve your Siſter; you are moſt welcome,
So is this worthy Gentleman whoſe vertues
I ſhall be proud to be acquainted with.
Iac. She has found me out already, and has paid me;
Shall we be going?
Fab. Peace;
Your goodneſſe Lady
Will ever be afore us, for my ſelfe
I will not thanke you ſingle, leſt I leave
My friend, this Gentleman, out of acquaintance.
Iac. More of me yet?
Fra. Would I were able Sir,
From either of your worths to merit thankes.
Clo. But brother, is your friend thus ſad ſtill? me thinks
'Tis an unſeemly nature in a Souldier.
Iac. What hath ſhe to do with me, or my behaviour?
Fab. He do's but ſhew ſo, prethee to him Siſter.
Iac. If I do not breake thy head, I am no Chriſtian,
If I get off once.
Clo. Sir, we muſt intreat you
To thinke your ſelfe more welcome, and be merry,
'Tis pitty a faire man of your proportion
Should have a ſoule of ſorrow.
Iac. Very well;
Pray Gentlewoman what would you have me ſay?
Clo. Do not you know Sir?
Ia. Not ſo well as you
That talke continually.
Fra. You have hit her, Sir.
Clo. I thank him, ſo he has,
Faire fall his ſweet face for't.
Iac. Let my face
Alone, I would wiſh you, leaſt I take occaſion
To bring a worſe in queſtion.
Clor. Meaning mine?
Brother, where was your friend brought up? h'as ſure
Been a great lover in his youth of pottage,
They lye ſo dull upon his underſtanding.
Fab. No more of that, thou'lt anger him at heart.
Clo. Then let him be more manly, for he lookes
Like a great School-boy that had been blown up
Laſt night at duſt-point.
Fra. You will never leave
Till you be told how rude you are, fye Clora.
Sir will it pleaſe you ſit?
Clo. And I'le ſit by you.
Iac. Woman be quiet, and be rul'd I would wiſh you.
Clo. I have done, Sir Captaine.
Fab. Art thou not aſham'd?
Iac. You are an aſſe, I'le tell you more anon,
You had better ha been hang'd then brought me hither.
Fab. You are grown a ſullen foole; either be handſom,
Or by this light I'le have wenches baite thee;
Goe to the Gentlewoman, and give her thanks,
And hold your head up; what?
Ia. By this light I'le brain thee.
Fra. Now ô my faith this Gentleman do's nothing
But it becomes him rarely; Clora, look
How well this little anger, if it be one,
Shews in his face.
Clo. Yes, it ſhewes very ſweetly.
Fra. Nay do not bluſh Sir, ô my troth it does,
I would be ever angry to be thus.
Fabritio, ô my conſcience if I ever
Do fall in love, as I will not forſwear it
Till I am ſomething wiſer, it muſt be,
I will not ſay directly with that face,
But certainly, ſuch another as that is,
And thus diſpoſe my chance to hamper me.
Fab. Doſt thou heare this, and ſtand ſtill?
Iac. You will prate ſtill;
I would you were not women, I would take
A new courſe with ye.
Clo. Why courageous?
Iac. For making me a ſtone to whet your tongues on.
Clo. Prethee ſweet Captaine.
Iac. Goe, goe ſpin, goe hang.
Clo. Now could I kiſſe him.
Iac. If you long for kicking,
Your beſt come kiſſe me, do not though, I de wiſh ye,
I'le ſend my Foot-man to thee, he ſhall leap thee,
And thou wantſt horſing: I'le leave ye Ladies.
Fra. Beſhrew my heart you are unmannerly
To offer this unto a Gentleman
Of his deſerts, that comes ſo worthily
To viſite me, I cannot take it well.
Iac. I come to viſite you, you fooliſh woman?

Fra. I, though your did Sir, and for that I thanke you,
I would be loth to loose those thankes; I knowe
This is but some odd way you have, and faith
It do's become you well to make us merry,
I have heard often of your pleasant veine.
Fab. What wouldst thou ask more?
Ja. Pray thou scurvy fellowe
Thou hast not long to live; adieu desire Damsels,
You filthy women farewell, and be sober,
And keepe your chambers.
Clor. Farewell old Don Diego.
Fra. Away, away, you must not be so angry,
To part thus roughly from us; yet to me
This do's not shew, as if 'twere yours, the wars
May breed men something plain I know,
But not thus rude; give me your hand good Sir
I know 'tis white, and——
Jac. If I were not patient,
What would become of you two prating housewives?
Clo. For any thing I know, we would in to supper,
And there begin a health of lusty Claret
To keep care from our hearts, and it should be——
Fab. Faith to whom? Mark but this Jacamo.
Clo. Even to the handsomest fellow now alive.
Fab. Do you know such a one?
Fra. He may be ghest at,
Without much travel.
Fab. There's another item.
Clo. And he should be a Souldier.
Fra. 'Twould be better.
Clo. And yet not you sweet Captaine
Fra. Why not he?
Ja. Well; I shall live to see your husbands beate you,
And hisse 'em on like ban-dogs.
Clo. Ha, ha, ha.
Jac. Green sicknesses and serving-men light on ye
With greasy Codpieces, and woollen stockings,
The Devill (if he dare deal with two women)
Be of your counsels: Farewell Plaisterers——Exit Jacamo.
Clor. This fellow will be mad at Mid-sumer
Without all doubt.
Fab. I thinke so too.
Fra. I am sorry
Hee's gone in such a rage; but sure this holds him
Not every day.
Fab. Faith every other day
If he come neare a woman.
Clor. I wonder how his mother could endure
To have him in her belly he's so boysterous.
Fra. He's to be made more tractable I doubt not.
Clo. Yes, if they taw him as they do whit-leather
Upon an iron, or beate him soft like Stock-fish.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Lælia and her waiting woman with a vaile.

Lel. Art sure 'tis he?
Wom. Yes, and another with him.
Lel. The more the merryer; did you give that money
And charg'd it to be delivered where I shewed you?
Wom. Yes, and what else you bad me.
Lel. That brave fellow,
Though he be old, what ere he be, shews toughnesse,
And such a one I long for, and must have
At any price; these young soft melting gristles
Are only for my safer ends.
Wom. They are here.
Lel. Give me my vaile, and bid the boy goe sing
That song above, I gave him: the sad Song:
Now if I misse him, I am curst, goe wench
And tell 'em I have utterly forsworn
All company of men; yet make a venture
At last to let 'em in; thou knowst these things,
Doe 'em to'th life.
Wom. I warrant you I am perfect.
Lel. Some ill woman for her use would give
A million for this wench; she is so subtle.
Enter to the doore Julio and Angilo.
Wom. Good Sir desire it not, I dare not do it,
For since your last being here, Sir, beleeve me
She has griev'd her selfe out of all company,
And (sweet soule) almost out of life too.
Jul. Prethee,
Let me but speake one word.
Wom. You will offend Sir
And yet your name is more familiar with her
Then any thing but sorrow, good Sir goe.
Ang. This little varlet hath her lesson perfect,
These are the baites they bob with.
Iul. Faith I will not.
Wom. I shal be chidden cruelly for this;
But you are such a Gentleman——
Iul. No more. (nough.
Ang. There's a new Tyre-wench; peace, thou art well e-
Iul. What, has she musique?
Wom. Yes; for Gods sake stay,
'Tis all she feedes upon.
Iul. Alas poore soule.
Ang. Now will I pray devoutly, for there's need ont.

The SONG.

AWay delights, goe seeke some other dwelling,
For I must dye.
Farewell false Love, thy tongue is ever telling
Lye after lye.
For ever let me rest now from thy smarts,
Alas, for pitty goe,
And fire their hearts
That have been hard to thee, mine was not so.

Never againe deluding love shall know me,
For I will dye;
And all those griefes that thinke to over-grow me
Shall be as I.
For ever will I sleepe, while poore maids cry,
Alas for pity stay
And let us dye
With thee, men cannot mocke us in the day.

Iul. Mistris? not one word, Mistris if I grieve ye
I can depart againe.
Ang. Let's goe then quickly,
For if she get from under this darke cloud,
We shall both sweate I feare for't.
Iul. Do but speake
Though you turne from me, and speake bitterly,
And I am gone, for that I think will please you.
Ang. Oh that all women were thus silent ever,
What fine things they were.
Iul. You have look'd on me,
When (if there be beliefe in womens words
Spoken in teares) you swore you lov'd to do so.
Lel. O me my heart!

Ang. Now Iulio play the man,
Or ſuch another willundoe thee:
Would I had any thing to keepe me buſie
I might not heare her; thinke but what ſhe is,
Or I doubt mainly, I ſhall be i'th maſh too.
Iul. Pray ſpeake againe;
Lel. Where is my woman?
Wom. Here.
Ang. Mercy upon me! what a face ſhe has?
Would it were vail'd againe.
Lel. Why did you let
This flattering man in to me? did not I
Charge thee to keep me from his eyes againe,
As carefully as thou wouldſt keep thine owne?
Thou haſt brought me poyſon in a ſhape of heaven
Whoſe violence will breake the hearts of all,
Of all weake women, as it has done mine,
That are ſuch fooles to love, and looke upon him.
Good Sir be gone, you know not what an eaſe
Your abſence is.
Ang. By heaven ſhe is a wonder,
I cannot tell what 'tis, but I am ſqueamiſh.
Iul. Though I deſire to be here more then heaven
As I am now, yet if my ſight offend you,
So much I love to be commanded by you
That I will goe: Farewell—
Lel. I ſhould ſay ſomething
E're you depart, and I would have you heare me:
But why ſhould I ſpeak to a man that hates me?
And will but laugh at any thing I ſuffer?
Iul. If this be hate——
Lel. Away, away deceiver.
Iul. Now help me Angilo!
Ang. I am worſe then thou art.
Lel. Such teares as thoſe might make another woman
Believe thee honeſt Iulio: almoſt me
That know their ends, for I confeſſe they ſtir me.
Ang. What will become of me? I cannot goe now
If you would hang me, from her: o brave eye!
Steale me away for Gods ſake Iulio.
Iul. Alas poor man! I am loſt againe too ſtrangely.
Lel. No, I will ſooner truſt a Crocadile
When he ſheds teares, for he kills ſodainly,
And ends our cares at once; or any thing
That's evill to our natures, then a man;
I finde there is no end of his deceivings,
Nor no avoyding 'em, if we give way:
I was requeſting you to come no more,
And mocke me with your ſervice, 'tis not well,
Nor honeſt to abuſe us ſo far: you may love too;
For though, I muſt confeſſe I am unworthy
Of your love every way: yet I would have you
Thinke I am ſomewhat too good to make ſport of.
Iul. Will you believe me?
Lel. for your vows and oaths,
And ſuch deceiving teares as you ſhed now,
I will as you doe, ſtudy to forget 'em.
Iul. Let me be moſt despis'd of men—
Lel. No more;
There is no new way left, by which your cunning
Shall once more hope to catch me; no, thou falſe man
I will avoid thee, and for thy ſake all
That beare thy ſtamp; as counterfeit in love.
For I am open ey'd againe, and know thee.
Goe, make ſome other weepe, as I have done,
That dare believe thee: goe, and ſweare to her
That is a ſtranger to thy cruelty,
And knowes not yet what man is, and his lyings,
How thou di'ſt daily for her: powre it out
In thy beſt lamentations; put on ſorrow,
As thou canſt, to deceive an Angell, Iulio,
And vow thy ſelfe into her heart, that when
I ſhall leave off, to curſe thee for thy falſhood,
Still a forſaken woman may be found,
To call to heaven for vengeance.
Ang. From this houre,
I heartily deſpiſe all honeſt women;
I care not if the world tooke knowledge on't,
I ſee there's nothing in them, but that folly
Of loving one man only: give me henceforth (Before the greateſt bleſſing can be thought of)
If this be one, a whore; that's all I aime at.
Iul. Miſtris, the moſt offending man is heard
Before his ſentence, why will you condemn me
E're I produce the truth to witneſſe with me
How innocent I am of all your angers?
Lel. There is no truſting of that tongue, I know't,
And how far if it be believed it kills; no more Sir.
Iul. It never lyed to you yet; if it did
'Twas only when it cal'd you mild and gentle.
Lel. Good Sir no more; make not my underſtanding
After I have ſuffered thus much evill by you,
So poor to thinke I have not reach'd the end
Of all your fore'd affections; yet becauſe
I once lov'd ſuch a ſorrow too too dearly,
As that would ſtrive to be; I do forgive ye
Even heartily, as I would be forgiven,
For all your wrongs to me; my charity
Yet loves you ſo far, (though againe I may not)
And wiſh when that time comes, you will love truly
(If you can ever doe ſo) you may finde
The worthy fruit of your affections,
True love againe, not my unhappy harveſt,
Which like a foole I ſow'd in ſuch a heart
So dry and ſtonie, that a thouſand ſhowres
From theſe two eyes, continually rayning,
Could never ripen.
Iul. Y'ave conquer'd me:
I did not thinke to yield, but make me now,
Even what you will my Lelia, ſo I may
Be but ſo truly happy to enjoy you.
Lel. No, no, thoſe fond imaginations,
Are dead and buried in me, let 'em reſt.
Iul. I'le marry you.
Ang. The Devill thou wilt Iulio
How that word waken'd me? come hither friend,
Thou art a foole, looke ſtedfaſtly upon her
Though ſhe be all that I know excellent
As ſhe appeares, though I could fight for her,
And run through fire; though I am ſtarke mad too
Never to be recover'd, though I would Give all I had i'th world to lye with her
Even to my naked ſoule, I am ſo far gone,
Yet me thinks ſtill we ſhould not doate away
That that is ſomething more then ours, our honours
I would not have thee marry her by no meanes,
Yet I ſhould do ſo; is ſhe not a whore?
Iul. She is; But ſuch a one——
Ang. 'Tis true, ſhe's excellent,
And when I well conſider, Iulio
I ſee no reaſon we ſhould be confin'd
In our affections; when all creatures elſe
Enjoy ſtil where they like.
Iul. And ſo will I then.
Lel. He's faſt enough I hope now, if I hold him.
Ang. You muſt not do ſo though, now I conſider

Better

Better what 'tis.
Iul. Do not consider Angilo,
For I must doit.
Ang. No I'le kill thee first.
I love thee so well that the wormes shall have thee
Before this woman, friend.
Iul. I was your counsell.
Ang. As I was a knave,
Not as I lov'd thee.
Iul. All this is lost upon me Angilo,
For I must have her: I will marry yee
When you please; pray looke better on me.
Ang. Nay then no more friend; farewell Iulio,
I have so much discretion left me yet
To know, and tell thee thou art miserable.
Iul. Stay thou art more then she, and now I finde it.
Lel. Is he so?
Iul. Mistris.
Lel. No, I'le see thee starv'd first. Exit Lel.
Iul. Friend.
Ang. Fly her as I do, Iulio, she's a witch.
Iul. Beate me away then, I shall grow heere still else.
Ang. That were the way to have me grow there with Farewell for ever. Exit Ang. (thee
Iul. Stay, I am uncharm'd,
Farewell thou curst house, from this houre be
More hated of me then a Leprosie. Exit Iulio.

Enter Lelia.

Lelia. Both gon? a plague upon 'em both,
Am I deceiv'd againe? Oh I would talke
And follow 'em; but I feare the spight of people,
Till I have emptied all my gall; the next
I seize upon, shall pay their follies
To the last penny; This will worke me worse
He that comes next, by heav'n shall feele their curse. Exit.

Scæna quinta.

Enter Iacamo at one doore Fabritio at another.

Fab. O yee are a sweet youth, so uncivilly
To rayle and run away?
Ja. O are you there Sir?
I am glad I have found ye, you have not now your Ladies
To shew your wit before.
Fab. Thou woult not, woult 'a?
Ja. What a sweet youth I am, as you have made me,
You shall know presently.
Fab. Put up your sword
I have seene it often, 'tis a Fox.
Iac. It is so,
And you shall feele it too; will you dispatch Sir?
And leave your mirth out; or I shall take occasion
To beate ye, and disgrace you too. (you
Fab. Well since, there is no other way to deale with
Let's see your sword, I am sure you scorne all odds,
I will fight with you ——
Jac. How now? (they measure, and Fab: gets his Sword.
Fab. Nay stand out,
Or by this light I'le make yee.
Ja. This is scurvy
And out of feare done.
Fab. No Sir out of judgement,
For he that deales with thee, thou'rt growne so boystrous
Must have more wits, or more lives then another,
Or alwayes be in Armor, or inchanted;
Or he is miserable.
Ja. Your end of this Sir?
Fab. My end is only mirth to laugh at thee,
Which now I'le do in safety; ha, ha, ha.
Ja. Sbart? then I am grown ridiculous.
Fab. Thou art;
And wilt be shortly sport for Ideale children,
If thou continuest this rude stubbornesse.
Jac. O God, for any thing that had an edge?
Fab. Ha, ha, ha.
Jac. Fye, what a name it is,
To have a Tubor shew his teeth?
Fab. Ha, ha.
Jac. Why dost thou laugh at me thou wretched fellow?
Speake with a pox, and looke ye render me
Iust such a reason ——
Fab. I shall dye with laughing.
Jac. As no man can finde fault with: I shall have Another Sword; I shall ye fleering puppy.
Fab. Does not this vermine's shew finely in thee?
Once more take heed of children, if they finde thee
They'le breake up schoole, to beare thee company,
Thou wilt be such a pastime, and whoo'e at thee:
And call thee bloody bones, and Spade, and Spittle,
And Gaffer Madman; and go by Ieronimo,
And will with wispe and come aloft, and crack rope,
And old Saint Dennis with the dudgeon Codpeece:
And twenty such names.
Jac. No I thinke they will not.
Fab. Yes but they will; and Nurses still their children
Onely with thee, and more take him Iacamo.
Iac. Gods pretious, That I were but over thee
One Steeple height: I would fall and breake thy neck.
Fab. This is the reason I laugh at thee,
And while thou art thus, will do: tell me one thing.
Jac. I wonder how thou durst thus question me,
Pre thee restore my Sword.
Fab. Tell me but one thing,
And it may be I will: Nay Sir, keep out (Sir.
Jac. Well I will be your foole now, speake your minde
Fab. Art thou not breeding Teeth?
Jac. How? Teeth?
Fab. Yes Teeth, thou would'st not be so froward else.
Jac. Teeth?
Fab. Come, 'twill make thee
A little reumatique, but that's all one,
Weel'e have a Bib, for spoyling of thy doublet;
And a fring'd Muckender, hang at thy girdle,
I'le be thy Nurse, and get a Corall for thee:
And a fine Ring of Bells.
Jac. Faith this is somewhat
Too much Fabritio, to your friend that loves you;
Me thinkes your goodnesse, rather should invent,
A way to make my follies lesse, then breed 'em;
I should have been more moderate to you,
But I see ye despise me.
Fab. Now I love yee,
There, take your Sword, continue so: I dare not
Stay now to try your patience, Soone I'le meet yee,
And as you love your honours, and your state,
Redeeme your selfe well to the Gentlewoman,
Farewell 'till soone. Exit Fab.
Jac. Well I shall thinke of this. Exit Jac.

Scæna sexta.

Enter Host, Piso, and Boy with a glasse of wine.

Piso. Nothing 'ith world but a dri'd Tongue or two—

Host. Taſt him and tell me.
Piſo. Is a valiant wine,
This muſt be he mine Hoſt.
Host. This ſhall be Iſe,
Oh he's a develish bitten wine, a Tyrant,
Where he layes hold Sir, This is he that ſcornes
Small Beere ſhould quench him, or a coolish Candell
Bring him to bed; no if he ſtinch I'le ſhame him,
And draw him out to mull amongſt old Midwives.
Piſo. There is a Souldier, I would have thee better
Above the reſt, becauſe he thinkes there's no man
Can give him drinke enough.
Host. What kinde of man?
Piſ. That thou mayſt know him perfectly, her's one
Of a left-handed making, a lanck thing,
As if his belly were tane up with ſtraw,
To hunt a match.
Host. Has he no beard to ſhew him?
Piſo. Faith but alittle, yet enough to note him,
Which growes in parcells here, and there a remnant,
And that thou maiſt not miſſe him, he is one
That weares his fore-head in a vellet ſcabberd.
Host. That note's enough, he's mine, I'le fuddle him
Or lye'ith ſudd; you will be here too?
Piſo. Yes, till ſoone, farewell and beare up.
Host. If I do not,
Say I am recreant, I'le get things ready.

Actus Secundus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Iulio, and Angilo.

Iul. 'Tis ſtrange thou ſhould'ſt be thus, with thy diſ-
Ang. I am ſure I am ſo. (cretion
Iul. I am well you ſee.
Ang. Keep your ſelfe warme then, & go home, & ſleepe,
And pray to God thou maiſt continue ſo;
Would I had gon to'th Devill of an arrant,
When I was made a foole to ſee her: Leave me
I am not fit for converſation.
Iul. Why, thou art worſe then I was.
Ang. Therefore leave me,
The nature of my ſickneſſe is not eas'd
By company, or councell, I am mad,
And if you follow me with queſtions
Shall ſhew my ſelfe ſo.
Iul. This is more then errour.
Ang. Pray be content, that you have made me thus,
And do not wonder at me. (gon
Iul. Let me know, but what you meane to do and I am
I would be lo'ath to leave you thus elſe.
Ang. Nothing
That needs your feare, that is ſufficient;
Farewell, and pray for me.
Iul. I would not leave you.
Ang. You muſt and ſhall.
Iul. I will then: would yon woman
Had been ten fathom under ground, when firſt
I ſaw her eyes.
Ang. Yet ſhe had been dangerous,
For to ſome wealthy Rocke of pretious ſtone,
Or mine of gold as tempting, her faire body
Might have been turn'd; which once found out by labour
And brought to uſe, having her ſpells within it,
Might have corrupted States, and ruin'd Kingdomes
Which had been fearefull (Friend) Go, when I ſee thee
Next, I will be as thou art, or no more.
Pray do not follow me, you'l make me angry.
Iul. Heav'n grant you may be right againe.
Ang. Amen. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Tavern Boyes, &c.

Boy. Score a gallon of Sack, and a pinte of Olives
Above within. Why drawer! (to the Vnicorne.
Boy. A non, a non.
Another boy. Looke into the Nags head there.
2. Boy. Score a quart of Claret to the Bar,
And a pound of Sauſages into the flower-pott.
Enter firſt Servant with wine.
1. Ser. The Divell's in their throates, anon, anon.
Enter ſecond Servant.
2. Ser. Mull a pinte of Sack there for the women in the Flower-deluce, & put in ginger enough, they belch like (be porguns,
And Robbin fetch Tobacco for the Peacock, they will not
Drunke till midnight elſe: how now how does my Maſter.
2. Boy. Faith he lyes drawing on a pace.
1. Boy. That's an ill ſigne.
2. Boy. And fumbles with the pots too.
1. Boy. Then there's no way but one with him.
2. Boy. All the reſt,
Except the Captaine are in Limbo patrum,
Where they lye ſod in ſack.
1. Boy. Does he beare up ſtill.
2. Boy. Afore the winde ſtill, with his lights up bravely
All he takes in I think he turnes to Iuleps,
Or has a would of Sturge in his belly,
The reſt looke all like fire-drakes, and lye ſcatter'd
Like ruſhes round about the roome. My Maſter
Is now the loumg'ſt man, I thinke above ground,
1. Boy. Would he were alwayes drunke then.
Within. Drawer.
2. B. Anon, anon Sir,
1 B. And ſwears I ſhall be free to morrovv, and ſo vveeps
And calls upon my Miſtris.
2 B. Then he's right. (her
1. B. And ſvvears the Captain muſt lye this night with
And bad me breake it to her vvith diſcretion,
That he may leave an iſſue after him:
Able to entertaine a dutch Ambaſſador,
And tells him feelingly how ſweete ſhe is,
And hovv he ſtoole her from her friendes i'th Countrey,
And brought her up diſguiz'd vvith the Carriers,
And vvas nine nights bereaving her her maidenhead,
And the tenth got a dravver, here they come.
Enter Iac. Hoſt, Lod. Piſo.
Within cry drawer. Anon, anon, ſpeake to the Tyger, Peter.
Host. Ther's my Bells boyes, my ſilver Bell.
Piſo. Would he vvere hang'd
As high as I could ring him.
Host. Captaine.
Iac. Hoe Boy.
Lod. Robin, ſufficient ſingle Beere, as cold as chriſtall,
Quench Robin, quench.
1. Boy. I am gon Sir.
Host. Shall vve beare up ſtill? Captaine hovv I love thee?
Sweete Captaine let me kiſſe thee, by this hand
I love thee next to Malmeſey in a morning,

Of things transitory.
Ja. I love thee too, as far as I can love a fatt man.
Hoſt. Do'ſt thou Captaine?
Sweetly? and hartily?
Jac. With all my heart Boy. (Captaine
Hoſt. Then welcome death, come cloſe mine eyes ſweet
Thou ſhalt have all.
Jac. What ſhall your wife have then? (ver ſpoone
Hoſt. Why ſhe ſhall have beſides my bleſſing, and a ſil-
Enough to keepe her ſtirring in the world,
Three little Children, one of them was mine
Upon my conſcience, th'other two are Pagans.
Iac. 'Twere good ſhe had a little fooliſh money,
To rub the time a way with,
Hoſt. Not a rag,
Not a Deniere, no let her ſpin a Gods name:
And raiſe her houſe againe,
Jac. Thou ſhalt not dye though,
Boy ſee your Maſter ſafe delivered,
He's ready to lye in.
Hoſt. God night.
Jac. God morrow,
Drinke tell the Cow come home, 'tis all pay'd boyes.
Lod. A pox of Sack.
Hoſt. Marry God bleſſe my Buts, Sack is a jewell,
'Tis comfortable Gentlemen.
Jac. More Beere boy.
Very ſufficient ſingle Beere.
Boy. Here Sir.
How is it Gentlemen?
Jac. But ev'n ſo, ſo.
Hoſt. Go before finely Robin, and prepare
My wife, bid her be right and ſtreight, I come boy
And Sirha, if they quarrell let 'em uſe,
Their owne diſcretions, by all meanes, and ſtir not,
And he that's kill'd ſhall be as ſweetly buried;
Captaine, adieu, adieu ſweet bully Capta i ne,
One kiſſe before I dye, one kiſſe.
Jac. Farewell Boy.
Hoſt. All my ſweet boyes farewell. Exit Hoſt.
Lod. Go ſleep, you are drunke.
Jac. Come Gentlemen, I'le ſee you at your Lodging,
You looke not luſtily, a quart more.
Lod. No Boy.
Piſo. Get us a Torch.
Boy. 'Tis day Sir.
Iac. That's all one.
Piſo. Are not thoſe the ſtars, thou ſcurvy Boy?
Lod. Is not Charle-waine there, tell me that, there?
Iac. Yes;
Ihave paid 'em truely: do not vex him Sirha.
Piſo. Confeſſe it Boy, or as I live I'le beate
Midnight into thy braines.
Boy. I do confeſſe it.
Piſo. Then live, and draw more ſmall Beere preſently.
Iac. Come Boyes, let's hug together, and be loving,
And ſing, and do brave things cheerely my hearts,
A pox a being ſad; now, could I fly
And turne the world about upon my finger,
Come ye ſhall love me, I am an honeſt fellow:
Hang care and fortune, we are friendes.
Lod. No Captaine.
Iac. Do not you love me? I love you too dearely.
Piſo. No by no meanes; you are a fighting Captaine,
And kill up ſuch poore people as we are, by th dozens.
Lod. As they kill flyes with Fox-tailes, Captaine.
Iac. Well Sir.
Lod. Me thinkes now as I ſtand, the Captaine ſhewes,
To be a very mercifull young man,
(And pre'thee Piſo, let me have thy opinion)
Piſo. Then he ſhall have mercy, that mercifull is,
Or all the Painters are Apocrypha.
Iac. I am glad you have your witts yet, will ye go?
Piſo. You had beſt ſay, we are drunke.
Iac. Ye are.
Lod. Yee lye.
Iac. Y'are Raſcalls, drunken raſcalls.
Piſo. 'Tis ſufficient.
Iac. And now I'le tell you why, before I beate yee,
You have been tampring any time theſe three dayes,
Thus to diſgrace me.
Piſo. That's a lye too.
Iac. Well Sir,
Yet I thanke God I have turn'd your points on you,
For which I'le ſpare yee ſomewhat, halfe a beating.
Piſo. I'le make you fart fire Captaine, by this hand,
And ye provoke, do not provoke I'de with you.
Iac. How do you like this?
Lod. Sure I am inchanted.
Piſo. Stay till I draw.
Iac. Deſpatch then, I am angry.
Piſo. And thou ſhalt ſee how ſodainly I'e kill thee. (ards
Iac. Thou darſt not draw, ye cold, tame, mangy Cow-
Ye drunken Rogues, can nothing make you valiant?
Not wine, nor beating?
Lod. If this way be ſufferd
'Tis very well.
Iac. Go ther's your way, go and ſleep:
I have pitty on you, you ſhall have the reſt
To morrow when wee meete.
Piſo. Come Lodowick,
Hee's monſtrous drunke now, ther's no talking with him.
Iac. I am ſo, when I am ſober, I'le do more. (Exit Lod. &
Boy wher's mine Hoſt? Piſo.
Boy. Hee's on his bed a ſleepe Sir. Exit Boy.
Iac. Let him alone then: Now am I high proofe
For my action, now could I fight bravely,
And charge into a wilde fire, or I could love
Any man living now, or any woman,
Or indeed any creature that loves Sack
Extreamly, monſtrouſly; I am ſo loving,
Juſt at this inſtant, that I might be brought
I feele it, with a little labour, now to talke
With a juſtice of peace, that to my nature
I hate next an ill Sword: I will do
Some ſtrange brave thing now, and I have it here:
Pray God the ayre keepe out; I feele it buzing. Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Fredrick, Franck, Clora.

Clor. Shee loves him too much, that's the plaine truth
For which if I might be beleev'd, I thinke her (Fredrick
A ſtrange forgetter of her ſelfe; ther's Iulia,
Or twenty more——
Fred. In your eye I believe you,
But credit me the Captaine is a man:
Lay but his rough affections by, as worthy.
Clor. So is a reſty lade, a horſe of ſervice,
If he would leave his nature, give me one
By your leave Sir to make a husband of
Not to be wean'd, when I ſhould marry him;
Me thinkes a man is miſery enough,

Fred. You

Fred. You are too bitter,
I would not have him worſe.
Yet I ſhall ſee you hamper'd one day Lady,
I do not doubt it, for this hereſie
Clor. I'le burne before; come pre'thee leave this ſadneſſe;
This walking by thy ſelfe to ſee the Divell,
This mumps, this Lachrimæ, this love in ſippets;
It fitts thee like a French-hood.
Fra. Does it ſo?
I am ſure it fits thee to be ever talking,
And nothing to the purpoſe, take up quickly;
Thy witt will founder of all foure elſe wench,
I thou hold'ſt this pace; take up when I bid thee.
Clor. Before your Brother fly?
Fred. I can endure it.

Enter Iacamo.

Clor. Heer's Raw-head come againe; Lord how he lookes?
Pray God we ſcape with broken pates.
Fra. Were I hee,
Thou ſhould'ſt not want thy wiſh, he has been drinking
Has he not Fredrick?
Fred. Yes but do not finde it.
Clor. Peace and let's heare his wiſedome.
Fred. You will mad him.
Jac. I am ſomewhat bold, but that's all one.
Clor. A ſhort and pithy ſaying of a Souldier.
Fra. As I live
Thou art a ſtrange mad wench.
Clor. To make a parſon.
Jac. Ladyes I meane to kiſſe yee
Clor. How he wipes his mouth like a young Preacher;
We ſhall have it.
Jac. In order as you ly before me; firſt
I'le begin with you.
Fra. With me Sir?
Iac. Yes
If you will promiſe me to kiſſe in eaſe.
Fra. I care not if I venture.
Jac. I will kiſſ according to mine owne inventions
As I ſhall ſee cauſe; ſweetly I would wiſh you,
I love ye.
Fra. Do you Sir?
Jac. Yes indeed do I,
Would I could tell you how.
Fra. I would you would Sir.
Jac. I would to God I could, but 'tis ſufficient,
I love you with my heart.
Fra. Alas poore heart.
Jac. And I am ſorry; but wee'l talk of that,
Hereafter if it pleaſe God.
Fra. Ev'n when you will Sir.
Clor. Hee's diſmall drunk, would he were muſled.
Jac. You
I take it are the next.
Fra. Go to him foole.
Clor. Not I, 'a will bite me.
Jac. When witt? when?
Clor. Good Captaine.
Jac. Nay, and you play boa-peepe; I'le ha, no mercy
But catch as catch may.
Fred. Nay, I'le not defend ye.
Clor. Good Captaine do not hurt me, I am ſorry
That ere I anger'd ye.
Iac. I'le tew you for't
By this hand witt, unleſſe you kiſſe diſcreetly.
Clor. No more Sir.
Iac. Yes a little more ſweet witt,
One taſt more o' your office: go thy wayes
With thy ſmall kettle Drumes; upon my conſcienc
Thou art the beſt, that e're man laid his leg o'er.
Clor. He ſmells juſt like a Cellar,
Fye upon him.
Iac. Sweete Lady now to you.
Clor. For loves ſake kiſſe him.
Fred I ſhall not keep my countenance.
Fra. Trye pre'thee.
Iac. Pray be not coy ſweet woman, for I'le kiſſe ye,
I am blunt
But you muſt pardon me.
Clor. O God my ſides.
All. Ha, ha, ha, ha.
Iac. Why ha, ha, ha? why laugh?
Why all this noyſe ſweet Ladyes?
Clor. Luſty Laurence,
See what a Gentlewoman you have ſaluted;
Pray God ſhe prove not quick.
Fred. Where were thine eyes
To take me for a woman, ha, ha, ha.
Jac. Who art 'a, art 'a mortall?
Fred. I am Fredrick.
Jac. Then Fredrick is an Aſſe,
A ſcurvy Fredrick to laugh at me.
Fra. Sweet Captaine.
Iac. A way woman;
Go ſtich and ſerve God, I deſpiſe thee woman,
And Fredrick ſhall be beaten; S'blood ye Rogue
Have you none elſe to make your puppies of, but me?
Fre. I pre'thee be more patient
Ther's no hurt done.
Iac. S'blood but there ſhall be, Scab.
Clor. Help, help for loves ſake.
Fra. Whoſe within there?
Fred. So now you have made a faire hand.
Jac. Why?
Fred. You have kill'd me—— Fal as kill'd.
Clor. Call in ſome Officers, and ſtay the Captaine.
Jac. You ſhall not need.
Clor. This is your drunkenneſſe.
Fra. O me unhappy Brother, Fredrick,
Looke but upon me, do not part ſo from me,
Set him a little higher he is dead.
Clor. O villaine, villaine. Enter Fabritio.
Fab. How now what's the matter?
Fra. O Sir my Brother! o my deareſt Brother!
Clor. This drunken trowgh has kill'd him.
Fab. Kill'd him?
Clor. Yes.
For heaven God ſake hang him quickly, he will do
Ev'ry day ſuch a murder elſe. there is nothing
But a ſtrong Gallowes that can make him quiet,
I finde it in his nature too late.
Fabr. Pray be quiet,
Let me come to him.
Clor. Some go for a Surgeon.
Fra. Oh what a wretched woman has he made me!
Let me alone good Sir.
Fab. To what a fortune,
Haſt thou reſerv'd thy life.
Ja. Fabritio.
Fab. Never entreat me, for I will not know thee,
Nor utter one word for thee, unleſſe it be
To have thee hang'd; for God ſake bee more temperate.
Jac. I have a ſword ſtill, and I am a villaine.
Clor. &c. Hold, hold, hold.
Jac. Ha?
Clor. Away with him for heavens ſake

Hee's

He's too desperate for our enduring.
Fab. Come, you shall sleepe, come strive not Ile have it so, here take him to his lodging, and
See him laid before you part.
Ser. We will Sir.
Fred. Ne're wonder, I am living yet, and well,
I thanke you sister for your griefe, pray keepe it
Till I am fitter for it.
Fab. Do you live Sir?
Fred. Yes, but 'twas time to counterfeit, he was grown
To such a madnesse in his wine.
Fab. 'Twas well Sir,
You had that good respect unto his temper,
That no worse followd. (perish'd,
Fred. If I had stood him, certaine one of us must have
How now Franke?
Fra. Beshrew my heart I tremble like an aspine.
Clo. Let him come here no more for heavens sake
Unlesse he be in chaines.
Fra. I would faine see him
After he has slept, Fabritio, but to try
How he wil be; chide him, and bring him backe.
Clor. You'l never leave till you be worried with him.
Fra. Come brother, wee'l walke in, and laugh a little.
To get this Fever off me.
Clo Hang him squib,
Now could I grinde him into priming powder.
Fra. Pray will you leave your fooling?
Fa. Come, all friends. Exeunt.
Fra. Thou art enough to make an age of men so,
Thou art so crosse and peevish.
Fab. I will chide him,
And if he be not graceless, make him cry for't.
Clo. I would goe a mile (to see him cry) in slippers
He would looke so like a whay cheese;
Fra. Would we might see him once more.
Fab. If you dare
Venture a second tryall of his temper
I make no doubt to bring him.
Clor. No good Franke
Let him alone, I see his vaine lyes only
For falling out at Wakes and Beare-baitings,
That may expresse him sturdy.
Fab. Now indeed
You are too sharp sweet sister, for unlesse
It be this sin, which is enough to drown him,
I meane this sowrenesse, he's as brave a fellow,
As forward, and as understanding else
As any He that lives.
Fra. I doe beleeve you,
And good Sir when you see him, if we have
Distasted his opinion any way,
Make peace againe.
Fab. I will: I'le leave ye Ladies.
Clo. Take heed you had best, h'as sworn to pay you else.
Fab. I warrant you, I have been often threatned. (ach,
Clo. When he comes next, I'le have the cough or tooth-
Or something that shall make me keepe my chamber,
I love him so well.
Fra. Would you would keepe your tongue. Exeunt.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Angilo.

Ang. I cannot keepe from this ungodly woman,
This Lelia, whom I know too, yet am caught,
Her looks are nothing like her; would her faults
Were all in Paris print upon her face,
Cum Privilegio, to use 'em still. (masque
I would write an Epistle before it, on the inside of her
And dedicate it to the whore of Babilon, with a preface upō
Her nose to the gentle Reader; & they should be to be sold
At the signe of the Whores head i'th pottage pot, in what
Street you please: But all this helps not me; —— I
Am made to be thus catch'd, past any redresse, with a thing
I contemn too.
I have read Epictetus twice over against the Desire of these outward things, and still her face runs in My mind, I went to say my prayers, and they were
So laid out o'th way, that if I could finde any prayers I
Had, I'me no Christian.
This is the doore, and the short
Is, I must see her againe. —— —— He knockes.

Enter Maid.

Maid. Who's there?
Ang. 'Tis I, I would speake with your Mistris.
Maid. Did she send for you? (leave.
Ang. No, what then? I would see her, prethee by thy Maid. Not by my leave; for she will not see you, but doth hate you, and (so proper
Your friend, and doth wish you both hang'd, w^ch being
Men, is great pitty, that you are not.
Ang. How's this? (perswaded your
Maid. For your sweet self in particular, who she resolvs
Friend to neglect her, she deemeth whip-cord the most Convenient unction for your backe and shoulders.
Ang. Let me in, I'le satisfie her. (my speeches,
Ma. And if it shal happen that you are in doubt of these Insomuch that you shal spend more time in arguing at the Dore, I am fully perswaded that my Mistris in person from Above, will utter her mind more at large by way of Urine upon your head, that it may sink the more soundly
Into your understanding faculties.
Ang. This is the strangest thing, good pretty soul, why
dost thou use me so?
I pray thee let me in sweet heart.
Maid. Indeed I cannot sweet-heart. (become thee.
Ang. Thou art a handsome one, and this crossenes do's Maid. Alas I cannot help it. (said I lik'd thee of
Ang. Especially to me; thou knowst when I was here, I
All thy Mistris servants. (press
Maid. So did I you, though it be not my fortune to ex-
It at this present: for truly if you would cry, I cannot Let you in. (you
Ang. Pox on her, I must goe the down-right way: looke
Here is ten pound for you, let me speak with her.
Maid. I like your gold well, but it is a thing by heaven
I cannot doe, shee (affaires.
Will not speake with you, especially at this time, she has
Ang. This makes her leave her jesting yet, but take it
And let me see her, bring me to a place
Where undiscern'd of herselfe I may
Feede my desiring eyes but halfe an houre.
Ma. Why faith I think I can, and I wil stretch my wits
And body too for gold: if you will sweare as you
Are gentle, not to stir, or speake, where you shall (you
See or hear, now, or hereafter: give me your gold, I'le plant
Ang. Why, as I am a Gentleman, I will not.
Maid. Enough, quicke, follow me.
(Exit Ang. & Maid.

Enter Servant. (Nell?
Why where's this maid, she has much care of her business.

I thinke ſhe be ſunke;—why Nell—whiew——
Maid within. Whats the matter?

Enter Maid.

Ser. I pray you heartily come away, oh, come, come, (the Gentleman,
My Miſtris invited, is comming down the ſtreet, and the (banquet
Not yet brought out?—— (They bring in the Banquet
Lel. within. Nell, Sirha?
Maid. I come forſooth. (in hand, my
Ser. Now muſt I walk: when there's any fleſhly matters
Miſtris ſends me of a four hours errand: but if I goe not
About mine own bodily buſineſſe as well as ſhee, I am a Turke. Exit Servant.

Enter Father.

Fa. What, all wide open? 'Tis the way to ſin
Doubtleſſe; but I muſt on; the gates of hell
Are not more paſſable then theſe; how they
Will be to get out, God knows, I muſt try.
'Tis very ſtrange, if there be any life
Within this houſe, would it would ſhew it ſelfe.
What's here? a Banquet? and no mouth to eate,
Or bid me do it? this is ſomething like
The entertainment of adventurous Knights
Entring enchanted Caſtles: For the manner
Though there be nothing diſmall to be ſeene
Amazes me a little; what is meant
By this ſtrange invitation? I will ſound
My Daughters meaning, ere I ſpeake to her,
If it be poſſible, for by my voyce—— Muſique.
She will diſcover me! hark, whence is this.

The SONG.

COme hither you that love, and heare me ſing
of joyes ſtill growing
Green, freſh, and luſty, as the pride of Spring,
and ever blowing.
Come hither youths that bluſh, and dare not know
what is deſire,
And olde men worſe then you, that cannot blow
one ſparke of fire.
And with the power of my enchanting Song,
Boyes ſhall be able men, and old men young.
Enter Angilo above.
Come hither you that hope, and you that cry,
leave off complaining,
Youth, ſtrength, and beauty, that ſhall never dye,
are here remaining.
Come hither fooles, and bluſh, you ſtay ſo long
from being bleſt,
And mad men worſe then you, that ſuffer wrong,
Yet ſeeke no reſt.
And in an houre, with my enchanting Song,
You ſhall be ever pleas'd, and young maids long.

Enter Lelia and her maid with a Night-gowne and Slippers.

Lel. Sir you are welcome hither, as this kiſſe
Given with a larger freedome then the uſe
Of ſtrangers will admit, ſhall witneſſe to you.
Put the gowne on him, in this chaire ſit downe;
Give him his ſlippers: be not ſo amaz'd,
Here's to your health, and you ſhall feele this wine
Stir lively in me, in the dead of night.
Give him ſome wine; fall to your banquet Sir,
And let us grow in mirth; though I am ſet
Now thus far off you, yet four glaſſes hence
I will ſit here,
And try, till both our bloods
Shoote up and downe to finde a paſſage out,
Then mouth, to mouth will we walke up to bed,
And undreſſe one another as we goe;
Where both my treaſure, body, and my ſoule
Are your's to be diſpos'd of.
Fa. Umh, umh.—Makes ſignes of his white head & beard.
Lel. You are old,
Is that your meaning? why, you are to me
The greater novelty, all our freſh youth
Are daily offer'd me, though you performe
As you thinke little, yet you ſatisfie
My appetite: from your experience
I may learn ſomething in the way of luſt
I may be better for. But I can teach
Theſe young ones;
But this day I did refuſe
A paire of 'em, Julio, and Angilo,
And told them they were as they were Raw fooles and whelps. [a] (a Ang. makes diſcontented ſigns.
Maid. Pray God he ſpeak not [b] (b Maid lais her finger crſſe her mouth to him.
Lel. Why ſpeak you not ſweet Sir?
Fath. Umh.—— (Stops his ears, ſhews he is troubled with Lel. Peace there, that muſique, now Sir ſpeak (the Muſick.
To me.
Fath. Umh.—— Points at the Maid.
Lel. Why? would you have her gone? you need not keep
Your freedome in for her; ſhe knows my life
That ſhe might write it;
Thinke ſhe is a ſtone?
Shee is a kinde of bawdy Confeſſor,
And will not utter ſecrets.
Fath. Umh.—— (Points at her again.
Lel. Be gone then, ſince he needs will have it ſo,
Tis all one. Exit Maid.—— Fath. locks the dore.
'Is all now as you would? come meet me then,
And bring a thouſand kiſſes on thy lips,
And I will rob thee of 'em, and yet leave
Thy lips as wealthy as they were before.
Fa. Yes, all is as I would but thou.
Lel. By heaven 'tis my Father.—— Starts
Fath. And I do beſeech thee
Leave theſe unheard of luſts which worſe become thee,
Then mocking of thy Father; let thine eyes
Reflect upon thy ſoule, and there behold
How loathed blacke it is; and whereas now
Thy face is heavenly faire, but thy minde foule,
Goe but into thy Cloſet, and there cry
Till thou haſt ſpoil'd that face, and thou ſhalt finde
How excellent a change, thou wilt have made
For inward beauty.
Lel. Though I know him now
To be my Father, never let me live
If my luſt do abate.
I'le take upon me
To have known him all this while.
Fath. Looke, doſt thou know me?
Lel. I knew yee Sir before.
Fath. What didſt thou do?
Lel. Knew you, and ſo unmov'dly have you borne
All the ſad croſſes that I laid upon you,
With ſuch a noble temper, which indeed
I purpoſely caſt on you, to diſcern
Your carriage in calamity, and you
Have undergone 'em with that brave contempt,
That I have turn'd the reverence of a childe

Into

Into the hot affection of a Lover.
Nor can there on the earth be found but yours
A ſpirit fit to meete with mine.
Fath. A woman? thou art not ſure.
Lel. Looke and beleeve.
Fath. Thou art
Something created to ſucceed the Devill
When he growes weary of his envious courſe,
And compaſſing the world; but I beleeve thee
Thou didſt but meane to try my patience,
And do'ſt ſo ſtill; but better be advis'd:
And make thy tryall with ſome other things
That ſafelier will admit a dalliance:
And if it ſhould be earneſt, underſtand
How curſt thou art, ſo far from heaven, that thou
Beleev'ſt it not enough to damn alone,
Or with a ſtranger, but wouldſt heape all ſins
Unnaturall upon this aged head
And draw thy Father to thy Bed, and hell.
Lel. You are deceiv'd Sir, 'tis not againſt nature
For us to lye together; if you have
An arrow of the ſame tree with your bow,
Is't more unnaturall to ſhoot it there
Then in another? 'Tis our generall nature
To procreate, as fires is to conſume,
And it will trouble you to finde a ſticke
The fire will turne from: If't be natures will
We ſhould not mixe, ſhe will diſcover to us
Some moſt apparant croſſeneſſe, as our organs
Will not be fit; which if we do perceive
We'l leave, and thinke it is her pleaſure
That we ſhould deale with others.
Fath. The dores are faſt; thou ſhalt not ſay a prayer,
Tis not Gods will thou ſhouldſt; when this is done
He kill my ſelfe, that never man may tell me
I got thee*. * Fath. draws his ſword. Angilo diſcovers himſelf.
Lel. I pray you Sir, help ther, for Gods ſake Sir.
Ang. Hold reverend Sir, for honour of your age.
Fath. Whoe's that?
Ang. For ſafety of your ſoule, and of the ſoule
Of that too wicked woman yet to dye.
Fa. What art thou? and how cam'ſt thou to that place?
Ang. I am a man ſo ſtrangely hither come,
That I have broke an oath in ſpeaking this,
But I believe 'twas better broke then kept,
And I deſire your patience; let me in,
And I proteſt I will not hinder you
In any act you wiſh, more then by word,
If ſo I can perſwade you, that I will not
Uſe violence, I'le throw my ſword down to you:
This houſe holds none but I, only a maid
Whom I will locke faſt in as I come downe.
Fa. I do not know thee, but thy tongue doth ſeeme
To be acquainted with the truth ſo well
That I will let thee in: throw down thy ſword.
Ang. There 'tis.
Lel. How came he there? I am betraid to ſhame,
The feare of ſodaine death ſtrook me all over
So violently, that I ſcarce have breath He lets in Ang.
To ſpeake yet: But I have it in my head, and lockes the
And out it ſhall, that (Father) may perhaps (doore.
O're-reach you yet.

Enter Father and Angelo.

Fat. Come Sir, what is't you ſay?
Lel. My Angilo, by all the joyes of love
Thou art as welcome as theſe plyant arms
Twin'd round, and faſt about thee, can perſwade thee.
Ang. Away.

Lel. I was in ſuch a fright before thou cam'ſt,
Yon old mad fellow, (it will make thee laugh
Though it feared me) has talkt ſo wildly here—
Sirrha, he ruſht in at my dores, and ſwore
He was my Father, and I thinke beleev'd it:
But that he had a ſword, and threatned me—
I'faith he was good ſport, good, thruſt him out
That thou and I may kiſſe together; wilt thou?
Fath. Are you her Champion? & with theſe fair words,
Got in to reſcue her from me. Offer to run at him.
Ang. Hold ſir,
I ſweare I doe not harbour ſuch a thought,
I ſpeake it not, for that you have two ſwords,
But for tis truth.
Lel. Two ſwords my Angilo?
Thinke this, that thou haſt two young brawny armes
And ne're a ſword, and he has two good ſwords
And ne're an arme to uſe 'em; ruſh upon him,
I could have beaten him with this weake body,
If I had had the ſpirit of a man.
Ang. Stand from me, and leave talking, or by heaven
I'le trample thy laſt damning word out of thee.
Fa. Why do you hinder me then? ſtand away
And I will rid her quickly.
Lel. Would I were
Cleare of this buſineſſe, yet I cannot pray.
Ang. Oh be advis'd, why you were better kill her
If ſhe were good; Convey her from this place
Where none but you, and ſuch as you appoint
May viſite her; where let her heare of nought
But death and damning, which ſhe hath deſerv'd,
Till ſhe be truly, juſtly ſorrowful,
And then lay mercy to her, who does know
But ſhe may mend?
Fa. But whither ſhould I beare her?
Ang. To my houſe,
'Tis large, and private, I will lend it you.
Fa. I thanke you Sir, and happily it fits
With ſome deſigne I have, but how ſhall we Convey her?
Lel. Will they cary me away?
Fa. For ſhe wil ſcratch and kick, & ſcream ſo loud
That people will be drawn to reſcue her.
Ang. Why? none can hear her here, but her own maid,
Who is as faſt as ſhe.
Fa. But in the ſtreete?
Ang. Why, we will take 'em both into the Kitchin,
There binde 'em, and then gag 'em, and then throw 'em
Into a Coach I'le bring to the backe-dore,
And hurry 'em away.
Fa. It ſhall be ſo,
I owe you much for this; and I may pay you,
There is your ſword, lay hold upon her quickly,
This way with me, thou diſobedient childe.
Why do's thy ſtubborn heart beat at thy breaſt?
Let it be ſtill, for I will have it ſearch'd
Till I have found a well of living teares
Within it, that ſhall ſpring out of thine eyes,
And flow all o're thy body foul'd with ſin,
Till it have waſhed it quite without a ſtain. (They drag her.
Lel. Help! help! ah! ah!
Murther, I ſhall be murthered, I ſhall be murthered.
Fa. This helps thee not.
Lel. Baſely murdered, baſely.
Fa. I warrant you. Exeunt.

Actus Quintus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Lodowicke and Piſo.

Lod. THis roguy Captaine has made fine work with us.
Piſo. I would the Devill in a ſtorm would carry him
Home to his Gariſon againe; I ake all over,
That I am ſure of; Certainly my body
Is of a wild-fire, for my head rings backward,
Or elſe I have a moriſe in my braines.
Lod. I'le deale no more with ſouldiers: wel remembred,
Did not the Viſion promiſe to appeare
About this time again?
Piſo. Yes, here he comes:
He's juſt on's word.

Enter Father.

Fath. O, they be here together,
Shee's penitent, and by my troth I ſtagger
Whether (as now ſhe is) either of theſe
Two fooles be worthy of her; yet becauſe
Her youth is prone to fall againe, ungovern'd,
And marriage now may ſtay her, one of 'em:
And Piſo, ſince I underſtand him abler,
Shall be the man; the other beare the charges,
And willingly, as I will handle it.
I have a Ring here, which he ſhall believe
Is ſent him from a woman I have thought of:
But e're I leave it, I'le have one of his
In pawne worth two on't: for I will not looſe
By ſuch a meſſe of ſugar-ſops as this is:
I am too old.
Lod. It moves againe, let's meet it.
Fa. Now if I be not out, we ſhall have fine ſport,
I am glad I have met you Sir, ſo happily,
You do remember me, I am ſure.
Lod. I doe Sir.
Piſo. This is a ſhort præludium to a challenge.
Fa. I have a meſſage Sir, that much concerns you,
And for your ſpeciall good; Nay you may heare too.
Piſo. VVhat ſhould this fellow meane?
Fa. There is a Lady,
(How the poore thing begins to warme already)
Come to this Towne, (as yet a ſtranger here Sir)
Faire, young, and rich, both in poſſeſſions,
And all the graces that make up a woman,
A widow, and a vertuous one: It workes,
He needs no broath upon't.
Lod. VVhat of her Sir?
Fath. No more but this; ſhe loves you.
Lod. Loves me?
Fa. Yes.
And with a ſtrong affection, but a faire one, (matter.
If ye be wiſe and thankfull, you are made: there's the whole
Lod. I am ſure I heare this.
Fath. Here is a Ring Sir, of no little value:
Which after ſhe had ſeen you at a window,
She bad me haſt, and give it, when ſhe bluſh'd
Like a blown roſe.
Lod. But pray Sir by your leave——
Me thinks your yeares ſhould promiſe no ill meaning.
Fa. I am no Bawd, nor cheater, nor a coarſer
Of broken-winded women: if you feare me
I'le take my leave: and let my Lady uſe
A fellow of more forme; an honeſter
I am ſure ſhe cannot.
Lod. Stay, you have confirm'd me,
Yet let me feele, you are in health.
Fa. I hope ſo,
My water's well enough, and my pulſe.
Lod. Then
All may be excellent: pray pardon me;
For I am like a boy that had found money,
Afraid I dreame ſtill.
Piſo. Sir, what kind of woman?
Of what proportion is your Lady?
Lod. I,
Fa. I'le tell you preſently her very picture,
Do you know a woman in this towne they call,
Stay, yes, it is ſo, Lelia?
Piſo. Not by ſight.
Fa. Nor you Sir?
Lod. Neither.
Fa. Theſe are precious Rogues
To raile upon a woman they never ſaw;
So they would uſe their Kindred.
Piſo. We have heard though
She is very faire and goodly.
Fa. Such another,
Juſt of the ſame complexion, making, ſpeech,
But a thought ſweeter is my Lady.
Lod. Then
Shee muſt be excellent indeed.
Fa. Indeed ſhe is,
And you will finde it ſo; you do beleeve me?
Lod. Yes marry do I, and I am ſo alter'd ——
Fa. Your happineſſe will alter any man.
Do not delay the time Sir: at a houſe
Where Don Valaſco lay, the Spaniſh Signior
(Which now is Signieur Angelus) ſhe is.
Lod. I know it.
Fa. But before you ſhew your ſelfe,
Let it be night by all meanes, willingly
By day ſhe would not have ſuch gallants ſeene
Repair unto her 'tis her modeſty.
Lod. I'le goe and fit my ſelfe.
Fa. Doe, and be ſure
You ſend proviſion in, in full abundance,
Fit for the marriage; for this night I know
Shee will be yours: Sir, have you never a token
Of worth to ſend her backe againe? you muſt,
Shee will expect it.
Lod. Yes, pray give her this,
And with it all I have; I am made for ever. Exit Lod.
Piſo. Well, thou haſt fooles lucke; ſhould I live as long
As an old oake, and ſay my prayers hourly
I ſhould not be the better of a penny.
I think the Devill be my ghoſtly Father;
Upon my conſcience I am full as handſome,
I am ſure I have more wit, and more performance,
Which is a pretty matter.
Fa. Do you thinke ſir,
That your friend Signeur Piſo will be conſtant
Unto my Lady? you ſhould know him well.
Piſo. Who? Signieur Piſo?
Fa. Yes, the Gentleman.
Piſo. VVhy, you are wide Sir.
Fa. Is not his name Piſo?
Piſo. No, mine is Piſo.
Fa. How?
Piſo. 'Tis indeed Sir,
And his is Lodowicke.
Fa. Then I am undone Sir,
For I was ſent at firſt to Piſo; what a raſcall

VVas I, ſo ignorantly to miſtake you?
Piſo. Peace.
There is no harme done yet.
Fa. Now 'tis too late,
I know my errour:
At turning of a Street,
For you were then upon the right hand of him,
You chang'd your places ſudainly: where I
(Like a croſſe Block-head) loſt my memory:
What ſhall I do? my Lady utterly
Will put me from her favour.
Piſo. Never feare it,
I'le be thy guard, I warrant thee, O, O,
Am I at length reputed for the Ring,
I'le fetch it back with a light vengance from him:
Had better keep ſame Devills, then that Rings
Art thou not Steward?
Fa. No.
Piſo. Thou ſhalt be ſhortly
Fa. Lord how he takes it?
Piſo. I'le go ſhift me ſtreights;
Art ſure it was to Piſo?
Fa. O too ſure Sir.
Piſo. I'le mount thee if I live for't,
Give me patience heaven to beare this bleſſing I beſeech thee;
I am but man; I pre'thee breake my head
To make me underſtand, I am ſenſible.
Fa. Lend me your dagger, and I will Sir.
Piſo. No
I believe now like a good Chriſtian.
Fa. Good Sir make haſt; I dare not go without ye
Since I have ſo miſtaken.
Piſo. 'Tis no matter,
Meet me within this halfe houre at St. Margrets. Piſo.
Well go thy wayes old leg, thou haſt the trick on't. Exit.

Enter Angilo, and Julio.

Ang. How now? the newes?
Fa. Well, paſſing well, I have 'em,
Both in a leaſh and made right for my purpoſe.
Jul. I am glad on't I muſt leave you.
Ang. Whether man?
Jul. If all go right, I may be faſt enough too.
Ang. I cry you mercie Sir, I know your meaning,
Clora's the woman, ſhe's Franck; bedfellow,
Commend me to 'em, and go Julio
Bring 'm to ſupper all, to grace this matters
They ſerve for witneſſes. (another.
Ju. I will, Farewell. Exit Jul at one dore, & Ang, & Fa, at

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Clora, Franck, and Fredrick, and Maid.

Fred. Siſter, I brought you Jacamo to the doore,
He has forgot all that he ſaid laſt night:
And ſhame of that makes him more loath to come,
I left Fabritio perſwading him, but 'tis in vaine.
Fra. Alas my fortune Clora.
Clor. Now Franck, See what a kind of man you love,
That loves you when hee's drunk; If ſo
Faith I would marry him; My friends I hope
Would make him drink. (mours then,
Clor. 'Tis well conſider'd Franck, he has ſuch pretty hu-
Beſides being a Souldier, 'tis better he ſhould love (he
You when hee's drunck, then when hee's ſober, for then
Will be ſure to love you, the greateſt part on's life.
Fra. And were not I a happy woman then?
Clor. That ever was borne Franck, y'faith——
Fred. How now? what ſayes hee?

Enter Fabritio. (and bell

Fab. Faith you may as well tice a dog up with a whip,
As him, by telling him of love and women, he Sweares
They mock him.
Fred. Looke how my Siſter weepes.
Fab. VVhy who can helpe it?
Fred. Yes, you may ſafly ſweare ſhe loves him.
Fab. VVhy ſo I did; and may do all the oathes,
Arithmatique can make, ere he believe me,
And ſince he was laſt drunk, he is more jealous
They would abuſe him: If we could perſwade him
She lov'd, he would embrace it.
Fred. She her ſelfe
Shall bate ſo much of her owne modeſty
To ſweare it to him; with ſuch teares as now
You ſee raine from her.
Fab. I believe 'twould worke,
But would you have her do't i'th open ſtreet?
Or if you would hee'le run away from her,
How ſhall we get him hither?
Fred. By entreaty.
Fab. 'Tis moſt impoſſible, No, If we could
Anger him hither, as ther is no way
But that to bring him; and then hold him faſt
Women, and men, whilſt ſhe delivers to him the truth
Seal'd with her teares, he would be plaine
As a pleas'd child; he walkes below for me
Under the window.
Clor. VVe'le anger him I warrant ye,
Let one of the maides take a good bowle of water,
Or ſay it be a piſſ-pott, and powre't on's head.
Fab. Content hang me if I like not the caſt of it rarely,
(for no queſtion it,
Is an approv'd receipt to fetch ſuch a fellow
Take all the women-kind in this houſe, betwixt the age of one,
And one hundred, & let them take unto them a pott or a
Bowle containing ſeven quarts or upwards, & let them
Never leave, till the above named,
Pott or Bowle become full, then let one of them ſtretch out
Her arme and power it on his head, add Probatum eſt, it
VVill fetch him, for in his anger he will run up, & then let Us alone.
Clor. Go you and do it. Exit Maid.
Fra. Good Clora, no. (that Clor. Away I ſay & do it; never feare, we have enough of Water ready diſtill'd.
Fra. Why this will make him mad Fabritio,
Hee'le neither love me drunke, nor ſober now.
Fab. I warrant you: what, is the wench come up?

Enter Wench above.

Clo. Art thou there wench?
Wench. I.
Fab. Looke out then if thou canſt ſee him. (could not
Wench. Yes I ſee him, & by my troth he ſtands ſo faire I
Hold were he my Father, his hat's of too, & he's ſcratching
His head.
Fab. O waſh that hand I pre'thee. (I have throwne thee
Wench. God ſend thee good luck, this the ſecond time,
Out to day, ha, ha, ha, juſt on's head.
Fra. Alas!
Fab. What does he now? (Street windows
Wench. He gathers ſtones, Gods ſight, he breakes all the
Fab. Whore's Bawdes, your windowes, your windowes.
Wench. Now he is breaking all the low windowes with his Sword,

Excellent

Excellent ſport, Now he's beating a fellow that laugh'd (at him;
Truely the man takes it patiently; Now he goes (downe the Street
Gravely, looking on each ſide, ther's not one more dare (laugh.

Fra. Does he go on?

Wench. Yes.

Fra. Fabritio, you have undone a Maid (Fran. kneeles.
By treachery; know you ſome other better,
You would prefer your friend to? If you do not
Bring him againe, I have no other hope,
But you that made me looſe hope, If you faile me,
I ne're ſhall ſee him, but ſhall languiſh out
A diſcontented life, and dye contemn'd. (up

Fab. This vexes me, I pray you be more patient (lift her
If I have any truth, let what will happen,
I'le bring him preſently, Do you all ſtand
At the Street dore, the Maides, and all, to watch
When I come backe, and have ſome private place
To ſhuffle me into, for he ſhall follow
In fury, but I know I can out run him:
As he comes in, clap all faſt hold on him,
And uſe your owne diſcretions.

Fred. Wee will do it.

Fab. But ſudainly for I will bring him hither,
With that unſtop'd ſpeed that you ſhall run over
All that's in's way: and though my life be ventur'd
'Tis no great matter, will do't.

Fra. I thanke you,
Worthy Fabritio. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia

Enter Jacamo.

Iac. I ever knew no woman could abide me,
But am I growne ſo contemptible, by being once drunke
Amongſt 'em, that they begin to throw piſſe on my head?
For ſurely it was piſſe huh, huh. (ſeeme to ſmell.

Enter Fabritio.

Fab. Jacamo, how do'ſt thou?

Jac. Well, ſomething troubled with watriſh humours.

Fab. Foh, how thou ſtinck'ſt; pre'thee ſtand further of me
Me things theſe humours become thee better then thy dry
Chollerick humours, or thy wine-wet humours; ha?

Jac. You'r pleaſant, but Fabrito know I am not in the wood of Suffering jeſt. (moody

Fab. If you be not i'th mood I hope you will not be
But truely I cannot blame the Gentlewoman, you ſtood eveſdropping,
Under their window, and would not come up.

Jac. Sir, I ſuſpect now, by your idle talke
Your hand was in't, which if I once believe,
Be ſure you ſhall account to me. (to you already

Fab. The Gentlewomen and the Maides have counted
The next turne I ſee is mine.

Jac. Let me dye but this is very ſtrange; good Fabritio
Do not provoake me ſo. (ther's no

Fab. Provoke you? you'r growne the ſtrongeſt fellow;
Keeping company with you, phiſh; take you that.

Jac. O all the Devills? ſtand Slave. Fab. gives him a box o'th ear ſudainly, & throws him from him, & goes his waies, whilſt Iaca. drawes his Sword.

Fab. follow me if thou dar'ſt.

Jac. Stay coward, ſtay.——Ja: runnes after Fabritio.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Fred. Fra. Clora. and Servant and Maid

Clor. Be ready for I ſee Fabritio running,
And Jacamo behind him.

Enter Fabritio.

Fab. Wher's the place.

Fred. That way Fabritio. Exit Fab.

Enter Jacamo.

Jac. Where art thou treacher? (Fred. Clor. and Maid, lay hold on Jacamo.
What is the matter Sirs?
Why do you hold me? I am baſely wrong'd,
Torture, and hell, be with you; let me go. (they drag him to a chaire and hold him downe in't.

Fred. Good Iacamo be patient, and but heare
What I can ſay, you know I am your friend,
If you yet doubt it, by my ſoule I am.

Iac. S'death ſtand away;
I would my breath were poyſon.

Fred. As I have life that which was throwne on you,
And this now done, were but to draw you hither
For cauſes weighty, that concerne your ſelfe
Uoid of all malice, which this Maid my Siſter
Shall tell you.

Iac. Puh, a pox upon you all; you will not hold me
For ever here, and till you let me go,
I'le talke no more.

Franck. As you'r a Gentleman
Let not this boldneſſe make me be beleev'd,
To be immodeſt; If there were a way
More ſilently to be acquainted with you
God knowes, that I would chooſe, But as it is
Take it in plaineſſe: I do love you more
Then you do your content, If you refuſe
To pitty me, I'le never ceaſe to weepe,
And when mine eyes be out I will be told
How faſt the teares I ſhed for you do fall,
And if they do not flow abundantly,
I'le fetch a ſigh ſhall make 'em ſtart, and leap,
As if the fire weare under.

Iac. Fine mocking, fine mocking.

Fred. Mocking? looke how ſhe weepes.

Iac. Do's ſhe counterfeit crying too.

Fred. Behold how the teares flow, or pitty her
Or never more be call'd a man. (ſible thinke you,

Iac. How's this? ſoft you, ſoft you my Maſters: Is't poſ-
She ſhould be in earneſt? (many ſleepes,

Clor. Earneſt? I in earneſt: ſhe's a foole to breake ſo
That would have been ſound ones, & venture ſuch a face, &
So much life, for ere an humorous aſſe i'th world.

Fra. Why Clora? I have knowne you cry as much?
For Julio, that has not halfe his worth,
All night you write and weepe too much I feare
I do but what I ſhould.

Clor. If I do write
I am anſwer'd Franck.

Fra. I would I might be ſo.

Jac. Good Fredrick let me go I would faine trye
If that thing do not counterfeit.

Fred. Give me your Sword then.

Jac. No, but take my word,
As I am man, I will not hurt a creature
Under this roofe, before I have deliver'd
My ſelfe, as I am now into your handes,
Or have your full conſent.

Fred. It is enough.

Jac. Gent.

Ja Gentlwoman, I pray you let me fele your face, I am an Infidell, if she do not weepe. Stay, wher's my handkerchife?
I'le wipe the old sweat off, the fresh teares come, pox on't
I am a handsome, gratious fellow amongst women, and Knew't not Gentlewoman; how should I know these
For me? Is not your Mother dead? (teares are Fra. By heaven they are for you. (morrow
Iac. Slight I'le have my head cor'd, and powderd to
By breake of day, If you love me, I pray you kisse me,
For If I love you, it shall be such love, as I will not be
A sham'd of, If this be a mock—— kisses,
It is the hartiest, and the sweetest mock
That ere I tasted, mock me so againe ——kisse againe
Fred. Fy Iacamo? why do you let her kneele
So long?
Iac. It's true I had forgot it. ——lift her up,
And should have done this twelve-moneth; pray you rise
(she could
Fredrick, If I could all this while have been perswaded
Have lov'd me, dost thou thinke I had not rather kisse her
Then another should? and yet you may gull me for ought
I know, but if you do, hell take me If I do not cutt
All your throates sleeping.
Fred. Oh do not thinke of such a thing.
Iac. Otherwise, If she be in earnest, the short is I am.
Fran. Alas, I am.
Iac. And I did not think it possible any woman
Could have lik'd this face, it's good for nothing, is't?
Clor. Yes it's worth forty shillings to pawne, being (lind almost quite
Through with velvet.
Fra. 'Tis better then your Iulio's.
Iac. Thou thinkest so, (kissing Franck.
But otherwise, in faith it is not Franck—whilst Iacamo is
Enter Fabritio.
Fab. Hist Iacamo; How do'st thou Boy'tha?
Iac. Why very well, I thank you Sir. (lages,
Fab. Do'st thou perceive the reason of matters, and pas-
Yet Sirah, or no?
Iac. 'Tis wondrous good Sir. (ten to some
Fab. I have done simply for you, but now you are beat-
Understanding, I pray you dally not with the Gentlewo-
(man
But dispatch your Matrimony, with all convenient speed.
Fred. He gives good counsell.
Iac. And I will follow it.
Fab. And I you, prethee do not take it unkindly,
For trust me I boxt thee for thy advancement,
A foolish desire I had to joggle thee into preferment.
Iac. I apprehend you Sir, & if I can study out a course
How a bastinadoing may any waies raise your fortunes
In the State, you shall be sure on't.
Fab. Oh Sir keepe your way, God send you much joy.
Clor. And me my Iulio.
O God I heare his voyce, now he is true, (but Fred.
Have at a marriage Franck, as soone as you——Exeunt all

As Cockles.
Fred. Give 'em joy, I cannot now goe,
The Duke hath sent for me in hast. (where they are. Ex.

Fred. reades. You shall finde us all at Signeur Angelo's,

Mess. You are staid for Sir.
Fred. I come, pray God the businesse
Hold me not from this sport, I would not loose it. Exeunt.

Ang. God give you joy, and make you live together
A happy paire.
Piso. I do not doubt we shall. (fortune,
There was never poore Gentleman had such a sodaine
I could thrust my head betwixt 2. pales, & strip me out of
My old skin like a Snake: will the guests come thou saidst
Thou sentest for to solemnize the Nuptials?
Fa. They will, I looke for em ere this.
Enter Julio, Iacamo, Fabritio, Franke, Clora.
Iul. By your leave all.
Fath. They'r here Sir.
Iul. Especially faire Lady
I aske your pardon, to whose marriage bed
I wish all good successe, I have here brought you
Such guests as can discerne your happinesse,
And best do know how to rejoyce at it;
For such a fortune they themselves have run,
The worthy Iacamo, and his faire Bride,
Noble Fabritio, whom this age of peace
Has not yet aught to love ought but the warrs,
And his arue friends, this Lady who is but
A piece of me.
Lel. Sir, you are welcome all,
Are they not Sir? (foole. Exit Fath.
Piso. Bring in some wine, some of the wine Lodwick the
Sent hither: who ever thou bid'st welcome shall finde it
Lel. An unexpected honour you have done
To our too hasty wedding.
Iac. Faith Madam, our weddings were as hasty as yours
We'ar glad to run up & downe any whether, to see where
We can get meat to our wedding.
Piso. That Lodwick hath provided too, good Asse.
Ang. I thought you Iulio, would not thus have stollen a (marriage
Without acquainting your friends.
Iul. Why I did give thee incklings. (er'e almost
Ang. If a marriage should be thus slubberd up in a play.

Any body had taken notice you were in love, the Spec(tators
Would take it to be but ridiculous.
Iul. This was the firſt, and I will never hide
An other ſecret from you.

Enter Father.

Father. Sir, yonder's your friend Ladwick, hide your
And 'twill be the beſt ſport———— (ſelfe
Piſo Gentlemen, I pray you take no notice, I'm here.
The coxcomb Ladwick is coming in.

Enter Ladwick.

Ladwick. Is that that Lady?
Fath. That is my Lady.
Lod. As I live ſhe's a faire one; what make al theſe heere?
Fath. O Lord Sir ſhe is ſo peſterd——— (told us
Fab. Novv will the ſport be, it runnes right as Iulio
Lod. Faire Lady health to you; ſome vvords I have, that Require an utterance more private,
Then this place can afford.
Lel. I'le call my husband
All buſineſſe I heare vvith his eares novv.
Lod. Good Madam no, bet I perceive your jeſt,
You have no husband, Iam the very man
That vvalk'd the ſtreetes ſo comely.
Lel. Are you ſo?
Lod. Yes faith, vvhen Cupid firſt did prick your heart
I am not cruell, but the love began
I'th Street I'le ſatisfie i'th chamber fully.
Lel. To aske a Madman vvhether he be mad
Were but an idle queſtion, if you be,
I do not ſpeake to you, but if you be not
Walke in the Streetes againe and there perhaps
I may dote on you, here I not endure you.
Lod. Good Madam ſtay, do not you know this Ring?
Lel. Yes it vvas mine, I ſent it by my Man,
To change and ſo he did, it has a blemiſh,
And this he brought me for it; did you change it?
Are you a Goldſmith?
Lod. Sure the world is mad,
Sirrah, did you not bring me this ring from your Lady?
Fa. Yes ſurely Sir, did I, but your worſhip muſt ev'n (beare with me;
For there was a miſtaking in it, and ſo: as I was Saying to your worſhip, my Lady is now married.
Lod. Married? to whom?
Fa. To your worſhips friend Piſo.
Lod. S'death to Piſo?
Piſo. within. Ha, ha, ha.
Ang. Yes Sir I can aſſure you ſhe's maried to him, I ſaw't
With theſe gray eyes.
Lod. Why what a Rogue art thou then? thou haſt made
Me ſend in proviſion too. (in's mouth
Fa. O a Gentleman ſhould not have ſuch fowle wordes
But your Worſhips proviſion could not have come in at a fitter time,
Will it pleaſe you to taſt any of your owne wine?
It may be the Vintner has cozend you.
Lod. Pox I am mad.
Ang. You have alwayes plots Sir, & ſee how they fall out.
Iac. You had a plott upon me, how do you like this?
Lod. I do not ſpeake to you.
Fab. Becauſe you dare not. (in this Ring
Lod. But I will have one of that old Rogues teeth ſet
Fath. Do'ſt not thou know that I can beate thee?
Doſt thou know it now? (diſcovers himſelfe)
Lod. He beate me once indeed.
Fath. And if you have forgot it, I can call a witneſſe.
Come forth Piſo——— remember you it?
Piſo Faith I do call to minde ſuch a matter.
Fath. And if I cannot ſtill do't, you are young
And will aſſiſt your Father in law.
Piſo. My Father in law?
Ang. Your Father in law, as ſure as this is widow Lelia
Piſo. How widow Lelia?
Fath. I faith 'tis ſhe, Sonne.
Lod. Ha, ha, ha, let my proviſion go, I am glad I
Have miſt the woman.
Piſo. Have you put a whore upon me?
Lel. By heaven you do me wrong, I have a heart
As pure as any womans, and I meane
To keep it ſo for ever.
Fa. There is no ſtarting now, Son, if you offer't
I can compell you, her eſtate is great,
But all made o're to me, before this match,
Yet if you uſe her kindly, as I ſweare
I thinke ſhe will deſerve, you ſhall enjoy it
During your life, all ſave ſome ſlender piece
I will reſerve for my own maintenance,
And if God bleſſe you with a childe by her,
It ſhall have all.
Piſo. So I may have the meanes
I doe not much care what the woman is:
Come my ſweet heart, as long as I ſhall finde
Thy kiſſes ſweet, and thy meanes plentifull,
Let people talke their tongues out.
Lel. They may talke
Of what is paſt, but all that is to come
Shall be without occaſions.
Iul. Shall we not make Piſo, and Ladwick friends?
Iac. Hang 'em they dare not be Enemies, or if they be,
The danger is not greate, vvelcome Fredrick.

Enter Fredrick.

Fredrick. Firſt joy unto you all; and next I think
We ſhall haue vvarres.
Iac. Give me ſome vvine, I'le drinke to that.
Fab. I'le pledge.
Fran. But I ſhall looſe you then. (a Souldier
Iac. Not a vvhit vvench; I'le teach thee preſently to be
Fred. Fabritio command, and yours are both reſtor'd
Iac. Bring me foure glaſſes then.
Fab. Where are they?
Ang. You ſhall not drink 'em here, 'tis ſupper time,
And from my houſe no creature here ſhall ſtir,
Theſe three dayes, mirth ſhall flow as well as wine.
Fa. Content, within I'le tell you more at large
How much I am bound to all, but moſt to you,
Whoſe undeſerved liberality
Muſt not eſcape thus unrequited.
Iac. 'Tis happineſſe to me, I did ſo well:
Of every noble action, the intent
Is to give worth reward, vice, puniſhment. Exeunt Om.

THE

The Prologue.

TO please you with this Play, we feare will be
(So does the Author too) a mystery
Somewhat above our Art; For all mens eyes,
Ears, faiths, and judgements, are not of one size.
For to say truth, and not to flatter ye,
This is not Comody, nor Tragedy,
Nor History, nor any thing that may
(Yet in a weeke) be made a perfect Play:
Yet those that love to laugh, and those that thinke
Twelve-pence goes farther this way then in drinke,
Or Damsels, if they marke the matter through,
May stumble on a foolish toy, or two
Will make 'em shew their teeth: pray, for my sake
(That likely am your first man) doe not take
Adistaste before you feele it: for ye may
When this is hist to ashes, have a Play.
And here, to out-hisse this; be patient then,
(My honour done) y'are welcome Gentlemen.

The Epilogue.

IF you mislike; (as you shall ever be
Your owne free Judges) this Play utterly,
For your owne Nobleness, yet do not hisse,
But as you goe by, say it was amisse;
And we will mend: Chide us, but let it be
Never in cold blood: O' my honesty
(If I have any) this I'le say for all,
Our meaning was to please you still, and shall.

The Prologue.

BEGGARS BVSH.

Actus Primus, Scæna Prima.

Enter a Merchant, and Herman.

Mer. IS he then taken?
Her. And brought back even now sir.
Mer. He was not in disgrace?
Her. No man more lov'd, (man.
Nor more deserv'd it, being the onely
That durst be honest in this Court.
Mer. Indeed
We have heard abroad sir, that the State hath suffered,
A great change, since the countesse death.
Her. It hath sir.
Mer. My five yeares absence, hath kept me a stranger
So much to all the occurrents of my Country,
As you shall bind me for some short relation
To make me understand the present times.
Her. I must begin then with a war was made
And seven yeares with all cruelty continued
Upon our Flanders by the Duke of Brabant,
The cause grew thus: during our Earles minority,
Woolfort, (who now usurps) was employed thither
To treat about a match betweene our Earle (treaty
And the daughter and Heire of Brabant: during which
The Brabander pretends, this daughter was
Stolne from his Court, by practice of our State,
Though we are all confirm'd, 'twas a fought quarrell
To lay an unjust gripe upon this Earledome,
Itbeing here beleev'd the Duke of Brabant
Had no such losse. This war upon't proclaim'd,
Our Earle, being then a Child, although his Father
Good Gerrard liv'd, yet in respect he was Chosen by the Countesse favour, for her Husband
And but a Gentleman, and Floris holding
His right unto this Country from his Mother,
The State thought fit in this defensive war,
Woolfort being then the only man of marke,
To make him Generall.
Mer. Which place we have heard
He did discharge with honour.
Her. I, so long,
And with so blest successes, that the Brabander
Was forc't (his treasures wasted, and the choyce
Of his best men of Armes tyr'd, or cut off)
To leave the field, and sound a base retreat
Back to his Countrey: but so broken both
In minde and meanes, er'e to make head againe,
That hitherto he sitts downe by his losse,
Not daring, or for honour, or revenge
Againe to tempt his fortune. But this Victory
More broke our State, and made a deeper hurt
In Flanders, then the greatest overthrow
She ever receiv'd: For Woolfort, now beholding
Himselfe, and actions in the flattering glasse
Of selfe-deservings, and that cherish't by
The strong assurance of his power, for then
All Captaines of the Army, were his creatures,
The common Souldier too at his devotion,
Made so by full indulgence to their rapines
And secret bounties, this strength too well knowne
And what it could effect, soone put in practice,
As furtherd by the child-hood of the Earle
And their improvidence, that might have peirc't
The heart of his designes, gave him occasion
To seize the whole, and in that plight you find it.
Mer. Sir, I receive the knowledge of thus much
As a choyce favour from you
Her. Onely I must add
Bruges holds out.
Mer. Whether sir, I am going
For there last night I had a ship put in,
And my horse waits me. Exit.
Her. I wish you a good journey.

Enter Woolfort, Hubert.

Wool. What? Hubert stealing from me? who disarm'd him,
It was more then I commanded; take your sword,
I am best guarded with it in your hand,
I have seene you use it nobly.
Hub. And will turne it
On mine owne bosom, ere it shall be drawne
Vnworthily or rudely.
Wool. VVould you leave me
VVithout a farwell Hubert? fly a friend
Vnwearied in his study to advance you?
VVhat have I ev't possessed which was not yours?
Or either did not court you to command it?
Who ever yet arriv'd to any grace,
Reward or trust from me, but his approaches
Were by your faire reports of him prefer'd?
And what is more I made my selfe your Servant,
In making you the Master of those secrets
Which not the rack of conscience could draw from me,
Nor I, when I askt mercy, trust my prayers with;
Yet after these assurances of love,
These tyes and bonds of freindship, to forsake me,
Forsake me as an enemie? corne you must
Give me a reason.
Hub. Sir, and so I will,
If I may do't in privat: and you heare it.
Wool. All leave the roome: you have your will, set downe (vanish'd
And use the liberty of our first friendship.
Hub. Friendship? when you prov'd Traitor first, that
Nor do I owe you any thought, but hate,
I know my flight hath forfeited my head;
And so I may make you first understand
What a strange monster you have made your selfe,
I welcome it.
Wool. To me this is strange language.
Hub. To you? why what are you?
Wool. Your Prince and Master,
The Earle of Flaunders.
Hub. By a proper title,
Rais'd to it by cunning circumvention, force,
Blood, and proscriptions.
Wool. And in all this wisedome;
Had I not reason? when by Gerrards plotts
I should haue first been call'd to a strict accop
How, and which way I had consum'd that masse
Of money, as they terme it in the warr,

VVho underhand, had by his Miniſters
Detracted my great action, made my faith
And loyalty ſo ſuſpected: in which failing
He ſought my life by practice.
Hub. With what fore-head,
Do you ſpeake this to me? who (as I know't)
Muſt, and will ſay 'tis falſe,
Wool. My guard there.
Hub. Sir, you bad me ſit, & promis'd you would heare
Which I now ſay you ſhall, not a ſound more,
For I that am contemner of mine owne,
Am Maſter of your life; then heer's a Sword
Betweene you, and all aydes Sir, though you blind
The credulous beaſt, the multitude, you paſſe not
Theſe groſſe untruthes on me.
Wool. How? groſſe untruthes.
Hub. I, and it is favourable language,
They had bin in a meane man lyes, and foule ones.
Wool. You take ſtrange licence.
Hub. Yes, were not thoſe rumours
Of being called unto your anſwers, ſpread
By your owne followers; and weake Gerrard wrought
(But by your cunnig practiſe) to be beleeve
That you were dangerous; yet not to be
Puniſh'd by any formall courſe of law,
But firſt to be made ſure, and have your crimes
Layd open after, which your queint traine taking
You fled unto the Campe, and there crav'd humbly
Protection for your innocent life, and that,
Since you had ſcap'd the fury of the warr,
You might not fall by treaſon, and for proofe,
You did not for your owne ends make this danger;
Some that had been before, by you ſuborn'd,
Came forth and tooke their oathes they had been hir'd
By Gerrard to your murther. This once heard,
And eaſily beleev'd, th' inraged Souldier
Seeing no further then the outward man,
Snatch'd haſtily his Armes, ran to the Court,
Kill'd all that made reſiſtance, cut in pieces
Such as were Servants, or thought friends to Gerrard,
Vowing the like to him.
Wool. Will you yet end?
Hub. Which he foreſeeing, with his Sonne, the Earle,
Forſooke the Citty; and by ſecret wayes
As you give out, and we would gladly have it,
Eſcap'd their fury: though 'tis more then feard
They fell among the reſt; Nor ſtand you there
To let us onely mourne, the impious meanes
By which you got it, but your cruelties ſince
So farr tranſcend your former bloody ills,
As if compar'd, they onely would appeare
Eſſayes of miſchiefe; do not ſtop your eares,
More are behind yet.
Wool. O repeat them not,
'Tis hell to heare them nam'd.
Hub. You ſhould have thought,
That hell would be your puniſhment when you did them,
A Prince, in nothing but your princely luſts,
And boundleſſe rapines.
Wool. No more I beſeech you.
Hub. Who was the Lord of houſe or land, that ſtood
Within the proſpect of your coveteous eye?
Wool. You are in this to me a greater Tyrant,
Then ere I was to any.
Hub. I end thus
The generall griefe, now to my private wrongs
The loſſe of Gerrards daughter Jaqueline:
The hop'd for partner of my lawfull bed,
Your cruelty hath frighted from mine armes;
And her, I now was wandring to recover.
Thinke you that I had reaſon now to leave you,
When you are growne ſo juſtly odious,
That ev'n my ſtay here with your grace and favour,
Makes my life irkſome? here ſurely take it,
And do me but this fruite of all your friendſhip,
That I may dye by you, and not your hang-man.
Wool. Oh Hubert, theſe your wordes and reaſons have
As well drawne drops of blood from my griev'd hart,
As theſe teares from mine eyes;
Deſpiſe them not
By all that's ſacred, I am ſerious Hubert,
You now have made me ſenſible, what furyes,
Whips, hangmen, and tormentors a bad man
Do's ever beare about him: let the good
That you this day have done, be ever numberd,
The firſt of your beſt actions;
Can you think,
Where Floriz is or Gerrard, or your love,
Or any elſe, or all that are proſcrib'd?
I will reſigne, what I uſurpe, or have
Unjuſtly forc'd; the dayes I have to live
Are too too few to make them ſatisfaction
With any penitence: yet I vow to practiſe
All of a man.
Hub. O that your hart and tongue
Did not now differ!
Wool. By my griefes they do not
Nake the good paines to ſearch them out; 'tis worth it,
You have made cleane a Leper: truſt me you have,
And made me once more fit for the ſociety,
I hope of good men.
Hub. Sir, do not abuſe
My aptneſſe to beleeve.
Wool. Suſpect not you
A faith that's built upon ſo true a ſorrow,
Make your owne ſafetyes: aske them all the ties
Humanity can give, Heinskirck too ſhall
Along with you to this ſo wiſh'd diſcovery,
And in my name profeſs all that you promiſe;
And I will give you this helpe to't: I have
Of late receiv'd certaine intelligence,
That ſome of them are in or about Bruges
To be found out: which I did then interpret,
The cauſe of that Townes ſtanding out againſt me;
But now am glad, it may direct your purpoſe
Of giving them their ſafety, and mee peace.
Hub. Be conſtant to your goodneſſe, & you have it. Ex.

Scena Secunda.

Enter 3. Marchants.

1. Mer. T'is much that you deliver of this Goſwin.
2. Mer. But ſhort of what I could, yet have the Country
Confirmd it true, and by a generall oath,
And not a man hazard his credit in it:
He beares himſelfe with ſuch a confidence
As if he were the Maſter of the Sea;
And not a winde upon the Sailers compaſſe,
But from one part or other, was his factor,
To bring him in the beſt commodities,
Merchant e're venturd for.
1. 'Tis ſtrange,
2. And yet;

This

This do's in him deserve the least of wonder,
Compared with other his peculiar fashions,
Which all admire: he's young, and rich, at least
Thus far reputed so, that since he liv'd
In Bruges, there was never brought to harbour
So rich a Bottome, but his bill would passe
Unquestion'd for her lading.
3 Mer. Yet he still Continues a good man.
2 Mer. So good, that but
To doubt him, would be held an injury
Or rather malice, with the best that traffique;
But this is nothing, a great stocke, and fortune,
Crowning his judgement in his undertakings
May keep him upright that way: But that wealth
Should want the power to make him dote on it,
Or youth teach him to wrong it, best commends
His constant temper; for his outward habit
'Tis suitable to his present course of life:
His table furnish'd well, but not with dainties
That please the appetite only for their rareneſſe,
Or the deare price; nor given to wine or women,
Beyond his health, or warrant of a man,
I meane a good one: and so loves his state
He will not hazard it at play; nor lend
Upon the assurance of a well-pen'd Letter,
Although a challenge second the denyall
From such as make th'opinion of their valour
Their meanes of feeding.
1 Mer. These are wayes to thrive,
And the meanes not curs'd.
2 Mer. What follows this,
Makes many Venturers with him, in their wishes,
For his prosperity; for when desert
Or reason leads him to be liberall,
His noble mind and ready hand contend
Which can add most to his free curtesies,
Or in their worth, or speed to make them so.
Is there a Virgin of good fame wants dowre?
He is a father to her; or a Souldier
That in his Countreyes service, from the warre
Hath brought him only scars, and want? his house
Receives him, and relieves him, with that care
As if what he posses'd had been laid up
For such good uses, and he steward of it.
But I should loose my selfe to speake him further
And stale in my relation, the much good
You may be witnesse of, if your remove
From Brugis, be not speedy.
1 Mer. This report
I do assure you will not hasten it,
Nor would I wish a better man to deale with
For what I am to part with.
3 Mer. Never doubt it,
He is your man and ours, only I wish
His too much forwardneſſe to embrace all bargains
Sucke him not in the end.
2 Mer. Have better hopes,
For my part I am confident; here he comes.

Enter Florez & the fourth Merchant.

Flor. I take it at your own rates: your wine of Cyprus,
But for your Candy sugars, they have met
With such foule weather, and are priz'd so high
I cannot save in them.
4 Mer. I am unwilling
To seeke another Chap-man: make me offer
Of something near my price, that may assure me
You can deale for them.
Flor. I both can, and will,
But not with too much losse; your bill of lading
Speakes of two hundred chests, valued by you
At thirty thousand gilders. I will have them
At twenty eight; so, in the payment of
Three thousand sterling, you fall only in
Two hundred pound.
4 Mar. You know, they are so cheape.——
Flo. Why looke you; I'le deale fairly, ther's in prison,
And at your suite, a Pirat, but unable
To make you satisfaction, and past hope
To live a weeke, if you should prosecute
What you can prove against him: set him free,
And you shall have your money to a Stiver,
And present payment.
4 Mar. This is above wonder,
A Merchant of your ranke, that have at Sea
So many Bottoms in the danger of
These water-Theeves, should be a meanes to save 'em
It more importing you for your owne safety
To be at charge to scoure the Sea of them
Then stay the sword of Justice, that is ready
To fall on one so conscious of his guilt
That he dares not deny it.
Flo. You mistake me,
If you thinke I would cherish in this Captaine
The wrong he did to you, or any man;
I was lately with him, (having first, from others
True testimony been assured, a man
Of more desert never put from the shore)
I read his letters of Mart from this State granted
For the recovery of such losses, as
He had receiv'd in Spain, 'twas that he aim'd at,
Not at three tuns of wine, bisket, or beefe,
Which his necessity made him take from you.
If he had pillag'd you neare, or sunke your ship,
Or thrown your men o'r-boord, then he deserv'd
The Lawes extreamest rigour: But since want
Of what he could not live without, compel'd him
To that he did (which yet our State calls death)
I pitty his misfortune; and to worke you
To some compassion of them, I come up
To your own price: save him, the goods are mine;
If not, seeke else-where, I'le not deale for them.
4 Mar. Well Sir, for your love, I will once be led
To change my purpose.
Flo. For your profit rather.
4 Mar. I'le presently make meanes for his discharge,
Till when, I leave you.
2 Mar. What do you thinke of this?
1 Mar. As of a deed of noble pitty: guided
By a strong judgement.
2 Mar. Save you Master Gosvin.
Flo. Good day to all.
2 Mar. We bring you the refusall
Of more Commodities.
Flo. Are you the owners
Of the ship that lastnight put into the Harbour?
1 Mar. Both of the Ship, and lading.
Flo. What's the fraught?
1 Mar. Indico, Quitchineel, choise Chyna stuffs.
3 Mar. And cloath of Gold brought from Camball.
Flo. Rich lading.
For which I were your Chapman, but I am
Already out of cash.
1 Mar. I'le give you day
For the moiety of all.
Flo. How long?

3 Mer. Sixe moneths.
Flo. 'Tis a faire offer: which (if we agree
About the prizes) I, with thanks accept of,
And will make preſent payment of the reſt;
Some two hours hence I'le come aboord.
1 Mer. The Gunner ſhall ſpeake you welcome.
Flo. I'le not faile,
3 Mer. Good morrow. Exit Merch.
Flo. Heaven grant my Ships a ſafe returne, before
The day of this great payment: as they are Expected three moneths ſooner: and my credite
Stands good with all the world. Enter Gerrard.
Ger. Bleſſe my good Maſter,
The prayers of your poor Beadſ-man ever ſhall
Be ſent up for you.
Flo. God 'a mercy Clauſe,
Ther's ſomething to put thee in minde hereafter
To thinke of me.
Ger. May he that gave it you
Reward you for it, with encreaſe, good Maſter.
Flo. I thrive the better for thy prayers.
Ger. I hope ſo.
This three yeares have I fed upon your bounties,
And by the fire of your bleſt charity warm'd me,
And yet, good Maſter, pardon me, that muſt,
Though I have now receiv'd your almes, preſume
To make one ſute more to you.
Flo. What is't Clauſe?
Ger. Yet do not think me impudent I beſeech you,
Since hitherto your charity hath prevented
My begging your reliefe, 'tis not for money
Nor cloaths (good Maſter) but your good word for me.
Flo. That thou ſhalt have, Clauſe, for I think thee ho-
Ger. To morrow then (dear Mr.) take the trouble (neſt.
Of walking early unto Beggars Buſh,
And as you ſee me, among others (Brethren
In my affliction) when you are demanded
Which you like beſt among us, point out me,
And then paſſe by, as if you knew me not.
Flo. But what will that advantage thee?
Ger. O much Sir,
'Twill give me the preheminence of the reſt,
Make me a King among 'em, and protect me,
From all abuſe, ſuch as are ſtronger, might
Offer my age; Sir, at your better leizure
I will informe you further of the good
It may do to me.
Flo. 'Troth thou mak'ſt me wonder;
Have you a King and Common-wealth among you?
Ger. We have, & there are States are governd worſe.
Flo. Ambition among Beggars?
Ger Many great ones
Would part with halfe their Eſtate, to have the place,
And credit to beg in the firſt file, Maſter:
But ſhall I be ſo much bound to your furtherance
In my Petition?
Flo. That thou ſhalt not miſſe of,
Nor any worldly care make me forget it,
I will be early there.
Ger. Heaven bleſſe my Maſter. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Higgen, Ferret, Prig, Clauſe, Jaculine, Snap, Gynkes, and other Beggars.

Hig. COme Princes of the ragged regiment,
You 'o the blood, Prig my moſt upright Lord,
And theſe (what name or title, e're they beare)
Jarkman, or Patrico, Cranke, or Clapperdudgeon.
Frater, or Abram-man; I ſpeake to all
That ſtand in faire Election for the title
Of King of Beggars, with the command adjoyning,
Higgen, your Orator, in this Inter-regnum,
That whilom was your Dommerer, doth beſeech you
All to ſtand faire, and put your ſelves in ranke,
That the firſt Commer, may at his firſt view
Make a free choiſe, to ſay up the queſtion.
Fer. Pr. 'Tis done Lord Higgen.
Hig. Thankes to Prince Prig, Prince Ferret.
Fer. Well, pray my Maſters all, Ferret be choſen
Ye'ar like to have a mercifull mild Prince of me.
Prig. A very tyrant, I, an arrant tyrant.
If e're I come to reigne; therefore looke to't,
Except you do provide me hum enough
And Lour to bouze with: I muſt have my Capons
And Turkeys brought me in, with my green Geeſe,
And Ducklings i'th ſeaſon: fine fat chickens,
Or if you chance where an eye of tame Pheſants
Or Partridges are kept, ſee they be mine,
Or ſtraight I ſeize on all your priviledge,
Places, revenues, offices, as forfeit,
Call in your crutches, wooden legs, falſe bellyes,
Forc'd eyes and teeth, with your dead arms; not leave you
A durty clout to beg with o' your heads,
Or an old rag with Butter, Frankinſence,
Brimſtone and Rozen, birdlime, blood, and creame,
To make you an old ſore; not ſo much ſope
As you may ſome with i'th Falling-ſickneſſe;
The very bag you beare, and the brown diſh
Shall be eſcheated. All your daintieſt dells too
I will deflowr, and take your deareſt Doxyes
From your warme ſides; and then ſome one cold night
I'le watch you what olde barne you goe to roaſt in,
And there I'le ſmoother you all i'th muſty hay. (Ginks
Hig. This is tyrant-like indeed: But what would
Or Clauſe be here, if either of them ſhould raigne?
Ger. Beſt aske an aſſe, if he were made a Cannell,
What he would be; or a dog, and he were a Lyon.
Ginks. I care not what you are, Sirs, I ſhall be
A Begger, ſtill, I am ſure, find my ſelfe there.
Enter Florez.
Snap. O here a Judge comes.
Hig. Cry, a Judge, a Judge.
Flo. What aile you Sirs? what means this out-cry?
Hig. Maſter
A ſort of poor ſoules met: Gods fools, good Maſter,
Have had ſome little variance amongſt our ſelves
Who ſhould be honeſteſt of us; and which lives
Uprighteſt in his call: Now, 'cauſe we thought
We ne're ſhould gree on't our ſelves, becauſe
Indeed 'tis hard to ſay: we all diſſolv'd, to put it (this,
To whom that ſhould come next, and that's your Maſter-
Who, I hope, will termine it as your mind ſerves you,
Right, and no otherwiſe we aske it: which?
Which does your Worſhip thinke is he? ſweet Maſter
Looke over us all, and tell us; we are ſeven of us,
Like to the ſeven wiſe Maſters, or the Planets.
Flo. I ſhould judge this the man with the grave beard,
And if he be not—
Ger. Bleſſe you, good Maſter, bleſſe you. (you
Flo. I would he were: there's ſomething too, amongſt
To keep you all honeſt. Exit
Snap. King of heaven goe with you.
Omn. Now good reward him, (houre.
May he never want it, to comfort ſtill the poor, in a good
Fer. What

Fer. What is't? ſee; Snap ha's got it.
Snap. A good crown, marry:
Prig. A crown of gold.
Fer. For our new King: good luck.
Ginks. To the common treaſury with it; if 't be gold,
Thither it muſt.
Prig. Spoke like a Patriot, Ferret——
King Clauſe. I bid God ſave thee firſt, firſt, Clauſe,
After this golden token of a crowne;
Where's Oratour Higgen with his gratuling ſpeech now,
In all our names?
Fer. Here he is pumping for it.
Gin. H' has cough'd the ſecond time, 'tis but once more
And then it comes.
Fer. So, out with all: expect now——
Hig. That thou art choſen, venerable Clauſe,
Our King and Soveraign; Monarch o'th Maunders.
Thus we throw up our Nab-cheats, firſt for joy,
And then our filches; laſt, we clap our fambles,
Three ſubject ſignes, we do it without envy:
For who is he here did not wiſh thee choſen
Now thou art choſen? aske 'em: all will ſay ſo,
Nay ſwear't: 'tis for the King, but let that paſſe;
When laſt in conference at the bouzing ken
This other day we ſate about our dead Prince
Of famous memory: (reſt, goe with his rags:)
And that I ſaw thee at the tables end,
Riſe mov'd, and gravely leaning on one Crutch,
Lift the other like a Scepter at my head,
I then preſag'd thou ſhortly wouldſt be King
And now thou art ſo: but what need preſage,
To us, that might have read it, in thy beard,
As well, as he that choſe thee? by that beard
Thou wert found out, and mark'd for Soveraignty.
O happy beard! but happier Prince, whoſe beard,
Was ſo remark'd, as marked out our Prince,
Not bating us a haire. Long may it grow,
And thick, and faire, that who lives under it,
May live as ſafe, as under Beggars Buſh,
Of which this is the thing, that but the type.
Om. Excellent, excellent oratour, forward good Higgen
Give him leave to ſpit: the fine, well-ſpoken Higgen.
Hig. This is the beard, the buſh, or buſhy-beard,
Under whoſe gold and ſilver raigne 'twas ſaid
So many ages ſince, we all ſhould ſmile
On impoſitions, taxes, grievances,
Knots in a State, and whips unto a Subject,
Lye lurking in this Beard, but all hem'd out:
If now, the Beard be ſuch, what is the Prince
That owes the Beard? a Father; no, a Grandfather;
Nay the great Grand-father of you his people.
He will not force away your hens, your bacon,
When you have ventur'd hard for't, nor take from you
The fatteſt of your puddings: under him
Each man ſhall eate his own ſtolne eggs, and butter,
In his owne ſhade, or ſun-ſhine, and enjoy
His owne deare Dell, Doxy, or Mort, at night
In his own ſtraw, with his owne ſhirt, or ſheet,
That he hath filch'd that day, I, and poſſeſſe
What he can purchaſe, backe, or belly-cheats
To his own prop: he will have no purveyers
For Pigs, and poultry.
Ger. That we muſt have, my learned Oratour,
It is our will, and every man to keep
In his own path and circuite.
Hig. Do you heare?
You muſt hereafter maund on your own pads he ſaies.
Ger. And what they get there, is their owne, beſides
To give good words.
Hig. Do you marke? to cut bene whids,
That is the ſecond Law.
Ger. And keepe a-foote
The humble, and the common phraſe of begging,
Leſt men diſcover us.
Hig. Yes; and cry ſometimes,
To move compaſſion: Sir, there is a table,
That doth command all theſe things, and enjoyns 'em;
Be perfect in their crutches: their falſ'd plaiſters,
And their true paſ-ports, with the ways to ſtammer,
And to be dumb, and deafe, and blind, and lame,
There, all the halting paces are ſet downe,
I'th learned language.
Ger. Thither I refer them,
Thoſe, you at leiſure ſhall interpret to them,
We love no heapes of lawes, where few will ſerve.
Om. O gracious Prince, ſave, ſave the good K. Clauſe.
Hig. A Song to crowne him.
Fer. Set a Centinell out firſt.
Sn. The word?
Hig. A Cove comes, and fumbumbis to it.—— ſtrike.

The SONG.

CAſt our Caps and cares away: this is Beggars Holi-day,
At the Crowning of our King, thus we ever dance & ſing.
In the world looke out and ſee: where ſo happy a Prince as he?
Where the Nation live ſo free, and ſo merry as do we?
Be it peace, or be it warr, here at liberty we are,
And enjoy our eaſe and reſt; To the field we are not preſt;
Nor are called into the Towne, to be troubled with the Gowne.
Hang all Offices we cry, and the Magiſtrate too, by;
When the Subſidies encreaſe, we are not a penny ceaſe;
Nor will any goe to law, with the Beggar for a ſtraw.
All which happineſſe he brags, he doth owe unto his rags.

Enter Snap, Hubert, and Hemskirke.

Snap. A Cove: Fumbumbis.
Prig. To your poſtures; arme:
Hub. Yonder's the Towne: I ſee it.
Hemſk. Ther's our danger
Indeed afore us, if our ſhadows ſave not.
Hig. Bleſſe your good Worſhips:
Fer. One ſmall piece of money.
Prig. Amongſt us all poore wretches:
Ger. Blinde, and lame,
Ginks. For his ſake that gives all.
Hig. Pittifull Worſhips;
Snap. One little doyt.

Enter Jaculine.

Jac. King, by your leave, where are you?
Ger. To buy a litle bread,
Hig. To feed ſo many
Mouths, as will ever pray for you.
Prig. Here be ſeven of us.
Hig. Seven, good Maſter, O remember ſeven,
Seven bleſſings.
Fer. Remember, gentle Worſhip.
Hig. 'Gainſt ſeven deadly ſins,
Prig. And ſeven ſleepers.
Hig. If they be hard of heart, and will give nothing——
Alas, we had not a charity this three dayes.
Hub. Ther's amongſt you all?
Fer. Heaven reward you.
Prig. Lord, reward you?
Hig. The Prince of pitty bleſſe thee.
Hub. Do I ſee? or is't my fancy that would have it ſo?

Ha?

Ha? 'tis her face: come hither Maid.
Jac. What ha', you
Bells for my ſquirrell? I ha' giv'n Bun meat,
You do not love me, do you? catch me a butter fly,
And I'le love you againe; when? can you tell?
Peace, we go a birding: I ſhall have a fine thing.
Hub. Her voyce too ſayes the ſame; but for my head
I would not that her manners, were ſo chang'd,
Heare me thou honeſt fellow; what's this Mayden,
That lives amongſt you here?
Ginacks. Ao, ao, ao, ao.
Hub. How? nothing but ſignes?
Gin. Ao, ao, ao, ao.
Hub. This ſtrange,
I would faine have it her, but not her thus. (dumb Sir.
Hig. He is de-de-de-de-de-de-deafe, and du-du-dude—
Hub. Slid they did all ſpeak plain ev'n now me thought
Do'it thou know this ſame Maid? (foole
Sn. Why, why, why, why, which, gu, gu, gu, gu, Gods
She was bo-bo-bo-bo-borne at the barne younder,
By-be-be-be-be-Beggars Buſh-bo-bo-Buſh
Her name is, My-my-my-my-my-match; ſo was her Mo-mo-mo-Mothers too-too
Hub. I underſtand no word ſhe ſayes; how long
Has ſhe been here? (go-go-go-good luck,
Sn. Lo-lo-long enough to be ni-ni-nigled: and ſhe ha'
Hub. I muſt be better inform'd, then by this way.
Here was another face too, that I mark'd
O the old mans: but they are vaniſh'd all
Moſt ſodainly: I will come here againe,
O, that I were ſo happy, as to finde it,
What I yet hope? it is put on.
Hem. What meane you Sir,
To ſtay there with that ſtammerer?
Hub. Farewell friend,——
It will be worth returne, to ſearch: Come,
Protect us our diſguize now, pre'thee Hemskirck
If we be taken, how do'ſt thou imagine
This Towne will uſe us, that hath ſtood ſo long
Out, againſt Woolfort?
Hem. Even to hang us forth
Upon their walls a ſunning, to make Crowes meate,
If I were not aſſur'd 'o the Burgomaſter,
And had a pretty skuys, to ſee a niece there,
I ſhould ſcarce venture.
Hub. Come 'tis now too late
To looke back at the ports: good luck, and enter. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Floriz.

Flo. Still blow'ſt thou there? and from all other parts,
Do all my Agents ſleepe? that nothing comes?
Ther's a conſpiracy of windes, and ſervants:
If not of Elements, to ha' me breake;
What ſhould I thinke unleſſe the Seas, and Sandes
Had ſwallow'd up my ſhips? or fire had ſpoyl'd
My ware-houſes? or death devour'd my Facto
I muſt ha' had ſome returnes;
Enter Merchants.
1. Mer. 'Saue you Sir.
Flo. 'Save you.
1. Mer. No newes, yet 'o your Ships?
o. N ot any yet Sir.
1. Mer. 'Tis ſtrange.
Flo. 'Tis true Sir: what a voyce was here now?
This was one paſſing bell, a thouſand ravens
Sung in that man now, to preſage my ruines.
2. Mer. Goſwin, good day, theſe winds, are very conſtant.
Flo. They are ſo Sir; to hurt——
2. Mer. Ha? you had no letters,
Lately from England, nor from Denmark?
Flo. Neither. (land,
2. Mer. This winde brings them; nor no newes over
Through Spaine, from the Straights?
Flo. Not any.
2. Mer. I am ſorry Sir.
Flo. They talke me downe: and as 'tis ſaid, of Vultures
They ſent a feild fought, and do ſmell the carkaſſes
By many hundred miles: So do theſe, my wracks
At greater diſtances: why thy will heaven
Come on, and be: yet if thou pleaſe, preſerve me;
But in my owne adventure, here at home,
Of my chaſt love, to keep me worthy of her,
It ſhall be put in ſcale againſt all ill fortunes:
I am not broken yet: nor ſhould I fall,
Me thinkes with leſſe then that, that ruines all. Exit

Scæna Tertia.

Enter. Van-dunck. Hubert. Hemſkirck. and Margaret. Boores.

Van. Captaine you are welcome; ſo is this your friend
Moſt ſafely welcome, though our Towne ſtand out
Againſt your Maſter; you ſhall finde good quarter:
The troth is, we not love him: Meg: ſome wine,
Let's talke a little treaſon, If we can
Talk treaſon, gain' the Traitors: by your leave, Gentlemen
We here in Brugis, thinke he do's uſurpe,
And therefore I am bold with him.
Hub. Sir, your boldneſſe,
Happely becomes your mouth, but not our eares,
While we are his ſervants; And as we come here,
Not to aske queſtions, walke forth on your walls;
Viſit your courtes of guard, view your Munition,
Aske of your corne-proviſions, nor enquire
Into the leaſt, as ſpies upon your ſtrengthes,
So let's entreate, we may receive from you
Nothing in paſſage or diſcourſe, but what
We may with gladneſſe, and our honeſties here,
And that ſhall ſeale our welcome.
Van. Good: let's drinke then,
Mage: fill out, I keep mine old pearle ſtill Captaine.
Mar. I hang faſt man.
Hem. Old Iewels, commend their keeper, Sir.
Van. Heer's to you with a hart, my Captaines friend,
With a good heart, and if this make us ſpeake
Bold words, anon: 'tis all under the Roſe
Forgotten: drowne all memory, when we drinke
Hub. 'Tis freely ſpoken noble Burgomaſter,
I'le do you right.
Hem. Nay Sir mine heire Van-dunck,
Is a true Stateſmen. (Woolfort.
Van. Fill my Captaines cup there, ô that your Maſter
Had been an honeſt man.
Hub. Sir?
Van. Under the Roſe.
Hem. Heer's to you Marget.
Mar. Welcom; welcom Captaine.
Van. Well ſaid my pearle ſtill,

And

Van. Well ſaid, my pearl ſtill,
Hem. And how does my Niece?
Almoſt a woman; I thinke? This friend of mine,
I drew along with me, through ſo much hazard,
Only to ſee her: ſhe was my errand.
Van. I, a kinde Uncle you are (fill him his glaſſe)
That in ſeven yeares, could not find leizure.——
Hem. No,
It's not ſo much.
Van. I'le bate you ne'r an houre on't,
I was before the Brabander gan his wary,
For moone-ſhine, i'th water there, his daughter
That never was loſt: yet you could not finde time
To ſee a Kinſwoman: But ſhee is worth the ſeeing Sir.
Now you are come, you aske if ſhe were a woman?
Shee is a woman Sir; fetch her forth Margee. Exit Marg.
And a fine woman, and has Suitors.
Hem. How?
What Suitors are they.
Van. Bachellors: young Burgers:
And one, a gallant, the young Prince of Merchants,
We call him here, in Bruges.
Hem. How? a Merchant?
I thought't Van-doncke, you had underſtood me better,
And my Niece too, ſo truſted to you by me:
Then t'admit of ſuch in name of Suitors.
Van. Such? he is ſuch a ſuch, as were ſhe mine
I'de give him thirty thouſand crownes with her.
Hem. But the ſame things Sir, fit not you and me. Exit.
Van. Why, give's ſome wine, then; This will fit us all:
Here's to you ſtill, my Captains friend: All out;
And ſtill, would Woolfort were an honeſt man,
Under the Roſe, I ſpeake it: but this Merchant
Is a brave boy: he lives ſo, i'the towne here,
We know not what to thinke on him: At ſometimes
We feare he will be Bankrupt; he do's ſtretch
Tenter his credite ſo; embraces all,
And too't, the winds have been contrary, long.
But then, if he ſhould have all his returnes,
We thinke he would be a King, and are halfe ſure on't.
Your Maſter is a Traytor, for all this
Under the Roſe: here's to you; and uſurps
The Earldome from a better man.
Hub. I marry Sir,
Where is that man?
Van. Nay ſoft: and I could tell you
'Tis ten to one I would not: here's my hand,
I love not Woolfort: ſit you ſtill, with that:
Here comes my Captaine againe, and his fine Niece,
And ther's my Merchant: view him well, ſill wine here.

Enter Hemskirke, Bertha, and Florez.

Hem. You muſt not only know me for your Uncle,
Now, but obey me; you, goe caſt your ſelfe
Away, upon a dunghill here? a Merchant?
A petty fellow? one that makes this trade
With oathes and perjuries?
Flo. What is that you ſay Sir?
If it be me you ſpeake of; as your eye
Seemes to direct: I wiſh you would ſpeake to me, Sir.
Hem. Sir, I do ſay, ſhe is no Merchandize,
Will that ſuffice you?
Flo. Merchandize good Sir,
Though ye be Kinſman to her: take no leave thence
To uſe me with contempt: I ever thought
Your Niece above all price.
Hem. And do ſo ſtill, Sir,
I aſſure you, her rate's at more then you are worth.
Flo. You do not know, what a Gentleman's worth ſir,
Nor can you value him.
Hub. Well ſaid Merchant.
Van. Nay,
Let him alone, and ply your matter.
Hem. A Gentleman?
What, o' the wool-pack? or the Sugar-cheſt?
Or liſts of Velvet? which is't? pound, or yard,
You vent your Gentry by?
Hub. O Hemskirke, fye.
Van. Come, do not mind 'em drink, he is no Woolfort,
Captaine, I adviſe you.
Hem. Alas, my pretty man,
I think't be angry, by its looke: Come hither,
Turne this way, a little: if it were the blood
Of Charlemaine, as't may (for ought I know)
Be ſome good Botchers iſſue, here in Bruges.
Flo. How?
Hem. Nay: I'me not certaine of that; of this I am,
If it once buy, and ſell, its Gentry is gone.
Flo. Ha, ha;
Hem. You are angry, though ye laugh.
Flo. No, now 'tis pitty
Of your poor argument. Do not you, the Lords,
Of land (if you be any) ſell the graſſe,
The corne, the ſtraw, the milke, the cheeſe?
Van. And butter:
Remember butter; doe not leave out butter. (ſtor'd with?
Flo. The Beefs and Muttons that your grounds are Swine, with the very maſt, beſide the woods?
Hem. No, for thoſe ſordid uſes, we have Tenants,
Or elſe our Bayliffs.
Flo. Have not we Sir, Chap-men,
And Factors, then to anſwer theſe? your errour
Fetch'd from the Heralds A B C. and ſaid over
With your Court faces, once an houre, ſhall never Make me miſtake my ſelfe. Do not your Lawyers
Sell all their practiſe, as your Prieſts their prayers?
What is not bought, and ſold? The company
That you had laſt, what had you fort, y'faith?
Hem. You now grow ſawcy.
Flo. Sure I have been bred
Still, with my honeſt liberty, and muſt uſe it.
Hem. Upon your equals, then.
Flo. Sir, he that will
Provoke me firſt, doth make himſelfe my equall.
Hem. Do ye heare? no more.
Flo. Yes Sir, this little, I pray you,
And't ſhall be aſide, then after, as you pleaſe,
You appeare the Uncle, ſir, to her I love,
More then mine eyes; and I have heard your ſcorns
With ſo much ſcoffing, and ſo much ſhame,
As each ſtrive which is greater: But, beleeve me
I ſuck'd not in this patience with my milke.
Do not preſume, becauſe you ſee me young,
Or caſt deſpights on my profeſſion
For the civility and tameneſſe of it.
A good man beares a contumely worſe
Then he would do an injury. Proceed not
To my offence: wrong is not ſtill ſucceſſefull,
Indeed it is not: I would approach your Kinſ-woman
With all reſpect, done to your ſelfe and her.
Hem. Away Companion: handling her? take that.
Flo. Nay, I do love no blows, ſir, there's exchange.
Hub. Hold ſir,
Mar. O murther.
Ber. Help, my Goſwin.
Mar. Man.
Van. Let 'em alone; my life for one.
Flo. Nay come

If you have will.
Hub. None to offend you, I, Sir.
Flo. He that had, thank himself: not hand her? yes Sir,
And claspe her, and embrace her; and (would she Now goe with me) bear her through all her race,
Her Father, Brethren, and her Uncles, arm'd,
And all their Nephews, though they stood a wood
Of pikes, and wall of Canon: kisse me Gertrude,
Quake not, but kisse me.
Van-d. Kisse him, girle, I bid you;
My Merchant royall; feare no Uncles: hang 'em,
Hang up all Uncles: Are we not in Bruges?
Under the Rose here?
Flo. In this circle, Love,
Thou art as safe, as in a towre of brasse;
Let such as do wrong, feare.
Van. I, that's good,
Let Woulfort looke to that.
Flo. Sir, here she stands,
Your Niece, and my beloved. One of these titles
She must apply to; if unto the last,
Not all the anger can be sent unto her,
In frowne, or voyce, or other art, shall force her,
Had Hercules a hand in't: Come, my Joy,
Say thou art mine, aloud Love, and professe it.
Van. Doe: and I drinke to it.
Flo. Prethee say so, Love.
Ger. 'Twould take away the honour from my blushes:
Doe not you play the Tyrant, sweet: they speake it.
Hem. I thanke you Niece.
Flo. Sir, thanke her for your life,
And fetch your sword within.
Hem. You insult too much
With your good fortune, Sir. Exit Florez.
Hub. A brave cleare spirit;
Hemskirke, you were too blame: a civill habit
Oft covers a good man: and you may meete
In person of a Merchant, with a soule
As resolute, and free, and all wayes worthy,
As else in any file of man-kinde: pray you,
What meant you so to slight him?
Hem. 'Tis done now,
Aske no more of it; I must suffer. Exit Hemskirke.
Hub. This,
Is still the punishment of rathnesse, sorrow;
Well; I must to the woods, for nothing here
Will be got out. There, I may chance to learne
Somewhat to help my enquiries further.
Van. Ha?
A Looking-glasse?
Hub. How now, brave Burgo-master?
Van. I love no Woulforts, and my name's Vandunke,
Hub. Van-drunke it's rather: Come, go sleep within.
Van. Earle Florez is right heir, and this same Woulfort
Under the Rose I speake it. —
Hub. Very hardly.
Van-d. Usurpes: and a cranke Traitor, as ever breathed,
And all that do uphold him. Let me goe,
No man shall hold me, that upholds him;
Doe you uphold him?
Hub. No.
Van. Then hold me up. Exeunt.

Enter Florez and Hemskirke.

Hem. Sir, I presume, you have a sword of your owne,
That can so handle anothers.
Flo. Faith you may Sir. (of you
He. And ye have made me have so much better thoughts
As I am bound to call you forth.
Flo. For what Sir?
Hem. To the repairing of mine honour, & hurt here.
Flo. Expresse your way.
Hem. By fight, and speedily.
Flo. You have your will: Require you any more?
Hem. That you be secret: and come single.
Flo. I will.
Hem. As you are the Gentlemã you would be thought.
Flo. Without the Conjuration: and I'le bring
Only my sword, which I will fit to yours,
I'le take his length within.
Hem Your place now Sir?
Flo. By the Sand-hills.
Hem. Sir, nearer to the woods,
If you thought so, were fitter.
Flor. There, then.
Hem. good.
Your time?
Flo. 'Twixt seven and eight.
Hem. You'l give me Sir
Cause to report you worthy of my Niece,
If you come, like your promise.
Flo. If I do not
Let no man think to call me unworthy first,
I'le doe't my selfe: and justly wish to want her. — Exeunt.

Prig Come aloft bullets three, with a whim-wham:
Have ye their moneys?
Hig. Yes, yes.
1 B. Oh rare Jugler.
2 B. Oh admirable Jugler,
Prig. One tricke more yet;
Hey, come aloft: ſa, ſa, flim, flum, t aradumbis?
Eaſt, weſt, north, ſouth, now flye like Jacke with a bumbis.
Now all your money's gone: pray ſearch your pockets.
1 B. Humh.
2 B. He,
3 B. The Divell a penny's here.
Prig. This was a rare tricke.
1 B. But 'twould be a far rarer to reſtore it.
Prig. I'le doe ye that too: looke upon me earneſtly,
And move not any wayes your eyes from this place,
This button here: pow, whir, whiſs, ſhake your pockets
1 B. By th maſſe 'tis here againe boyes.
Prig. Reſt ye merry;
My firſt tricke has paid me.
All B. I, take it, take it,
And take ſome drinke too.
Prig. Not a drop now I thanke you;
Away, we are diſcover'd elſe. Exit.

Enter Gerrard like a blinde Aquavitæ-man, and a boy ſinging the Song.

Bring out your Cony-skins, faire maids to me,
And hold 'em faire that I may ſee;
Grey, blacke, and blew: for your ſmaller skins,
I'le give ye looking-glaſſes, pins.
And for your whole Coney, beer's ready ready money.
Come gentle Jone, do thou begin
With thy blacke, blacke, blacke Cony-skin.
And Mary then, and Jane will follow,
With their ſilver-hair'd skins, and their yellow.
The white Cony-skin, I will not lay by,
For though it be faint, tis faire to the eye,
The grey it is warme, but yet for my money,
Give me the bonny, bonny blacke Coney.
Come away faire maides, your skins will decay:
Come, and take money maids, put your ware away.
Cony-skins, Cony-skins, have ye any Cony-skins,
I have fine brace-lets, and fine ſilver pins.

Ger. Buy any brand wine, buy any brand wine?
Boy. Have ye any Cony-skins. (ſhip,
2 B. My fine Canary-bird, ther's a cake for thy wor-
1 B. Come, fill, fill, fill, fill ſuddenly: lets ſee Sir,
What's this?
Ger. A penny Sir.
1 B. Fill till't be ſix-pence,
And there's my pig.
Boy. This is a counter Sir.
1 B. A counter? ſtay ye, what are theſe then?
O execrable Jugler! ô damn'd Jugler!
Look in your hoſe, hoa: this comes of looking forward.
3 B. Divell a Dunkirke! what a rogue's this Jugler,
This hey paſſe, repaſſe, h'as repaſt us ſweetly.
2 B. Doe ye call theſe tricks.

Enter Higgen.

Hig. Have ye any ends of gold or ſilver. (copper.
2 B. This fellow comes to mock us; gold or ſilver? cry
1 B. Yes my good friend,
We have e'ne an end of all we have.
Hig. 'Tis well Sir,
You have the leſſe to care for: gold and ſilver, Exit.

Enter Prig. (to ſel. Exit.

Pr. Have ye any old cloaks to ſel, have ye any old clokes
1 B. Cloakes? looke about ye boyes: mine's gone.
2 B. A ——— juggle 'em?
——— o' their Preſtoes: mine's gone too.
3 B. Here's mine yet.
1 B. Come, come, let's drink then: more brand wine.
Boy. Here Sir. (ſtrip him;
1 B. If e're I catch your Sow-gelder, by this hand I'le
Were ever fooles ſo ferkt? we have two cloakes yet,
And all our caps; the Divell take the ſlincher.
All B. Yaw, yaw, yaw, yaw.

Enter Hemskirke.

Hem. Good do'n my honeſt fellows,
You are merry here I ſee.
3 B. 'Tis all we have left Sir.
Hem. What haſt thou? Aquavitæ?
Boy. Yes.
Hem. Fill out then,
And give theſe honeſt fellows round.
All b. We thanke ye.
Hem. May I ſpeake a word in private to ye?
All b. Yes Sir.
Hem. I have a buſineſſe for you, honeſt friends,
If you dare lend your help, ſhall get you crownes.
Ger. Ha?
Lead me a little nearer, boy.
1 B. What is't Sir?
If it be any thing to purchaſe money,
Which is our want, command us.
Boors. All, all, all Sir.
Hem. You know the young ſpruce Merchant in Brugis.
2 B. Who? Maſter Goſwin?

Hem. That: he owes me money,
And here in towne there is no ſtirring of him.
Ger. Say ye ſo?
Hem. This day, upon a ſure appointment,
He meets me a mile hence, by the Chaſe ſide
Under the row of Okes, do you know it?
All b. Yes Sir.
Hem. Give 'em more drinke: there if you dare but venture
When I ſhall give the word to ſeize upon him,
Here's twenty pound.
2 Boy. Beware the Jugler.
Hem. If he reſiſt, downe with him, have no mercy.
1 Boy. I warrant you: wee'l hamper him.
Hem. To diſcharge you,
I have a warrant here about me.
3 Boy. Her's our warrant,
This carries fire i'the tayle.
Hem. Away with me then,
The time draws on,
I muſt remove ſo inſolent a Suitor,
And if he be ſo rich, make him pay ranſome
Ere he ſee Bruges towres againe: thus wiſe men
Repaire the hurts they take by a diſgrace,
And piece the Lyons skyn with the Foxes caſe.
Ger. I am glad I have heard this ſport yet.
Hem. Ther's for thy drink; come pay the houſe within
And looſe no time.
Ger. Away with all our haſt too. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Florez.

Flo. No winde blow faire yet? no returne of moneys?
Letters? nor any thing, to hold my hopes up?
Why then 'tis deſtin'd, that I fall, fall miſerably,
My credite I was built on, ſinking with me.
Thou boyſtrous North-wind, blowing my miſ-fortunes,
And froſting all my hopes to cakes of coldneſſe,
Yet ſtay thy fury: give the gentle South
Yet leave to court thoſe ſailes that bring me ſafety,
And you auſpicious fires, bright twins in heaven
Daunce on the ſhrowds: he blows ſtill, ſtubbornly,
And on his boyſtrous racke rides my ſad ruine;
There is no help, there can be now no comfort,
To morrow with the Sun-ſet ſets my credite.
Oh miſery! thou curſe of man, thou plague,
In the midſt all our ſtrength thou ſtrik'ſt us;
My vertuous Love is toſs'd too: all, what I have been,
No more hereafter to be ſeen then ſhadow;
To priſon now? well, yet ther's this hope left me,
I may ſinke fairely under this dayes venture
And ſo to morrow's croſs'd, and all thoſe curſes:
Yet manly I'le invite my fate, baſe fortune
Shall never ſay, ſhe has cut my throate in feare.
This is the place his challenge call'd me too,
And was a happy one at this time for me,
For let me fall before my foe i'the field,
And not at Bar, before my Creditors,
Ha's kept his word: now Sir, your ſwords tongue only
Loud as you dare, all other language——

Enter Hemskirke.

Hem. Well Sir,
You ſhall not be long troubled: draw.
Flo. 'Tis done Sir,
And now have at ye.
Hem. Now.

Enter Boores.

Flo. Betray'd to Villains?
Slaves ye ſhall buy me bravely,
And thou baſe coward.

Enter Gerrard and Beggars.

Ger. Now upon 'em bravely,
Conjure 'em ſoundly boyes.
Boores. Hold, hold.
Ger. Lay on ſtill,
Down with that Gentleman rogue, ſwinge him to ſtrap:
Retire Sir, and take breath: follow and take him,
Take all, 'tis lawfull prize.
Boores. We yield.
Ger. Downe with 'em
Into the wood, and rifle 'em, tew 'em, ſwinge 'em,
Knocke me their braines into their breeches. Exeunt.
Boors. Hold, hold.
Flo. What these men are I know not, nor for what cauſe
They ſhou'd thus thruſt themſelves into my danger,
Can I imagine. But ſure heavens hand was in't,
Nor why this coward knave ſhould deale ſo baſely
To eate me up with ſlaves: but heaven, I thanke thee,
I hope thou haſt reſerv'd me to an end
Fit for thy creature, and worthy of thine honour:
Would all my other dangers here had ſuffered,
With what a joyfull heart ſhould I goe home then?
Wher now, heaven knows, like him that waits his ſentence
Or heares his paſſing bell; but ther's my hope ſtill.

Enter Gerrard.

Ger. Bleſſing upon you Maſter.
Flo. Thanke ye; leave me,
For by my troth I have nothing now to give thee.
Ger. Indeed I do not aske Sir, only is grieves me
To ſee ye looke ſo ſad; now goodneſſe keepe ye
From troubles in your minde.
Flo. If I were troubled
What could thy comfort do? prethee Clauſe, leave me.
Ger. Good Maſter be not angry; for what I ſay
Is out of true love to ye.
Flo. I know thou lov'ſt me.
Ger. Good Mr. blame that love then, if I prove ſo fawcy
To aske ye why ye are ſad.
Flo. Moſt true, I am ſo,
And ſuch a ſadneſſe I have got will ſinke me.
Ger. Heaven ſhield it, Sir.
Flo. Faith thou muſt looſe thy Maſter.
Ger. I had rather looſe my neck Sir: would I knew—
Flo. What would the knowledg do thee good, ſo miſerable
Thou canſt not help thy ſelfe: when all my ways (rable,
Nor all the friends I have——
Ger. You do not know Sir,
What I can doe: cures ſometimes, for mens cares
Flow, where they leaſt expect 'em.
Flo. I know thou wouldſt doe,
But fare-well Clauſe, and pray for thy poore Maſter.
Ger. I will not leave ye.
Flo. How?
Ger. I dare not leave ye,
And till ye beate me dead, I muſt not leave ye.
By what ye hold moſt precious, by heavens goodneſſe,
As your faire youth may proſper, good Sir tell me:
My minde beleeves yet ſomething's in my power
May eaſe you of this trouble.
Flo. I will tell thee
For a hundred thouſand crownes upon my credit,
Taken up of Merchants to ſupply my traffiques,

The

The windes and weather envying of my fortune,
And no returne to help me off, yet shewing
To morrow, Clause, to morrow, which must come
In sproh, thou shalt finde me poore, and broken.
Ger. I cannot blame your griefe Sir.
Flo. Now, what say'st thou?
Ger. I say you should not shrinck, for he that gave ye,
Can give you more; his power can bring ye off Sir,
When friends and all forsake ye, yet he sees you.
Flo. That's all my hope.
Ger. Hope still Sir, are you tide
Within the compasse of a day, good Master,
To pay this masse of money?
Flo. Ev'n to morrow;
But why do I stand mocking of my misery?
Is't not enough the floods, and friends forget me?
Ger. Will no lesse serve?
Flo. What if it would?
Ger. Your patience,
I do not aske to mock ye: 'tis a great sum,
A sum for mighty men to start, and stick at;
But not for honest: have ye no friends left ye,
None that have felt your bounty? worth this duty?
Flo. Duty? thou know'st it not.
Ger. It is a duty,
And as a duty, from those men have felt ye,
Should be return'd againe: I have gain'd by ye,
A daily meanes these seven yeares you have shown'd me,
Will halfe supply your want.
Flo. Why do'st thou foole me?
Can'st thou worke miracles?
Ger. To save my Master,
I can worke this.
Flo. Thou wilt make me angry with thee.
Ger. For doing good?
Flo. What power hast thou?
Ger. Enquire not:
So I can do it, to preserve my Master;
Nay if it be three parts.
Flo. O that I had it,
But good Clause, talke no more, I feele thy charity,
As thou has felt mine: but alas!
Ger. Distrust not.
'Tis that that quenches ye: pull up your spirit,
Your good, your honest, and your noble spirit;
For if the fortunes of ten thousand people
Can save ye, rest assur'd; you have forgot Sir,
The good ye did, which was the power you gave me;
Ye shall now know the King of Beggars treasure:
And let the windes blow as they please, the Seas roare,
Yet, here to morrow, you shall finde your harbour:
Here faile me not, for if I live I'le fit ye.
Flo. How faine I would believe thee.
Ger. If I ly Master,
Believe no man hereafter.
Flo. I will trye thee,
But he knowes, that knowes all.
Ger. Know me to morrow,
And if I know not how to cure ye, kill me;
So passe in peace, my best, my worthiest Master. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Hubert like a Huntesman.

Hub. Thus have I stolne away disguiz'd from Hemskirck,
To try these people, for my heart yet tells me
Some of these Beggars, are the men I looke for Appearing like my selfe, they have no reason
(Though my intent is faire, my maine end honest)
But to avoyde me narrowly, that face too,
That womans face, how neere it is: o may it
But prove the same, and fortune how I'le blesse thee;
Thus, sure they cannot know me, or suspect me,
If to my habit I but change my nature;
As I must do; this is the wood they live in,
A place fit for concealement: where, 'till fortune
Crowne me with that I seeke, I'le live amongst 'em. Exit.

Enter Higgen. Prig. Ferret. Gypsy, and the rest of the Boores.

Hig. Come bring 'em out, for here we sit in justice:
Give to each one a cudgell, a good cudgell:
And now attend your sentence, that you are rogues,
And mischeivous base rascalls, (ther's the point now,)
I take it, is confess'd.
Prig. Deny it if you dare knaves.
Boores. We are Rogues Sir.
Hig. To amplify the matter then rogues as ye are,
And lamb'd, ye shall be ere we leave ye.
Boores. Yes Sir.
Hig. And to the open handling of our justice,
Why did ye this upon the proper person
Of our good Master? were you drunk when you did it?
Boores. Yes indeed were we.
Prig. You shall be beaten sober.
Hig. Was it for want you undertooke it?
Boores. Yes Sir.
Hig. You shall be swing'd aboundantly.
Prig. And yet for all that,
You shall be poore rogues still.
Hig. Has not the Gentleman,
Pray marke this point Brother Prig, that noble Gentleman
Releiv'd ye often, found ye meanes to live by,
By imploying some at Sea, some here, some there,
According to your callings?
Boores. 'Tis most true Sir.
Hig. Is not the man, an honest man?
Boores. Yes truly.
Hig. A liberall Gentleman? and as ye are true rascalls
Tell me but this, have ye not been drunk, and often,
At his charge?
Boores. Often, often.
Hig. Ther's the point then,
They have cast themselves, brother Prig.
Prig. A shrew'd point Brother.
Hig. Brother, proceed you now; the cause is open,
I am some what weary.
Prig. Can you do these things?
You most abhominable stinking Rascalls,
You turnip-eating Rogues.
Boores. We are truly sorry.
Prig. Knock at your hard harts Rogues, and presently
Give us a signe you feele compunction,
Every man up with's cudgell, and on his neighbour
Bestow such almes, 'till we shall say sufficient,
For there your sentence lyes without partiality;
Either of head, or hide, Rogues, without sparing,
Or we shall take the paines to beat you dead else:
You shall know your doom.
Hig. One, two, and three about it.
Prig. That fellow in the blew, has true compunction,
He beates his fellowes bravely, oh, well struck boyes,

Enter Gerrard.

Hig. Up with that blew breech, now prayes he the Diuell (well;
So get ye home, drink small beere, and be honest,
Call in the Gentleman.

Ger. Do, bring him presently,
His cause I'le heare my selfe.
Enter Hemskirck.
Hig. Prig. With all due reverence,
We do resigne Sir.
Ger. Now huffing Sir, what's your name?
Hem. What's that to you Sir?
Ger. It shall be ere we part.
Hem. My name is Hemskirk,
I follow the Earle, which you shall feele.
Ger. No threatning,
For we shall coole you Sir; why did'st thou basely
Attempt the murder of the Merchant Goswin?
Hem. What power hast thou to aske me?
Ger. I will know it.
Or flea thee till thy paine discover it.
Hem. He did me wrong, base wrong.
Ger. That cannot save ye,
Who sent ye hither? and what further villanies
Have ye in hand?
Hem. Why would'st thou know? what profit,
If I had any private way, could rise
Out of my knowledge, to do thee commodity?
Be sorry for what thou hast done, and make amends foole
I'le talke no further to thee: nor these rascalls.
Ger. Tye him to that tree.
Hem. I have told you whom I follow.
Ger. The Divell you should do, by your villanies,
Now he that has the best way, wring it from him.
Hig. I undertake it: turne him to the Sun boyes;
Give me a fine sharpe rush, will ye confesse yet? (me
Hem. Ye have rob'd me already, now you'le murder
Hig. Murder your nose a little: does your head purge
To it againe, 'twill do ye good. (Sir?
Hem. Oh,
I cannot tell you any thing.
Ger. Proceed then.
Hig. Ther's maggots in your nose, I'le fetch em out Sir.
Hem. O my head breakes.
Hig. The best thing for the rhewme Sir,
That falls into your worships eyes.
Hem. Hold, hold.
Ger. Speake then.
Hem. I know not what.
Hig. It lyes in's braine yet,
In lumps it lyes, I'le fetch it out the finest;
What pretty faces the foole makes? heigh!
Hem. Hold,
Hold, and I'le tell ye all, looke in my doublet;
And there within the lining in a paper,
You shall finde all.
Ger. Go fetch that paper hither,
And let him loose for this time.
Enter Hubert.
Hub. Good ev'n my honest freinds.
Ger. Good ev'n good fellow.
Hub. May a poore huntsman, with a merry hart,
A voyce shall make the forrest ring about him,
Get leave to live amongst ye? true as steele, boyes?
That knowes all chases, and can watch all howres,
And with my quarter staffe, though the Divell bid stand,
Deale such an almes, shall make him roare again? (walkes
Prick ye the fearefull hare through crosse wayes, sheepe
And force the crafty Reinald climb the quicksetts;
Rouse ye the lofty Stag, and with my bell-horne,
Ring him a knell, that all the woods shall mourne him,
'Till in his funerall teares, he fall before me?
The Polcat, Marterne, and the rich skin'd Lucerne,
I know to chase, the Roe, the winde out-stripping
Isgrin himselfe, in all his bloody anger;
I can beate from the bay, and the wild Sounder
Single, and with my arm'd staffe, turne the Boare,
Spight of his tomy tushes, and thus strike him;
'Till he fall downe my feast.
Ger. A goodly fellow.
Hub. What mak'st thou here, ha?
Ger. We accept thy fellowship.
Hub. Hemskirck, thou art not right I feare, I feare thee.
Enter Ferret. a letter.
Fer. Here is the paper: and as he said we found it.
Ger. Give me it, I shall make a shift yet, old as I am
To finde your knavery: you are sent here, Sirra
To discover certaine Gentlemen, a spy-knave
And if ye finde 'em, if not by perswasion
To bring 'em back, by poyson to dispatch 'em.
Hub. By poyson, ha?
Ger. Here is an other, Hubert;
What is that Hubert Sir?
Hem. You may perceive there.
Ger. I may perceive a villany and a ranke one,
Was he joyn'd partner of thy knavery?
Hem. No.
He had an honest end, would I have had so,
Which makes him scape such cut throates.
Ger. So it seemes,
For here thou art commanded, when that Hubert
Has done his best and worthiest service, this way
To cut his throat, for here he's set downe dangerous.
Hub. This is most impious.
Ger. I am glad we have found ye,
Is not this true?
Hem. Yes? what are you the better;
Ger. You shall perceive Sir, ere you get your fredome:
Take him aside, and friend, we take thee to us,
Into our company, thou dar'st be true unto us?
Hig. I, and obedient too?
Hub. As you had bred me.
Ger. Then take our hand: thou art now a servant to us,
Welcom him all.
Hig. Stand off, stand off: I'le do it,
We bid yee welcome three wayes; first for your person,
Which is a promising person, next for your quallity,
Which is a decent, and a gentle quality,
Last for the frequent meanes you have to feed us,
You can steale 'tis to be presum'd.
Hub. Yes, venson,
Or if I want ——
Hig. 'Tis well you understand right,
And shall learne dayly: you can drink too?
Hub. Soundly.
Hig. And ye dare know a woman from a weathercock?
Hub. Yes, if I handle her.
Ger. Now sweare him.
Hig. You are welcom Brother. (keeping
All. Welcom, welcom, welcom, but who shall have the
Of this fellow?
Hub. Thank ye friends,
And I beseech ye, if you dare but trust me;
For if I have kept wilde doggs and beastes for wonder,
And made 'em tame too: give into my custody
This roaring rascall I shall hamper him,
With all his knacks and knaveryes, and I feare me
Discover yet a further villany in him;
O he smells ranck 'oth rascall.
Ger. Take him to thee,
But if he scape ——

Hub. Let

Hub. Let me be ev'n hang'd for him,
Roome Sir, I'le tye ye to my leaſh.
Hem. A way Raſcall.
Hub. Be not ſo ſtubborne: I ſhall ſwindge ye ſoundly,
And ye play tricks with me.
Ger. Now ſweare him.
Hig. I crowne thy nab, with a gag of benbouſe,
And ſtall thee by the ſalmon into the clowes,
To mand on the pad, and ſtrike all the cheates;
To nill from the Ruffmans, commition and ſlates,
Twang dell's, i' the ſtiromell, and let the Quire Cuffin:
And Herman Beck ſtrine, and trine to the Ruffin.
Ger. Now interpret this unto him.
Hig. I powre on thy pate a pot of good ale,
And by the Rogues oth a Rogue thee inſtall:
To beg on the way, to rob all thou meetes;
To ſteale from the hedge, both the ſhirt and the ſheetes:
And lye with thy wench in the ſtraw till ſhe twang,
Let the Conſtable, Iuſtice, and Divell go hang.
Ger. So, now come in,
But ever have an eye Sir, to your priſoner.
Hub. He muſt blinde both mine eyes, if he get from me.
Ger. Go, get ſome victualls, and ſome drink, ſome good (drink
For this day wee'le keep holly to good fortune,
Come and be frollick with us.
Hig. ye are a ſtanger. Exeunt.

Scæna quarta.

Enter Floriz. and Bereha.

Ber. Indeed yaer welcom: I have hard your ſcape,
And therefore give her leave, that onely loves you;
(Truely and dearely loves ye) give her joy leave,
To bid ye welcom: what'ſt makes you ſad man?
Why do you looke ſo wilde? is't I offend ye?
Be ſtrew my heart, not willingly.
Flo. No Jertred.
Ber. Is't the delay of that ye' long have look'd for,
A happy marriage? now I come to urge it:
Now when ye pleaſe to finiſh it.
Flo. No newes yet?
Ber. Do you heare Sir?
Flo. Yes.
Ber. Do you love me?
Flo. Have I liv'd,
In all the happineſſe fortune could ſeat me,
In all mens faire opinions?
Ber. I have provided
A Prieſt, that's ready for us.
Flo. And can the Divell,
In one ten dayes, that Divell chance devour me?
Ber. Wee'le fly to what place you pleaſe.
Flo. No ſtar proſperous?
All at a ſwoope?
Ber. You do not love me Gofwin?
You will not looke upon me?
Flo. Can mens prayers
Shot up to heaven, with ſuch a zeale as mine are,
Fall back like lazy miſts, and never proſper?
Geyves, I muſt weare, and cold muſt be my comfort;
Darkneſſe, and want of meat; alas ſhe weepes too,
Which is the top of all my ſorrowes, Jertred.
Ber. No, no, you will not know me; my poore beauty,
Which has been worth your eyes.
Flo. The time growes on ſtill:
And like a tumbling wave, I ſee my ruine,
Come rolling over me.
Ber. Yet will ye know me?
Flo. For a hundred thouſand crownes.
Ber. Yet will ye love me?
Tell me but how I have deſerv'd your ſlighting.
Flo. For a hundred thouſand crownes?
Ber. Farewell diſſembler.
Flo. Of which I have ſcarce ten: ô how it ſtarts me.
Ber. And may the next you love, hearing my ruine.
Flo. I had forgot my ſelfe, ô my beſt Jertred,
Crowne of my joyes, and comforts.
Ber. ſweet what ayle ye?
I thought you had been vext with me.
Flo. My minde wench,
My minde o're flow'd with ſorrow, ſunck my memory.
Ber. Am I not worthy of the knowledge of it?
And cannot I as well affect your ſorrowes,
As your delights? you love no other woman?
Flo. No I proteſt.
Ber. You have no ſhips loſt lately?
Flo. None that I know of.
Ber. I hope you have ſpilt no blood: whoſe innocence
May lay this on your conſcience.
Flo. Cleare, by heaven.
Ber. Why ſhould you be thus then?
Flo. Good Jertred, aske not,
Ev'n By the love you beare me.
Ber. I am obedient.
Flo. Go in my faire; I will not be long from ye,
Nor long I feare me with thee, At my returne
Deſpiſe me as you pleaſe.
Ber. The good gods guide ye. Exit.
Flo. Now for my ſelfe which is the leaſt I hope for,
And when that failes, for mans worſt fortune, pitty. Exit.

Actus Quartus Scæna prima.

Enter Floriz. and 4. Merchants.

Flo. WHy Gentlemen, 'tis but a week more I intreat (you
But 7. ſhort daies, I am not runnig from ye,
Nor, if you give me patience, is it poſſible
All my adventures faile; you have ſhips abroad,
Endure the beating both of winde, or weather:
I am ſure 'twould vex your hearts, to be proteſted
Ye are all falſe Merchants,
1. Mer. Yes, and muſt have faire play;
There is no lying here elſe, one howres failing
Failes us of all our friends, of all our credits:
For my part I would ſtay, but my wants tell me,
I muſt wrong others in't.
Flo. No mercy in ye?
2. Mer. 'Tis fooliſh to depend on others mercy:
Keepe your ſelfe right, and even out your cloth Sir,
According to your calling: you have liv'd there
In Lordlike prodigality, high, and open,
And now ye finde what 'tis: the liberall ſpending
The ſummer of your youth, which you ſhould gleane in,
And like the labouring Ant, make uſe and gaine of,
Has brought this bitter ſtormy winter on ye,
And now you cry.
3. Mer. Alas before your poverty,
We were no men, of no ſtrength, no endeavours
You

You ſtood alone, tooke up all trade, all buſineſs,
Running through your hands, ſcarce a ſayle at Sea,
But loaden with your goods: we poore weak pedlers,
When by your leave, and much intreaty to it:
We could have ſtoage for a little cloth,
Or a few wines, put of and thanke your worſhip
Lord, how the world's chang'd with ye? now I hope Sir,
We ſhall have ſea-roome
Flo. Is my miſery,
Become my ſcorne too? have ye no humanity,
No part of men left? are all the bountyes in me
To you, and to the Towne, turn'd my reproaches?
4. Mer. Well, get your monyes ready: 'tis but 2. howres
We ſhall proteſt ye elſe, and ſodainly.
Flo. But two dayes.
1. Mer. Not an howre, ye know the hazard. Exit.
Flo. How ſoone my light's put out: hard harted Bruges;
Within thy walls, may never honeſt Merchant
Venture his fortunes more: O my poore wench too;

Enter Gerrard.

Ger. Good fortune Maſter.
Flo Thou miſtak'ſt me Clauſe,
I am not worth thy bleſſing.
Ger. Stil a ſad man?

Enter Higgen. and Prig. like Porter.

No beliefe gentle Maſter? come bring it in then,
And now believe your Beadeſman.
Flo. Is this certaine?
Or do'ſt thou work upon my troubled ſence?
Ger. 'Tis gold Sir,
Take it and try it.
Flo. Certainely 'tis treaſure,
Can there be yet this bleſſing?
Ger. Ceaſe your wonder,
You ſhall not ſinke, for nev'r a ſowſt Flap-dragon:
For nere a pickell'd pilcher of 'em all Sir,
'Tis there your full ſumm, a hundred thouſand crownes,
And good ſweet Maſter, now Be merry; pay 'em
Pay the poore pelting knaves, that know no goodneſſe:
And cheere your heart up handſomely.
Flo. Good Clauſe,
How cam'ſt thou by this mighty ſumm? if naughtily—
I muſt not take it of thee, 'twill undo me.
Ger. Feare not: you have it by as honeſt meanes
As though your father gave it: Sir, you know not
To what a maſſe, the little we get dayly,
Mounts in ſeven yeares; we beg it for heavens charity,
And to the ſame good, we are bound to render it.
Flo. What great ſecurity?
Ger. Away with that Sir,
Were not ye more then all the men in Bruges;
And all the money in my thoughts———,
Flo. But good Clauſe,
I may dye preſently.
Ger. Then this dyes with ye-
Pay when you can good Maſter, I'le no parchments,
Onely this charity I ſhall intreat ye,
Leave me this Ring.
Flo. Alas, it is to poore Clauſe.
Ger. 'Tis all I aske, and this with all, that when
I ſhall deliver this back, you ſhall grant me
Freely one poore petition.
Flo. There I confeſſe it,
And may my faith forſake mee when I ſhun it.
Ger. Away, your time drawes on. Take up the money
And follow this young Gentleman.
Flo. Farewell Clauſe,
And may thy honeſt memory live ever.
Ger. Heaven bleſſe ye and ſtill keep ye, farewell Maſter
Exeunt.

How will ye kiſſe me, pray you?
Hub. Thus: ſoft as my loves lips.
Jac. Oh!
Hub. What's your Fathers name?
Jac. He's gone to heaven.
Hub. Is it not Gerrard, ſweet?
Jac. I'le ſtay no longer,
My mother's an olde woman, and my Brother
Was drown'd at ſea, with catching Cockles. O love:
O how my heart melts in me: how thou fir'ſt me!
Hub. 'Tis certain ſhe: pray let me ſee your hand, ſweet,
Jac. No, no, you'l bite it.
Hub. Sure I ſhould know that Gymmall;
Jac. 'Tis certaine he: I had forgot my ring too.
O Hubert, Hubert.
Hub. Ha? me-thought ſhe nam'd me—
Doe you know me, Chicke?
Jac. No indeed, I never ſaw ye,
But me-thinks you kiſſe finely.
Hub. Kiſſe againe then;
By heaven 'tis ſhe.
Jac. O what a joy he brings me.
Hub. You are not Minche?
Jac. Yes pretty Gentleman,
And I muſt be married to morrow to a Capper.
Hub. Muſt ye my ſweet, and doe's the Capper love ye?
Ja. Yes, yes, he'l give me pye, & look in mine eys thus:
Tis he: 'tis my deare Love; O bleſt fortune.
Hub. How fain ſhe would conceal her ſelfe yet ſhew it,
Will ye love me, and leave that man? I'le ſerve.
Jac. O I ſhall looſe my ſelfe.
Hub. I'le waite upon ye,
And make ye dainty Noſe-gayes.
Jac. And where will ye ſticke 'em?
Hub. Here in boſome, and make a crown of Lillies
For your faire head.
Jac. And will ye love me, deed-law?
Hub. With all my heart.
Jac. Call me to morrow then,
And we'l have brave chear, and goe to Church together:
Give you good even Sir.
Hub. But one word faire Minche.
Jac. I muſt be gone a milking.
Hub. Ye ſhall preſently.
Did you never heare of a young Maid called Jaculine?
Ja. I am diſcovered: hark in your eare, I'le tell ye;
You muſt not know me: kiſſe and be conſtant ever.
Hub. Heaven curſe me elſe: tis ſhe, and now I am certain
They are all here: now for my other project.— Exeunt.

1. Mer. Nay, if it would ha pon courtesy.
Flo. None at all Sir;
Take it 'tis yours: ther's your ten thousand for ye,
Give in my Bills your fumme.
3. Mer. Pray be plea'd Sir,
To make a further use.
Flo. No,
3. Mer. What I have Sir,
You may command; pray let me be your Servant.
Flo. Put your hatts on: I care not for your courtisies,
They are most untimely don, and no truth in 'em.
2. Mer. I have a frought of pepper.
Flo. Rot your pepper,
Shall I trust you againe? ther's your seven thousand.
4. Mer. Or if you want fine sugar, 'tis best landing.
Flo. No, I can send to Barbary, those people
That never yet knew faith, have noble freedoms:
These carry to Vanlock, and take my Bills in
To Peter Zuten these: bring back my Jewells,
Why are these peices?

Enter Saylor.

Saylor. Health to the noble Merchant,
The Susan is return'd.
Flo. Well?
Say. Well, and rich Sir,
And now put in.
Flo. Heaven thou hast heard my prayers.
Say. The brave Rebecca too: bound from the straights,
With the next tide is ready to put after.
Flo. What newes o'th' fly-boate?
Say. If this winde hold till midnight,
She will be here, and wealthy, scap't fairely.
Flo. How, pre'thee Saylor?
Say. Thus Sir, she had fight
Seven howers together, with six Turkish Gallyes,
And she fought bravely: but at length was boorded:
And over lai'd with strength: when presently
Comes boring up the winde Captaine Van-noke,
That valiant Gentleman, you redeem'd from prison;
He knew the Boate, set in: and fought it bravely:
Beate all the Gallies off, sunk three, redeem'd her,
And as a service to ye, sent her home Sir.
Flo. An honest noble Captaine, and a thankfull;
Ther's for thy new's: go drink the Merchants health, Saylor
Say. I thanke your bounty, and I'le do it to a doyt, Sir,

Exit Saylor.

1. Mer. What miracles are powr'd upon this fellow?
Flo. This ye are I hope my friends, I shall scape prison,
For all your cares to catch me.
2. Mer You may please Sir
To think of your poor servants in displeasure,
Whose all they have, goods, monyes, are at your service.
Flo. I thank you,
When I have need of you I shall forget you:
You are paid I hope.
All. We joy in your good fortunes.

Enter Van-donck.

Van-d. Come Sir, come take your ease you must go
With mee, yonder is one weepes and howles. (home
Flo. Alas how does she?
Van-d. She will be better soone I hope.
Flo. Why soone sir?
Van-d. Why when you have her in your armes, this night,
My boy she is thy wife
Flo. With all my hart I take her.
Van-d. We have prepar'd, all thy friends will be there,
And all my Kindred shall partake to the full revell:
Thou hast been wrong'd, and no more shall my servitor,
Waite on that knave the Vicar, I have heard all,
All his bribes for thy Boy, but thou shalt have her;
Hast thou dissolv'd thy bondage?
Flo. Moll.
Van-d. By the masse Boy,
Thou tumblest now in wealth, and I joy in it,
Thou art the best Boy, that ever nourish'd
Thou hast been sad, I'le cheere thee up with Sack,
And when thou art lusty I'le fling thee to thy Mistris.
She'l hug thee, sirrah.
Flo. I long to see it,
I had forgot you: ther's for you my friends,
You had but heavy burthens, commend my love
To my fair love, all the love I have
To honest Clause, shortly I will thanke him better. Exit.
Hig. By the masse a royall Merchant,
Gold by the handfull, here will be store soone Prig.
Prig. It partly seemes so, and here will I be in a trice.
Hig. And I boy,
Away all's we are loot'd for.
Prig. Oh these bak'd meates,
Me thinkes I smell them hither.
Hig. Thy mouth waters. Exeunt.

Scæna Quarta.

Enter Hubert, and Hemskirck.

Hub. I Must not,
Hemsk. Why I'am in thy power to do it, and in mine
To reward thee to thy wishes.
Hub. I dare not, nor I will not.
Hem. Gentle Huntsman,
Though thou hast kept me hard: though in thy duty,
Which is requir'd to do it with hast usd me stubbornly;
I can forgive thee freely.
Hub. You the Earles servant.
Hemsk. I sweare I am neare as his owne thoughts to him;
Able to doe thee——
Hub. Come, come, leave your praying.
Hemsk. If thou dar'st but cry.
Hub. I thanke you hartily, you will be
The first man that will hang me, a sweet recompence,
I could do, but I do not say I will,
To any honest fellow that would thinke on't:
And be a benefactor.
Hem. If it be not recompenced, and to thy owne desires,
If within these ten dayes I do not make thee——
Hub. What, a false knave?
Hemsk. Pgethee, prethee conceive me rightly, any thing
Of profit or of place that may advance thee.
Hub. Why what a Goosecap would'st thou make me,
Do not I know that men in misery will promise
Any thing, more then their lives can reach at?
Hemsk. Beleeve me Huntsman,
There shall not one short syllable
That comes from me, passe
Without it's full performance.
Hub. Say you so Sir?

Have ye ere a good place for my quality,
Hem. A thousand Chases, Forrests, Parks: I'le make thee
Chiefe ranger over all the games.
Hub. When?
Hem. Presently. (apo.
Hub. This may provoke me: and yet to prove a knave,
Hem. 'Tis to prove honest; 'tis to do good service,
Service for him thou art sworn to, for thy Prince,
Then for thy selfe that good: what fool would live here,
Poore, and in misery, subject to all dangers,
Law, and lewd people can inflict, when bravely
And to himselfe he may be law, and credit?
Hub. Shall I believe thee?
Hem. As that thou holdst most holy.
Hub. Ye may play tricks.
Hem. Then let me never live more.
Hub. Then you shall see Sir, I will do a service
That shall deserve indeed.
Hem. 'Tis well said, hunts-man,
And thou shalt be well thought of. (seem nothing,
Hub. I will do it: 'tis not your letting free, for that's
But such a service, if the Earl be noble,
He shall for ever love me.
Hem. What are hunts-men?
Hub. Do you know any of these people live here?
Hem. No.
Hub. You are a foole then: here be those to have 'em,
I know the Earl so well, would make him caper.
Hem. Any of the old Lords that rebell'd?
Hub. Peace, all,
I know 'em every one, and can betray 'em.
Hem. But wilt thou doe this service?
Hub. If you'l keep
Your faith, and free word to me.
Hem. Wilt thou swear me?
Hub. No, no, I will beleeve ye: more then that too,
Here's the right heire.
Hem. O honest, honest hunts-man!
Hub. Now, how to get these Gallants, there's the matter,
You will be constant, 'tis no work for me else.
Hem. Will the Sun shine again?
Hub. The way to get 'em.
Hem. Propound it, and it shall be done.
Hub. No sleights;
(For they are Devillish crafty, it concerns me,)
Nor reconcilement, (for they dare not trust neither)
Must doe this tricke.
Hem. By force?
Hub. I, that must doe it.
And with the person of the Earl himselfe,
Authority (and mighty) must come on 'em:
Or else in vaine: and thus I would have ye do it.
To morrow-night be here: a hundred men will bear 'em,
(So he be there, for he's both wise and valiant)
And with his terrour will strike dead their forces,
The houre be twelve a clock, now for a guide
To draw ye without danger on these persons,
The woods being thicke, and hard to hit, my selfe
With some few with me, made unto our purpose,
Beyond the wood, upon the plain, will wait ye
By the great Oke.
Hem. I know it: keep thy faith hunts-man,
And such a showr of wealth——
Hub. I warrant ye:
Misse nothing that I tell ye.
Hem. No.
Hub. Farewell;
You have your liberty, now use it wisely;
And keep your houre, goe closer about the wood there,
For feare they spy you.
Hem. Well.
Hub. And bring no noyse with ye. (Exit.
Hem. All shall be done to'th purpose: farewel hunts-man.

Enter Gerrard, Higgen, Prig, Ginks, Snap, Ferret.

Ger. Now, what's the news in towne?
Ginks. No news, but joy Sir;
Every man wooing of the noble Merchant,
Who has his hearty commendations to ye.
Fer. Yes, this is news, this night he's to be married.
Ginks. By'th masse that's true, he marryes Vandunks
The dainty black-ey'd bell. (daughter
Hig. I would my clapper
Hung in his baldricke, what a peale could I ring?
Ger. Married?
Gin. This very time Sir, o'the pyes,
The gilding hot mince pyes.
Prig. O the Plum-pottage, (boys,
Hig. For one leg of a goose now would I venture a limb
I love a fat goose, as I love allegiance,
And——in——again the Boare, too well they know it,
And therefore fear we their powdry.
Ger. To be married
To Vandunks daughter?
Hig. O this doulous Merchant:
What sport he will keep? but hark ye brother Prig,
Shall we do nothing in the fore-said wedding?
Ther's money to be got, and meate I take it,
What thinke ye of a wastell?
Prig. No, by no meanes,
That goes no further then the street, there leaves us,
Now we must think of something that must draw us
Into the bowels of it, into'th buttery,
Into the Kitchin, into the Cellar, something
That shee old drunken Burgo-master loves,
What think ye of a wastell?
Hig. I think worthily.
Prig. And very fit it should be, thou, and Ferret,
And Ginks to sing the Song: I for the structure,
Which is the bowle.
Hig. Which must be up-ley English,
Strong, lusty London beer; let's think more of it,
Ger. He must not marry.

Enter Hubert.

Hub. By your leave in private,
One word Sir, with ye; Gerrard: do not stare me,
I know ye, and he knows ye, that best loves ye:
Hubert speakes to ye, and you must be Gerrard,
The time invites you to it.
Ger. Make no show then,
I am glad to see you Sir: and I am Gerrard.
How stands affaires?
Hub. Faire, if ye dare now follow,
Hewskirke I have let goe, and these my causes,
I'le tell ye privately, and how I have wrought him,
And then to prove me honest to my friends,
Looke upon these directions; you have seen his.
Hig. Then will I speak a speech, and a brave speech
In praise of Merchants, where's the Ape
Prig. ——Take him,
A gowty Beare, ward stole him the other day.
Hig. May his Beares worry him, that Ape had paid it,
What dainty tricks? ——o' that wanton Bear-ward:
In his french doublet, with his baster'd bullions,
In a long stock ty'd up, o how daintily
Would I have made him waite, and change a trencher,
Cary a cup of wine? ten thousand stinks
Waite on thy mangy soule, thou lowzy Bear-ward.

Ger. 'Tis

Ger. Tis passing well, I both beleeve and joy in't
And will be ready ; keepe you here the meane while,
And keepe this in, I must a while forsake ye,
Upon mine anger no man stir, this two houres.
Hig. Not to the wedding sir?
Ger. Not any whither.
Hig. The wedding must be seene sir ; we want meat too,
VVe be monstrous out of meat.
Prig. Shall it be spoken,
Fatt Capon shak't their tailes at's in defiance?
And turkey toombs such honorable monuments,
Shall piggs, sir, that the Persons selfe would envy,
And deintie Ducks?
Ger. Not a word more, obey me. Exit Ger.
Hig. VVhy thencome dolefull death, this is flat tyrany
And by this hand ——
Hub. VVhat?
Hig. Ile goe sleepe upon't. Exit Hig.
Prig. Nay, and there be a wedding, and we wanting Farewell our happie daies: we doe obey sir. Exeunt.

Scena Quinta.

Enter two young Merchants.

1. Mer. VVell met sir, you are for this lusty wedding.
2. Mer. I am so, so are you I take it.
1. Mer. Yes,
And it much glads me, that to doe him service
Who is the honour of our trade, and luster,
VVe meet thus happily.
2. Mer. He's a noble fellow,
And well becomes a bride of such a beauty.
1. Mer. She is passing faire indeed, long may their loves
Continue like their youths, in spring of sweetnesse,
All the young Merchants will be here
No doubt on't,
For he that comes not to attend this wedding
The curse of a most blind one fall upon him,
A lowd wife, and a lazie: here's Vanlock.

Enter Vanlock and Francis.

Vanl. VVell overtaken gentlemen: save ye. (cit,
1. Mer. The same to you sir; save ye faire Mistris Fran-
I would this happie night might make you blush too.
Vanl. She dreames a pace,
Fran. That's but a drowsie fortune.
3. Mer. Nay take us with ye too; we come to that end,
I am sure ye are for the wedding.
Vanl. Hand and heart man:
And what their feet can doe, I could have tript it
Before this whorson gout

Enter Gerrard.

Ger. Blesse ye Masters. (Master,
Vanl. Clause? how now Clause; thou art come to see thy

Enter Florez.

Vanl. He's heere himselfe.
Flo. Stand at the doore my friends? I pray walke in: welcome faire Mistris Francis,
See what the house affords, ther's a young Lady
VVill bid you welcome,
Vanl. VVe joy your happinesse. Exit.
Flo. I hope it will be so: Clause nobly welcome,
My honest, my best friend, I have been carefull
To see thy monys ——.
Ger. Sir, that brought not me,
Do you know this Ring againe?
Flo. Thou hadst it of me. (me
Ger. And do you well remember yet, the boone you gave Upon returne of this?
Flo. Yes, and I grant it,
Be it what it will: aske what thou can'st, I'le do it;
Within my power.
Ger. Ye are not married yet
Flo. No,
Ger. Faith I shall aske you that that will disturb ye,
But I must put ye to your promise.
Flo. Do,
And if I faint and flinch in't ——
Ger. Well said Master,
And yet it grieves me too: and yet it must be.
Flo. Prethee distrust me not.
Ger. You must not marry,
That's part of the power you gave me: which to make up,
You must presently depart, and follow me.
Flo Not marry Clause?
Ger. Not if you keep your promise,
And give me power to aske.
Flo. Pre'thee thinke better,
I will obey, by heaven.
Ger. I have thought the best Sir.
Flo. Give me thy reason, do'st thou feare her honesty?
Ger. Chaste as the yce, for any thing I know, Sir.
Flo. Why should'st thou light on that then? to what (purpose?
Ger. I must not now discover.
Flo. Must not marry?
Shall I breake now when my poore hart is pawn'd?
When all the preparation?
Ger. Now or never. (fright me
Flo. Come, 'tis not that thou would'st: thou dost but
Ger. Upon my soule it is Sir, and I binde ye.
Flo. Clause, can'st thou be so cruell?
Ger. You may breake Sir,
But never more in my thoughts, appeare honest.
Flo. Did'st ever see her?
Ger. No:
Flo. She is such a thing,
O Clause, she is such a wonder, such a mirror,
For beauty, and faire vertue, Europe has not:
Why hast thou made me happy, to undo me?
But looke upon her; then if thy heart relent not,
I'le quit her presently, who waites there?
Ser. within. Sir.
Flo. Bid my faire love come hither, and the company,
Pre'thee be good unto me; take a mans hart
And looke upon her truly: take a friends hart
And feele what misery must follow this,
Ger. Take you a noble hart and keep your promise;
I forsooke all I had, to make you happy.

Enter Bertha. Van-donck, and the rest Merchants.

Can that thing call'd a woman, stop your goodnesse?
Flo. Looke there she is, deale with me as thou wilt now
Did'st ever see a fayrer?
Ger. She is most goodly.
Flo. Pray ye stand still.
Ber. What ayles my love?
Flo. Did'st thou ever,
By the faire light of heaven, behold a sweeter?
O that thou knew'st but love, or ever felt him,
Looke well, looke narrowly upon her beauties. (so.
1. Mer. Sure h'as some strange designe in hand, he starts

2 Mer. This Beggar has a ſtrong power over his plea-
Flo. View all her body. (ſure
Ger. 'Tis exact and excellent.
Flo. Is ſhe a thing then to be loſt thus lightly?
Her mind is ten times ſweeter, ten times nobler,
And but to heare her ſpeak, a Paradiſe,
And ſuch a love ſhe beares to me, a chaſte love,
A vertuous, faire, and fruitfull love: 'tis now too
I am ready to enjoy it; the Prieſt ready: Clauſe,
To ſay the holy words ſhall make us happy,
This is a cruelty beyond mans ſtudy,
All theſe are ready, all our joyes are ready,
And all the expectation of our friends,
Twill be her death to do it.
Ger. Let her dye then.
Flo. Thou canſt not: 'tis impoſſible.
Ger. It muſt be.
Flo. 'Twill kil me too, 'twil murder me: by heaven Clauſ
ble give thee halfe I have; come thou ſhalt ſave me.
Ger. Then you muſt goe with me: I can ſtay no longer
If ye be true, and noble.
Flo. Hard heart, I'le follow:
Pray ye all goe in againe, and pray be merry,
I have a weighty buſineſſe, give my cloake there.
Enter Servant (with a Cloake.)
Concerns my life, and ſtate; make no enquiry,
This preſent houre befalne me: with the ſooneſt

Nor our good mirth, he cannot ſtay long from her
I am ſure of that.
Flo. I will not ſtay; beleeve Sir. Exit.
Gertrud, a word with you;
Ber. Why is this ſtop, Sir?
Flo. I have no more time left me, but to kiſſe thee,
And tell thee this, I am ever thine: farewell wench. Exit.
Be. And is that all your ceremony? Is this a wedding?
Are all my hopes and prayers turnd to nothing?
Well, I will ſay no more, nor ſigh, nor ſorrow; oh me,
Till to thy face I prove thee falſe. Exit.

Actus Quintus, Scæna Prima.

That moſt ſhould tye him? 'Tis ſome other Love
That hath a more command on his affections,
And he that fetcht him, a diſguiſed Agent,
Not what he perſonated; for his faſhion
Was more familiar with him, and more powerfull
Then one that ask'd an almes: I muſt finde out
One, if not both: kind darkneſſe be my ſhrowd
And cover loves too curious ſearch in me,
For yet, ſuſpition, I would not name thee.
Boor. Miſtris, it grows ſome-what pretty and dark.
Ber. What then?
Boor. Nay, nothing; do not thinke I am afraid,
Although perhaps you are.
Ber. I am not, forward.
Boo. Sure but you are: give me your hand, fear nothing.
There's one leg in the wood, do not pull backward:
What a ſweate one on's are in, you or I?
Pray God it do not prove the plague; yet ſure
It has infected me; for I ſweat too,
It runs out at my knees, feele, feele, I pray you.
Ber. What ailes the fellow?
Boor. Hark, hark I beſech you,
Doe you heare nothing?
Ber. No.
Boor. Lyſt: a wilde hog,
He grunts: now 'tis a beare: this wood is full of em,
And now, a wolfe Miſtris, a wolfe a wolfe,
It is the howling of a wolfe.
Ber. The braying of an aſſe, is it not.
Boor. Oh, now one has me;
Oh, my left ham, farewell.
Ber. Looke to your ſhankes,
Your breech is ſafe enough, the wolfe's a Fern-beake.
Boo. But ſee, ſee, ſee. There is a ſerpent in it,
It has eyes as broad as platters; it ſpits fire;
Now it creeps towards us, help me to ſay my prayers:
It hath ſwallowed me almoſt, my breath is ſtopt,
I cannot ſpeake; do I ſpeake Miſtris? tell me.
Ber. Why, thou timorous Sot, canſt thou perceive
Any thing i'the buſh, but a poore glo-worme?
Boo. It may be tis but a glo-worm now, but 'twill
Grow to a fire-drake preſently.
Ber. Come thou from it:
I have a pretious guide of you; and a courteous
That gives me leave to lead my ſelfe the way thus.
Boor. It thunders, you heare that now.
Ber. I heare one hollow.
Boo. 'Tis thunder, thunder:
See, a flaſh of Lightning:
Are you not blaſted Miſtris? pull your maske off,
It has plaid the barber with me here: I have loſt
My beard, my beard, pray God you be not ſhaven,
'Twill ſpoile your marriage Miſtris.
Ber. What ſtrange wonders,
Feare fancies in a Coward?
Boor. Now, the earth opens.
Ber. Prethee hold thy peace.
Boor. Will you on then?
Ber. Both love and jealouſie have made me bold,
Where my fate leads me, I muſt goe. Exit.
Boor. God be with you then.
Enter Woolfort, Hemskirke, and Attendants.
Hem. It was the fellow ſure, he that ſhould guide me,
The hunt-man that did hollow us.
Woolf. Beſt make a ſtand
And liſten to his next: ha?
Hem. Who goes there?
Boor. Miſtris, I am taken.
Hem. Miſtris? look forth ſouldiers.
Woolf. What are you ſirha?
Boo. Truly all is left
Of a poore Boore, by day-light, by night no body,
You might have ſpar'd your drum, and guns, & pikes too
For I am none that will ſtand out Sir, I.
You may take me in with a walking ſticke
Enen when you pleaſe, and hold me with a pack-threed.
Hem. What woman was't you call'd to.
Boor. VVoman? none Sir.
Woolf. None? did you not name Miſtris?
Boor. Yes, but ſhee's
No woman yet! ſhe ſhould have been this night,
But that a Beggar ſtole away her Bridegroome,
VVhom we were going to make hue and cry after;

I tell

I tell you true Sir, she should ha' bin maried to day,
And was the Bride, and all; but in came Clause,
The old lame Beggar, and whips up M^r. Goswin
Under his arme, away with him as a Kite,
Or an old Fox, would swoope a way a gosling.
Hems. 'Tis she, 'tis she, 'tis she, Niece?
Ber. Ha?
Hem. She Sir,
This was a noble entrance to your fortune,
That being on the point thus to be married:
Upon her venture here: you should surprise her.
Woolf. I begin Hemskirck, to believe my fate,
Works to my ends.
Hem. Yes Sir, and this adds truth,
Unto the fellow our guide, who assur'd me Floris,
Liv'd in some Merchants shop, as Gerrard did:
I the old beggars, and that he would use
Him for the traine, to call the other forth,
All which we finde is done—That's he againe—— Againe
Woolf. Good we sent out to meet him. Halla
Hems. Heer's the Oke.
Ber. O I am miserably lost, thus falne
Into my vncles hands from all my hopes,
Can I not thinke away my selfe and dye?
O I am miserably lost; thus fallen
Into my Uncles hands, from all my hopes:
No matter now, where thou be false or no,
Goswin, whether thou love an other better;
Or me alone; or where thou keep thy vow,
And word, or that thou come, or stay: for I
To thee from henceforth, must be ever absent,
And thou to me: no more shall we come neare,
To tell our selves, how bright each other eyes were,
How soft our language, and how sweet our kisses,
Whil'st we made one our food, th' other our feast,
Not mix our soules by sight, or by a letter
Hereafter, but as small relation have,
As two new gon to in habiting a grave:
Can I not thinke away my selfe and dye?
Enter Hubert. Higgen. Prig. Ferret. Snap. Gincks. like Boores.
Hub. I like your habits well: they are safe, stand close
Hig. But what's the action we are for now? ha?
Robbing a Ripper of his fish?
Prig. Or taking,
A poultrer prisoner, without ransome, Bullyes?
Hig. Or cutting off a convoy of butter?
Fer. Or surprising a Boores ken, for granting cheates?
Prig. Or cackling cheates?
Hig. Or mergery-praters, Rogers,
And Tibs o'th the Buttry?
Prig. O' I could drive a Regiment
Of geese afore me, such a night as this
Ten leagues with my hatt, and staff, and not a hisse
Heard, or a wing of my troopes disordered.
Hig. Tell us,
If it be milling of a lag of duds,
The fetching of a back of clothes or so;
We are horribly out of linnen.
Hub. No such matter.
Hig. Let me alone for any Farmers dog,
If you have a minde to the cheese-loft: 'tis but thus:
And he is a silenc'd Mastiff, during pleasure.
Hub. Would it would please you to be silent.
Hig. Mum.
Woolf. Who's there?
Hub. A friend, the Huntsman.
Hems. O 'tis he.
Hub. I have kept touch Sir, which is the Earle of these?
Will ye know a man now?
Hems. This my Lord's the friend,
Hath undertooke the service.
Hub. If 't be worth
His Lordships thanks anon, when 'tis done
Lording, I'le looke for't, a rude woodman,
I know how to pitch my toyles, drive in my game:
And I have don't, both Floris and his Father
Old Gerrard, with Lord Arnold of Bentuisen,
Cozen, and Jaqueline, young Floris Sister;
I haue 'em all.
Wool. Thou speak'st too much, too happy,
To carry faith with it.
Hub. I can bring you
Where you shall see, and finde 'em.
Wool. We will double,
What ever Hemskirck then hath promis'd thee.
Hub. And I'le deserve it treble; what horse ha' you?
Woolf. A hundred.
Hub. That's well: ready to take
Upon surprise of 'em?
Hems. Yes.
Hub. Devide then,
Your force into five Squadrons; for there are
So many out lets, wayes, thorough the wood,
That issue from the place where they are lodg'd;
Five severall wayes, of all which passages
We must posses our selves, to round 'em in,
For by one starting hole, they'll all escape else;
I and 4. Boores here, to me will be guides,
The Squadron, where you are, my selfe will lead:
And that they may be more secure, I'le use
My wonted whoopes, and hollowes, as I were
A hunting for 'em; which will make them rest,
Careles of any noyse, and be a direction
To the other guides, how we approach 'em still.
Wool. 'Tis ordered well, and relisheth the Souldier,
Make the division Hemskirck; you are my charge
Faire one, I'le looke to you.
Boo. Shall no body need
To looke to me? I'le looke unto my selfe.
Hub. 'Tis best this, remember.
Hig. Say 'tis dog boy. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Gerrard and Floriz.

Ger. By this time Sir I hope you want no reasons
Why I broke off your marriage, for though I
Should as a Subject duely you my Prince
In things indifferent, it will not therefore
Discredit you, to acknowledge me your Father,
By harkning to my necessary counsells.
Flo. Acknowledge you my Father? Sir I do,
And may impiety, conspiring with
My other Sinnes, finde me, and sodainly
When I forget to pay you a Sonnes duty
In my obedience, and that help'd forth
With all the cheerefullnesse.
Ger. I pray you rise,
And may those powers that see and love this in you,
Reward you for it: Taught by your example
Having receiv'd the rights due to a Father,
I tender you th' allegeance of a Subject:
Which as my Prince accept of.

Flor. I

Flo. Kneele to me?
May mountaines firſt fall down beneath their valleys,
And fire no more mount upwards, when I ſuffer
An act in nature ſo prepoſterous;
I muſt o'recome in this, in all things elſe
The victory be yours: could you here read me,
You ſhould perceive how all my faculties
Triumph in my bleſt fate, to be found yours;
I am your ſon, your ſon Sir, and am prouder
To be ſo, to the Father, to ſuch goodneſſe
(Which heaven be pleas'd, I may inherit from you)
Then I ſhall ever of thoſe ſpecious titles
That plead for my ſucceſſion in the Earldome
(Did I poſſeſſe it now) left by my mother.
Ger. I do beleeve it: but—
Flo. O my lov'd Father,
Before I knew you were ſo, by inſtinct,
Nature had taught me, to look on your wants,
Not as a ſtrangers: and I know not how,
What you call'd charity, I thought the payment
Of ſome religious debt, nature ſtood bound for;
And laſt of all, when your magnificent bounty
In my low ebb of fortune, had brought in
A flood of bleſſings, though my threatning wants
And feare of their effects, ſtill kept me ſtupid,
I ſoone found out, it was no common pitty
That lead you to it.
Ger. Thinke of this hereafter
When we with joy may call it to remembrance,
There will be a time, more opportune, then now
To end your ſtory, with all circumſtances,
I add this only: when we fled from Woolfort
I ſent you into England, and there placed you
With a brave Flanders Merchant, call'd rich Goſwin,
A man ſupplyed by me unto that purpoſe,
As bound by oath never to diſcover you,
Who dying, left his name and wealth unto you
As his reputed Son, and yet receiv'd ſo;
But now, as Florez, and a Prince, remember
The countreys, and the ſubjects generall good
Muſt challenge the firſt part in your affection:
The faire maid, whom you choſe to be your wife,
Being ſo far beneath you, that your love
Muſt grant ſhee's not your equall.
Flo. In diſcent
Or borrowed glories, from dead Anceſtors,
But for her beauty, chaſtity, and all vertues
Ever remembred in the beſt of women,
A Monarch might receive from her, not give,
Though ſhe were his Crownes purchaſe; In this only
Be an indulgent Father: in all elſe,
Uſe my authority.

Enter Hubert, Hemskirke, Woolfort, Bertha and Souldiers.

Hub. Sir, here be two of 'em,
The Father and the Son, the reſt you ſhall have
As faſt as I can rouze them.
Ger. Who's this? Woolfort?
Wool. I Criple, your faigned crutches wil not help you,
Nor patch'd diſguiſe that hath ſo long conceal'd you,
It's now no ha'ting: I muſt here finde Gerrard,
And in this Merchants habit, one called Florez
Who wou'd be an Earl.
Ger. And is, wert thou a ſubject.
Flo. Is this that Traitor Woolfort?
Woolf. Yes, but you
Are they that are betraid: Hemskirke;
Ber. My Goſwin
Turn'd Prince? ô I am poorer by this greatneſſe,
Then all my former jealouſies or misfortunes.
Flo. Gertrud?
Woolf. Stay Sir, you were to day too neare her,
You muſt no more ayme at thoſe eaſy acceſſes,
Leſſe you can do't in aire, without a head,
Which ſhall be ſodainly tri'de.
Ber. O take my heart, firſt,
And ſince I cannot hope now to enjoy him,
Let me but fall a part of his glad ranſome.
Woolf. You know not your own value, that entreat
Ger. So proud a fiend as Woolfort.
VVoolf. For ſo loſt
A thing as Florez.
Flo. And that would be ſo
Rather then ſhe ſhould ſtoop againe to thee;
There is no death, but's ſweeter then all life,
When VVoolfort is to give it: O my Gertrude,
It is not that, nor Prince dome that I goe from,
It is from thee, that loſſe includeth all. (ſay ſo,
Wool. I, if my young Prince knew his loſſe, hee would VVhich that he yet may chew on, I will tell him
This is no Gertrude, nor no Hemskirks Niece,
Nor Vandoncks daughter; this is Bertha, Bertha,
The heir of Brabant, ſhe that cauſ'd the warr,
Whom I did ſteale, during my treaty there,
For your minority, to raiſe my ſelfe;
I then fore-ſeeing 'twould beget a quarrell.
That, a neceſſity of my employment,
The ſame employment, make me maiſter of ſtrength,
That ſtrength, the Lord of Flanders, ſo of Brabant,
By marrying her: which had not been to doe Sir,
She come of years, but that the expectation
Firſt of her Fathers death, retarded it,
And ſince the ſtanding out of Bruges, where
Hemskirke had hid her, till ſhe was neer loſt:
But Sir, we have recover'd her: your Mercha ntſhip
May breake, for this was one of your beſt bottoms
I thinke
Ger. Inſolent Devill!

Enter Hubert, with Jaqueline, Gynks and Coſtin.

Woolf. Who are theſe, Hemskirke?
Hem. More, more, Sir.
Flo. How they triumph in their treachery?
Hem. Lord Arnold of Bentbuſin, this Lord Coſtin,
This Jaqueline the ſiſter unto Florez. (royall,
Wol. All found? why here's brave game, this was ſport
And puts me in thought of a new kind of death for 'em.
Huntſ-man, your horn: firſt wind me Florez fall,
Next Gerrards, then his daughter Jaquelins,
Thoſe raſcalls, they ſhall dye without their rights:
Hang 'em Hemskirke on theſe trees; Ile take
The aſſay of theſe my ſelfe.
Hub. Not here my Lord,
Let 'em be broken up, upon a ſcaffold,
Twill ſhew the better when their arbour's made.
Ger. Wretch art thou not content thou haſt betraid us
But mocke us too?
Ginks. Falſe Hubert, this is monſtrous.
Wool. Hubert?
Hem. VVho, this?
Ger. Yes, this is Hubert, Woolfort,
I hope he has helpt himſelfe to a tree.
Woolf. The firſt,
The firſt of any, and moſt glad I have you Sir,
I let you goe before, but for a traine;
Is't you have done this ſervice?
Hub. As your Huntſ-man,

But now as Huberts, ſave your ſelves, I will,
The Woolf's a foote, kill, kill, kill, kill.

Enter with a drum Van-doncks, Hubert, Higgen, Prig, Fetch, Snap.

Woolf. Betray'd?
Hub. No, but well eatch'd, and I the firſt with'th.
Van-d. How do you Woolfort? Rouſe, good knave Wool:
I ſpeake it now to both our Rogue, and Hemskirke,
Rogue Hemskirke, your truſt have no neſte, this Lady
Was ſtolen by you, and tane by you, and now
Reſign'd by me, to the right owner here:
Take her my Prince.
Flo. Can this be poſſible,
Welcom my love, my ſweet, my worthy love. (& thanke
Van-d. I ha' giv'n you her twice: now keep her better
Lord Hubert, that came to me in Gerrards name,
And got me out, with my brave Boyes, to march
Like Cæſar, when he bred his Comentaryes,
So I, to end my Chronicle, came forth
Cæſar Van-doncks, & veni, vidi, vici,
Give me my Bottle, and ſet downe the drum;
You had your tricks Sir, had you? we ha' tricks too,
You ſtole the Lady?
Hig. And we led your Squadrons
Where they ha' ſcratch'd their leggs a little, with brambles,
If not their faces.
Prig. Yes, and run their heads
Againſt trees.
Hig. 'Tis Captaine Prig, Sir.
Prig. And Coronell Higgen. (leggs
Hig. We have fill'd a pitt with your people ſome with
Some with armes broken, and a neck, or two
I think be looſe.
Prig. The reſt too, that eſcap'd,
Are not yet out o'the briars,
Hig. And your horſes, Sir,
Are well ſet up in Bruges all by this time:
You looke as you were not well Sir, and would be
Shortly let blood; do you want a ſcarfe?
Van-d. A halter.
Ger. 'Twas like your ſelfe, honeſt, and noble Hubert:
Can'ſt thou behold theſe mirrors altogether,
Of thy long, falſe, and bloody uſurpation?
Thy tyrranous proſcription, and freſh treaſon?
And not ſo ſee thy ſelfe, as to fall downe
And ſinck'ing, force a grave, with thine owne guilt,
As deep as hell, to couer thee and it? (me
Woolf. No, I can ſtand: and praiſe the toyles that tooke
And laughing in them dye, they were brave ſnares.
Flo. 'Twer truer valour, if thou durſt repent
The wrongs th' haſt don, and live.
Woolf. Who, I repent?
And ſay I am ſorry? yes, 'tis the fooles langnage
And not fot Woolfort.
Van-d. Woolfort thou art a Divell,
And ſpeaks his language, oh that I had my longing
Under this rew of trees now would I hang him.
Flo. No let him live, untill he can repent,
But baniſh'd from our State, that is thy doome. (skirck
Van-d. Then hang his worthy Captaine here, this Hem-
For proſit of th' example.
Flo. No let him,
Enjoy his ſhame too: with his conſcious life,
To ſhew how much our innocence contemnes;
All practiſe from the guiltieſt, to moleſt us.
Van-d. A noble prince.
Ger. Sir, you muſt helpe to joyne
A paire of hands, as they have don their hearts here,
And to their loves with joy.
Flo. As to mine owne,
My gratious Siſter, worthieſt Brother:
Van-d. I'le go afore, and have the bon-fire made,
My fire-workes, and flap dragons, and good backrack,
With a peck of little fiſhes, to drink downe
In healthes to this day.
Hig. Slight, here be changes,
The Bells ha' not ſo many, nor ſo ſtrange big.
Prig. Our Company is grown horrible thin by it,
What think you Ferret?
Fer. Marry I do thinke,
That we might all be Lords now, if we could hand ſome
Hig. Not I if they ſhould offer it: I'le diſlodge firſt,
Remove the Buſh to another climat.
Ger. Sir, you muſt thanke this worthy Burgomaſter,
Here be friends aske to be look'd on too:
And thank'd, who though their trade, and courſe of life
Be not ſo perfect, but it may be betterd,
Have yet us'd me with curteſy, and bin true
Subjects unto me, while I was their King,
A place I know not well, how to reſigne.
Nor unto whom: But this I will entreat
Your grace, command them, follow me to Bruges;
Where I will take the care on me, to finde
Some manly, and more profitable courſe
To fit them, as a part of the Republique.
Flo. Do you heare Sirs? do ſo.
Hig. Thankes to your good grace.
Prig. To your good Lordſhip.
Fer. May you both live long. (all but Beggars.
Ger. Attend me at Van-doncks, the Burgomaſters. Ex.
Hig. Yes, to beat hemp, and be whipt twice a weeke,
Or turne the wheele, for Crab the Rope-maker:
Or learne to go along with him, his courſe;
That's a fine courſe now, i' the Common-wealth, Prig,
What ſay you to it?
Prig. It is the backwardſt courſe,
I know i'the world.
Hig. Then Higgen will ſcarce thrive by it,
You do conclude?
Prig. 'Faith hardly, very hardly.
Hig. Troth I am partly of your minde, Prince Prig;
And therefore farewell Flanders, Higgen will ſeek
Some ſafer ſhelter, in ſome other Clymat:
With this his tatterd Colony: Let me ſee
Snap, Ferret, Prig, and Higgen, all are left
O the true blood: what? ſhall we into England?
Prig. Agreed,
Hig. Then beare up bravely with your Brute my lads
Higgen hath prig'd the prancers in his dayes,
And ſold good peny-worthes; we will have a courſe,
The ſpirit of Bottom, is growne bottomleſſe.
Prig. I'le mand no more, nor cant.
Hig. Yes, your ſixpenyworth
In private, brother, ſixpence is a ſumm,
I'le ſteale you any mans dogg for
Prig. For Sixpence more,
You'l tell the owner where he is.
Hig. 'Tis right,
Higgen muſt practiſe, ſo muſt Prig to eat;
And write the Letter: and gi' the word, But now
No more, as either of theſe.
Prig. But as true Beggars,
As ere we were.
Hig. We ſtand here, for an Edilogue;
Ladyes, your bountyes firſt; the reſt will follow,

For

For womens favours, are a leading almes,
If you be pleas'd look cheerely throw your eyes:
Out at your maskes.
Prig. And let your beauties ſparkle.
Hig. So may you neer want dreſſings, Iewells, gownes
Still i' the faſhion.
Prig. Nor the men you love,
VVealth nor diſcourſe to pleaſe you.
Hig. May you Gentlemen,
Never want good freſh ſuites nor liberty.
Prig. May every Merchant here ſee ſafe his ventures.
Hig. And every honeſt Citizen his debts in.
Prig. The Lawyers gaine good Clyents.
Hig. And the Clyents good Councell.
Prig. All the Gameſters here good fortune.
Hig. The Drunkards too good wine.
Prig. The eaters meate
Fit for their taſts and pallats.
Hig. The good wives kind Husbands.
Prig. The young maides choyce of Sutors.
Hig. The Midwives merry hearts.
Prig. And all good cheere.
Hig. As you are kinde unto us and our Buſh,
We are the Beggars and your dayly Beadſmen,
And have your money, but the Almes we aske
And live by, is your Grace, give that and then
VV'eel boldly ſay our word is, Come agen.

THE

THE COXCOMBE.

Actus Primus, Scena Prima.

Enter Richardo and Viola.

Rich. LEt us make use of this stolne privacy,
And not loose time in protestation, mistris,
For twere in me a kind of breach of faith,
To say againe I love you.
Vio. Sweet speake softly
For though the venture of your love to me,
Meetes with a willing, and a full returne:
Should it arrive unto my Fathers knowledge;
These were our last discourse.
Rich. How shall he know it?
Viol. His watching cares are such, for my advancement,
That every where his eye is fix'd upon me:
This night that does afford us some small freedom,
At the request and much entreaty of,
The mistris of the house, was hardly given me:
For I am never sufferd to stir out,
But he hath spies upon me; yet I know not
You have so won upon me, that could I thinke
You would love faithfully (though to entertaine
Another thought of you, would be my death)
I should adventure on his utmost anger.
Rich. Why, do you thinke I can be false?
Vio. No faith,
You have an honest face, but if you should——
Rich. Let all the stored vengeance of heavens justice——
Vio. No more, I do believe you, the dance ended,
Which this free womans ghests have vow'd to have
Ere they depart, I will make home, and store me
With all the Iewells, Chaines, and gold are trusted
Unto my custody, and at the next corner,
To my Fathers house, before one at the farthest,
Be ready to receive me.
Rich. I desire
No bond beyond your promise, let's go in,
To talke thus much before the doore, may breed,
Suspition. Enter Mercury and Antonio talking.
Viol. Here are company too.
Rich. Away,
Those powers that prosper true and honest loves
Will blesse our undertakeings.
Vio. 'Tis my wish Sir. Exit Rich and Viol.
Mer. Nay, Sir, excuse me, I have drawne you to,
Too much expence already in my travell:
And you have been to forward in your love;
To make my wants your owne, allow me manners
Which you must grant I want, should I encrease,
The bond in which your courtisyes have tide me:
Be still consuming you, give me leave
To take mine owne wayes now; and I shall often
With willingnesse come to visit you, and then thanke you.
Ant. By this hand I could be angry, what do you thinke
Must we that have so long time, beene as one (me?
Seene Cityes, Countryes, Kingdomes, and their wonders
Beene bedfellowes, and in our various journey
Mixt all our observations, part (as if
We were 2. Carriers at 2. severall wayes,
And as the forehorse guides, cry God be with you)
Without or complement, or cerimony?
In travelers that know transalpine garbes,
Though our designes are neere so serious, friend,
It were a capitall crime; it must not be,
Nay what is more, you shall not, you ere long
Shall see my house, and finde what I call mine
Is wholly at your service.
Mer, 'Tis this tires me,
Sir I were easily woo'd if nothing else
But my will lay in the choyce, but 'tis not so
My friends and kindred that have part of me,
And such on whom my chiefest hopes depend,
Iustly expect the tender of my love
After my travell, then mine owne honesty
Tells me 'tis poore, having indifferent meanes
To keep me in my quallity and rank,
At my returne to tire anothers bounty,
And let mine owne grow lusty, pardon me.
Ant. I will not, cannot, to conclude I dare not:
Can any thing confer'd upon my friend
Be burthensome to me? for this excuse
Had I no reason else you should not leave me,
By a travellers faith you should not, I have said,
And then you know my humour, ther's no contending.
Mer. Is there no way to escape this Inundation?
I shall be drown'd with folly if I go:
And after 9. dayes men may take me up,
With my gall broken.
Ant. Are you yet resolv'd?
Mer. Wood you would spare me.
Ant. By this light I cannot
By all, that may be sworne by.
Mer. Patience helpe me;
And heaven grant his folly be not catching:
If it be, the townes undone, I now would give
A reasonable sum of gold to any sheriff,
That would but lay an execution on me,
And free me from his company; while he was abroad,
His want of witt and language kept him dumbe:
But Balaam's Asse will speake now without spurring.
Ant. Speake, have I won you?——

Enter Servant and Musitian.

Mer. You are not to be resisted.
Ser. Be ready I entreat you the dance done,
Besides a liberall reward I have,
A bottle of sherry in my power shall beget
New crotchets in your heads.
Musit. Tush feare not us, wee'le do our parts.
Ser. Go in,
Ant. I know this fellow:
Belong you to the house?
Ser. I serve the Mistris.
Ant. Pretty, and short, pray you sir then informe her,
Two Gentlemen are covetous to be honour'd,
With her faire presence.
Ser. She shall know so much,
This is a merry night with us, and forbid not

Enter Viola with a Key and a little Casket.
The night is terrible and I enclos'd
With that my vertue and my self hate most;
Darkenesse, yet must I feare that which I wish,
Some company, and every step I take
Sounds louder in my fearefull eares to night
Then ever did, the shrill and stered bell
That rang me to my prayers; the house will rise
When I unlock the doore, were it by day
I am bold enough, but then a thousand eyes
Warne me from going, might not God have made
A time for envious prying folke to sleepe
Whilst lovers met, and yet the sunne have shone?
Yet I was bold enough, to steale this key
Out of my fathers Chamber, and dare yet
Venture upon mine enemy, this night,
Arm'd onely with my love, to meet my friend.
Alas how valiant, and how fraid at once
Love makes a Virgin? I will throw this key
Back through a windowe, I had wealth enough
In Iewels with me, if I hold his love
I steale e'm for; farewell my place of birth,
I never make account to looke on thee againe;
And if there be as I have heard men say,
These houshold gods, I doe beseech them looke
To this my charge, blesse it from theeves and fire,
And keepe till happily my love I win
Me from thy doore, and hold my Father in. Exit.
Enter Richardo, Pedro, Vberto, Silvio, and Drawer with a Candle.

Vber. Now dare I speake any thing, to any body living, come whers the faule? off with it.
Ric. I have broke my wind, call you this sack? —
I wonder who made it? he was a sure workeman, for tis plaguy strong worke, is it gone round? (up yet?
Vb. Tis at the last out of my way, good boy, is the moon

As fleſh and blood can hold: I cannot back;
I threw the key within, and ere I raiſe
My Father up, to ſee his daughters ſhame,
I'le ſet me downe, and tell the Northern winde,
That it is gentler then the curling Weſt;
If it will blow me dead, but he will come;
Ifaith 'tis cold; if hee deceive mee thus,
A woman will not eaſily truſt a man. Hark what's that?

Mer. Then ſhew me the way out, I'le conſider you.
Ser. Good Lord, ſir.
Mer. If I had not an excellent tempered patience, now ſhould I breake this fellowes head, and make him underſtand were neceſſary; the onely plague of this houſe is the unhandſome love of ſervants, that neere doe their duty in the right place, but when they muſter before dinner, and ſweep the table with a wodden dagger, and then they are troubleſom too, to all mens ſhoulders, the Woodcocks fleſht agen, now I ſhall have a new ſtir.

Ant. Nay Sir you have rais'd more, that has reaſon to curſe you, and you knew all, my wifes up, and comming downe too.

Enter Wife as out of her bed.

Ant. Shee's here already; ſweet hart how ſay you by this Gentleman? he would away at midnight.
Wife. That I am ſure hee will not.
Mer. Indeed I muſt.
Mari. Good Sir let not your homely entertainement preſſe you to leave your bed at midnight; if you want, what my houſe or your towne may afford you, make it your own fault if you call not for it: pray go to bed again; let me compell you, I am ſure you have no power to denye a woman; the ayre is piercing, & to a body beaten with long travell, 'twill prove an ill Phyſitian.
Mer. If ſhe ſpeake longer I ſhall be a knaue, as ranke as ever ſweat for't; Sir if you will ſend your wife up preſently, I will either ſtay with you, d'ye marke, me or deliver you, ſo juſt a cauſe, that you your ſelfe, ſhall thruſt me out of doores, both ſuddainly and willingly.
Ant. I would faine heare that faith, pray thee go up ſweet hart, I have halfe perſwaded him, beſides, he hath ſome private buſineſſe with mee.
Mer. Good night Sir, and what content you would have, I wiſh with you. Exit.

Mer. Faith I would not have you know it, let me go, 'twill be far better for you.
Ant. Who's that, that knocks there? i'ſt not at the ſtreet doore?
Ser. Yes ſir.
Ant. Who's there, cannot you ſpeake? (me in.
Within Vio. A poore diſtreſſed maid, for gods ſake let
Mer. Let her in and me out together, 'tis but one labour, 'tis pity ſhee ſhould ſtand ith' ſtreet, it ſeemes ſhe knowes you.
Ant. There ſhee ſhall ſtand for me, you are ignorant; this is a common aſſome of the Rogues that lie about the looſe parts of the City.
Mer. As how?
Ant. To knock at doores in dead time of night, and uſe ſome fained voyce to raiſe compaſſion, and when the doores are open, in they ruſh, and cut the throats of all and take the booty, we cannot be too carefull.
Within Vi. As ever you had pity let me in, I am undone elſe.
Ant. Who are you?
Vio. My name is Viola, a Gentlewoman, that ill chance hath diſtreſſed, you know my father,
Mer. Alas, of god we'll let her in, 'tis one of the Gentlewomen were here ith' evening, I know her by her name, (poore ſoule) ſhee's cold I warrant her, let her have my warme Bed, and I'le take her fortune; come, pray come.
Ant. It is not Viola that's certaine, ſhe went home to her fathers, I am ſure,
Vio. Will not you be ſo good to let me in?
Ant. I'le be ſo good to have you whipt away if you ſtay a litle longer: Shee's gone I warrant her, now let mee know your cauſe for I will heare it, and not repent the knowing.
Mer. Since you are ſo importunate, I'le tell you, I love your wife extreamly.
Ant. Very well.
Mer. And ſo well that I dare not ſtay.
Ant. VVhy?

Mer. For

Mer. For wronging you; I know I am flesh and blood, and you have done me friendships infinite and often, that must require me honest and a true man, and I will be so or I'le breake my heart.

Ant. VVhy, you may stay for all this, me thinks.

Mer. No, though I wood be good, I am no saint, nor is it safe to try mee, I deale plainely.

Ant. Come I dare try you, do the best you can.

Mer. You shall not when I am right agen, I'le come and see you, till when, I'le use all Countryes and all meanes, but I will loose this folly, 'tis a Divell.

Ant. Is there no way to stay you?

Mer. No, unles you will have me such a villaine to you as all men shall spit at mee.

Ant. Do's she know you love her?

Mer. No I hope not, that were recompence fit for a Rogue to render her.

Ant. If ever any had a faithfull friend I am that man, and I may glory in't, this is he, that ipse, he that passes all Christendome for goodnesse, hee shall not over go me in his friendship twere recreant and base, and I'le be hang'd first, I am resolv'd, go thy wayes, a wife shall never part us, I have consider'd and I finde her nothing to such a friend as thou art; I'le speake a bold word, take your time and woe her, you have overcome me cleerely, and do what's fitting with her, you conceive mee, I am glad at hart you love her: by this light, ne're stare upon me for I will not flye from it, if you had spoken sooner, sure you had bin serv'd; Sir, you are not every man, now to your taske, I give you free leave, and the sinne is mine if there be any in it.

Mer. Hee will be hang'd before he makes this good, hee cannot be so innocent a Coxcombe, he can tell ten sure, if I had never knowne you as I have done, I might be one, as others perhaps sooner, but now 'tis impossible ther's too much good betweene us.

Ant. Well thou art een the best man—I can say no more, I am, so over joy'd, you must stay this night, and in the morning go as earely as you please, I have a toy for you.

Mer. I thought this pill would make you sicke.

Ant. But where you meane to be I must have notice,
And it must be hard by too, do you marke me?

Mer. Why? whats the matter?

Ant. There is a thing in hand.

Mer. Why? what thing?

Ant. A round one, if it take right, and you be not peevish We two will be——you would little thinke it, as famous for our friendship——

Mer. How?

Ant. If God please, as ever Damon was and Pythias or Pylades, and Orestes, or any two that ever were: do you conceive me yet?

Mer. No by my troth Sir; he will not help me up sure.

Ant. You shall anon, and for our names, I thinke they shal live after us, and be remember'd while there is a story; or I loose my aime.

Mer What a vengeance ailes hee? how do you?

Ant. Yes faith, wee two wilbe such friends as the world shall ring off.

Mer. And why is all this?

Ant. You shall enjoy my wife.

Mer. Away, away.

Ant. The wonder must begin, so I have cast it, 'twill be scurvy else, you shall not stirr a foote i'nt, pray be quiet 'till I have made it perfect.

Mer. What shall a man do with this wretched fellow? there is no mercy to be used towards him, he is not capable of any pirty, he will in spight of course be a Cuckold, And who can help it? must it begin so needs Sir?——thinke agen.

Ant. Yes marry must it, and I my selfe will woe this woman for you, do you perceive it now? ha?

Mer. Yes now I have a little sight i'th matter; o that thy head should be so monstrous, that al thy Servants hatts may hang upon't! but do you meane to do this?

Ant. Yes certaine, I will woe her, and for you, strive not against it, 'tis the overthrow of the best plott that ever was then.

Mer. Nay I'le assure you Sir, I'le do no harme, you have too much about you of your owne.

Ant. Have you thought of a place yet?

Mer. A place?

Ant. I a place where you will bide, pre'thee no more of this modesty, 'tis foolish, and we were not determinde to be absolute friends indeed, 'twere tolerable.

Mer. I have thought, and you shall heare from me.

Ant. Why? this will gaine me everlasting glory; I have the better of him, that's my comfort, good night. Exit.

Mer. Good night, well go thy wayes, thou art the tydiest wittall this day I thinke above ground, and yet thy end for all this must bee mottly. Exit.

Dorit. A Gentlevvoman vvhore, by this darkenesse I'le case her to the skin.

Tinck. Peace I say.

Viola. What feare have I endured this dismall night?
And vvhat disgrace if I vvere seene and knovvne?
In vvhich this darkenesse, onely is my friend,
That onely has undone me; a thousand curses
Light on my easy, foolish childish, love,
That durst so lightly lay a confidence
Upon a man, so many being false;

My

my wearineſſe, and weeping makes me ſleepie, I muſt lye downe.

Tin. VVhats this? a prayer, or a homilie, or a Ballad of good councell? ſhe has a gowne, I am ſure.

Dor. Lets have no pitty, for if you doe, heres that ſhall cure your whittle.

Viol. Alas what would you have? I am as miſerable as you can mak me any way.

Dor. That ſhall be tryde.

Vio. Here, take my gowne if that will doe you pleaſure.

Tin. Yes marry will it, looke in the pockets Doll, there may be birds.

Dor. They are flowne a pox goe with them, I'le have this Hatt, and this Ruffe too, I like it, now will I flouriſh like a Lady, brave I faith boy.

Vio. Y'are ſo gentle people to my ſeeming,
That by my truth I could live with you.

Tin. Could you ſo? a pretty young round wench, well bloudded, I am for her, theeves.

Dor. But by this I am not, coole your Codpiece, Rogue, or Ile clap a ſpell upon't, ſhall take your edge off with a very vengeance.

Tin. Peace horſe-fleſh, peace, Ile caſt off my Amazon, ſhe has walked too long, and is indeede notorious, ſheele fight and ſcould, and drinke like one of the worthies.

Dor. Vds pretious you young contagious whore muſt you be ticing? and is your fleſh ſo wrank ſir, that two may live upon't? I am glad to heare your corſall growne ſo luſty; he was dry foundered tother day, weenee my pampered lade of Aſia.

Vio. Good woman doe not hurt me, I am ſorry that I have given any cauſe of anger.

Dor. Either binde her quickly and come away, or by this ſteele Ile tell though I truſſe for company now could I eate her broyld, or any way, without vinegar, I muſt have her noſe.

Vio. By any thing you love beſt, good ſir, good woman.

Tin. Why her noſe Dorithy?

Dor. If I have it not and preſently and warme, I looſe that I goe withall.

Tin. Wood the Devill had that thou goeſt withall, and thee together, for ſure he got thy whelps if thou haſt any, theres thy deere dad, whore I put up your cutpurſe; an I take my ſwich up, twill be a black time with you elſe ſheth your bung whore.

Vio. Doe what you will, indeed I will not cry.

Tin. Hurt her not, if thou doſt by Ale and Beare Ile clout thy old bald braine pan, with a peece of braſſe, you bitch incarnate.

Exeunt Tinker and Dorithy.

Viola. O God to what am I reſerved, that knew not
Through all my childiſh howers and actions
More ſinne then poore imagination,
And too much loving of a faithleſſe man?
For which I am paid, and ſo, that not the day
That now is riſing to protect the harmeleſſe,
And give the innocent a ſanctuary
From theeves and ſpoylers, can deliver me
From ſhame, at leaſt ſuſpition——

Enter Valerio.

Val. Sirrah leade downe the horſes eaſily, I'le walke a foot till I be downe the hill, tis very early, I ſhall reach home betimes. How now, whoſe there?

Vio. Night thee was ever friend to lovers, yet
Has rais'd ſome weary ſoule, that hates his bed
To come and ſee me bluſh, and then laugh at me.

Val. H'ad a rude heart that did this.

Vio. Gentle ſir,
If you have that which honeſt men call pitty,
And be as far from evill as you ſhew:
Helpe a poore maide, that this night by bad fortune
Has beene thus us'd by Robbers.

Val. A pox upon his heart that would not helpe thee, this theefe was halfe a Lawyer, by his bands, how long have you bin tyed here?

Viol. Alas this hower, and with cold and feare am almoſt periſht.

Val. Where were the watch the while? good ſober Gent. they were like carefull members of the City, drawing in diligent ale and ſinging catches, while Mr. Conſtable contrived the toſts: theſe fellowes would bee more ſeverely puniſht then wandring Gipſies, that every ſtarete whipps, for if they had every one two eyes a peece more, three pots would put them out.

Viol. I cannot tell I found no Chriſtian to give me ſuccour.

Val. When they take a theefe, I'le take Orlend agen; the whiffons drinke opium in their Ale, & then they ſleep like topps; as for their bills, they onely ſerve to reach downe Bacon to make Ruffers on; now let mee know whom I have done this courteſie too, that I may thanke my early riſing for it?

Viol. Sir, All I am, you ſee.

Val. You have a name I'm ſure, and a kindred, a father, friend or ſomething that muſt owne you; ſhee's a handſome young wench; what Rogues were theſe to Rob her?

Vio. Sir you ſee all I dare reveale,
And as you are a Gent preſſe me no further;
For there begins a griefe whoſe bitterneſſe
Will breake a ſtronger heart then I have in me,
And twill but make you heavie with the hearing,
For your owne goodneſſe take deſire it not.

Val. If you would not have me enquire that, how do you live then?

Viol. How I have liv'd, is ſtill one queſtion,
Which muſt not be reſolv'd——
How I deſire to live, is in your liking,
So worthy an opinion I have of you.

Val. Is in my liking? how I pray thee? tell me, faith I'le do you any good lys in my power: ſhe has an eye would raiſe a bedrid man; come leave your feare and tell mee, thats a good wench.

Viol. Sir I would ſerve——

Val. Who wouldſt thou ſerve? doe not weepe and tell me.

Viol. Faith ſir even ſome good woman, and ſuch a wife if you be married, I doe imagine yours.

Val. Alas! thou art young and tender, let me ſee thy hand, this was neere made to waſh or wind up water, beare cloaths, or rub a floore, by this light, for one uſe that ſhall be nameleſſe, tis the beſt wanton hand that ere I look't on.

Vio. Dare you accept me ſir, my heart is honeſt,
Among your vertuous charitable deeds,
This will not be the leaſt.

Val. The

Val. Thou canst in a Chamber.

Vio. In a Chamber sir.

Val. I meane waite there upon a Gentlewoman,
How quick she is, I like that mainely too;
Ile have her, though I keepe her with maine strength
like a besieged towne, for I know I shall have the enemy
afore me within a weeke.

Viol. Sir I can sow too, and make pretty laces,
Dresse a head handsome, teach young gentlewomen,
For in all these I have a little knowledge.

Val. Tis well, no doubt I shall encrease that knowledge; I like her better still, how she provokes me; pritty
youngmaid you shall serve a good Gentlewoman, though
I say't that will not be unwilling you should please mee,
nor I forgetfull if you doe.

Viol. I am the happier.

Val. My man shall make some shift to carry you behind him, can you ride well?

Viola. But I'le hold fast for catching of a fall.

Val. That's the next way to pull another on you, I'le worke her as I go I know shee's wa x, now, now, at this time could I begett a worthy on this wench. (tenfold

Viol. Sir for this Gentlenesse, may heaven requite you

Val. Tis a good vvench hovv ever others use thee, be sure I'le bee a loving master to thee, come. Exeunt.

Enter Antonio like an Irish Footman, with a letter.

Ant. I hope I am vvilde enough for being knovvne I have vvrit a letter here, and in it have abus'd my selfe most bitterly, yet all my feare is not enough, for that must do it, that must lay it on, I'le vvin her out i'th flint, vvill be more famous, novv for my language.

Enter Servingman.

Ser. Now Sir vvho vvould you speake vvith? (her.

Ant. Where be thy Mastres man? I vvould speake vvith

Ser. Cannot I deliver it?

Ant. No by my trot and fait can'st thou not man.

Ser. Well Sir I'le call her to you, pray shake your eares vvithout a little. Exit. Servingman.

Ant. Cran a Cree do it quickly; this rebbell tonge sticks in my teeth vvorse then a toughe hen, sure it vvas nere knovvne at Babell, for they soul'd no apples, and this vvas made for certaine at the first planting of Orchards
'tis so crabbed.

Enter. Wife, and servingman.

Mar. Whats he wood speake with me?

Ser. A kill kenny ring, there he stands Madam.

Mar. What would you have with me, friend?

Ant. He has a letter for other women, wilt thou read it.

Mar. From whence?

Ant. De Crosse creest from my Master.

Mar. Who is your Master?

Ant. I pray do you looke.

Mar. Doe you know this fellow?

Ser. No Maddam not I; more then an Irish footman stand further friend, I doe not like your roperunners,
what stallion Rogues are these, to weare such dovvsetts,
the very Cotton may commit adultery.

Mar. I cannot find whose hand this should be, Ile reade, to the beauteous vvife of Don Antonio, sure this is some blind scrib —— vvell novv vvhat follovves?

Ant. Pray God it take, I have given her, that will stirr her conscience, how it workes with her; hope if it be thy will let the flesh have it.

Mar. This is the most abhord, intollerable knavery, that ever slave entertain'd, sure there is more then thine
owne head in this villany, it goes like practic'd mischeife, disabled in his body? o good God, as I live he lyes feare-fully, and basely, ha? I should know that lewell, 'tis my husband, come hither shat, are you an Irish man?

Ant. Sweete woman a Cree I am an Irish man.

Mar. Now I know it perfectly; is this your trick Sir? I'le trick you for it; how long have you serv'd this Gentleman?

Ant. Please thee a little day, o my Mac dermond put me
to my mastree, 'tis don I know.

Mar. By my faith he speakes as well as if he had been lousy for the language a yeare or two; well Sir, you had bin better have kept your owne shape as I will use you, what have I don that should deserve this tryall, I never made him cuckold to my knowledge, Sirrah com hither.

Ant. Now will she send some lewell, or some letter
I know her minde as well; I shall be famous.

Mar. Take this Irish bawde heere.

Ant. How?

Mar. And kicke him till his breeches and breech be of one colour a bright blew both.

Ant. I may be well swing'd thus, for I dare not reveale
my selfe, I hope shee does not meane it, o hone o hone, o
St. Patricke, o a Cree, o sweet woman. (well

Mar, No turne him and kick him o tother side, that's

Ant. O good waiting man, I beseech thee good waiting man, a pox fyre your leggs.

Mar. You Rogue you enimy to all, but little breeches
how darst thou come to me with such a letter?

Ant. Prethee pitty the poore Irishman, all this makes for me, if I win her yet, I am still more glorious.

Mar. Now could I weep at what I have don, but I'le harden my hart agen, go shut him up, 'till my husband comes home, yet thus much ere ye go, sirrah thatch'd head, would'st not thou be whipt & think it justice? well *Aqua-
vitæ* Barrell, I will bounce you.

Ant. I pray do, I beseech you be not angry.

Mar. O you hobby headed Raskall, I'le have you flead, and trossers made of thy skin to tumble in, go a way with him, let him see no sun, 'till my husband come home, sir I shall meet with you for your knavery, I feare it not.

Ant. Wilt thou not let mee go? I do not like this.

Mar. Away with him.

Servingman. Come I'le lead you in by your lacke a lent
haire, go quietly or I'le make your crupper cracke.

Mar. And do you heare me sirrah? and when you have done, make my Coach ready.

Serving. Yes forsooth. Exit. Servingman, with Antonio.

Mar. Locke him up safe enough I'le to this Gentleman,
I know the reason of all this businesse, for I do suspect it,
If he have this plott, I'le ring him such a peale, shall make his eares deafe for a moneth at least. Exit.

Enter Richardo.

Ric. Am I not mad? can this weake temper'd head,
That will be mad with drink, endure the wrong
That I have done a virgin and my love?
Be mad, for so thou ought'st, or I will beate
The walls and trees, downe with thee, and will let Either thy memory out or madnesse in,
But sure I never lov'd faire Viola:
I never lov'd my Father nor my Mother,
Or any thing but drinke; had I had love;
Nay, had I knowne so much charity,
As would have sav'd an Infant from the fire,
I had bin naked, raving in the street:
With halfe a face, gashing my selfe with knives,
Two howers ere this time.

Enter Pedro, Silvio, Uberto.

Ped. Good morrow Sir.

Rich. Good morrow Gentlemen, shal we go drink agen?

I have my witts.

Ped. So have I but they are unſetled ones, would I had ſome porrige.

Rich. The taverne boy was here this morning with mee
And told me that there was a Gentlewoman,
Which he tooke for a whore that hung on me:
For whom we quarrel'd, and I know not what.

Ped. Iſaith not I.

Vbe. I have a glimmering of ſome ſuch thing.

Rich. Was it you Silvio,
That made me drinke ſo much? 'twas you or Pedro.

Ped. I know not who.

Sil. We were all apt enough.

Rich. But I wil lay the faule on none but me,
That I would be ſo entreated, come Silvio,
Shall we goe drinke agen, come Gentlemen,
Why do you ſtay, let's never leave off now,
Whilſt we have Wine and throates, I'le practiſe it,
Till I have made it my beſt quality;
For what is beſt for me to do, but that?
For Gods ſake come and drinke; when I am nam'd
Men ſhall make anſwer, which Richardo meane you?
The excellent drinker? I will have it ſo,
Will you goe drinke?

Silv. We drunke too much too lately.

Rich. Why there is then the leſſe behind to drinke,
Let's end it all, diſpatch that, wee'l ſend abroad,
And purchaſe all the Wine the world can yield,
And then drinke it off, then take the fruits o'the earth,
Diſtill the Juice from them, and drinke that off;
Wee'l catch the raine before it fall to ground,
And drinke off that that never more may grow;
Wee'l ſet our mouths to Springs, and drinke them off,
And all this while wee'l never thinke of thoſe
That love us beſt, more then we did laſt night.
We will not give unto the poore a drop
Of all this drinke, but when we ſee them weepe,
Wee'l run to them, and drinke their teares off too,
Wee'l never leave whilſt there is heate or moyſture,
In this large globe, but ſuck it cold and dry,
Till we have made it Elementall earth,
Meerly by drinking.

Ped. Is't flattery to tell you, you are mad?

Rich. If it be falſe,
There's no ſuch way to bind me to a man;
He that will have me, lay my goods and lands,
My life down for him, need no more, but ſay
Richardo thou art mad, and then all theſe
Are at his ſervice, then he pleaſes me,
And makes me thinke that I had vertue in me,
That I had love, and tenderneſſe of heart,
That though I have committed ſuch a fault,
As never creature did, yet running mad,
As honeſt men ſhould doe for ſuch a crime,
I have expreſt ſome worth, though it be late:
But I alas have none of theſe in me,
But keep my wits ſtill like a frozen man,
That had no fire within him.

Sil. Nay good Richardo leave this wild talk, and ſend a letter to her, I'le deliver it.

Rich. 'Tis to no purpoſe; perhaps ſhe's loſt laſt night,
Or ſhe got home agen, ſhe's now ſo ſtrictly
Look'd to, the wind can ſcarce come to her, or admit
She were her ſelfe; if ſhe would hear from me,
From me unworthy, that have us'd her thus,
She were ſo fooliſh, that ſhe were no more
To be beloved. Enter Servant with a Night-gown.

Ser. Sir, we have found this night-gown ſhe took with her.

Rich. Where?

Rich. Where? where? ſpeake quickly.

Ser. Searching in the Suburbs, we found a Tinker and his whore, that had in it a ſap-houſe, whom we apprehended, and they confeſt they ſtole it from her.

Rich. And murthered her?

Sil. What aile you Man?

Rich. Why all this doth not make me mad.

Sil. It does, you would not offer this elſe, good Pedro tooke to his ſword.

Ser. They do deny the killing of her, but ſwore they left her tyed to a tree, in the fields, next thoſe Suburbs that are without our Ladies gate, neer day, & by the rode, ſo that ſome paſſinger muſt needs unty her quickly.

And. The will of heaven be done? Sir I wil only entreat you this, that as you were the greateſt occaſion of her loſſe, that you will be pleaſed to urge your friends, and be your ſelfe earneſt in the ſearch of her; if ſhe be found, ſhe is yours, if ſhe pleaſe, I my ſelfe only, ſee theſe people better examin'd, and after follow ſome way in ſearch, God keepe you Gentlemen. Exit.

Sil. Alas good man!

Ric. VVhat think you now of me, I think this lump
Is nothing but a piece of fleagme congeal'd
VVithout a ſoule, for where theres ſo much ſpirit
As would but warm a flea, thoſe faults of mine
VVould make it glow and flame in this dull heart,
And run like molten gold through every ſin,
Till it could burn theſe walls and fly away.
Shall I intreat you all to take your horſes,
And ſearch this innocent?

Ped. VVith all our hearts.

Ric. Do not devide your ſelves till you come there,
VVhere they ſay ſhe was ty'd, I'le follow too,
But never to return till ſhe be found.
Give me my ſword good Pedro, I will do
No harme believe me with it, I am now
Farre better temper'd; If I were not ſo,
I have enow beſides, God keep you all,
And ſend us good ſucceſſe. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius, Scæna Prima.

Enter Mercury and Servant.

Mer. WHo is it? can you tell?

Ser. By my troth Sir I know not, but 'tis a Gentlewoman

Mer. A Gentleman I'le lay my life you puppy, h'as ſent his wife to me: if he have, hang up the bed.

Ser. Here ſhe is Sir.

Enter VVife with a letter.

VVife. I am glad I found you Sir, there take your letter and keepe it till you have another friend to wrong, 'tis too malicious falſe to make me ſin, you have provoked mee to be that I love not, a talker, and you ſhall heare me.
VVhy ſhould you dare to imagine me
So light a huſwife, that from four hours knowledge
You might preſume to offer to my credite
This rude and ruffian tryall, I am ſure
I never courted you, nor gave you tokens,
That might concerne aſſurance, you are a foole.

Mer. I cannot blame you now, I ſee this letter
Though you be angry, yet with me you muſt not,
Unleſſe you'l make me guilty of a wrong,
My worſt affections hate——

VVife. Did not you ſend it?

Mer. No upon my faith, which is more, I under-and it not; the hand is as far from my knowledg, as the malice.

Wife. This is strange. (hatefull,

Mer. It is so, and had been stranger, and indeed more Had I, that have receiv'd such courtesies, & owe so many Thanks, done this base office.

Wife. Your name is at it.

Mer. Yes, but not my nature, and I shall hate my name worse then the manner, for this base broking; you are wise and vertuous, remove this fault from me; for on the love I beare to truth and goodnesse, this letter dare not name me for the author.

Wife. Now I perceive my husbands knavery, if my man can but finde where he has been, I will goe with this Gentleman whatsoever comes on't; and as I meane to carry it both he and all the world shall thinke it fit, and thank me for it.

Mer. I must confesse I loved you, at first, however this made me leave your house unmannerly, that might provoke me to do something ill, both to your honour & my faith, and not to write this letter, which I hold so truly wicked, that I will not thinke on't.

Wife. I do beleeve you, and since I see you are free, my words were not meant to you, but this is not the halfe of my affliction.

Mer. 'Tis pitty you should know more vexation; may I enquire?

Wife. Faith Sir I feare I have lost my husband.

Mer. Your husband? it cannot be: I pitty her, how shee's vext? Enter Servant.

Wife. How now? what news? nay speake, for we must know. (has been

Ser. Faith I have found at length by chance where he Wife. Where?

Ser. In a blind out-house in the Suburbs, pray God all be well with him.

Wife. Why?

Ser. There are his cloaths, but what's become of him, I cannot yet enquire.

Wife. I am glad of this; sure they have murtherd him, what shall I do?

Mer. Be not so grieved before you know the truth, you have time enough to weepe, this is the sodainst mischiefe; did you not bring an Officer to search there, where you say you found his cloaths.

Ser. Yes, and wee searcht it, and charg'd the fellow with him: but he like a rogue, stubborn rogue, made answer, he knew not where he was; he had been there, but where he was now, he could not tell: I tell you true I fear him.

Wife. Are all my hopes and longings to enjoy him, After this 3 yeares travell, come to this?

Ser. It is the rankest house in all the City, the most curst roguy bawdi-house? hell fire it.

Mer. This is the worst I heard yet; will you go home? I'le beare you company, and give you the best help I may: this being here will wrong you.

Wife. As you are a Gentleman, and as you loved your dead friend, let me not goe home, that will but heape one sorrow on another.

Mer. Why purpose any thing and I'le perform't; I am at my wits end too.

Ser. So am I, O my deare Master!

Mer. Peace you great foole.

Wife. Then good Sir cary me to some retired place, far from the sight of this unhappy City, whether you will indeed, so it be far enough. (home,

Mer. If I might councel you, I think 'twere better to go and try what may be done yet, hee may bee at home afore you, who can tell?

Wife. O no, I know he's dead, I know hees murder'd; tell me not of going home, you murder me too.

Mer. Well, since it pleases you to have it so, I will no more perswade you to go home, I'le be your guide in the Countrey, as your griefe doth command me, I have a Mother dwelling from this place some 20. miles, the house though homely, yet able to shew something like a welcome: thither I'le see you safe with all your sorrows.

Wife. With all the speed that may be thought upon; I have a Coach here ready, good Sir quickly; I'le fit you my fine husband.

Mer. It shall be so, if this fellow be dead, I see no band of any other man, to tye me from my will, and I will follow her with such carefull service, that she shall either be my Love or Wife, will you walke in?

Wife. I thank you Sir, but one word with my man, and I am ready; keepe the Irish fellow safe, as you love your life, for he I feare has a deep hand in this, then search agen, & get out warrants for that naughty man, that keeps the bad house, that he may answer it, if you find the body, give it due buriall; farewell. You shall heare from me, keep all safe. Exeunt.

Ser. O my sweet Mr!

Antonio knocking within.

Ant. within. Man-a-cree, the Devill take thee, wilt thou kill me here, I prethee now let me goe looke my dr. I shall be very cheel elfe. Enter Servant.

Ser. Do you hear man-a-cree, I'le cree your concombe, and you keep not still, down you rogue.

Ant. Good sweet fact serving-man, let me out I beseech de, and by my troe I will give dye Worship 2. shillings in good argott, to buy dy Worship pippines.

Ser. This rogue thinks all the worth of man consists in Peepins; by this light I'le beate rebellion out of you for ever.

Ant. Wilt thou not heare me man? is fet, I'le give thee all I have about me.

Ser. I thank you Sir, so I may have picking worke,

Ant. Here is five shillings man,
Here is a cudgell, a very good one.

Enter two Serving-men.

2 Ser. How now, what's the matter, what's the Irishman.

1 Ser. There, a wyth take him, he makes more noyse alone there, then ten Lawyers can do with double & a scurvy Case.

2 Ser. Let him out, I must talke with him.

Enter Antonio.

Ant. Wilt thou give me some drinke, ô hone? I am very dry man. (friend.

2 Ser. You shall have that shall quench your thirst, my

Ant. Fate dost thou meane man.

2 Ser. Even a good tough halter.

Ant. A halter? ô hone! (truth.

2 Ser. Sirha you are a mischievous rogue, that's the Ant. No fet I am not.

1 Ser Shall I knocke out his braines? I have kill'd dogs have been worth three of him for all uses.

2 Ser. Sirah, the truth on't is, you must with mee to a Justice. O Roger, Roger.

1 Ser. Why, what's the matter William? (us.

2 Ser. Heavy newes Roger, heavy newes, God comfort

1 Ser. What is't man?

Ant. What's the matter now? I am e'ne weary of this way, would I were out on't. (rogue

1 Ser. My Mr. sure is murdered, Roger, and this curst feare has had a hand in't.

Ant. No

Ant. No fet not.

1 Ser. Stand away, i'le kickt out of him: come firha, mount, i'le make you dance, you Raſcall, kill my Maſter? If thy breech were cannon proofe, having this good cauſe on my ſide, I would encounter it; hold faire, Shamrocke.

Ant. Why how now ſirs? you wil not murder me indeed.

2 Ser. Bleſſe us Roger!

Ant. Nay, I am no ſpirit.

2 Ser. How do you Sir, this is my very Maſter.

Ant. Why well enough yet, but you have a heavy foote of your owne; where's my wife?

1 Ser. Alas poor ſorrowfull Gentlewoman, ſhe thinks you are dead, and has given o're houſe-keeping.

Ant. Whether is ſhe gone then?

1 Ser. Into the Countrey with the Gentleman your friend Sir, to ſee if ſhe can wear her ſorrows out there; ſhe weeps and takes on too too ——

Ant. This falls out pat; I ſhall be everlaſting for a name: doe you hear? upon your lives and faiths to me, not one word I am living, but let the ſame report paſſe along, that I am murther'd ſtill; I am made for ever.

1 Ser. Why Sir?

Ant. I have a Cauſe Sir that's enough for you; well, if I be not famous, I am wrong'd much; for any thing I know I will not trouble him this weeke at leaſt, noe, let them take their way one of another.

1 Ser. Sir, will you be ſtill an Iriſh-man.?

Ant. Yes a while.

2 Ser. But your Worſhip will be beaten no more?

Ant. No I thanke you William.

1 Ser. In truth Sir, if it muſt be ſo, I'le doe it better then a ſtranger.

Ant. Goe, you are Knaves both, but I forgive you, I am almoſt mad with the apprehenſion of what I ſhall be, not a word I charge you. Exeunt.

Enter Valerio, and Viola.

Val. Come pretty ſoul, we now are neer our home,
And whilſt our horſes are walkt downe the hill,
Let thou and I walke here over this Cloſe:
The foot-way is more pleaſant, 'tis a time
My pretty one, not to be wept away,
For every living thing is full of love;
Art not thou ſo too? hah?

Vio. Nay, there are living things empty of love,
Or I had not been here, but for my ſelfe
Alas, I have too much.

Val. It cannot be, that ſo much beauty, ſo much youth and grace ſhould have too much of love. (know.

Vio. Pray what is love? for I am full of that I doe not

Val. Why, love faire maid is an extream deſire,
That's not to be examin'd but fulfil'd,
To aske the reaſon why thou art in love,
Or what might be the nobleſt end in love,
Would overthrow that kindly riſing warmth,
That many times ſlides gently o're the heart,
Twould make thee grave, & ſtaid thy thoughts would be,
Like a thrice married Widow, full of ends,
And void of all compaſſion, and to fright thee
From ſuch enquiry, whereas thou art now
Living in ignorance, mild, freſh, and ſweet,
And but ſixteen, the knowing what love is,
Would make thee ſixe and forty.

Vio. Would it would make me nothing, I have heard Schollers affirme the world is upheld by love,
But I beleeve women maintain all this,
For ther's no love in men.

Val. Yes, in ſome men.

Vio. I know them not.

Val. Why, there is love in me.

Vio. Ther's charity I am ſure towards me. (maide,

Val. And love; which I will now expreſſe, my pretty
I dare not bring thee home, my Wife is foule,
And therefore envious, ſhe is very old,
And therefore Jealous; thou art faire and young,
A ſubject fit for her unlucky vices.
To worke upon, ſhe never will endure thee.

Vio. Shee may endure
If ſhe be ought, but Divell, all the friendſhip
That I will hold with you; can ſhe endure
I ſhould be thankfull to you? may I pray
For you and her, will ſhe be brought to thinke
That all the honeſt induſtry I have
Deſerves browne bread? if this may be endur'd,
Shee'l picke a quarrell with a ſleeping childe,
E're ſhe fall out with me.

Val. But truſt me ſhe does hate all handſomeneſſe.

Vio. How tell you in love with ſuch a creature?

Val. I never lov'd her.

Vio. And yet married her?

Val. Shee was a rich one. (then too.

Vio. And you ſwore I warrant you, ſhe was a faire one

Val. Or beleeve me I thinke I had not had her. (a place

Vio. Are you men all ſuch? wood you wood wall us in
Where all we women, that are innocent,
Might live together.

Val. Do not weep at this,
Although I dare not for ſome weighty reaſon
Diſpleaſe my Wife, yet I forget not thee.

Vio. What will you do with me?

Val. Thou ſhalt be plac'd
At my mans houſe, and have ſuch food and rayment
As can be bought with money: theſe white hands
Shall never learn to worke, but they ſhall play
As thou ſaiſt they were wont, teaching the ſtrings
To move in order, or what elſe thou wilt.

Vio. I thanke you Sir, but pray you cloath me poorly,
And let my labour get me meanes to live.

Val. But faire one, you I know do ſo much hate
A foule ingratitude, you will not looke
I ſhould do this for nothing.

Vio. I will worke as much out as I can, and take as little
That you ſhall have as duly paid to you
As ever ſervant did.

Val. But give me now a tryall on't, I may beleeve
We are alone, ſhew me how thou wilt kiſſe
And hug me hard, when I have ſtolne away
From my too clamorous Wife that watches me,
To ſpend a bleſſed houre or two with thee.

Vio. Is this the love you mean? you would have that
Is not in me to give, you would have luſt.

Val. Not to diſſemble, or to mince the word,
'Tis luſt I wiſh indeed.

Vio. And by my troth I have it not: for heavens ſake uſe mee kindely.
Though I be good, and ſhew perhaps a monſter,
As this world goes.

Val. I doe
But ſpeak to thee; thy anſwers are thy owne,
I compell none, but if thou refuſe this motion,
Thou art not then for me, alas good ſoule?
What profit can thy worke bring me.

Vio. But I feare: I pray goe, for luſt they ſay will grow
Outragious being deni'd, I give you thankes
For all your courteſies, and there's a Jewell
That's worth the taking, that I did preſerve
Safe from the robbers, pray you leave me here

Just as you found me, a poor innocent,
And Heaven will bleſſe you for it.

Val. Pretty maid I am no Robber nor no Raviſher,
I pray thee keepe thy Jewel, I have done
No wrong to thee, though thou beeſt vertuous
And in extremity, I doe not know,
That I am bound to keepe thee.

Viol. No ſir, for gods ſake if you know an honeſt man in all theſe countries, give me ſome directions to find him out.

Val. More honeſt then my ſelfe good ſooth I doe not know; I would have lain with thee with thy conſent, and who would not in all theſe parts, is paſt my memory, I am ſorry for thee, farwell gentle maid, god keepe thee ſafe. Exit.

Vio. I thanke you ſir, and you;
Woman they ſay, was onely made of man,
Me thinks tis ſtrange they ſhould be ſo unlike,
It may be all the beſt was cut away
To make the woman and the nought was left
Behind with him, I'le ſit me downe and weepe,
All things have caſt me from 'em but the earth;
The evening comes and every little flower
Droops now, as well as I.

Enter two Milkmaides with pailes.

Nan. Good Madg lets reſt a little, by my troth I am weary, this new pail is a plaguy heavie one, would Tom were hang'd for chooſing it, 'tis the arrantſt foole in a Country.

Mag. With all my heart, and I thanke you too, Nan.

Vio. What true contented happineſſe dwells here,
More then in Cities? wood to God my father
Had lived like one of theſe and bred me up
To milke and doe as they doe: me thinks
Tis a life that I wood chooſe, if I were now
To tell my time agen, above a princes; maids for charity
Give a poore wench one draught of Milke
That wearineſſe and hunger have nigh famiſht.

Nan. If I had but one Cows Milke in all the world, you ſhould have ſome on't; there, drink more, the cheeſe ſhall pay for it, alas poore heart! ſhees dry.

Mag. Doe you dwell here about us?

Vio. No, would I did.

Nan. Madge if ſhe do not looke like my coſen Sue o'th more lane as one thing can looke like another——

Mag. Nay Sue has a hazell eye, I know Sue well, and by your leave not ſo trim a body neither, this is a feate bodied thing I tell you.

Nan. She laces cloſe by the maſſe I warrant you, and ſo does Sue too.

Vio. I thanke you for your gentleneſſe faire maids.

Nan. Drinke agen pray thee.

Vio. I am ſatisfied, and heaven reward thee for't, yet thus far I will compell you to accept theſe trifles, toyes onely that expreſſe my thanks, for greater worth, I'm ſure they have not in them; indeed you ſhall, I found e'm as I came.

Nan. Madge, look you here Madge.

Mag. Nay I have as fine a one as you, mines all gold and painted, and pretious ſtone in't; I warrant it coſt a crowne wench.

Nan. But mine is the moſt ſumptuous one that ere I ſaw.

Viol. One favour you muſt doe me more, for you are well acquainted here.

Nan. Indeed wee'le doe you any kindneſſe ſiſter.

Vio. Onely to ſend me to ſome honeſt place, where I may finde a ſervice.

Nan. Vds me, our Dorithy went away but laſt weeke, and I know my Miſtris wants a Maid, and why may ſhee not be placed there? this is a likely wench I tell you truly, and a good wench I warrant her.

Mag. And tis a hard caſe if wee that have ſerved four yeares apiece can not bring in one ſervant, we will preferr her; harke you ſiſter, pray what's your name?

Viol. Melvia.

Nan. A feate name ifaith; and can you milke a Cow? and make a merry-buſh? that's nothing.

Vio. I ſhall learne quickly.

Nan. And dreſſe a houſe with flowers? and ſerve a pigg? this you muſt doe, for we deale in the dary, and make a bed or two?

Vio. I hope I ſhall.

Nan. But be ſure to keepe the men out, they will mar all that you make elſe, I know that by myſelfe; for I have been ſo touz'd among e'm in my days, come you ſhall een home with us and be our fellow, our houſe is ſo honeſt, and we ſerve a very good woman, and a Gentlewoman, and we live as merrily, and dance a good dayes after even-ſong, our wake ſhall be on Sunday; doe you know what a wake is? we have mighty cheer then, and ſuch a coyle, 'twould bleſſe ye; you muſt not be ſo baſhfull, you'l ſpoile all.

Mag. Let's home for Gods ſake, my Miſtris thinkes by this time we are loſt, come wee'l have a care of you, I warrant you; but you muſt tell my Miſtris where you were borne, and every thing that belongs to you, & the ſtrangeſt things you can deviſe, for ſhe loves thoſe extreamly, 'tis no matter whether they be true or no, ſhee's not ſo ſcrupulous; you muſt be our ſiſter, and love us beſt, and tell us every thing, and when cold weather comes wee'l ly together, will you do this?

Viola. Yes.

Nan. Then home again a gods name, can you go apace.

Vio. I warrant you. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Pedro and Uberto, ſeverally.

Pedro. How now, any good newes yet?

Siluio. Faith not any yet.

Ped. This comes a tipling; would 'twere treaſon an pleas'd God to drinke more then three draughts at a meale.)

Sil. When did you ſee Richard?

Ped. I croſt him twice to day. (night?

Sil. You have heard of a young wench that was ſeen laſt

Ped. Yes.

Sil. Has Richard hard of this?

Ped. Yes and I thinke hee's ridden after, farewell I'le have another counſil.

Sil. If you heare any things pray ſpare no horſe-fleſh I'le do the like. Exeunt

Ped. Do.

Enter Richards, and Valerio.

Rich. Sir, I did thinke 'twas you by all diſcriptions.

Val. Tis ſo,
I tooke her up indeed, the manner how
You have heard already, and what ſhe had about her,
As Iewels, gold and other trifling things.
And what my end was, which becauſe ſhe ſlighted,
I left her there i'the feildes.

Rich. Left i'th feildes? could any but a Rogue
That had deſpis'd humanity and goodneſſe,

God

God, law and credit? and had ſet himſelfe
To looſe his nobleſt part, and be a beaſt,
Have left ſo innocent, unmatch'd a virtue,
To the rude mercy of a wilderneſſe?
Val. Sir If you come to raile, pray quit my houſe,
I do not uſe to have ſuch language given;
Within my doores to me; for your wench,
You may go ſeeke her with more patience,
Shee's tame enough I warrant you.
Ric. Pray forgive me.
I do confeſſe my much forgetfullneſſe;
And weigh my words no farther I beſeech you,
Then a meere madneſſe; for ſuch a griefe has ſeiz'd mee
So ſtrong and deadly, as a puniſhment,
And a juſt one too,
That 'tis a greater wonder I am living,
Then any thing I utter; yet let me tel you thus much,
'Twas a fault for leaving her
So in the fieldes.
Val. Sir I will thinke ſo now, and credit me,
You have ſo wrought me with your griefe, that I
Do both forgive and pitty you:
And if youle pleaſe to take a bed this night heere;
Too morrow I'le bring you where I left her.
Rich. I thanke you, no, ſhall I be ſo unworthy,
To think upon a bed, or eaſe or comfort,
And have my heart ſtray from me God knowes where,
Cold and forſaken, deſtitute of friends,
And all good comforts elſe, unleſſe ſome tree
Whoſe ſpeechleſſe charity muſt better ours,
With which the bitter eaſt winds made thier ſport
And ſung through hourely, hath invited her
To keep off halfe a day? ſhall ſhee be thus,
And I draw in ſoft ſlumbers? God forbid.
No, night and bitter coldneſſe I provoke thee,
And all the dewes that hang upon thy locks, (prime Showers, hailes, ſnowes, froſts, & two edged windes that
The maiden bloſſoms, I provoke you all,
Anddare expoſe this body to your ſharpneſſe,
Till I be made a land marke.
Val. Will you then ſtay and eate with mee?
Rich. Y'are angry with me, I know you'r angry,
You would not bid me eate elſe; my poore Miſtris,
For ought I know thou art famiſh't, for what elſe
Can the feilds yeeld thee, and the ſtubborne ſeaſon,
That yet holds in the fruite? good Gentle Sir,
Thinke not ill manners in mee for denying
Your offerd meate, for ſure I canno t eate
While I do thinke ſhe wants; well I'me a raſcall;
A villaine, ſlave, that onely was begotten,
To murder women and of them the beſt.
Val. This is a ſtrange affliction.
If you'le accept no greater courtiſy, yet drink Sir.
Ric. Now I am ſure you hate me, and you knew
What kinde of man I am, as indeed 'tis fit,
That every man ſhould know me to avoide me.
If you have peace within you Sir, or goodneſſe
Name that abhor'd word drinke no more unto mee,
You had ſafer ſtrike me.
I pray you do not, if you love me do not.
Val. Sir, I meane no ill by it.
Rich. It may be ſo,
Nor let me ſee
None ſir, if you love heaven;
You know not what offence it is unto mee,
Nor good now, do not aske me why:
And I warne you once againe, let no man elſe ſpeake oft,
I feare your ſervants will be prating to me.
Val. Why Sir what aile you?
Rich. I hate drinke, ther's the end on't,
And that man that drinkes with meate is damnd
without an age of prayers and repentance,
And ther's a hazard too; good Sir no more,
If you will do me a free courtiſy,
That I ſhall know for one, go take your horſe,
And bring me to the place where you left her:
Val. Since you are ſo importunate I will;
But I will with Sir you had ſtay'd to night
Upon my credit, you ſhall ſee no drinke.
Rich. Be gon the hearing of it makes me giddy,
Sir will you be intreated to forbeare it,
I ſhall be mad elſe.
Val. I pray no more of that, I am quiet,
I'le but walke in and away ſtraight.
Rich. Now I thanke you,
But what you do, do in a twinckling, Sir.
Val. As ſoone as may bee. Exeunt

Enter Mother, Viola, and 2. Milkmaides.

Moth. Is this the wench? you have brought me ſome catch I warrant;
How injuringly ſhe looks upon the matter?
Malge. Yes forſooth this is the maiden.
Moth. Come hither, wood you ſerve?
Viola If it ſhalt pleaſe you to accept my ſervice I hope I ſhall do ſomething that ſhall like you, though it be but truth, and often praying for you.
Moth. You are very curious of your hand me thinks,
You preſerve it ſo with gloves, let me ſee it;
I marry, here's a hand of march-pane wenches:
This pretty palme never knew ſorrow yet;
How ſoft it is I warrant you, and ſupple:
O' my word this is fitter for a pocket to filch withall
Then to worke, I feare me little one,
You are no better then you ſhould be; goe too.
Vio. My Conſcience yet is but one witneſſe to me,
And that heaven knows is of mine innocence,
Tis true, I muſt confeſſe, with ſhame enough,
The time that I have lead yet never taught me
What t'was to breake a ſleep, or to be weary.
Moth. You ſith ſay well: if you be mine, Wench, you muſt doe well too, for words are but ſlow workers, yet ſo much hope I have of you, that I'le take you ſo you'l bee diligent, and do your duty: how now?

Enter Alexander.

Alex. There is a meſſenger come from your ſon
That brings you word he is return'd from travell,
And will be here this night.
Moth. Now joy upon thee for it, thou art ever
A bringer of good tidings, there, drinke that:
In troth thou haſt much contented me, my ſon?
Lord how thou haſt pleas'd me, ſhall I ſee my Son
Yet ere I dye? take care my houſe be handſome,
And the new ſtooles ſet out, and boughes and ruſhes,
And flowers for the window, and the Turky Carpet,
And the great parcell falt, Nan, with the Cruets,
And prethee Alexander goe to the Cooke,
And bid him ſpare for nothing, my ſon's come home,
Who's come with him?
Alex. I heare of none yet, but a Gentlewoman?
Moth. A Gentlewoman? what Gentlewoman.
Alex. I know not but ſuch a one there is, he ſayes.
Moth. Pray God he have not caſt away himſelfe
Upon ſome ſtrott-faire piece, I do not like it.
Alex. No ſure, my Maſter has more diſcretion.
Moth. Well, be it how it will, he ſhall be welcome.
Sirs, to your tasks, and ſhew this little novice

How

How to bestir her selfe, I'le sort out things. Exit.

Madg. We will forsooth, I can tell you my mistris is a stirring woman.

Nan. Lord how shee'le talke some times? tis the maddest cricket——

Vio. Mee thinks she talkes well, and shewes a great deale of good huswifry, pray let me deck the chambers, shall I?

Nan. Yes you shall, but doe not scorne to be avis'd sister, for there belongs more to that then you are aware on; why would you venture so fondly upon the strowings? ther's mighty matters in them I'le assure you, and in the spreading of a bough pot, you may misse if you were ten yeares elder, if you take not a speciall care before you.

Vio. I will learne willingly, if that be all.

Nan. Sirrah where is't they say my young master hath beene?

Mag. Faith I know not, beyond the sea, where they are borne without noses.

Nan. Iesse blesse us! without noses? how doe they doe for handkerchers?

Mag. So Richard saies, and sirrah, their feet stands in their foreheads.

Nan. Thats fine by my troth, these men have pestilence running heads then; doe they speake as we doe?

Mag. No, they never speake.

Nan. Are they cursend?

Mag. No they call them Infidells, I know not what they are.

Nan. Sirrah we shall have fine courting now my young master is come home, were you never courted sister?

Vio. Alas I know it not.

Mag. What is that courting sirrah?

Nan. I can tell, for I was once courted in the matted chamber, you know the party Madge, faith hee courted finely.

Mag. Pray thee what ist?

Nan. Faith nothing but he was some what figent with me, faith tis fine sport, this courting.

Alex. within. Where be the Maids there?

Mag. We shall be hang'd anon, away good wenches, and a care you dight things handsomely, I will looke over you. Exeunt.

Enter Mercury and Maria.

Mer. If your sorrow will give you so far leave, pray thinke your selfe most welcome to this place, for so upon my life you are, and for your owne faire sake, take truce a while with these immoderate mournings.

Wife. I thanke you sir, I shall doe what I may;
Pray leade me to a chamber.

Enter Mother and Alexander.

Mer. Presently,
Before your blessing mother, I entreate ye
To know this Gentlewoman, and bid her welcome,
The vertuous wife of him that was my selfe
In all my travells.

Moth. Indeed she is most welcom, so are you son (kneele.
Now all my blessing on thee; thou hast made me
Younger by 20 yeares, then I was yesterday,
Will you walke in? what ayles this Gentlewoman?
Alas I feare she is not well, good Gentlewoman.

Mer. You feare right.

Moth. She has fasted over long,
You shall have supper presently o'th boord.

Mer. She will not eate I can assure you mother,
For Gods sake let your maide conduct her up
Into some faire becomming Chamber
Fit for a woman of her being and
As soone as may be,
I know shee's very ill, and wood have rest.

Moth. There is one ready for her, the blow chamber.

Mer. Tis well, I'le leade you to your Chamber doore
And there I'le leave you to your quiet, Mistris.

Wife. I thanke you Sir, good rest to every one,
You'le see me once againe to night I hope. Exit.

Moth. Where are these maides attend upon the Gentlewoman, and see she want no good thing in the house: goodnight with all my heart forsooth, good Lord how you are growne? is he not Alexander?

Allex. Yes truly he's shot up finely god be thanked.

Mer. An ill weed Mother will do so.

Allex. You say true Sir, an ill weede growes a pace.

Mer. Allexander the sharpe, you take me very quickly.

Moth. Nay I can tell, Allexander will do it, do you reade madcapp still?

Allex. Some times forsooth.

Moth. But faith son what countries have you travell'd?

Mer. Why many, Mother, as they lay befor me, France, Spaine, Italy and Germany, and other Provinces that I am sure you are not betterd by, when you heare of them.

Moth. And can you these tongues perfectly?

Mer. Of some a little, Mother.

Moth. Pray spout some french sonne.

Mer. You understand it not, and to your eares 'twill go like an unshod cart upon the stones, onely a rough unhandsome sound.

Moth. Faith I would faine heare some french.

Allex. Good Sir speake some french to my Mistris.

Mer. At your entreaty Allexander, I will, who shall I speake to?

Allex. If your worship will do me the favour Sir, to me.

Mer. Monseir, Poultron, Coukew, Cullione, Besay, Mancur.

Allex. Awe Moinseir.

Moth. Ha, ha, ha, this fine indeed, gods blessing on thy hart Son, by my troth thou art growne a proper Gentleman, cullen and pullen, good god what aucey words they use beyond the seas, ha, ha, ha?

Mo. Come then. Exeunt.

Ant. I have ridden like a fury to make up this worke and I will do it bravely ere I leave it, this is the house I am sure.

Enter Allexander.

Allex. Whood you speake with Sir?

Ant. Marry Sir I would speake with a Gentlewoman, came this night late heere from the City, I have some letters of Importance to her, I am a Post Sir and would bee dispatch'd in hast.

Allex. Sir, cannot I deliver 'em? for the truth is shee's ill and in her chamber.

Ant. Pray pardon me I must needes speake with her, my businesse is so weighty.

Allex. I'le tell her so, and bring you present word.

Ant. Pray do so, and I'le attend her, pray god the griefe of my imaginde death spoyle not what I intend, I hope it will not.

Enter

Enter Allexander.

Allex. Though she be very ill, and desires no trouble,
Yet if your businesse be so urgent, you may come up and

Ant. I thanke you Sir, I follow you. Exeit. Allex.

Enter Wife.

Wife. What should this fellow be i'th name of heaven

Enter Antonio.

Ant. Yes for sooth Mistris. (Post?

Wife. What good newes hast thou brought me gentle
For I have woe and griefe too much already,

Ant. I would you had lesse, Mistris, I could wish; be-throw my hart she moves me cruelly.

Wife. Have I found you once more Iugler? well I ewell, cares has this asse to betray him with? well, whats your businesse then?

Ant. I have brought a letter from your servant, Mistris,
in hast.

Wife. Pray give it me, I hope the best still.

Ant. This is the upshot and I know I have hit it,
Well if the spirits of the dead do walke, I shall
Heare more of this one hundred yeares hence.

Wife. By any meanes you must have speciall care, for now the Citty is possest for certaine, my Matter is made away, which for ought I knowe is a truth. Indeed, good Mistris leave your griefe and see your danger, and let that wise and noble Gentleman with whome you are, bee your right hand in all things.

Ant. Now do I know I have the better ont by the anguishing of her eye at this neere instant, tis ful unmixt in her blood, in coyning somewhat to turne Mercury I know
it.

Wife. He is my husband, and 'tis reasonable he should command in all things, since he will be an asse again, the haire at his one perill be it, in the morne you shall have a packet, 'till I must intreate you stay, you shall not loose
by it.

Ant. I do not doubt it, Mistris; I le leave you to your Wife. Prethee no more, I know all this already.

Ant. I'le take my leave now, I am made for ever. Exit.

Wife. Good night I am provided for you my fine youth
Exit.

Enter Mother beating Viola, Allexander, with a broken glasse.

Mother. I'le make thee have more care.

Viola. Good Mistris pardon me.

Moth. Thou't neere be good I warrant thee, can your fine fingers hold no faster?

Viola. Indeed it was against my will.

Moth. Allexander, let's see the glasse, as I am true kirsome woman, it is one of the christall glasses my cozen sent mee and the baggage hath broake it where it cannot bee
mended, Allexander, can Humfrey mend this thinke you?

Allex. No truly this will neere be mended.

Viola. Truly I meant but to wash it for the Gentlewo-man, that is sick above, and shaking out the water, knockt
it against the pale side.

Moth. Did you so be sure I'le stop it, twill make a good gap in your quarters wages, can tell you.

Viola. I pray forgive me, and let me have no wages this first quarter.

Moth. Go whimling, and fetch two or three grating loaves out of the kitching, to make gingerbread of, tis such an untoward thing. Exit. Viola.

Allex. Shee's somewhat simple indeed, she knew not what a kimnell was, she wants good nurture mightily.

Moth. My Sonne tells me, Allexander, that this young widdow meanes to sojourne here, she offers largly for her board, I may offer her good cheere, prey thee make a step i'th morning downe to the parlonage for some Pigeons? what are you mad there; what noyse is that are you
at bowles within? why do you whine?

Enter Viola, weeping.

Viola. I have done another fault, I beseech you sweete
Mistris forgive me.

Mother. What's the matter.

Viola. As I was reaching for the bread that lay upon the shelfe, I have throwne downe the mince meat, that should have made the pyes to morrow.

Moth. Get thee out of my house thou filthy destroying
Harlot, thou, I'le not keepe thee an howre longer.

Viola. Good Mistris beate me rather for my fault as much as it deserves, I do not know whether to go.

Moth. No I warrant thee, out of my doores.

Viola. Indeed I'le mend, I pray speake you for me.

Allex. If thou had'st hurl'd downe any thing but the pye meate, I would have spoake for thee, but I cannot finde in my hart now.

Moth. Art thou here yet? I thinke I must have an officer to thrust thee out of my doores, must I?

Viola. Why you may stop this in my wages too,
For Gods sake do; I le finde my selfe this yeare;
And let me stay.

Mer. Thou't spoyle ten times as much, I'le cudgell thee out of my doores.

Viola. I am assur'd you are more mercifull;
Then thus to beate me and discharge me too.

Moth. Dost thou dispute with thee, Allexander, carry the prating hilding forth.

Viola. Good Mistris heare me I have heere a Jewell,
My Mother left me and 'tis something worth:
Receive it and when all my faults together
Come to the worth of that, then turne me forth;
'Till then I pray you keep mee.

Moth. What giggombob have wee here, pray god you have not pilfer'd this some where; th'art such a pulling thing, wipe your eyes, and rise go your wayes, Allexander, bid the Cook mince some more meate, come and get you to bed quickly that you may up betime i'th morning a milking of you and I shall fall out worse yet.

Exit Mother and Allexander.

Viola. She has hurt my arme, I am afraid, she is a very angry woman, but blesse him heaven that did me the most wrong, I am a fraide Antonius wife should see mee, she will knowe mee

Mother within. Meiola.

Viola. I am coming, shee's not angry agen I hope. Exit.

Enter Mercury.

Mer. Now what am I the better for enjoying
This woman that I lov'd so all I finde;
That I before imagin'd to be happy:
Now I have done, it turnes to nothing else
But a poore pittied and a base repentance,
Udsfoote I am monstrous angry with my selfe:

Why

Why ſhould a man that has diſcourſe and reaſon,
And knowes how neere he looſes all in theſe things,
Covet to have his wiſhes ſatisfied,
Which when they are, are nothing but the ſhame
I do begin to loath this woman ſtraingly,
And I thinke juſtly too, that durſt adventure,
Flinging away her modeſty to take
A ſtranger to her bed, her husbands body
Being ſcarce cold in the earth for her content,
It was no more to take my ſences with,
Then if I had an idle dream had in ſleep
Yet I have made her promiſes; which grieves me,
And I muſt keep 'em too, I thinke ſhe hunts me:
The Devill cannot keep theſe women off,
When they are fletched once.

Enter VVife in night attire.

VVife. To bed for gods ſake Sir, why do you ſtay heer?
Some are up i'th houſe, I hard the wife,
Good deare ſweete hart to bed.
Merc. Why I am going? why do you follow me?
You would not have it knowne I hope, pray get you
Back to your chamber, the dores hard by for mee,
Let me alone I warrant you, this it is
To threſh well, have got a cuſtomer,
Will you go to bed?
VVife. Will you?
Mer. Yes I am going.
VVife. Then remember your promiſe you made to marry mee.
Mer. I will, but it was your fault, that it came
To this pinch now, that it muſt neede remembrance:
For out of honeſty I offer'd you
To marry you firſt, why did you ſlacke that offer?
Wife. Alas I told you the inconvenience of it,
And what wrong it would appeare to the world
If I had married you in ſuch poſt haſt
After his death: beſide, the fooliſh people
VVould have beene bold to have thought wee had lyen together in his time, and like enough imagin'd
VVe two had murthered him.
Mer. I love her tongue yet,
If I were a Saint
A gilded Saint, and ſuch a thing as this
Should prate thus wittily and feelingly
Unto my holineſſe, I cannot tell,
But I feare ſhrewdly I ſhould doe ſomething
That would quite ſcratch me out o'the Kallender,
And if I ſtay longer talking with her,
Though I am mad at what I have done already,
Yet I ſhall forget my ſelfe againe;
I feele the Divell
Ready to hold my ſtirrop; pray to bed, god-night.
Wife. This kiſſe, god-night ſweet Love,
And peace goe with thee: thou haſt prov'd thy ſelfe
The honeſteſt man that ever was entic'd
To that ſweet ſin as people pleaſe to call it,
Of lying with anothers VVife, and I,
I thinke the honeſteſt woman without bluſhing,
That ever lay with another man, I ſent my husband
Into a Cellar, poſt, fearing, and juſtly,
He ſhould have knowne him, which I did not purpoſe
Till I had had my end.
VVell, now this plot is perfect, let him bragge on't.

Exit.

Actus Quintus Scena Prima.

Enter Juſtice, and Curio with a paper.

Juſt. BIrlady Sir you have rid hard that you have.
Cur. They that have buſineſſe muſt do ſo I take it.
Juſt. You ſay true, when ſet you out my friend?
Cur. About ten a clock and I have rid all night.
Juſt. By the maſſe you are tough indeed, I have ſeene the day, I would have rid too with the proudeſt of them and fling durt in their faces, and I have don't with this fooliſh boy ſir many a time, but what can laſt alwayes? 'tis done, 'tis done now Sir, age, care, and office, brings us to our footecloathes, the more the pitty.
Curio. I believe that Sir, but will it pleaſe you to read the buſineſſe?
Juſt. My friend I can read an I can tell you when.
Cur. Would I could too Sir, for my haſt requires it.
Juſt. Whence comes it do you ſay?
Cur. Sir from the Citty.
Juſtice. O from the City 'tis a reverent place.
Curio. And his juſtice bee as ſhort as his memory,
A Dudgion Dagger will ſerve him to mow downe ſinne withall,
What clod pole Commiſſioner is this?
Juſt. And by my faith govern'd by worthy member,
Diſcreete and upright.
Curio. Sir they are beholding to you, you have given ſome of them a commendations, they were not worthy of this twenty yeares.
Juſt. Go to go to, you have a merry meaning, I have found you ſir ifaith, you are a wag, away, fye, now I'le read
Your letter.
Curio. Pray do ſir, what a miſery 'tis,
To have an urgent buſineſſe, wait the Juſtice,
Of ſuch an old Tuft taffity that knowes not,
Nor can be brought to underſtand more ſence,
Then how to reſtore ſuppreſt Ale-houſes,
And have his man compound ſmall treſpaſſes,
For ten groates.
Juſt. Sir it ſeems here your buſineſſe is of deeper circumſtance then I conceiv'd it for; what do you meane Sir?
Cur. 'Tis for mine owne eaſe I'le aſſure your VVorſhip.
Juſt. It ſhall not be ifaith friend, here I have it,
That one Antonio a Gentleman, I take it ſo,
Yes it is ſo, a Gentleman is lately thought to
Have been made away, and by my faith upon a
Perles ground too, if you conſider; wel, there's Knavery in't, I ſee that without ſpectacles.
Cur. Sure this fellow deals in revelation he's ſo hidden,
Goe thy wayes, thou wilt ſticke a bench ſpit as formally,
And ſhew thy agot, and hatch'd chaine
As well as the beſt of them.
Juſt. And now I have conſider'd, I beleeve it.
Cur. VVhat Sir?
Juſt. That he was murdered.
Cur. Did you know him?
Juſt. No.
Cur. Nor how it is ſuppos'd.
Juſt. No, nor I care not two-pence, thoſe are toyes and yet I verily beleeve hee was murdered, as ſure as I beleeve thou art a man, I never failde in theſe things yet, weare a man that's beaten to theſe matters, experience is a certaine conceal'd thing that failes not; pray let me aske you one thing

thing; why doe you come to me?

Cur. Because the letter is addrest to you, being the neareſt Juſtice.

Iuſt. The neareſt? is that all?

Cur. I thinke it be Sir, I would be loth you ſhould bee the wiſeſt.

Iuſt. Well Sir, as it is, I will endeavour in it; yet if it had come to me by name, I know not, but I thinke it had beene as ſoone diſpatcht as by another, and with as round a wiſedome, I, and as happily, but that's all one: I have borne this place this thirty yeares, and upwards, and with ſufficient credit: and they may when they pleaſe, know me better; to the neareſt? well.

Curio. Sir, it is not my fault, for had I knowne you ſooner——

Iuſt. I thanke you Sir, I know it.

Cur. I'le beſworne you ſhould have plaid for any buſineſſe now.

Iuſtice. And further, they have ſpecified unto mee, his Wife is ſorely ſuſpected in this matter, as a maine cauſe,

Curio I think e ſhe be Sir, for no other cauſe can be yet found.

Iuſt. And one Mercury a traveller, with whom they ſay directly ſhee is runne away, and as they thinke this way.

Cur. I knew all this before.

Iuſtice. Well Sir, this Mercury I know, and his breeding, a neighbours childe hard by; you have been happy Sir in comming hither.

Cur. Then you know where to have him Sir?

Iuſt. I do Sir, he dwells neare me.

Cur. I doubt your Worſhip dwels neare a Knave then.

Iuſt. I think ſo; pray put on: but 'tis a wonder
To ſee how graceleſſe people are now given,
And how baſe vertue is accounted with them
That ſhould be all in all as ſayes a wiſe man!
I tell you Sir, and it is true, that there have beene ſuch murthers, and of late dayes, as 'twould make your very heart bleede in you, and ſome of them as I ſhall bee enabled I will tell you, it fell out of late dayes.

Cur. It may be ſo, but will it pleaſe you to proceede in this?

Iuſt. An honeſt Weaver, and as good a work-man as ere ſhot ſhuttle, and as cloſe: but every man muſt dye; this honeſt Weaver being a little mellow in his Ale, that was the evidence verbatim, Sir, God bleſſe the marke, ſprung his necke juſt in this place: wel Iarvis, thou hadſt wrongs, & if I've ſome of the beſt ſhall ſweat for't, then a wench——

Cur. But Sir you have forgot my buſineſſe.

Iuſt. A ſober pretty maide about 17. they ſay, certainly howſoever 'tis ſhuffled; ſhee burſt her ſelfe, and fondly, if it be ſo, with Furmety at a Churching, but I thinke the Divell had another agent in't: either of which if I can catch ſhall ſtretch for't.

Cur. This is a mad Juſtice that will hang the Devill; but I would you would be ſhort in this, before that other notice can be given?

Iuſtice. Sir I will doe diſcreetly what is fitting; what, Antonio?

Ant. within. Your Worſhip?

Iuſt. Put on your beſt coate, and let your fellow Marke goe to the Conſtable & bid him aide me with all the ſpeed hee can, and all the power, and provide pen and inke to take their Confeſſions, and my long ſword, I cannot tell what danger wee may meete with; you'le goe with us?

Curio. Yes, what elſe? I came to that end to accuſe both parties.

Iuſt. May I crave what you are?

Cur. Faith Sir one that to be knowne would not profit you, more then a meere Kinſman of the dead Antonio's.

Iuſt. 'Tis well, I am ſorry for my neighbour, truly, that hee had no more grace, 'twill kill his Mother; ſhee's a good olde woman, will you walke in? I'le but put my Cloake on, and my Chaine off, and a cleane band, and have my ſhooes blackt over, and ſhift my Jerkin, and wee'l to our buſineſſe, and you ſhall ſee how I can bolt theſe matters.

Cur. As ſoone as't pleaſe you Sir. Exit.

Enter Valerio, and Richardo.

Val. This is the place; here did I leave the Maid
Alone laſt night drying her tender eyes,
Uncertaine what to do, and yet delirous
To have me gone.

Rich. How rude are all we men,
That take the name of Civill to our ſelves?
If ſhe had ſet her foote upon an earth
Where people live that we call barbarous;
Though they had had no houſe to bring her too,
They would have ſpoil'd the glory that the ſpring
Has deckt the trees in, and with willing hands
Have torne their branches downe, and every man
Would have become a builder for her ſake.
What time left you her there?

Val. I left her, when the Sun had ſo much to ſet,
As he is now got from his place of riſe.

Rich. So near the night ſhe could not wander far;
Faire Viola?

Val. It is in vaine to call, ſhe ſought a houſe
Without all queſtion.

Rich. Peace, faire Viola?
Faire Viola? who ſhould have left her here
On ſuch a ground? if you had meant to looſe her,
You might have found there were no Inches here
To take her name and carry it about,
When her true Lover came to mourn for her,
Till all the neighbouring valleys and the hills,
Reſounded Viola,——
And ſuch a place,
You ſhould have choſe——
You pity us becauſe
The dew a little wets our feete,
Unworthy far to ſeeke her in the wet;
And what becomes of her? where wandred ſhe,
With 2 ſhowers raining on her, from her eyes
Continually, abundantly, from which
There's neither tree nor houſe to ſhelter her;
Will you goe with me to travell?

Val. Whither?

Rich. Over all the world.

Val. No by my faith, I'le make a ſhorter journey
When I do travell.

Rich. But theres no hope
To gaine my end in any ſhorter way.

Val. Why, what's your end?

Rich. It is to ſearch the earth,
Till we have found two in the ſhapes of men,
As wicked as our ſelves.

Val. 'Twere not ſo hard to find out thoſe.

Rich. Why, if we finde them out,
It were the better for what brave villany,

Might wee 4. dor wee wood not keepe together:
For every one has treachery enough
For 20. Countryes, one should trouble Asia,
Anothor should sowe strife in Affrica;
But you should play the knave, at home in Europ,
And for America let me alone.
Vale. Sir I am honest,
Then you know how to bee, and can no more
Bee wrong'd but I shall finde my selfe a right.
Rich. If you had any sparke of honesty,
You would not think that honester then I,
Were a praise high enough to serve your turne:
if men were commonly so bad as I,
Theeves would be put in Callenders for Saints;
And bones of murderers would worke miracles.
I am a kinde of knave, of knave so much ——
There is betwixt mee and the vilest elsse,
But the next place of all to mine is yours.

Enter 2. Milkemaides, and Viola, with pailes.

Val. That last is she, 'tis shee.
Rich. Let us away, we shall infect her, let her have the winde,
And wee will kneele downe here.
Viola. Wenches away for here are men.
Valerio. Faire maide I pray you stay.
Vio. Alas, agen? (her go.
Rich. Why do you lay hold on her? I pray hartily let
Val. With all my heart, I do not meane to hurt her.
Rich. But stand away then for the purest bodyes
VVill soonest take infection, stand away,
But for infecting her my selfe, by heaven,
I would come there and beate thee further off.
Viola. I know that voyce and face.
Val. You are finely mad, god bwy Sir, now you are here together, I'e leave you so, god send you good lucke, both when you are soberer, you'le give me thanks. Exit.
Madge. VVilt thou go milke? come.
Nan. VVhy dost not come?
Madge. She nods, shee's a sleepe.
Nan. VVhat, wert up so early?
Madge. I think your man's mad to kneele there, nay come away yes body, Nan, help she looks black 'ith face, Shee's in a sound.
Nan. And you bee a man com hither, & helpe a woman.
Rich. Come thither? you are a foole.
Nan. And you a knave and a beast that you are.
Rich. Come hither? 'twasbeing my now so neare,
That made her sowne, and you are wicked people,
Or you wood do so too, my venom eyes
Strike innocency dead at such a distance,
Here I'le kneele for this is out of distance.
Nan. Th'art a prating Asse ther's no goodnesse in thee, I warrant, how dost thou?
Vio. Why? well.
Madge. Art thou able to go?
Vio. No, pray go you and milke, if I be able to come I'le follow you, if not I'le sit here,
'Till you come back.
Nan. I am loth to leave thee here with you wild foole.
Vio. I know him well, I warrant thee, he will not hurt mee.
Madge. Come then Nan. Exeunt Maides.
Rich. How do you be not fearefull, for I hold my hands
Before my mouth and speake, and so
My breath can never blast you.
Vio. 'Twas enough to use me ill, though you had never sought me too mock me to, why kneele you so farr Off, were not that gesture better us'd in prayer, had dealt so with you, I should not sleep, till God and you had both forgiven me.
Rich. I do not mock, nor lives there such a villane
That can do any thing contemptible,
To you, but I do kneele because it is,
An action very fit, and reverent,
In presence of so pure a creature,
And so farr off, as fearefull to offend,
One too much wrong'd already.
Vio. You confesse you did the fault, yet scorne to come,
So far as hither to aske pardon for't;
Which I could willingly afford to come,
To you to grant, good Sir if you have
A better love, may you be blest together,
Shee shall not wish you better then I will,
I but offend you; there are all the Iewels
I stole, and all the love I euer had,
I leave behinde with you, I'le carry now
To give another, may the next maide you try
Love you no worse, nor be no worse then I.
Rich. Do not leave me yet for all my fault,
Search out the next things too impossible,
And put me on them when they are effected,
I may with better modesty receive
Forgiveneſse from you.
Vio. I will set no pennance,
To gaine the great forgiveneſse you desire:
But to come hither and take me and it,
Or else I'le come and beg so you will grant,
That you will be content to be forgiven.
Rich. Nay I will come since you will have it so,
And since you please to pardon me I hope
Free from infection, here I am by you;
A careleſse man, a breaker of my faith,
A lothsome drunkard and in that wild fury:
A hunter after whores I do beseech you,
To pardon all these faultes, and take me up
An honest sober and a faithfull man. (mend,
Vio. For gods sake urge your faultes no more, but
All the forgiveneſse I can make you is,
To love you which I will do and desire,
Nothing but love againe, which if I have not,
Yet I will love you still.
Rich. O women that some one of you will take,
An everlasting pen into your hands:
And grave in paper which the writ shall make,
More lasting then the marble monuments,
Your matchleſse vertues to posteritye:
Which the defective race of envious man,
Strive to conceale.
Vio. Me thinkes I would not now for any thing,
But you had mist me, I have made a story,
Will serve to wast many a winters fier
When we are old, I'le tell my daughters then,
The miseryes their Mother had in love:
And say my girles bee wiser, yet I would not
Have had more witt my selfe, take up those Iewells,
For I thinke I heare my fellowes coming.

Enter the Milkemaides with their pailes.

Madge. How dost thou now? (home?
Vio. Why? very well I thanke you, 'tis late shall I hast
Nan. I prethee yver shall be sherst soundly.
Madge. VVhy doe's that railing man go with us?
Vio. I prey thee speake vvell of him, on my vvord,
Hee's an honest man.
Nan. There was never any so one's complexion, a Getleman?

I'de

I'de be asham'd to have such a foule mouth. Exeunt.

Enter Mother, Alexander, Andrugio, and his man Rowland.

Moth. How now Alexander, what Gentleman is this?

Alex. Indeed forsooth I know not, I found him at the market full of woe, crying a lost daughter, and telling all her tokens to the people; and wot you what? by all subscription in the world, it should be our new maid Melvia, one would little thinke it, therefore I was bold to tel him of her Mistris.

Mother. Melvia? it cannot be, foole, alas you know shee is a poore wench, and I tooke her in upon meere charity.

And. So seem'd my daughter when shee went away, as she had made her selfe.

Moth. What stature was your childe of, Sir?

And. Not high, and of a browne complexion,
Her haire aborne, a round face, which some friends
that flattered mee, would say 'twould bee a good one.

Alex. This is still Melvia, Mistris, that's the truth on't.

Moth. It may be so I'le promise you.

Alex. Well, goe thy wayes, the flower of our towne,
For a hand and a foote, I shall never see thy fellow.

Moth. But had shee not such toyes, as bracelets, rings, and Jewels?

And. Shee was something bolde indeed, to take such things that night she left me.

Moth. Then belike she run away?

And. Though she be one I love, I dare not lye, shee did indeed.

Moth. What thinke you of this Jewel?

And. Yes, this was one of them, and this was mine, you have made mee a new man, I thanke you for it.

Moth. Nay, and she be given to filching, there is your Jewell, I am cleare on't: but by your leave Sir, you shall answer me for what is lost since she came hither, I can tell you there lye things scattering in every place about the house.

Alex. As I am vertuous, I have the lyingst olde Gentlewoman to my Mistris, and the most malicious, the Devill a good word will shee give a servant, that's her olde rule; and God be thanked they'l give her as few, there is perfect love on both sides, it yearns my heart to heare the wench misconstrued, a carefull soule shee is i'le beswome for her, and when shee's gone, let them say what they will, they may cast their Capps at such another.

And. What you have lost by her, with all my heart
I'le see you double paid, for you have sav'd
With your kinde pitty two that must not live
Unlesse it be to thanke you; take this Jewell,
This strikes off none of her offences, Mistris,
Would I might see her.

Moth. Alexander, runne, and bid her make haste home, shee's at the milking Close; but tell her not by any means whoe's here, I know shee'l be too fearfull.

Alex. Wel, wee'l have a posset yet at parting, that's my comfort, and one round, or else i'le loose my will. Exit.

And. You shall finde Silvio, Uberto, and Pedro enquiring for the Wench at the next Towne, tell them shee is found, and where I am, and with the favour of this Gentlewoman, desire them to come hither.

Ma. I pray doe, they shall be all welcome. Exit Servant.

Enter Justice, Curio, and Mark.

Justice. By your leave forsooth you shall see me find the parties by a slight.

Moth. who's that? Mr. Justice? how do you Sir.

Iust. Why very well, and busie, wher's your son.

Moth. Hee's within Sir.

Iust. Hum, and how does the young woman my Cozen that came downe with him.

Moth. Shee's above, as a woman in her case may be.

Iustice. You have confest it? then sirha call in the Officers; shee's no Couzen of mine; a meere tricke to discover all.

Moth. To discover? what?

Enter Marke and Officers.

Iustice. You shall know that anon: I thinke you have over reached you; o welcome, enter the house, and by vertue of my warrant which you have there, seize upon the bodily persons of those whose names are there written, to wit, one Mercury, and the wife of one Antonio.

Moth. For what.

Iust. Away I say,
This Gentleman shall certifie you for what. Exit Officer.

Mother. Hee can accuse my Sonne of nothing, hee came from travell but within these two dayes?

Iust. There hangs a tale.

Moth. I should be sorry this should fall out at any time: but especially now Sir; will you favour mee so much, as to let me know of what you accuse him?

Cur. Upon suspition of murther.

Moth. Murther? I defie thee.

Curio. I pray GOD hee may prove himselfe innocent.

Iust. Fye, say not so, you shew your selfe to be no good Common-wealths man: for the more are hang'd, the better 'tis for the Common-wealth.

Mother. By this rule you were best hang your selfe.

Iust. I forgive your honest mirth ever: O, welcome, welcome Marke.

Enter Marke and Officers, with Mercury and the Wife.

Your penne, inke, and paper to take their examinations.

Mer. Why do you pull me so? I'le goe alone.

Iust. Let them stand, let them stand quietly, whilst they are examin'd?

Wife. What will you examine us of?

Iust. Of Antonio's murther.

Mer. Why, he was my friend.

Wife. He was my husband.

Iust. The more shame for you both; Marke, your penne and inke.

Moth. Pray God all be well, I never knew any of these Travellers come to good; I beseech you, Sir, be favourable to my Sonne.

Iust. Gentlewoman hold you content, I would it were come to that?

Mer. For gods sake mother why kneele you to such a pig bribe fellow? he has surfetted of geese, and they have put him into a fit of Justice, let him do his worst.

Iust. Is your paper ready?

Mark. I am ready Sir.

Enter Antonio.

Just. Accuse them Sir, I command thee to lay down accusations against these persons in behalfe of the State, and first looke upon the parties to be accus'd, and deliver your name.

Cu. My name is Curio, my murthered Kinsman
If he were living now, I should not know him,
Tis so long since we saw one another.

Ant. My cozen Curio?

Cur But thus much from the mouths of his servants, & others, whose examinations I have in writing about me, I can accuse them of; this Mercury, the last night, but this last, lay in Antonios house, and in the night he rose, raiting Antonio, where privately they were in talke an houre, to what end I know not: but of likely-hood, finding Antonio's house not a fit place to murther him in, hee suffered him to goe to bed againe, but in the morning early, he train'd him I think forth, after which time hee never saw his home; his cloathes were found neere the place where Mercury was, and the people at first denyed they saw him: but at last he made a frivolous tale, that there he shirted himselfe into a foote-mans habit: but in short, the next houre this woman went to Mercury, and in her Coach they posted hither; true accusations, I have no more, and I will make none.

Just. No more? wee need no more, Sirha, be drawing heir Mittimus before wee heare their answer. What say you Sir? are you guilty of this murther?

Mer. No Sir.

Just. Whether you are or no, confesse, it will bee the better for you.

Mer. If I were guilty, your Rhetoricke could not fetch it forth: but though I am innocent, I confesse, that if I were a stander by, these circumstances urg'd, which are true, would make me doubtlesse beleeve the accused parties to be guilty.

Just. Write downe, that hee being a stander by, for so you see he is, doth doubtlessely beleeve the accused parties, which is himselfe, to be guilty.

Mer. I say no such thing.

Just. Write it downe I say, wee'l try that.

Mer. I care not what you write, pray God you did not kill him for my love, though I am free from this, we both deserve.

Wife. Govern your tongue I pray you, all is well, my husband lives, I know it, and I see him.

Just. They whisper, sever them quickly I say Officers why do you let them prompt one another, Gentlewoman, what say you to this, are not you guilty?

Wife. No as I hope for mercy.

Jus. But are not those circumstances true, that this Gentleman hath so shortly and methodically deliver'd?

Wife. They are; and what you do with me I care not,
Since he is dead, in whome was all my care:
You knew him not.

Jus. No an't bin better for you too, and you had never knew'd him. (Joy

Wife. Why then you did not know the worlds chiefe
His face so manly, as it had been made,
To fright the world, yet he so sweetly temper'd,
That he would make himselfe a naturall foole,
To do a noble kindnesse for a friend,
He was a man whose name I'le not out live,
Longer then heaven whose will must be obay'd,
Will have me do.

Ant. And I will quit thy kindnesse.

Just. Before me she has made the teares stand in mine eyes, but I must be austere Gentlewoman, you must confesse this murder.

Wife. I cannot Sir, I did it not, but I desire to see those examinations which this Gentleman acknowledges to have about him, for but late last night I receiv'd letters from the Citty, yet I heard of no confession, then.

Just. You shall see them time enough I warrant you, but letters you say you had, where are those letters?

Wife. Sir they are gon.

Just. Gone? whether are they gone?
How have you dispos'd of 'em?

Wife. Why Sir they are for womens matters, and so I use 'em.

Just. Who writ em?

Wife. A man of mine.

Just. VVho brought 'em?

Wife. A Post.

Just. A Post? there was some great hast sure, a ha where is that Post?

Wife. Sir there he stands.

Just. Does hee so? bring hither that Post, I am afraid that Post will prove a knave; come hither Post, what what can you say concerning the murder of Antonio?

Ant. VVhats that to you?

Just. O Post, you have no answer ready have you? I'le have one from you.

Ant. You shall have no more from mee then you have, you examine an honest Gentleman and Gentlewoman heere, 'tis pitty such fooles as you should bee i'the commission.

Just. Say you so Post, take away that Post, whip him and bring him againe quickly, I'le hamper you Post.

Mer. 'Tis Antonio, I know him now as well, what an irregular foole is this?

Ant. VVhip me? hold off.

Wife. O good Sir whip him, by his murmuring he should know some thing of my husbands death; that may quit me, for gods sake fetch't out.

Just. Whip him I say.

Ant. who 'ist dares whip me now?

Wife. O my lou'd husband.

Mer. My most worthy friend? where have you been so long?

Ant. I cannot speake for joy.

Just. VVhy, what's the matter now, and shall not law then have her course?

Andra. It shall have no other course then it has I thinke

Just. It shall have other course before I go, or I'le beate my braines, and I say it was not honestly done of him to discover himselfe before the parties accus'd were executed that law might have had her course, for then the kingdome flourishes.

Ant. But such a wife as thou, had never any man, and such a friend as he, beleeve me wife, shall never be a good wife, love my frend, friend love my wife, harke friend.

Just. Mark. If wee can have nothing to doe, you shall sweare the peace of some body.

Mark. Yes Sir.

Ant. By my troth I am sorry my wife is so obstinate, sooth if I could yet doe thee any good, I wood, faith I wood.

Mer. I thanke you Sir, I have lost that passion.

Ant. Cozen Curio, you and I must be better acquainted.

Cur. It is my wish Sir.

Ant. I should not have known you neither, 'tis so long since since we saw, we were but children then: but you have shewd your selfe an honest man to me.

Cur. I would be ever so.

Enter Richards and Viola.

Moth. Looke you, whoe's there.

And. Say nothing to me, for thy peace is made.

Kic. Sir, I can nothing say,
But that you are her Father, you can both
Not only pardon, when you have a wrong,
But love where you have most injury.

Just. I think I shall heare of no hanging this yeare, there A Tinker and a Whore yet, the Cryer said that rob'd her, and are in prison, I hope they shall be hang'd.

And. No truly sir, they have broke prison.

Just. 'Tis no matter, then the Jaylor shall be hang'd.

And. You are deceiv'd in that to sir, 'twas known to bee against his will, and he hath got his pardon, I thinke for nothing, but if it doth cost him any thing, I'le pay it.

Just. Marke up with your papers, away.

Mer. O you shal stay dinner, I have a couple of brawling neighbours, that I'le assure you will not agree, and you shall have the hearing of their matter.

Just. With all my heare.

Mer. Go, Gentlemen, go in.

Rich. O Viola, that no succeeding age,
Might loose the memory of what thou wert,
But such an overswayed sex is yours,
That all the vertuous actions you can do,
Are but as men will call them, and I sweare,
'Tis my beliefe that women want but wayes;
To praise their deeds, but men want deeds to praise.

Exeunt omnes.

THis Comedy long forgot, by ſome thought dead,
By us preſerv'd, once more doth raiſe her head.
And to your noble cenſures does preſent,
Her outward forme, and inward ornament.
Nor let this ſmell of arrogance, ſince 'tis known,
The makers that confeſt it for their owne
Were this way skilfull, and without the crime
Of flatteries I may ſay did pleaſe the time;
The worke it ſelfe too, when it firſt came forth,
In the opinion of men of worth,
Was well receiv'd, and favour'd, though ſome rude
And harſh among the ignorant multitude,
(That reliſh groſſe food better then a diſh,
That's cook'd with care, and ſerv'd into the wiſh,
Of curious pallats) wanting wit and ſtrength,
Truly to judge, condemn'd it for the length,
That fault's reform'd, and now 'tis to be tri'd,
Before ſuch Judg's 'twill not be deni'd
A free and noble bearing, nor feare I,
But 'twill deſerve to have free liberty,
And give you cauſe (and with content) to ſay,
Their care was good that did revive this Play.

'Tis ended; but my hopes, and feares begin,

Sep. No Sir, as a Gueſt,
A welcome gueſt too: and it was approv'd of
By a dozen of his friends, though they were touch'd in't:

When we have laid by fooliſh modeſty
(As not a man of faſhion will weare it)

If merrily, ſet down, it fires the blood,

But the hints were mine owne; the wretch was fearfull:

And for mine owne defence I'le only add this,
I'le be admitted for a wanton tale
To ſome moſt private Cabinets, when your Prieſt-hood

Pho. Thou art baſhe'd: doſt thou want money?
Sep. No Sir.
Pho. Or haſt thou any ſuite? theſe ever follow
Thy vehement proteſtations.
Sep. You much wrong me;
How can I want, when your beames ſhine upon me,
Unleſſe employment to expreſſe my zeale
To do your Greatneſſe ſervice? doe but thinke
A deed ſo darke, the Sun would bluſh to looke on,
For which Man-kind would curſe me, and arme all
The Powers above, and thoſe below againſt me:
Command me, I will on.
Pho. When I have uſe,
I'le put you to the teſt.
Sep. May it be ſpeedy,
And ſomething worth my danger: you are cold,
And know not your own powers: this brow was faſhion'd
To weare a Kingly wreath, and your grave judgment,
Given to diſpoſe of Monarchies, not to govern
A childes affaires, the peoples eyes upon you,
The Souldier courts you; will you weare a garment
Of ſordid loyalty when 'tis out of faſhion?
Pho. When Pompey was thy Generall (Septinius)
Thou ſaidſt as much to him.
Sep. All my love to him,
To Cæſar, Rome, and the whole world is loſt
In the Ocean of your Bounties: I have no friend,
Project, deſigne, or Country, but your favour,
Which I'le preſerve at any rate.
Pho. No more;
When I call on you, fall not off; perhaps
Sooner then you expect, I may employ you,
So leave me for a while.
Sep. Ever your Creature. Exit.
Pho. Good day Acboreus; my beſt friend Achillas,
Hath fame delivered yet, no certaine rumour
Of the great Roman alion.
Achil. That we are
To enquire, and learn of you Sir: whoſe grave care
For Egypts happineſſe, and great Ptolomies good,
Have eyes and eares in all parts.

Pho. I'le not boaſt,
What my Intelligence coſts me: but 'ere long
You ſhall know more. The King, with him a Roman,
Ach. The ſcarlet livery of unfortunate war
Dy'de deeply on his face.
Achil. 'Tis Labienus
Cæſars Lieutenant in the wars of Gaul,
And fortunate in all his undertakings:
But ſince theſe Civill Jars he turn'd to Pompey,
And though he followed the better Cauſe
Not with the like ſucceſſe.
Pho. Such as are wiſe
Leave falling buildings, flye to thoſe that riſe;
But more of that hereafter.
Lab. In a word (Sir,)

Theſe

These gaping wounds, not taken as a slave,
Speake Pompeys losse: to tell you of the Battaile,
How many thousand severall bloody shapes
Death wore thatday, in triumph: how we bore
The shocke of Cæsars charge: or with what fury
His souldiers came on as if they had been
So many Cæsars, and like him ambitious,
To tread upon the liberty of Rome:
How Fathers kill'd their Sons, or Sons their Fathers,
Or how the Roman Peils on either side
Drew Roman blood, which spent, the Prince of weapons,
(The sword) succeeded, which in Civill wars,
Appoints the Tent, on which wing'd victory
Shall make a certaine Stand, then, how the Plaines
Flowd o're with blood, and what a cloud of vulturs
And other birds of prey, hung o're both armies,
Attending when their ready Servitors,
(The souldiers, from whom the angry gods
Had tooke all sense of reason, and of pity)
Would serve in their owne carkasses for a feast.
How Cæsar with his Javelin force'd them on
That made the least stop, when their angry hands
Were lifted up against some known friends face;
Then comming to the body of the army
He shews the sacred Senate, and forbids them
To waste their force upon the Common souldier,
Whom willingly, if ere he did know pity,
He would have spard.

Ptol. The reason Labienus?

Lab. Full well he knows, that in their blood he was
To passe to Empire, and that through their bowels,
He must invade the Laws of Rome, and give
A period to the liberty of the world.
Then fell the Lepidi, and the bold Corvini,
The fam'd Torquati, Scipio's, and Marcelli,
(Names next to Pompeys, most renown'd on earth)
The Nobles, and the Commons lay together,
And Pontique, Punique, and Assyrian blood
Made up one crimson Lake: which Pompey seeing,
And that his, and the fate of Rome had left him
Standing upon the Ramper of his Camp,
Though scorning all that could fall on himself,
He pities them whose fortunes are embarqu'd
In his unlucky quarrell; cryes aloud too
That they should sound retreat, and save themselves:
That he desir'd not, so much noble blood
Should be lost in his service, or attend
On his misfortunes: and then, taking horse
With some few of his friends, he came to Lesbos,
And with Cornelia, his Wife, and Sons,
He's touch'd upon your shore: the King of Parthia
(Famous in his defeature of the Crassi)
Offer'd him his protection, but Pompey
Relying on his Benefits, and your Faith,
Hath chosen Ægypt for his Sanctuary,
Till he may recollect his scattered powers,
And try a second day: now Ptolomy,
Though he appeare not like that glorious Thing,
That three times rode in triumph, and gave lawes
To conquer'd Nations, and made Crownes his guift
(As this of yours, your noble Father tooke
From his victorious hand, and you still weare it
At his devotion) to do you more honour
In his declinde estate, as the straightst Pyne
In a full grove of his yet flourishing friends,
He flyes to you for succour, and expects
The entertainment of your Fathers friend,
And Guardian to your selfe.

Ptol. To say I grieve his fortune
As much as if the Crowne I weare (his gift)
Were ravish'd from me, is a holy truth,
Our Gods can witnesse for me: yet, being young,
And not a free disposer of my self;
Let not a few hours, borrowed for advice,
Beget suspition of unthankfulnesse,
(Which next to hell I hate) pray you retire,
And take a little rest, and let his wounds
Be with that care attended, as they were
Carv'd on my flesh: good Labienus, thinke
The little respite, I desire shall be
Wholly emploid to find the readiest way
To doe great Pompey service.

Lab. May the gods
(As you intend) protect you. Exit.

Ptol. So: sit all,
It is my pleasure: your advice, and freely.

Ach. A short deliberation in this,
May serve to give you counsell to be honest,
Religious and thankfull, in themselves
Are forcible motives, and can need no flourish
Or glosse in the perswader, your kept faith,
(Though Pompey never rise to the height he's fallen from)
Cæsar himselfe will love; and my opinion
Is (still committing it to graver censure)
You pay the debt you owe him, with the hazard
Of all you can call yours.

Ptol. What's yours (Photinus?)

Pho. Achoreus (great Ptolomy) hath counsaild
Like a religious, and honest man,
Worthy the honour that he justly holds
In being Priest to Isis: But alas,
What in a man, sequestred from the world,
Or in a private person, is preferd,
No policy allows of in a King,
To be or just, or thankfull; makes Kings guilty,
And faith (though prais'd, is punish'd) that supports
Such as good Fate forsakes: joyne with the gods,
Observe the man they favour, leave the wretched,
The Stars are not more distant from the Earth
Then profit is from honesty; all the power,
Prerogatives, and greatnesse of a Prince
Is lost, if he descend once but to sweare
His course, as what's right, guides him; let him leave
The Scepter, that strives only to be good,
Since Kingdomes are maintain'd by force and blood.

Ach. Oh wicked.

Ptol. Peace: goe on. (youth,

Pho. Proud Pompey shews how much he scorns your
In thinking that you cannot keepe your owne
From such as are ore-come. If you are tired
With being a King, let not a stranger take
What nearer pledges challenge: resigne rather
The government of Ægypt and of Nyle
To Cleopatra, that has title to them,
At least defend them from the Roman gripe,
What was not Pompeys, while the wars endured,
The Conquerour will not challenge, by all the world
Forsaken and despis'd, your gentle Guardian
His hopes and forthnes desperate, makes choise of
What Nation he shall fall with; and pursu'd
By their pale Ghosts, slaine in this Civill War,
He flyes not Cæsar only, but the Senate,
Of which, the greater part have cloid the hunger
Of sharpe Parthalian fowle he flies the Nations
That he drew to his Quarrell, whose Estates
Are sunk in his: and in no place receiv'd,

Hath found out Ægypt, by him yet not ruin'd:
And Ptolomy, things conſider'd, juſtly may
Complaine of Pompey: wherefore ſhould he ſtaine
Our Ægypt, with the ſpots of Civill warre?
Or make the peaceable, or quiet Nyle
Doubted of Cæſar? wherefore ſhould he draw
His loſſe, and overthrow upon our heads?
Or chooſe this place to ſuffer in? already
We have offended Cæſar, in our wiſhes,
And no way left us to redeeme his favour
But by the hand of Pompey.

Ach. Great Oſiris,
Defend thy Ægypt from ſuch cruelty,
And barbarous ingratitude!

Pho. Holy trifles,
And not to have place in deſignes of State;
This ſword, which Fate commands me to unſheath,
I would not draw on Pompey, If not vanquiſh'd,
I grant it rather ſhould have paſs'd through Cæſar,
But we muſt follow where his fortune leads us;
All provident Princes meaſure their intents
According to their power: and ſo diſpoſe them;
And thinkſt thou (Ptolomy) that thou canſt prop
His Ruines, under whom ſad Rome now ſuffers?
Or tempt the Conquerours force when 'tis confirm'd?
Shall we, that in the Battail ſate as Neuters
Serve him that's over-come? No, no, heers loſt:
And though 'tis noble to a ſinking friend
To lend a helping hand while there is hope
He may recover, thy part not engag'd:
Though one moſt deare, when all his hopes are dead,
To drowne him, ſet thy foote upon his head.

Ach. Moſt execrable Councell.

Achil. To be follow'd,
'Tis for the Kingdomes ſafety.

Ptol. We give up
Our abſolute power to thee: diſpoſe of it
As reaſon ſhall direct thee.

Pho. Good Achillas,
Seeke out Septimius: doe you but ſooth him,
He is already wrought: leave the diſpatch
To me; of Labienus: 'tis determin'd
Already how you ſhall proceed: nor Fate
Shall alter it, ſince now the dye is caſt,
But that this hour to Pompey is his laſt. Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Apollodorus, Eros, Arſino.

Ap. Is the Queen ſtirring (Eros?)

Er. Yes, for in truth
Shee touch'd no bed to night.

Ap. I am ſorry for it,
And wiſh it were in me, with my hazzard
To give her eaſe.

Arſ. Sir, ſhe accepts your will,
And does acknowledge ſhe hath found you noble,
So far, as if reſtraint of liberty
Could give admiſſion to a thought of mirth,
Shee is your debtor for it.

Ap. Did you tell her
Of the ſports I have prepar'd to entertaine her?
Shee was us'd to take delight, with her faire hand,
To angle in the Nyle, where the glad fiſh
(As if they knew who 'twas ſought to deceive 'em)
Contended to be taken: other times
To ſtrike the Stag, who wounded by her arrows,
Forgot his teares in death, and kneeling thanks her
To his laſt gaſpe, then prouder of his Fate,
Then if with Garlands Crown'd, he had been choſen
To fall a Sacrifice before the altar
Of the Virgin Huntreſſe: the King, nor great Photinus
Forbid her any pleaſure; and the Circuite
In which ſhe is confin'd, gladly affords
Variety of paſtimes, which I would
Encreaſe with my beſt ſervice.

Er. O, but the thought
That ſhe that was borne free, and to diſpence
Reſtraint, or liberty to others, ſhould be
At the devotion of her Brother, whom
She only knows her equall, makes this place
In which ſhe lives (though ſtor'd with all delights)
A loathſome dungeon to her.

Ap. Yet, (how ere
She ſhall interpret it) I'le not be wanting
To do my beſt to ſerve her: I have prepar'd
Choiſe Muſicke neare her Cabinet, and compos'd
Some few lines, (ſet unto a ſolemn time)
In the praiſe of impriſonment. Begin boy.

The Song.

Looke out bright eyes, and bleſſe the ayre:
Even in ſhadowes you are faire.
Shut-up-beauty is like fire,
That breakes out clearer ſtill and higher.
Though your body be confin'd,
And ſoft Love a priſoner bound,
Yet the beauty of your mind,
Neither checke, nor chaine hath found.
Looke out nobly then, and dare,
Even the Fetters that you weare.

Enter Cleopatra.

Cleo. But that we are aſſur'd this taſts of duty,
And love in you (my Guardian) and deſire
In you (my Siſter) and the reſt, to pleaſe us,
We ſhould receive this, as a lawcy rudeneſſe
Offer'd our private thoughts. But your intents
Are to delight us: alas, you waſh an Ethiop:
Can Cleopatra, while ſhe does remember
Whoſe daughter ſhe is, and whoſe Siſter? (O
I ſuffer in the name) and that (in Juſtice)
There is no place in Ægypt, where I ſtand,
But that the tributary Earth is proud
To kiſſe the foote of her, that is her Queen,
Can ſhe (I ſay) that is all this, e're reliſh
Of comfort, or delight, while baſe Photinus,
Bond man Achillas, and all other monſters
That raigne ore Ptolomy, make that a Court,
Where they reſide, and this, where I a Priſoner?
But there's a Rome, a Senate, and a Cæſar,
(Though the great Pompey leane to Ptolomy)
May thinke of Cleopatra.

Ap. Pompey (Madam?)

Cleo. What of him? ſpeake: if ill (Apollodorus)
It is my happineſſe: and for thy newes
Receive a favour (Kings have kneel'd in vaine for)
And kiſſe my hand.

Ap. Heers loſt.

Cleo. Speake it againe?

Ap. His army routed: he fled and purſu'd

By the all-conquering Cesar.
Cleo. Whether bends he?
Ap. To Egypt.
Cleo. Ha! in person?
Ap. 'Tis receiv'd,
For an undoubted truth,
Cleo. I live againe,
And if assurance of my love, and beauty
Deceive me not, I now shall finde a Judge,
To do me right: but how to free my selfe,
And get accesse? the Guardes are strong upon me,
This doore I must passe through, Appollodorus;
Thou often hast profess'd (to do me service,)
Thy life was not thine owne.
Ap. I am not alterd;
And let your excellency propound a meanes,
In which I may but give the least assistance,
That may restore you, to that you were borne to,
(Though it call on the anger of the King,
Or, (what's more daedly) all his Minion
Photinus can do to me, I, unmov'd,
Offer my throate to serve you: ever provided,
It beare some probable shew to be effected,
To loose my selfe upon no ground, were madnesse:
Not loyall duty.
Cleo. Stand off: to thee alone,
I will discover what I dare not trust
My Sister with, Cesar is amarous,
And taken more with the title of a Queene,
Then feature or proportion, he lov'd Evnoe;
A More, deformed too, I have heard, that brought
No other object to inflame his blood,
But that her husband was a King, on both
He did bestow rich presents; shall I then,
That with a Pincly birth, bring beauty with me,
That know to prize my selfe at mine owne rate,
Despaire his favour? art thou mine?
Ap. I am.
Cleo. I have found out a way shall bring me to him,
Spight of Photinus watches, if I prosper,
(As I am confident I shall) expect
Things greater then thy wishes, though I purchase
His grace, with losse of my virginity,
It skills not, if it bring home Majesty. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus Scena Prima.

Enter Septimius, with a head, Achillas Guard.

Sep. 'Tis here, 'tis done, behold you fearefull viewers,
Shake, and behold the modell of the world here,
The pride, and strength, looke, looke againe, 'tis finished;
That, that whole Armyes, nay whole nations,
Many and mighty Kings, have been strooke blinde at,
And fled before wingd with their feares and terrours,
That steele warr waited on, and fortune courted,
That high plum'd honour built up for her owne:
Behold that mightinesse, behold that fierceneſſe,
Behold that child of warr, with all his glories;
By this poore hand made breathlesse, here (my Achillas,
Egypt, and Cesar, owe me for this service,
And all the conquer'd Nations.
Ach. Peace Septimius,
Thy words sound more ungratefull then thy actions,
Though sometimes safety seeke an instrument
Of thy unworthy nature, thou (loud boaster)
Think not she is bound to love him too, that's barbarous,
Why did not I, if this be meritorious
And bindes the King unto me, and his bounties,
Strike this rude stroke? I'le tell thee (thou poore Roman)
It was a sacred head, I durst not heave at,
Not heave a thought.
Sep. It was.
Ach. I'le tell thee truely,
And if thou ever yet heard'st tell of honour,
I'le make thee blush: It was thy Generall:
That mans that fed thee once, that mans that bred thee,
The aire thou breath'st was his: the fire that warm'd thee;
From his care kindled ever, nay, I'le show thee,
(Because I'le make thee sensible of thy businesse:
And why a noble man durst not touch at it)
There was no peece of Earth, thou puts thy foote on
But was his conquest; and he gave thee motion,
He triumph'd three times, who durst touch his person?
The very walls of Rome, bow'd to his presence,
Deare to the Gods he was, to them that feard him
A faire and noble Enemy, didst thou hate him?
And for thy love to Cesar, sought his ruine?
Armed the red Poarsalian feilds (Septimius)
Where killing was in grace, and wounds were glorious,
Where Kings were faire competitours for honour,
Thou should'st have come up to him, there have fought him.
There, sword, to sword.
Sep. I kill'd him on commandment,
If Kings commands be faire, when you all fainted,
When none of you durst looke ——
Ach. On deeds so barbarous,
What hast thou got?
Sep. The Kings love, and his bounty,
The honour of the service, which though you raile at;
On a thousand envious soules fling their foames on me,
Will dignifie the cause, and make me glorious:
And I shall live.
Ach. A miserable villaine,
What reputation, and reward belongs to it?
Thus (with the head) I seize on, and make mine;
And be not impudent to aske me why (Sirha)
Nor bold to stay, read in mine eyes, the reason:
The shame and obloquy, I leave thine owne,
Inherit those rewardes, they are fitter for thee,
Your oyles spent, and your snuff stinks: go out basely.
Sep. The King will yet consider. Exit.

Enter Ptolomy, Athenes, Photinus.

Achil. Here he comes Sir.
Ach. Yet if it be undone: heare me great Sir,
If this inhumane breake be yet unbrooken,
If that adored head be not yet severd
From the most noble Body, weigh the miseryes:
The desolations that this great Eclipse works,
You are young, be provident: fix not your Empire
Upon the Tombe of him, will shake all Egypt,
Whose warlike groanes will raise ten thousand Spirits,
(Great as himselfe) in every hand a thunder;
Destructions darting from their lookes and sorrowes,
That easy womens eyes shall never empty.
Pho. You have done well; and 'tis done, see Achillas,
And in his hand the head.
Ptol. Stay come no nearer,
Me thinks I feele the very earth shake under me,
I do remember him, he was my guardian,
Appointed by the Senate to preserve me:
What a full Majesty sits in his face yet?
Pho. The King is troubled: be not frighted Sir,

Be

Be not abus'd with feares; his death was neceſſary,
If you conſider (Sir) moſt neceſſary,
Not to be miſs'd: and humbly thanke great Iſis:
He came ſo opportunely to your hands;
Pitty muſt now give place to rules of ſafety,
Is not victorious Cæſar, new arriv'd:
And enter'd Alexandria, with his friends,
His Navy riding by to wait his charges?
Did he not beate this Pompey, and purſude him?
Was not this great man, his great enemy?
This Godlike vertuous man, as people held him,
But what foole dare be friend to flying vertue?

Enter Cæſar, Anthony, Dollobella, Sceva.

I heare their Trumpets, 'tis too late to ſtagger,
Give me the head, and be you confident:
Haile Conquerour, and head of all the world,
Now this head's off.

Cæſar. Ha?

Pbo. Do not ſhun me (Cæſar)
From kingly Ptolomy, I bring this preſent,
The Crowne, and ſweat of thy Pharſalian labour:
The goale and marke of high ambitious honour,
Before thy victory had no name (Cæſar)
Thy travell and thy loſſe of blood, no recompence,
Thou dreamſt of being worthy, and of warr;
And all thy furious conflicts were but ſlumbers,
Here they take life: here they inherit honour,
Grow fixt, and ſhoot up everlaſting triupmhes,
Take it, and looke upon thy humble ſervant,
With noble eyes looke on the Princely Ptolomy,
That offers with this head (moſt mighty Cæſar)
What thou would'ſt once have given for it, all Egypt.

Ach. Nor do not queſtion it (moſt royall Conquerour)
Nor diſ-eſteeme the benefit that meetes thee,
Becauſe 'tis eaſily got, it comes the ſafer:
Yet let me tell thee (moſt imperious Cæſar)
Though he oppos'd no ſtrength of Swords to win this,
Nor labourd through no ſhowres of darts, and lances:
Yet here he found a fort, that faced him ſtrongly
An inward warr: he was his Grand fires Gueſt,
Friend to his Father, and when he was expell'd
And beaten from this Kingdome by ſtrong hand,
And had none left him, to reſtore his honour,
No hope to finde a friend, in ſuch a miſery;
Then in ſtept Pompey: tooke his feeble fortune:
Strengthend, and cheriſh'd it, and ſet it right againe;
This was a love to Ceſar.

Sceva. Give me, hate, Gods.

Pbo. This Ceſar, may account a little wicked,
But yet remember, if thine owne hands (Conquerour)
Had fallen upon him, what it had bin then?
If thine owne Sword had touch'd his throat, what that way!
He was thy Son in law, there to be tainted,
Had bin moſt terrible: let the worſt be rendered,
We have deſerv'd for keeping thy hands innocent.

Ceſar. Oh Sceva, Sceva, ſee that head: ſee Captaines,
The head of godlike Pompey.

Sce. He was baſely ruinde,
But let the Gods be griev'd that ſuffer'd it,
And be you Ceſar——

Ceſar. Oh thou Conquerour,
Thou glory of the world once, now the pitty:
Thou awe of Nations, wherefore didſt thou fall thus?
What poore fate followed thee, and pluckt thee on
To truſt thy ſacred life to an Egyptian;
The life and light of Rome, to a blind ſtranger:
That honourable war nere taught a nobleneſſe,
Nor worthy circumſtance ſhew'd what a man was,
That never heard thy name ſung, but in banquets;
And looſe laſcivious pleaſures? to a Boy,
That had no faith to comprehend thy greatneſſe:
No ſtudy of thy life to know thy goodneſſe;
And leave thy Nation, nay, thy noble friend,
Leave him (diſtruſted) that in teares falls with thee?
(In ſoft relenting teares) heare me (great Pompey
(If thy great ſpirit can heare) I muſt taske thee:
Thou haſt moſt unnobly rob'd me of my victory,
My love, and mercy.

Ant. O how brave theſe teares ſhew?
How excellent is ſorrow in an Enemy?

Dol. Glory appeares not greater then this goodneſſe.

Ceſar. Egyptians, dare you thinke your high Pyramides,
Built to out-dare the Sun, as you ſuppoſe,
Where your unworthy Kings, lye rak'd in aſhes:
Are monuments fit for him? no, (brood of Nilus)
Nothing can cover his high fame, but heaven;
No Pyramides ſet off his memoryes:
But the eternall ſubſtance of his greateneſſe
To wich I leave him, take the head away,
And (with the body) give it noble buriall,
Your Earth ſhall now be bleſs'd to hold a Roman,
Whoſe braveryes all the worlds-earth cannot ballance.

Sce. If thou bee'ſt thus loving, I ſhall honour thee,
But great men may diſſemble; 'tis held poſſible,
And be right glad of what they ſeeme to weepe for,
Where are ſuch kinde of Phyloſophers; now do I wonder
How he would looke if Pompey were alive againe,
But how he would ſet his face?

Ceſar. You looke now (King)
And you that have beene Agents in this glory,
For our eſpeciall favour?

Ptol. We deſire it.

Ceſar. And doubt leſſe you expect rewards.

Sce. Let me give 'em:
I'le give 'em ſuch as nature never dreampt of,
I'le beat him and his Agents (in a morter)
Into one man, and that one man I'le bake then.

Ceſar. Peace: I forgive you all that's recompence:
You are young, and ignorant, that pleads your pardon,
And feare it may be more then hate provok'd ye;
Your Miniſters I muſt thinke wanted judgement,
And ſo they erd: I am bountifull to thinke this;
Beleeve me moſt bountifull: Be you moſt thankfull,
That bounty ſhare amongſt ye; if I knew
What to ſend you for a preſent King of Egypt,
(I meane a head of equall reputation
And that you lov'd) though it were your brighteſt Siſters,
(But her you hate) I would not be behinde ye.

Ptol. Heare me (great Ceſar.)

Ceſar. I heave hard too much
And ſtudy not with ſmooth ſhewes, to invade
My noble minde, as you have done my conquell:
Ye are poore and open: I muſt tell you roundly,
That man that could not recompence the benefits;
The great and bounteous ſervices of Pompey
Can never doate upon the name of Ceſar;
Though I had hated Pompey, and allowd his ruine,
I gave you no comiſſion to performe it:
Haſty to pleaſe in blood, are ſeldome truſty,
And but I ſtand in friend with my victories;
My fortune never failing to be friend me,
My noble ſtrengthes, and friends about my perſon,
I durſt not trye ye, nor expect a courtſy,
Above the pious love, you ſhewd to Pompey,
You have found me merciſull in arguing with ye:

Swords,

Swordes, Hangers, Fires, destructions of all natures,
Demolishments of Kingdomes, and whole Ruines
Are wont to be my Orators, turne to teares,
You wretched, and poore Seedes of Sun-burnt Egypt,
And now you have found the nature of a Conquerour,
That you cannot decline, with all your flatteries,
That where the day gives light, will be himselfe still.
Know how to meet his worth with humane courtesies,
Go, and embalme those bones of that great Souldier;
Howle round about his pile, fling on your Spices,
Make a Sabean bed, and place this Phenix
Where the hot Sun may emulate his vertues,
And draw another Pompey from his ashes
Divinely great, and fixe him 'mongst the worthies.
Ptol. We will doe all.
Cæsar. You have rob'd him of those teares
His kindred, and his friends kept sacred for him:
The Virgins of their funerall Lamentations:
And that kind Earth that thought to cover him,
(His Countries Earth) will cry out 'gainst your cruelties,
And weepe unto the Ocean for revenge,
Till Nilus raise his seven heads and devoure ye:
My griefe has stopt the rest; when Pompey liv'd
He us'd you nobly, now he is dead, use him so. Exit.
Ptol Now where's your confidence your aime (Photinus)
The Oracles, and faire Favors from the Conquerour
You rung into mine eares? how stand I now?
You see the tempest of his sterne displeasure,
The death of him you urged a Sacrifice
To stop his rage, presaging a full ruine;
Where are your Councells now?
Ach. I told ye Sir,
(And told the truth) what danger would fly after:
And though an Enemie, I satisfied you
He was a Roman, and the top of honour;
And howsoever this might please great Cæsar,
I told ye that the fowlenesse of his death
The impious basenesse ——
Pho. Peace, ye are a foole,
Men of deepe ends, must tread as deepe waies to'm;
Cæsar I know is pleas'd, and for all his sorrowes
(Which are put on for formes and meere dissemblings)
I am confident he's glad: to have told ye so,
And thanke ye outwardly, had bin too open,
And taken from the wisedome of a Conquerour.
Be confident, and proud ye have done this service;
Ye have deserv'd, and ye will finde it highly:
Make bold use of this benefit, and be sure
You keepe your Sister, (the high-sould-Cleopatra,)
Both close and short enough, she may not see him:
The rest, if I may counsell sir. ——
Ptol. Doe all:
For in thy faithfull service rests my safetie. Exit.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Septimius.

Sep. Heere's a strange alteration in the Court;
Mens faces are of other sets, and motions,
Their minds of subtler stuffe: I passe by now
As though I were a Rascall, no man knowes me,
No eye lookes after: as I were a plague,
Their doores shut close against me: and I wondred at
Because I have done a meritorious Murther,
Because I have pleas'd the Time, does the Time plague me?
I have knowne the day they would have hugged me for it:
For a lesse stroke then this, have done me reverence:
Opend their hearts, and secret closets to me
Their purses, and their pleasures, and bid me wallow.
I now perceive the great Thoeus eate the lasse,
And the huge *Le*viathans of Villany
Sup up the merits, nay themen and all
That doe them service, and spowt 'em out againe
Into the ayre, as thin, and unregarded
As drops of water; that are lost i'th Ocean;
I was lov'd once for swearing, and for drinking,
And for other principall Qualities, that became me,
Now a foolish unthankfull murther has undone me,
If my Lord Photinus be not mercifull Enter Photinus.
That set me on: And he comes, now fortune.
Pho. Cæsars unthankfulnesse a little stirrs me
A little frets my blood: take heede, proud Roman,
Provoke me not; stir not my anger farther:
I may finde out a way unto thy life too,
(Though arm'd in all thy Victories) and seize it,
A Conquerour has a heart, and I may hit it.
Sep. May it please your Lordship?
Pho. O Septimius!
Sep. Your Lordship knowes my wrongs.
Pho. Wrongs?
Sep. Yes my, Lord,
How the Captaine of the Guard Achillas, slights me.
Pho. Thinke better of him, he has much befriended thee,
Shew'd thee much love in taking the head from thee.
The times are altered (Souldier) Cæsars angry,
And our designe to please him, lost, and perish'd:
Be glad thou art unnam'd 'tis not worth the owning;
Yet, that thou maist be usefull ——
Sep. Yes my Lord,
I shall be ready.
Pho. For I may employ thee
To take a rubbe or too out of my way
As time shall serve: say that it be a Brother?
Or a hard Father?
Sep. 'Tis most necessary,
A Mother, or a Sister; or whom you please (sir.)
Pho. Or to betray a noble friend.
Sep. Tis all one.
Pho. I know thou wilt stir for gold.
Sep. Tis all my motion.
Pho. There take that for thy service, and farewell:
I have greater businesse now.
Sep. I am still your owne, Sir.
Pho. One thing I charge thee, see me no more (Septimius)
Vnlesse I send. Exit.
Sep. I shall observe your houre.
So, this brings towching in the mouth; some savour,
This is the Lord I serve, the power I worship,
My friends, Allyes, And here lyes my Allegeance.
Let people talke as they please of my rudenesse,
And shun me for my deede: bring but this to'em,
(Let me be damn'd for blood) yet still I am honourable,
This God creates new tongues, and new affections:
And though I had kill'd my Father, give me gold,
I'le make men sweare I have done a pious Sacrifice.
Now I will out-brave all: make all my Servants,
And my brave deed shall be wine, for vertuous.
Exit.

Scena

Scena Tertia.

Enter Cæsar, Antony, Dollobella, Sceva.

Cæsar. Keepe strong guardes, and with wary eyes (my friends)
There is no trusting to these base Egyptians:
They that are false to pious benefits,
And make compelld necessityes their faithes
Are traitors to the Gods.
Ant. Weel'e call a shore,
A legion of the best.
Cæsar. Not a man (Antony)
That were to shew our feares, and dim our greatnesse:
No 'tis enough my name's a shore.
Sce. Too much too,
A sleeping Cæsar, is enough to shake them;
There are some two or three malitious Rascalls
Trained up in villany, besides that Cerberus
That Roman dog, that lick'd the blood of Pompey.
Dol. 'Tis strange, a Roman Souldier?
Sce. You are cozend,
There be of us, as be of all other nations,
Villaines, and Knaves; 'tis not the name containes him,
But the obedience: when that's once forgotten,
And duty flung away, then welcom Devill,
Ptotinus and Achillas, and this vermine:
That's now become a naturall Crocadile,
Must be with care obseru'd.
Ant. And 'tis well counsell'd
No confidence, nor trust——
Sce. Ile trust the Sea first,
When with her hollow murmurs she invites me,
And cluches in her stormes, as politique Lyons
Conceale their clawes: Ile trust the Devill first:
The rule of ill, I le trust before the dore.
Cæsar. Go to your rests: & follow your own wisedomes,
And leave me to my thoughts: pray no more complement,
Once more strong watches.
Dol. All shall be observ'd, Sir. Exit.
Cæsar. I am dull, and heavy: yet I cannot sleepe,
How happy was I, in my lawfull warrs
In Germany, and Gaul, and Britany?
When euery night with pleasure I sat downe
What the day ministred? the sleepe came sweetely.
But since I undertooke this home-division,
This civill war, and past the Rubicon,
What have I done, that speakes an antient Roman?
A good, great Man? I have enterd Rome by force,
And on her tender wombe, (that gave me life)
Let my insulting Souldiers rudely trample,
The deare vaines of my Country, I have opend
And saild upon the torrents that flowd from her,
The bloody streames, that in their confluence
Carried before 'em thousand desolations;
I rob'd the treasury, and at one gripe
Snatch'd all the wealth, so many worthy triumphs,
Placed there as sacred to the peace of Rome;
I raiz'd Massilia, in my wanton anger:
Petreius and Affrinius I defeated.
Pompey I over threw; what did that get me?
The slubbord name of an authoriz'd enemy; noise within.
I heare some noises: they are the watches sure,
What friends have I tyde fast, by these ambitiones?
Cato, the lover of his Countryes freedom
Is past now into Affrik, to affront me,
Juba, (that kill'd my friend) is up in armes too:
The Sonnes of Pompey, are Masters of the Sea,
And from the reliques of their scatterd faction,
A new head's sprung: Say I defeate all these too:
I come home Crown'd an honourable Rebell,
I heare the noise still, and it comes still nearer:
Are the guards fast? who waites there?

Enter Sceva, with a packet, Cleopatra in it.

Sce. Are ye awake Sir?
Cæsar 'Ith name of wonder.
Sce. Nay I am a Porter,
A strong one too: or else my sides would cracke Sir,
And my sinnes were as waighty, I should scarce walke with 'em.
Cæsar. What hast thou there?
Sce. Aske them which stay without,
And brought it hither, your presence I denide 'em:
And put 'em by: tooke up the load my selfe,
They say 'tis rich: and valude at the Kingdome,
I am sure 'tis heavy: if you like to see it;
You may, if not I'le give it back.
Cæsar. Stay Sceva,
I would faine see it.
Sce. I'le begin to worke then:
No doubt to flatter ye, they have sent ye something,
Of a rich vallue, Iewells, or some Treasure;
May be a Rogue within, to do a mischief:
I pray you stand farther off, if there be villany,
Better my danger first: he shall scape hard too,
Ha? what art thou?
Cæsar. Stand farther off (good Sceva)
What heavenly vision? do I wake or slumber?
Farther off that hand friend.
Sce. What apparition,
What Spirit have I rais'd? sure 'tis a woman:
She lookes like one: Now she begins to move too:
A tempting Devill, ô my life: go off Cæsar,
Blesse thy selfe off, a baud growne in mine old dayes?
Bawdry advanced upon my back? 'tis noble;
Sir, if you be a Souldier come no nearer,
She is sent to dispossesse you of your honour,
A spunge, a spunge, to wipe away your victories:
And she would be coold (Sir) let the Souldiers trim her?
They'le give her that she came for, and dispatch her;
Be loyall to your selfe: thou damned woman
Do'st thou come hither with thy flourishes,
Thy flaunts, and faces, to abuse mens manners?
And am I made the instrument of bawdry?
I'le finde a lover for ye, one shall hugg ye;
Cæsar. Hold on thy life: and be more temperate,
Thou beast.
Sce. Thou beast?
Cæsar. Could'st thou be so inhumane,
So farr from noble men to draw thy weapon,
Upon a thing divine?
Sce. Divine, or humane,
They are never better pleas'd, nor more at harts-ease,
Then when we draw with full intent upon 'em.
Cæsar. Move this way (Lady)
Pray ye let me speake to ye.
Sce. And woman, you had best stand.
Cæsar. By the Gods,
But that I see her here, and hope her mortall:
I should imagine some celestiall sweetnesse,
The treasure of soft love.
Sce. Oh, this soundes mangely,
Poorely; and scurvely in a Souldiers mouth:

You

You had best be troubled with the Tooth-ach too:
For lovers ever are, and let your nose drop
That your celestiall beauty may be-friend ye:
At these yeares do you learne to be fantasticall?
After so many bloody feildes, a foole?
She brings her bed along too; shee'le loose no time,
Carryes her Litter to lye soft, do you see that?
Invites ye like a Gamster: note that impudence,
For shame reflect upon your selfe, your honour,
Looke back into your noble parts and blush:
Let not the deare sweat of the hot Pharsalia,
Mingle with base Embraces; am I he
That have receiv'd so many woundes for Cæsar?
Upon my Target, groves of darts still growing?
Have I endur'd all hungers, colds, distresses,
And as I had been bred that Iron that arm'd me)
Stood out all weathers, now to curse my fortune?
To ban the blood I lost for such a Generall?
Cæsar. Offend no more: be gon.
Sce. I will, and leave ye,
Leave ye to womens wars, that will proclaime ye:
You'le conquer Rome now, and the Capitoll
With Fans, and Looking-glasses, farwell Cæsar.
Cleo. Now I am private sir, I dare speake to ye:
But thus low first, for as a God I honour ye.
Sce. Lower you'le be anon.
Cæsar. Away.
Sce. And privater,
For that you covet all. Exit.
Cæsar. Tempt me no farther.
Cleo. Contemne me not, because I know thus (Cæsar)
I am a Queene, and coheire to this country,
The sister to the mighty Ptolomy,
Yet one distressd, that flyes unto thy justice,
One that layes sacred hold on thy protection
As on a holy Altar, to preserve me.
Cæsar. Speake Queene of beauty, and stand up.
Cleo. I dare not,
Till I have found that favour in thine eyes,
That godlike great humanity to helpe me,
Thus, to thy knees must I grow: (sacred Cæsar,)
And if it be not in thy will, to right me,
And raise me like a Queene from my sad ruines,
If these soft teares cannot sinke to thy pitty,
And waken with their murmurs thy compassions:
Yet for thy nobleness, for vertues sake,
And if thou beest a man, for despird beauty,
For honourable conquest, which thou do'st on:
Let not those cankers of this flourishing Kingdome,
Pontinus, and Achillas, (the one an Eunuch,)
The other a base bondman, thus raigne over me,
Seize my inheritance, and leave my brother
Nothing of what he should be, but the Title:
As thou art wonder of the world.
Cæsar. Stand up then
And be a Queene, this hand shall give it to ye,
Or chose a greater name, worthy my bounty:
A common love makes Queenes: chose to be worshiped,
To be divinely great, and I dare promise it,
A suitor of your sort, and blessed sweetnesse:
That hath adventur'd thus to see great Cæsar,
Must never be denied, you have found a patron
That dare not in his private honour, suffer
So great a blemish to the heaven of beauty:
The God of love would clap his angry wings,
And from his singing bow, let flye those arrowes
Headed with burning grieves, and pining sorrowes:
Should I neglect your cause, would make me monstrous,
To whom and to your service I devote me.
Enter Sceva.
Cle. He is my conquest now, and so He worke him,
The conquerour of the world will I lead captive,
Sce. Still with this woman? tilting still with Babies?
As you are honest thinke the Enemy,
Some valiant Foe indeed now charging on ye:
Ready to breake your ranks, and sling these——
Cæsar. Heare me,
But tell me true, if thou hadst such a treasure:
(And as thou art a Souldier, do not flatter me)
Such a bright gem, brought to thee, wouldst thou not
Most greedily accept?
Sce. Not as an Emperour,
A man that first would rule him selfe, then others,
As a poore hungry Souldier, I might bite, Sir,
Yet that's a weaknesse too: heare me, thou Tempter:
And heare thou Cæsar too, for it concerns thee,
And if thy flesh be deaf yet let thine honour,
The soule of a commander, give eare to me,
Thou wanton bane of warr, thou guilded Lethergy,
In whose embraces, ease (the rust of Armes)
And pleasure, (that makes Souldiers poore) inhabites.
Cæsar. Fye, thou blaspheme'st.
Sce. I do, when she is a goddesse,
Thou melter of strong mindes, dar'st thou presume
To smother all his triumphes, with thy vanityes,
And tye him like a flave, to thy proud beautyes?
To thy imperious lookes? that Kings have followd
Proud of their chaines? have waited on? shame Sir. Exit.
Cæsar. Alas thou art rather mad: take thy rest Sceva,
Thy duty makes thee erre, but I forgive thee:
Go: go I say, shew me no disobedience:
'Tis well, farewell, the day will breake dare Lady,
My Souldiers will come in: please you retire,
And thinke upon your servant?
Cleo. Pray you Sir, know me,
And what I am.
Cæsar. The greater, I more love ye,
And you must know me too.
Cleo. So far as modesty,
And majesty gives leave Sir, ye are too violent.
Cæsar. You are too cold to my desires.
Cleo. Sweare to me,
And by your selfe (for I hold that oath sacred)
You will right me as a Queene——
Cæsar. These lips be witnesse,
And if I breake that oath——
Cleo. You make me blush Sir,
And in that blush interpret me.
Cæsar. I will do,
Come let's go in, and blush again? this one word,
You shall beleeve. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius Scena Prima.

Enter Ptolomy, Pothinus.

Pho. GOod Sir, but heare.
Ptol. No more, you have undon me,
That, that I hourely fear, is falne upon me,
And heavily, and deadly.
Pho. Heare a remedy.
Ptol. A remedy now the disease is ulcerous?

And has infected all your ſecure negligence
Has broke through all the hopes I have, and ruinde me:
My Siſter is with Cæſar, in his chamber,
All night ſhe has bin with him; and no doubt
Much to her honour.
Pho. Would that were the worſt, Sir,
That will repaire it ſelfe: but I feare mainely,
She has made her peace with Cæſar.
Ptol. 'Tis moſt likely,
And what am I then?
Pho. 'Plague upon that Raſcall
Apollodorus, under whoſe command,
Under whoſe eye—— Enter Achillas.
Ptol. Curſe on you all, ye are wreches.
Pho. 'Twas providently don (Achillas.
Achil. Pardon me. (watchfull.
Pho. Your guardes were rarely wiſe, and woundrous
Achil. I could not helpe it, if my life had laine for't,
Alas, who would ſuſpect a pack of bedding:
Or a ſmall Truſſe of houſhould furniture?
And as they ſaide for Cæſars uſe: nor who durſt
(Being for his private chamber) ſeeke to ſtop it?
I was abuſed. Enter Acboreus.
Ach. 'Tis no hower now for anger:
No wiſedome to debate with fruitleſſe choler,
Let us conſider timely what we muſt do,
Since ſhe is flowne to his protection:
From whom we have no power to ſever her,
Nor force conditions——
Ptol. Speake (good Acboreus)
Ach. Let indirect and crooked counſells vaniſh,
And ſtraight, and faire directions——
Pho. Speake your minde Sir.
Ach. Let us chooſe Cæſar, and endeare him to us,)
An Arbitrator in all differences;
Betwixt you, and your ſiſter; this is ſafe now:
And will ſhew off, moſt honourable.
Pho. Baſe,
Moſt baſe and poore; a ſervile, cold ſubmiſſion: (lours,
Heare me, and pluck your hearts up, like ſtout Counſel-
Since we are ſenſible this Cæſar loades us,
And have begun our fortune, with great Pompey
Be of my minde.
Ach. 'Tis moſt uncomely ſpoken,
And if I ſay moſt bloodily, I lye not:
The law of hoſpitality, it poyſons,
And calls the Gods in queſtion that dwell in us,
Be wiſe O King.
Ptol. I will be: go my counſellours,
To Cæſar go, and do my humble ſervice:
To my faire ſiſter my commends negotiate,
And here I cuteſie what e're thou treatſt on.
Ach. Crown'd with faire peace, I go. Exit.
Ptol. My love go with thee,
And from my love go you, you cruell vipers:
You ſhall know now I am no ward, Photinus. Exit.
Pho. This for our ſervices
Princes do their pleaſures,
And they that ſerve obey in all diſgraces:
The loweſt we can fall to, is our graves;
There we ſhall know no difference: heark Achillas,
I may do ſomething yet, when times are ripe,
To tell this rare unthankfull King.
Achil. Photinus,
What e're it be I ſhall make one: and zealouſly:
For better dye attempting ſomething nobly,
Then fall diſgraced.
Pho. Thou lou'ſt me and 't thanke thee. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Antony, Dollobella, Sceva.

Dol. Nay there's no rowſing him: he is bewitcht ſure,
His noble blood curdled, and cold within him;
Growne now a womans warriour.
Sce. And a tall one:
Studies her fortifications, and her breaches,
And how he may advance his ram to batter
The Bullwarke of her chaſtitie.
Ant. Be not too angry,
For by this light, the woman's a rare woman,
A Lady of that catching youth, and beauty,
That unmatch'd ſweetneſſe——
Dol. But why ſhould he be foold ſo?
Let her be what ſhe will, why ſhould his wiſedome,
His age, and honour——
Ant. Say it were your owne caſe,
Or mine, or any mans, that has heate in him:
'Tis true at this time when he has no promiſe
Of more ſecurity then his ſword can cut through,
I do not hold it ſo diſcreete: but a good face (Gentleman)
And eyes that are the winningſt Orators:
A youth that opens like perpetuall ſpring,
And to all theſe, a tongue that can deliver
The Oracles of Love——
Sce. I would you had her,
With all her Oracles, and Miracles,
She were fitter for your turne.
Ant. Would I had (Sceva)
With all her faultes too: let me alone to mend 'em,
O that condition I made thee mine heire. (loſe
Sce. I had rather have your black horſe, then your hir-
Dol. Cæſar writes Sonnets now, the ſound of war
Is growne to boyſtrous for his mouth, he fighes too.
Sce. And learnes to ſolle moſt mellodiouſly,
And ſings, 'twould make your eares prick up, to heare him
Shortly ſhe'le make him ſpin. &c 'tis thought (Gent.)
He will prove an admirable maker of Bonelace,
And what a rare guilt will that be in a generall?
Ant. I would he could abſtaine.
Sce. She is a witch ſure,
And workes upon him with ſome damn'd inchantment.
Dol. How cunning ſhe will cary her behaviours,
And ſet her countenance in a thouſand poſtures:
To catch her ends?
Sce. She will be ſick, well, fallen,
Merry, coy, over-joyd, and ſecure to dye
All in one halfe an houre, to make an aſſe of him,
I make no doubt ſhe will be drunk too: dammably,
And in her drinke will fight, then ſhe fits him.
Ant. That thou ſhoulds bring her in!
Sce. 'Twas my blinde fortune,
My Souldiers told me, by the waite 'twas wicked:
Would I had carried Nilus Bull a furlong,
When I brought in this Cow: Cæſar has advanced me,
From an old Soldier, to a bawd of memory:
O, that the bones of Pompey were behinde him,
The honor'd Cato, and brave Portia with 'em,
That they might whip him from his whore, & rowze him:
That their feirce Trumpets, from his wanton trances,
Might ſhake him like an Earthquake!
Enter Septimius.
Ant. Whose this fellow? (clothes,
Dol. Why, a brave fellow, if we judge men by their
Ant. By

Ant. By my faith he is brave indeed: he's no cõmander.
Sce. Yes, he has a Roman face, he has been at faire wars
And plenteous too, and rich, his Trappings shew it.
Sep. And they will not know me now, they'l never know
Who dare blush now at my acquaintance? ha? (me,
Am I not totally a span-new Gallant
Fit for the choycest eyes? have I not gold?
The friendship of the world? if they shun me now?
(Though I were the arrantest Rogue, as I am well for-Mine owne curse, and the Devills are light on me. (ward,
Ant. Is't not Septimius?
Sce. Yes.
Dol. He that killd Pompey?
Sce. The same: Dogs, Scrs, that guilded botch, that rascal
Dol. How glorious villany appeares in Egypt?
Sep. Gallants, and Soldiers, sure they doe admire me.
Sce. Stand further off, thou stinkest
Sep. A likely matter:
These Cloaths smell mustily, doe they not Gallants?
They stinke they stinke, alas poore things, contemptible
By all the Gods in Egypt, the perfumes
That went to trymming these cloathes, cost me——
Sce. Thou stinkest still.
Sep. The powdring of this head too——
Sce. If thou hast it
I'll tell thee all the Gumms in sweet Arabia
Are not sufficient, were they burnt about thee,
To purge the sent of a ranck Rascall from thee,
Ant. I smell him now: fie, how the Knave perfumes him,
How strong he sents of Traitor?
Dol. You had an ill Millaner,
He laid too much of the Gum of Ingratitude
Upon your Coate, you should have washt off that sir,
Fie, how it choakes, too litle of your loyaltie
Your honesty, your faith, that are pure Ambers,
I smell the rotten smell of a hired Coward,
A dead Dog is sweeter.
Sep. Ye are merry Gentlemen
And by my troth, such harmelesse mirth takes me too,
You speake like good blunt Souldiers; and 'tis well e-
But did you live at Court, as I doe (Gallants) (nough,
You would refine, and learne an apter language;
I have done ye simple service on your Pompey,
You might have lookt him yet this brace of twelve
And hunted after him, like founderd Beagles, (moneths
Had not this fortunate hand——
Ant. He brags on't too?
By the good Gods, rejoyces in't; thou wretch
Thou most contemptible Slave.
Sce. Dog, mangy Mongrell,
Thou murdring mischiefe, in the shape of Souldier
To make all Souldiers hatefull; thou disease
That nothing but the Gallowes can give ease to. ——
Dol. Thou art so impudent, that I admire thee
And know not what to say.
Sep. I know your anger
And why you prate thus: I have found your mellencholly
Ye all want money, and you are liberall Captaines
And in this want, will talke a little desperately:
Heere's gold, come share; I love a brave Commander:
And be not peevish, doe as Cæsar does:
He's merry with his wench now, be you joviall,
And let's all laugh and drinke: would ye have partners?
I doe consider all your wants, and weigh 'em,
He has the Mistris, you shall have the maids,
I'le bring 'em to ye, to your armes.
Ant. I blush,
All over me, I blush, and sweat to heare him:
Upon my conscience, if my Armes were on now
Through them I should blush too: pray ye let's be walk-
Sce. Yes, yes; but ere we goe, I'le leave this lesson, (ing.
And let him study it; first Rogue, then Pander,
Next Devill that will be; get thee from mens presence,
And where the name of Souldier has beene heard of
Be sure thou live not: to some hungry desert
Where thou canst meete with nothing but thy conscience,
(And that in all the shapes of all thy villanies)
Attend thee still, where bruit Beasts will abhor thee,
And even the Sun will shame to give thee light
Goe hide thy head; or if thou think it better
Goe hang thy selfe.
Dol. Harke to that clause,
Sce. And that speedily,
That hatefull men may be eas'd of such a Monster. Exit.
Sep. Yet all this moves not me; not reflects on me;
I keepe my God still, and my confidence,
Their want of breeding, makes these fellowes murmur
Rude valorus, so I let 'em passe; rude honours:
There is a wench yet, that I know, affects me
And company for a King: a young plump villaine,
That when she sees this gold, shee'll leap upon me,

Enter Eros.

And here she comes: I am sure of her at midnight,
My pretty Eros welcome.
Eros. I have businesse.
Sep. Above my love, thou canst not.
Er. Yes indeede sir,
Far, far above.
Sep. Why, why so coy? 'pray ye tell me
We are alone.
Er. I am much asham'd we are so. (tecote,
Sep. You want a new Gowne now, & a handsome Pet-
A Skarfe, and some odd toyes: I have gold here ready,
Thou shalt have any thing.
Eros. I want your absence:
Keepe on your way, I care not for your company.
Sep. How? how? you are very short: doe you know
And what I have beene to ye? (me Eros?
Eros. Yes I know ye;
And I hope I shall forget ye: Whilst you were honest
I lou'd ye too.
Sep. Honest? come prethee kisse me.
Eros. I kisse no knaves: no Murderers, no Beasts,
No base betrayers of those men, that fed 'em,
I hate their looks; and though I may be wanton,
I scorne to nourish it, with blood purchase,
Purchase so fowly got; I pray ye unhand he,
I had rather touch the plagne, then one unworthy:
Goe seeke some Mistris, that a horse may marry
And keepe her company, shee is too good for ye. Exit.
Sep. Marry this goes neere; now I perceive I am hatefull,
When this light huffes can distinguish, it growes dange-
For mony seldome they refuse a Leaper: (rous,
But sure I am more odious, more diseas'd too:

Enter three lame Souldiers.

It fits cold here; what are these? three poore Souldiers?
Both poore and lame: their misery may make 'em
A little looke upon me, and adore me,
If these will keepe me company, I am made yet.
1. Sol. The pleasure Cæsar sleepes in, makes us miserable,
We are forgot, our maymes, and dangers laughed at;
He Banquets, and we beg.
2. Sol. He was not wont
To let poore Soldiers that have spent their Fortunes,
Their Bloods, & limbes, walk up & down like vagabonds,

Sep. Save ye good Souldiers: good poore men, heaven help ye:
You have borne the brunt of warr, and shew the story.
1. Sould. Some new commander sure.
Sep. You looke (my good friends)
By your thin faces, as you would be Suitors.
2. Sol. Cæsar, for our meanes (Sir.)
Sep. And 'tis fit Sir.
3. Sol. We are poore men, and long forgot.
Sep. I grieve for it:
Good Souldiers should have good rewardes, and favours,
I'le give up your petitions, for I pitty ye,
And freely speake to Cæsar.
All. O we honour ye.
1. Sould. A good man sure ye are: the Gods preserve ye.
Sep. And to releive your wants the while, hold souldiers
Nay 'tis no dreame: 'tis good gold take it freely,
'Twill keepe ye in good heart.
2. Sold. Now goodnesse quit ye.
Sep. I'le be a friend to your afflictions,
And eate, and drink with ye too, and wee'le be merry:
And every day I'le see ye.
1. Sol. You are a Souldier,
And one sent from the Gods, I think.
Sep. I'le cloth ye,
Ye are lame, and then provide good lodging for ye:
And at my Table, where no want shall meete ye.
Enter Sceva.
All. Was never such a man.
1. Sold. Deare honour'd Sir,
Let us but know your name, that we may worship ye.
2. Sold. That we may ever thank?
Sep. Why, call me any thing,
No matter for my name that may betray me.
Sce. A cunning theife, call him Septimius (Souldiers)
The villaine that kil'd Pompey.
All. How?
Sce. Call him the shame of men. Exit.
1. Sold. O that this money,
Were waight enough to breake thy braines out: fling all:
And fling our curses next: let them be mortall,
Out bloody wolfe, dost thou come guilded over,
And painted with the charities, to poyson us?
2. Sold. I know him now: may never Father owne thee,
But as a monstrous birth shun thy base memory:
And if thou hadst a Mother (as I cannot
Beleeve thou wert a naturall Burden, let her womb,
Be curst of women for a bed of vipers.
3. Sold. Me thinks the ground shakes to devoure this Rascall,
And the kinde aire turnes into foggs, and vapours
The infectious mists, to Crowne his villanies,
Thou maist go wander, like a thing heaven hated.
1. Sold. And valiant minds hold poysonous to remember
The Hangman will not keepe thee company,
He has an honourable house to thine,
No, not a theife though thou couldst save his life for't
Will eate thy bread, nor one, for thirst starv'd, drinke with thee.
2. Sould. Thou art no company for an honest dog,
And so wee'le leave thee to a ditch (thy destiny) Exeunt.
Sep. Contemned of all? and kickt too? now I finde it;
My vallours fled too, with mine honesty,
For since I would be knave I must be Coward:
This 'tis to be a Traitor, and betrayer,
What a deformity dwells round about me?
How monstrous shewes that man, that is ungratefull?
I am a fraide the very beasts will teare me,
Inspir'd with what I have done: the windes will blast me:
Now I am paid, and my reward dwells in me,
The wages of my fact, my soules oppresst,
Honest and noble mindes, you finde most rest. Exit.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Ptolemy, Achoreus, Photinus, Achillas.

Ptol. I have commanded, and it shall be so,
A preparation I have set o' foote,
VVorthy the friendship and the fame of Cæsar,
My Sisters favours shall seeme poore and wither'd:
Nay she her selfe, (trim'd up in all her beauty's)
Compar'd to what I'le take his eyes with all,
Shall be a dreame.
Pho. Do you meane to shew the glory,
And wealth of Egypt?
Ptol. Yes: and in that lustre,
Rome shall appeare in all her famous Conquests,
And all her riches of no note unto it.
Ach. Now you are reconcilde to your faire Sister,
Take heed Sir, how you step into a danger:
A danger of this precipice: but note sir,
For what Rome ever nais'd her mighty armyes?
First for ambition, then for wealth: 'tis madnesse,
Nay more, a secure impotence, to tempt
An armed Guest: feed not an eye, that conquers,
Nor teach a fortunate sword the way to be coveteous.
Ptol. Ye judge a misse: and far to wide to alter me,
Yet all be ready, as I gave direction:
The secret way of all our wealth appearing
Newly, and handsomely: and all about it:
No more disswading: 'tis my will.
Ach. I grieve for't.
Ptol. I will dazell Cæsar, with excesse of glory.
Pho. I feare you'le curse your will we must obey ye. Ex.

Scena Quarta.

Enter Cæsar, Antony, Dollabella, Sceva, above.

Cæsar. I wonder at the glory of this Kingdome,
And the most bounteous preparation,
Still as I passe, they Court me with.
Sce. I'le tell ye:
In Gaul, and Germany, we saw such visions,
And stood not to admire 'em, but possesse em:
VVhen they are ours, they are worth our admiration.
Enter Cleopatra.
Ant. The young Queen comes: give roome.
Cæsar. VVelcome (my dearest)
Come blesse my side.
Sce. I mary: here's a wonder,
As she appears now, I am no true Souldier,
If I be not readiest to recant.
Cleo. Be merry Sir,
My brother wil be proud to do you honour
That now appeares himselfe.
Enter Ptolomy, Achoreus, Achillas, Photinus, Appolodorus.
Ptol. Haile to great Cæsar
My Royall Guest, first I will feast thine eyes
VVith wealthy Ægypts store: and then thy palat
And waite my selfe upon thee. Treasure brought in.
Cæsar. VVhat rich service?

VVhat

What mines of treasure? richer still?
Cleo. My Cæsar,
What do you admire? pray ye turn, and let me talk to ye.
Have ye forgot me Sir? how, a new object?
Am I grown old o'th sodaine? Cæsar?
Cæsar. Tell me
From whence comes all this wealth?
Cleo. Is your eye that way?
And all my Beauties banisht?
Ptol. I'le tell thee Cæsar,
We owe for all this wealth to the olde Nylus:
We need no dropping raine to cheer the husband-man,
Nor Merchant that ploughs up the Sea, to seeke us;
Within the wealthy wombe of reverent Nylus,
All this is nourished: who to do thee honour,
Comes to discover his seven Deities,
(His conceal'd heads) unto thee: see with pleasure
Cæsar. The matchlesse wealth of this Land!
Cleo. Come, ye shall heare.
Cæsar. Away: let me imagine.
Cleo. How? frown on me?
The eyes of Cæsar wrapt in stormes?
Cæsar. I am sorry:
But let me thinke——

Musicke, Song.
Enter Isis, and three Labourers.

ISis, the Goddesse of this Land,
Bids thee (great Cæsar) understand
And marke our Customes, and first know,
With greedy eyes these watch the flow
Of plenteous Nylus: when he comes,
With Songs, with Daunces, Timbrels, Drums,
They entertaine him: cut his way,
And give his proud Heads leave to play:
Nylus himselfe, shall rise, and show
His matchlesse wealth in Over-flow.

Labourers Song.

COme let us help the reverend Nyle,
Hee's very olde (alas the while)
Let us dig him easie wayes,
And prepare a thousand Playes:
To delight his streames let's sing,
Aloud welcome to our Spring.
This way let his curling Heads,
Fall into our new made Beds.
This way let his wanton spawne,
Friske, and glide it o're the Lawnes.
This way profit comes, and gaine:
How he tumbles here amaine.
How his waters hast to fall
Into our Channells? Labour all
And let him in: Let Nylus flow,
And perpetuall plenty show.
With Incense let us blesse the brim,
And as the wanton fishes swim
Let us Gums, and Garlands fling,
And loud our Timbrels ring.
Come (olde Father) come away,
Our labour is our holy-day.

Isis. HEre comes the aged River now
With Garlands of great Pearl, his Brow
Begirt and rounded: In his Flow,
All things take life; and all things grow.
A thousand wealthy Treasures still,
To doe him service at his will,
Follow his rising Flood, and poure
Perpetuall blessings in our store.
Hear e him: and next there will advance,
His sacred Heads to tread a Dance,
In honour of my Royall Guest,
Marke them too: and you have a Feast.

Cleo. A little drosse betray me?
Cæsar. I am asham'd I warn'd at home, (my friends)
When such wealth may be got abroad: what honour?
Nay everlasting glory had Rome purchas'd,
Had she a just cause but to visit Ægypt!

Nylus SONG, and Dance.

MAke roome for my rich waters fall,
And blesse my Flood,
Nylus comes flowing, to you all
encrease and good.
Now the Plants and Flowers shall spring,
And the merry Plough-man sing.
In my hidden waves I bring,
Bread, and wine, and every thing.
Let the Damsells sing me in:
Sing aloud that I may rise:
Your holy Feasts and bowres begin,
And each hand bring a Sacrifice.
Now my wanton Pearls I show
That to Ladies faire neckes grow.
Now my gold
And treasures that can ne're be told,
Shall blesse this Land, by my rich Flow,
And after this, to crowne your Eyes,
My hidden holy head arises.

Cæsar. The wonder of this wealth, so troubles me,
I am not well: good-night.
Sce. I am glad ye have it:
Now we shall stir againe.
Ptol. Thou wealth, still haunt him.
Sce. A greedy spirit set thee on: we are happy.
Ptol. Lights: lights for Cæsar, and attendance.
Cleo. Well,
I shall yet finde a time to tell thee Cæsar,
Thou hast wrong'd her Love: the rest here.
Ptol. Lights along still:
Musicke, and Sacrifice to sleep for, Cæsar. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus Scena Prima.

Enter Ptolomy, Photinus, Achillas, Achoreus.

Ach. I Told ye carefully, what this would prove to,
What this inestimable wealth and glory
Would draw upon ye: I advis'd your Majesty
Never to tempt a Conquering Guest: nor add
A bayte, to catch a mind, bent by his Trade
To make the whole world his.
Pho. I was not heard Sir:
Or what I said, lost, and contemn'd: I dare say,
(And freshly now) 'twas a poore weaknesse in ye,
A glorious Childishnesse: I watch'd his eye,
And saw how Faulcon-like it tow'r'd, and flew
Upon the wealthy Quarry: how round it mark'd it:

I obſerv'd his words, and to what it tended;
How greedily he ask'd from whence it came,
And what Commerce we held for ſuch abundance:
The ſhew of Nylus, how he laboured at
To finde the ſecret wayes: the Song delivered.
Acb. He never ſmil'd I noted at the pleaſures:
But fixt his conſtant eyes upon the treaſure;
I doe not thinke his eares had ſo much leizure
After the wealth appear'd, to heare the Muſique?
Moſt ſure he has not ſlept ſince, his minds troubld
With objects they would make their own ſtill labour.
Pbo. Your ſiſter he ne're gaz'd on: that's a main note,
The prime beauty of the world had no power over him.
Acb. Where was his mind the whilſt?
Pbo. Where was your careſulneſſe
To ſhew an armed thiefe the way to rob ye:
Nay, would you give him this, 'twill excite him
To ſeeke the reſt. Ambition feeles no gift,
Nor knows no bounds indeed: ye have done moſt weakly.
Ptol. Can I be too kind to my noble friend?
Pbo. To be unkind unto your noble ſelfe, but favours
Of indiſcretion, and your friend has found it.
Had ye been train'd up in the wants and miſeries
A ſouldier marches through: and known his temperance
In offerd courteſies, you would have made
A wiſer Maſter of your owne, and ſtronger.
Ptol. Why ſhould I give him all, he would return it?
'Tis more to him, to make Kings.
Pbo. Pray thee be wiſer,
And truſt not with your loſt wealth, your loved liberty,
To be a King ſtill at your own diſcretion:
Is like a King; to be at his a vaſſaile.
Now take good councell, or no more take to ye
The freedome of a Prince.
Acbil. 'Twill be too late elſe:
For, ſince the Maſque, he ſent three of his Captaines
(Ambitious as himſelfe) to view againe
The glory of your wealth.
Pbo. The next himſelfe comes,
Not ſtaying for your courteſie, and takes it.
Ptol. What counſell my Acboreus?
Acb. I'le goe pray Sir,
(For that is beſt counſel now) the gods may help ye. Ex.
Pbo. I found ye out a way but 'twas not credited,
A moſt ſecure way; whether will ye flye now?
Acbil. For when your wealth is gone, your power muſt follow.
Pbo. And that diminiſht alſo, what's your life worth?
Who would regard it?
Ptol. You ſay true.
Acbil. What eye
Will looke upon King Ptolomy? If they do looke,
It muſt be in ſcorne:
For a poore King is a monſter;
What eare remember ye? 'twill be then a courteſie,
A noble one) to take your life too from ye:
But if reſerv'd, you ſtand to fill a victory,
As who knowes Conquerours minds? though outwardly
They beare faire ſtreames.
O Sir, does this not ſhake ye?
Is to be honyed on to theſe afflictions ——
Ptol. I never will: I was a Foole.
Pbo. For then Sir
Your Countreys cauſe falls with ye too, and fetterd:
All Ægypt ſhall be ploughed up with diſhonour.
Ptol. No more: I am ſenſible: and now my ſpicit
Burnes hot within me.
Acbil. Keepe it warm and fiery.
Pbo. And laſt be counſaild.
Ptol. I will, though I periſh.
Pbo. Goe in: wee'l tell you all: and then wee'l execute.
Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Cleopatra, Arſino, Eros.

Ars. You are ſo impatient.
Cleo. Have I not cauſe?
Women of common Beauties, and low Births,
When they are ſlighted, are allowd their angers,
Why ſhould not I (a Princeſſe) make him know
The baſeneſſe of his uſage.
Arſ. Yes: 'tis fit:
But then againe you know what man.
Cleo. He is no man:
The ſhadow of a Greatneſſe hangs upon him,
And not the vertue: he is no Conquerour,
H'as ſuffer'd under the baſe droſſe of Nature:
Poorely delivered up his power to wealth,
(The god of bed-rid men) taught his eyes treaſon
Againſt the truth of love: he has rais'd rebellion.
denid'e his holy flames.
Eros. He will fall backe again,
And ſatisfie your Grace.
Cleo. Had I been old,
Or blaſted in my bud, he might have ſhewd
Some ſhadow of diſlike: But, to prefer
The luſtre of a little art, (Arſino)
And the poore glow-worme light of ſome faint Jewels,
Before the life of Love, and ſoule of Beauty,
Oh how it vexes me: he is no Souldier,
(All honourable ſouldiers are Lovers ſervants)
He is a Merchant: a meere wandring Merchant,
Servile to gaine: he trades for poore Commodities, (tains
And makes his Conqueſts, theſts; ſome fortunate Cap-
That quarter with him, and are truly valiant,
Have ſtung the name of happy Ceſar on him,
Himſelfe ne're wonne it: he is ſo baſe and covetous,
Hee'l ſell his ſword for gold.
Ars. This is too bitter.
Cleo. Oh I could curſe my ſelf, that was ſo fooliſh,
So fondly childiſh to beleeve his tongue,
His promiſing tongue, ere I could catch his temper,
I had traſh enough to have cloyd his eyes withall:
His covetous eyes; ſuch as I ſcorne to tread on:
Richer then ere he ſaw yet, and more tempting; (nour,
Had I known he had ſtoop'd at that, I had ſav'd mine ho-
I had been happy ſtill: but let him take it,
And let him brag how poorly I am rewarded:
Let him goe conquer ſtill weake wretched Ladies:
Love has his angry Quiver too, his deadly,
And when he findes ſcorne, arm'd at the ſtrongeſt:
I am a foole to fret thus, for a foole:
An old blinde foole too? I loſe my health: I will not:
I will not cry: I will not honour him,
With tears diviner then the gods he worſhips:
I will not take the paines to curſe a poore thing.
Eros. Dye not: you ſhall not need.
Cleo. Would I were priſoner
To one I hate, that I might anger him,
I will love any man, to breake the heart of him:
Any, that has the heart and will to kill him.

Ars. Take

Ar. Take some faire truce.
Cleo. I will goe study mischiefe,
And put a looke on, arm'd with all my cunnings,
Shall meet him like a Basiliſque, and ſtrike him:
Love, put deſtroying flames into mine eyes,
Into my ſmiles, deceits, that I may torture him,
That I may make him love to death, and laugh at him.

Enter Appollodorus.

Ap. Cæſar commends his Service to your Grace.
Cleo. His ſervice? what's his ſervice?
Eros. Pray ye be patient,
The noble Cæſar loves ſtill.
Cleo. What's his will?
Ap. He craves acceſs unto your Highneſſe
Cleo. No:
Say no: I will have none to trouble me.
Ar. Good Siſter:
Cleo. None I ſay: I will be private.
Would thou hadſt hang me into Nylus (keeper)
When firſt thou gav'ſt conſent, to bring my body
To this unthankfull Cæſar.
Ap. 'Twas your will (Madam)
Nay more: your charge upon me, as I honoured ye:
You know what danger I endured.
Cleo. Take this,
And carry it to that Lordly Cæſar ſent thee:
There's a new Love, a handſome one: a rich one:
One that will hug his minde: bid him make love to it:
Tell the ambitious Broker, this will ſuffer——

Enter Cæſar.

Ap. He enters.
Cleo. How?
Cæſar. I doe not uſe to waite (Lady)
Where I am, all the dores are free, and open.
Cleo. I gheſſe ſo, by your rudeneſſe.
Cæſar. Ye are not angry?
Things of your tender mold, ſhould be moſt gentle;
Why doe you frowne? good gods, what a ſet-anger
Have you forc'd into your face? Come, I muſt temper ye:
What a coy ſmile was there, and a diſdainfull?
How like an ominous flaſh it broke out from ye?
Defend me (Love) Sweet, who has angr'd ye?
Cleo. Show him a glaſſe; that falſe face has betraid me:
That baſe heart wrought me——
Cæſar. Be more ſweetly angry;
I wrong'd ye faire?
Cleo. Away with your ſoule flatteries:
They are too groſſe: but that I dare be angry,
And with as great a god as Cæſar is,
To ſhew how poorly I reſpect his memory,
I would not ſpeake to ye.
Cæſar. Pray ye undoe this riddle,
And tell me how I have vext ye?
Cleo. Let me think firſt
Whether I may put on a Patience
That will with honour ſuffer me: know, I hate ye,
Let that begin the ſtory: Now I'le tell ye.
Cæſar. But do it milder: In a noble Lady,
Softneſſe of ſpirit, and a ſober nature,
That moves like ſummer winds, coole: and blows ſweetneſſe;
Shews bleſſed like her ſelfe.
Cleo. And that great bleſſednеſſe
You firſt reap'd of me, till you taught my nature
Like a rude ſtorm to talk aloud, and thunder
Sleep was not gentler to my ſoule, and ſtiller;
You had the Spring of my affections:
And my faire fruits I gave you leave to taſte of:
You muſt expect the winter of mine anger:
You flung me off, before the Court diſgrac'd me,
When in the pride I appeard of all my beauty,
Appear'd your Miſtreſſe; tooke into your eyes
The common-ſtrumpet love of hated lucre,
Courted with covetous heart, the ſlave of nature,
Gave all your thoughts to gold: that men of glory,
And minds adorn'd with noble love, would kick at:
Souldiers of royall marke, ſcorne ſuch baſe purchaſe:
Beauty and honour are the marks they ſhoot at;
I ſpake to ye then; I courted ye, and woo'd ye:
Call'd ye deare Cæſar, hung about ye tenderly:
Was proud to appear your friend.
Cæſar. You have miſtaken me.
Cleo. But neither Eye, nor Favour, not a Smile
Was I bleſſed backe; but ſhooke off rudely,
And, as ye had been ſold to ſordid infamy,
You fell before the Images of treaſure,
And in your ſoule you worſhip'd: I ſtood ſlighted,
Forgotten and contemn'd; my ſoft embraces,
And thoſe ſweete kiſſes you call'd Elizium,
As letters writ in ſand, no more remembred?
The name and glory of your Cleopatra
Laugh'd at, and made a ſtory to your Captaines:
Shall I endure?
Cæſar. You are deceiv'd in all this,
Upon my life you are, 'tis your much tenderneſſe.
Cleo. No, no, I love not that way; you are cozen'd:
I love with as much ambition as a Conquerour,
And where I love, will triumph.
Cæſar. So you ſhall:
My heart ſhall be the Chariot that ſhall beare ye,
All I have wonne ſhall waite upon ye: By the gods
The bravery of this womans mind, has fired me:
Deare Miſtreſs ſhall I but this night?——
Cleo. How Cæſar?
Have I let ſlip a ſecond vanity
That gives thee hope?
Cæſar. You ſhall be abſolute,
And Reigne alone as Queen: you ſhall be any thing.
Cleo. Make me a maide againe, and then I'le hear thee;
Examine all thy art of War, to doe that;
And if thou find'ſt it poſſible, I'le love thee:
Till when, farewell, unthankfull.
Cæſar. Stay.
Cleo. I will not.
Cæſar. I command.
Cleo. Command, and goe without, Sir.
I doe command thee be my ſlave for ever,
And vexe while I laugh at thee.
Cæſar. Thus low, beauty?
Cleo. It is too late; when I have found thee abſolute,
The man that Fame reports thee, and alſo me:
May be I ſhall think better. Farewell Conquerour. Exit
Cæſar. She mocks me too: I will enjoy her Beauty:
I will not be deni'd; before my longing.
Love is beſt pleas'd, when roundly we compell him,
And as he is Imperious, ſo will I be.
Stay fool, and be advis'd: that dulls the appetite;
Takes of the ſtrength and ſweetneſſe of delight.
By heaven ſhe is a miracle, I muſt uſe
A handſome way to win: how now? what feare
Dwells in your faces? you looke all diſtracted.

Enter

Enter Sceva, Anthony, Dollabella.

Sce. If it be feare, 'tis feare of your undoing?
Not of our selves: feare of your poore declining:
Our lives and deaths are equall benefits,
And we make louder prayers to dye nobly, (here,
Then to live high, and wantonly: whilst you are secure
And offer Hecatombs of lazie kisses
To the lewd god of Love, and cowardize,
And most lasciviously dye in delights,
You are begirt with the fierce Alexandrians,
Dol. The spawne of Ægypt, flow about your Pallace,
Arm'd all: and ready to assault.
Ant. Led on
By the false and base Photinus and his Ministers;
No stirring out; no peeping through a loop-hole,
But straight saluted with an armed Dart.
Sce. No parley: they are deafe to all but danger,
They sweare they will flea us, and then dry our Quarters:
A rasher of a salt lover, is such a Shooing-horne:
Can you kisse away this conspiracy, and set us free?
Or will the Giant god of love, fight for ye?
Will this fierce war-like bow kill a Cock-sparrow?
Bring out the Lady, she can quel this mutiny:
And with her powerfull looks, strike awe into them:
She can destroy, and build againe the City,
Your Goddesses have mighty gifts: shew 'em her fair breasts,
The impregnable Bulwarks of proud Love, and let 'em
Begin their battery there: she will laugh at 'em;
They are not above a hundred thousand, Sir.
A mist, a mist, that when her Eyes breake out,
Her powerfull radiant eyes, and shake their flashes,
Will flye before her heates.
Cæsar. Begirt with Villaines?
Sce. They come to play you, and your Love a Huntsup
You were told what this same whorson wenching, long
agoe would come too:
You are taken napping now: has not a souldier
A time to kisse his friend, and a time to consider,
But he must lye still digging, like a Ploner,
Making of mines, and burying of his honour there?
'Twere good you would thinke——
Dol. And time too, or you will finde else
A harder task, then Courting a coy Beauty.
Ant. Look out and then beleeve.
Sce. No, no, hang danger:
Take me provoking broth, and then goe to her:
Goe to your Love, and let her feele your valour; (Sir,)
Charge her whole body, when the sword's in your throat
You may cry, Cæsar, and see if that will help ye.
Cæsar. I'le be my selfe againe, and meet their furies,
Meet, & consume their mischiefs: make some shift (Sceva)
To recover the Fleet, and bring me up two Legions,
And you shall see me, how I'le breake like thunder
Amongst these beds of slimy Eeles, and scatter 'em.
Sce. Now ye speak sense: I'le put my life to the hazard
Before I goe. No more of this warm Lady,
Shee will spoil your sword-hand.
Cæsar. Goe: come, lets to Councell
How to prevent, and then to execute.

Scena Tertia.

Enter Souldiers.

1 Sold. Did ye see this Penitence?
2 Sold. Yes: I saw, and heard it.
3 Sold. And I too: looke'd upon him, and observ'd it,
Hee's the strangest Septimius now——
1. Sol. I heard he was altered,
And had given away his Gold to honest uses:
Cryde monstrously.
2. Sol. He cryes abundantly:
He is blind almost with weeping.
3. Sol. 'Tis most wonderfull
That a hard hearted man, and an old Souldier (dyde
Should have so much kind moysture: when his mother
He laughed aloud, and made the wickedst Ballads——
1. Sol. 'Tis like enough: he never lov'd his Parents;
Nor can I blame him, for they neere lov'd him.
His mother dream'd before she was deliverd
That she was brought abed with a Buzzard, and ever after
She whistled him up to th'world, his brave clothes too
He has flung away: and goes like one of us now:
Walks with his hands in's pockets, poore and sorrowfull,
And gives the best instructions.——
2. Sol. And tells stories
Of honest and good people that were honourd,
And how they were remembred: and runs mad
If he but hear of any ungratefull person,
A bloudy, or betraying man——
3. Sol. If it be possible
That an Arch-Villain may ever be recovered,
This penitent Rascall will put hard: 'twere worth our
To see him once againe. (labour

Enter Septimius.

1. Sol. He spares us that labour
For here he comes.
Sep. —— Blesse ye my honest friends,
Blesse ye from base unworthy men; come not neare me:
For I am yet too taking for your company.
1. Sol. Did I not tell ye?
2. Sol. What booke's that?
1. Sol. No doubt
Some excellent Salve for a sore heart, are you
Septimius, that base knave, that betrayd Pompey?
Sep. I was, and am; unlesse your honest thoughts
Will look upon my penitence, and save me
I must be ever Villaine: O good Souldiers
You that have Roman hearts, take heede of falsehood:
Take heede of blood; take heede of foule ingratitude,
The Gods have scarce a mercy for those mischiefes,
Take heede of pride, 'twas that that brought me to it.
2. Sol. This fellow would make a rare speech at the gal-
3. Sol. 'Tis very fit he were hangd to edifie us. (lowes
Sep. Let all your thoughts be humble, and obedient,
Love your Commanders, honour them that feede ye:
Pray, that ye may be strong in honesty
As in the use of armes; Labour, and diligently
To keepe your hearts from ease, and her base issues;
Pride, and ambitious wantonnesse, those spoyld me:
Rather loose all your limbs, then the least honesty,
You are never lame indeed, till losse of credit
Benum ye through: Scarrs, and those maimes of honour
Are memorable crutches, that shall beare
When you are dead, your noble names to Eternity.
1. Sol. I cry.
2. Sol. And so doe I.
3. Sol. An excellent villaine.
1. Sol. A more sweet pious knave, I never heard yet.
2. Sol. He was happie he was Rascall, to come to this Enter Acboreus.

Who's this? a Priest?
Sep. O stay, most holy Sir!

And

And by the Gods of Egypt, I conjure ye,
(Isis, and great Osiris) pitty me,
Pitty a loaden man, and tell me truly
With what most humble Sacrifice I may
Wash off my sin, and appease the powers that hate me?
Take from my heart those thousand thousand furies,
That restlesse gnaw upon my life, and save me?
Orestes bloody hands fell on his Mother,
Yet, at the holy altar he was pardon'd.
Ach. Orestes out of madnesse did his murther,
And therefore he found grace: thou (worst of all men)
Out of cold blood, and hope of gaine, base lucre,
Slewst thine own Feeder: come not neare the altar,
Nor with thy reeking hands pollute the Sacrifice,
Thou art markt for shame eternall. Exit.
Sep. Looke all on me,
And let me be a story left to time
Of blood and Infamy, how base and ougly
Ingratitude appears, with all her profits,
How monstrous, my hoped grace, at Court? good Souldiers
Let neither flattery, nor the witching sound
Of high and soft preferment, touch your goodnesse:
To be valiant, old, and honest, O what blessednesse——
1 Sold. Dost thou want any thing?
Sep. Nothing but your prayers:
2 S. Be thus, and let the blind Priest do his worst,
We have gods as well as they, and they will heare us.
3 S. Come, cry no more: thou hast wep't out twenty Pompeyes.

Enter Photinus, Achillas.

Pho. So penitent?
Achil. It seemes so.
Pho. Yet for all this
We must employ him.
1 Sold. These are the armed Souldier-leaders:
Away: and let's tot'h Fort, we shall be snapt else. Exit.
Pho. How now? why thus? what cause of this dejection?
Achil. Why dost thou weepe?
Sep. Pray leave me, you have ruin'd me,
You have made me a famous Villain.
Pho. Does that touch thee?
Achil. He will be hard to win: he feels his lewdnesse,
Pho. He must be won, or we shall want our right hand:
This fellow dares, and knows, and must be heertned,
Art thou so poore to blench at what thou hast done?
Is Conscience a comrade for an old souldier?
Achil. It is not that: it may be some disgrace
That he takes heavily; and would be cherish'd,
Septinius ever scorn'd to shew such weaknesse.
Sep. Let me alone; I am not for your purpose,
I am no wa new man.
Pho. We have new affairs for thee
Those that would raise thy head.
Sep. I would 'twere off,
And in your bellies for the love you beare me.
I'le be no more Knave, I have stings enough
Already in my breast.
Pho. Thou shalt be noble:
And who dares thinke then that thou art not honest?
Achil. Thou shalt command in Chief, all our strong
Forces
And if thou serv'st an use, must not all justifie it?
Sep. I am Rogue enough.
Pho. Thou wilt be more, and baser:
A poor Rogue is all rogues: open to all shames:
Nothing to shadow him: dost thou think crying
Can keep thee from the censure of the Multitude?
Or to be kneeling at the altar save thee?
'Tis poore and servile:
Wert thou thine own Sacrifice
'Twould seeme so low, people would spit the fire out.
Achil. Keep thy self glorious still, though ne're so staind,
And that will lessen it, if not work it out
To goe complaining thus: and thus repenting
Like a poore Girle that had betraid her maiden-head——
Sep. I'le stop mine eares.
Achil. Will shew so in a souldier,
So simply, and so ridiculously, so tamely——
Pho. If people would believe thee, 'twer some honesty,
And for thy penitence would not laugh at thee
(As sure they will) and beat thee, for thy poverty:
If they would allow thy foolery, there were some hope.
Sep. My foolery?
Pho. Nay, more then that, thy misery,
Thy monstrous misery.
Achil. He begins to hearken:
Thy misery so great, men will not bury thee.
Sep. That this were true!
Pho. Why does this conquering Cæsar
Labour through the worlds deep Seas of toyls & troubles,
Dangers, and desperate hopes? to repent afterwards?
Why does he slaughter thousands in a Battell,
And whip his Countrey with the Sword? to cry for't?
Thou kildst great Pompey: hee'l kil all his kinred,
And justifie it: nay raise up Trophies to it,
When thou heares him repent: (he's held most holy too)
And cry for doing daily bloody murthers,
Take thou example, and goe aske forgiveneſſe,
Call up the thing thou nam'st thy conscience,
And let it work: then 'twill seeme well Septinius.
Sep. He does all this.
Achil. Yes: and is honoured for it;
Nay call'd the honoured Cæsar, so maist thou be:
Thou wert born as neere a Crowne as he.
Sep. He was poore.
Pho. And desperate bloody tricks got him this credit.
Sep. I am afraid you will once more——
Pho. Help to raise thee:
Off with thy pining blacke, it dulls a Souldier,
And put on resolution like a man,
A noble Fate waits on thee.
Sep. I now feele
My selfe returning Rascall speedily.
O that I had the power——
Achil. Thou shalt have all:
And doe all through thy power, men shall admire thee,
And the vices of Septinius, shall turn vertues.
Sep. Off: off: thou must off: off my cowardize,
Puling repentance off.
Pho. Now thou speakst nobly.
Sep. Off my dejected looks: and welcome impudence:
My daring shall be Deity, to save me:
Give me instructions, and put action on me:
A glorious cause upon my swords point (Gentlemen)
And let my wit, and valour work: you will raise me,
And make me out-dare all my miseries?
Pho. All this, and all thy wishes.
Sep. Use me then,
Womanish feare farewell: I'le never melt more,
Lead on, to some great thing, to weale my spirit:
I cut the Cedar Pompey, and I'le fell
This huge Oake Cæsar too.
Pho. Now thou singst sweetly:
And Ptolomy shall crowne thee for thy service: (Exeunt.
Achil. He's well wrought: put him on apace for cooling.

Actus Quintus Scena Prima.

Enter Cæsar, Antony, Dollabella.

Ant: THe tumult still encreases.
Cæsar. O my fortune!
My lustfull folly rather! but 'tis well,
And worthily I am made a bondmans prey,
That after all my glorious victoryes,
In which I passd so many seas of dangers:
When all the Elements conspir'd against me,
Would yeild up the dominion of this head
To any mortall power; so blinde and stupid:
To trust these base Egyptians, that proclaimd
Their perjuries, in noble Pompeys death,
And yet that could not warn me.
Dol. Be still, Cæsar,
Who ever lov'd to exercise his fate,
Where danger look't most dreadfull.
Ant. If you fall,
Fall not alone: let the King and his Sister
Be buried in your ruines: on my life
They both are guilty: reason may assure you
Photinus nor Achillas durst attempt you,
Or shake one Dart, or Sword, aim'd at your safety,
Without their warrant.
Cæsar. For the young King I know not
How he may be misled; but for his Sister
(Unequall'd Cleopatra) 'twere a kinde
Of blasphemy to doubt her: ougly treason
Durst never dwell in such a glorious building,
Nor can so cleare and great a spirit, as hers is,
Admit of falsehood.
Ant. Let us seize on him then:
And leave her to her fortune.
Dol. If he have power
Use it to your security, and let
His honesty acquit him; if he be false,
It is too great an honour he should dye
By your victorious hand.
Cæsar. He comes: and I
Shall do as I finde cause.

Enter Ptolomy, Achoreus, Apollodorus.

Ptol. Let not great Cæsar
Impute the breach of hospitality,
To you (my guest) to me; I am contemn'd,
And my rebellious subjects lift their hands
Against my head: and would they aim'd no farther,
Provided that I fell a sacrifice
To gaine you safety: that this is not faign'd,
The boldnesse of my innocence may confirme you:
Had I bin privy to their bloody plot,
I now had led them on, and given faire glosse
To their bad cause, by being present with them:
But I that yet taste of the punishment,
In being false to Pompey, will not make
A second fault to Cæsar uncompell'd
With such as have not yet shooke off obedience,
I yeild my selfe to you, and will take part
In all your dangers.
Cæsar. This pleades your excuse,
And I receive it.
Ach. If they have any touch,
Of justice, or religion, I will use
The athority of our Gods, to call them back,
From their bad purpose.
Ap. This part of the pallace,
Is yet defensible: we may make it good,
Till your powers rescue us.
Cæsar. Cæsar beseig'd?
Ostaine to my great actions: 'twas my custome
An Army routed, as my feete had wings
To be first in the chase: nor walls, nor Bulworkes
Could guard those that escap'd the Battailes fury
From this strong Arme, and I to be enclos'd
My heart! my heart! but 'tis necessity,
To which the Gods must yeild, and I obey,
'Till I redeeme it, by some glorious way. Exeunt.

Scena Secunda.

Enter Photinus, Achillas, Septimius, Souldiers.

Pho. Ther's no retiring now, we are broke in:
The deed past hope of pardon: if we prosper
A will be stilde lawfull, and we shall give lawes
To those that now command us: stop not at
Or loyalty, or duty, bold Ambition,
To dare and power to do, gave the first difference
Betweene the King, and subject, Cæsars Motto,
Aut Cæsar aut Nihil, each of us must claime,
And use it as our owne.
Achil. The deed is bloody
If we conclude in Ptolomies death.
Pho. The better
The globe of Empire must be so manur.
Sep. Rome, that from Romulus first tooke her name
Had her walls watered with a Crymson showr
Drain'd from a Brothers heart: nor was she rais'd
To this prodigious height, that overlooks
Three full parts of the Earth, that pay her tribute,
But by enlarging of her narrow bounds
By the Sack of Neighbour Cities, were made hers
Till they were Cemented with the Blood of those
That did possesse 'em: Cæsar, Ptolomy,
(Now I am steeld) to me are empty names
Esteem'd as Pompeys was.
Pho. Well said Septimius,
Thou now art right againe.
Achil. But what course take we
For the Princesse Cleopatra?
Pho. Let her live
A while to make us sport: she shall authorize
Our undertakings to the ignorant people,
As if what we do were by her command:
But our triumvirat Government once confirm'd,
Shee bores her Brother company, that's my Province:
Leave me to work her.
Achil. I will undertake
For Ptolomy.
Sep. Cæsar shall be my taske,
And as in Pompey I began a name
I'le perfect it in Cæsar.

Enter (above) Cæsar, Ptolomy, Achoreus, Apollodorus, Anthony, Dollabella.

Pho. 'Tis resolv'd then

Weel

Wee'l force our passage.
Achil. See: they do appeare
As they desir'd a parley.
Pho. I am proud yet
I have brought them to capitulate.
Ptol. Now Photinus?
Pho. Now Ptolomy?
Ptol. No addition?
Pho. We are equall,
Though Cæsars name were put into the scale,
In which our worth is weighd.
Cæsar. Presumptuous Villaine,
Upon what grounds hast thou presum'd to raise
Thy servile hand against the King, or me,
That have a greater name?
Pho. On those, by which
Thou didst presume to passe the Rubicon
Against the Laws of Rome; and at the name
Of traytor smile, as thou didst when Marcellus
The Consull, with the Senats full consent
Pronounced thee for an enemy to thy Country,
Yet thou wentst on, and thy rebellious Cause
Was crown'd with fair success: why should we fear then?
Think on that Cæsar.
Cæsar. O the gods! be brav'd thus?
And be compelld to beare this from a slave
That would not brooke great Pompey his Superiour?
Achil. Thy glories now have touch'd the highest point,
And must descend.
Pho. Despaire, and thinke we stand
The Champions of Rome, to wreak her wrongs
Upon whose liberty thou hast set thy foote.
Sep. And that the ghosts of all those noble Romans
That by thy sword fell in this Civill warre,
Expect revenge.
Ant. Dar'st thou speak, and remember
There was a Pompey?
Pho. There is no hope to scape us:
If that against the odds we have upon you
You dare come forth and fight, receive the honour
To dye, like Romans, if ye faint, resolve
To starve, like wretches: I disdain to change Exit.
Another syllable with you.
Ant. Let us dye nobly:
And rather fall upon each others sword
Then come into these villains hands.
Cæsar. That Fortune
Which to this howre hath been a friend to Cæsar,
Though for a while she cloath her brow with frowns
Will smile again upon me; who will pay her,
Or sacrifice or vowes, if she forsake
Her best of works in me? or suffer him
Whom, with a strong hand she hath led triumphant
Through the whole Western world, & Rome acknowledgd
Her Soveraign Lord, to end in gloriously,
A life admir'd by all? the threatned danger
Must by a way more horrid, be avoided,
And I will run the hazard: Fire the Pallace,
And the rich Magazines that neighbour it,
In which the wealth of Ægypt is contain'd:
Start not, it shall be so; that while the people
Labour in quenching the ensuing flames,
Like Cæsar, with this handfull of my friends
Through fire, and swords, I force a passage to
My conquering Legions. King, if thou darst follow
Where Cæsar leads, or live, or dye a Free-man;
If not, stay here a bond-man to thy slave,
And dead, be thought unworthy of a grave. Exeunt.

Scena Tertia.
Enter Septimius.

Sep. I feele my resolution melts againe,
And that I am not knave alone, but foole
In all my purposes. This Devill Photinus
Employs me, as a property, and grown useless
Will shake me off againe: he told me so
When I kill'd Pompey: nor can I hope better
When Cæsar is dispatch'd: Services done
For such as only study their owne ends,
Too great to be rewarded, or return'd
With deadly hate: I learnd this principle
In his own Schoole: yet still he fooles me: well:
And yet he trusts me; Since I in my nature
Was fashion'd to be false, wherefore should I
That kill'd my Generall, and a Roman, one
To whom I owe all nourishments of life
Be true to an Ægyptian? to save Cæsar,
And turn Photinus plots on his own head,
As it is in my power, redeem my credit,
And live, to lye, and swear again in fashion,
Oh, 'twere a Master-piece? ha? —— me Cæsar,
How's he got off?

Enter Cæsar, Ptolomy, Antony, Dollabella. Acboreus, Appollodorus, Souldiers.

Cæsar. The fire has tooke,
And shews the City, like a second Troy,
The Navy too is scorch'd, the people greedy
To save their wealth, and houses, while their souldiers
Make spoile of all: only Achillas troops
Make good their guard: break through them, we are safe:
I'le lead you like a Thunder-bolt.
Sep. Stay Cæsar.
Cæsar. Who's this? the dog Septinius?
Ant. Cut his throat.
Dol. You barkt but now, fawne you so soone?
Sep. O heare me,
What I'le deliver is for Cæsars safety,
For all your good.
Ant. Good from a moneth like thine, (dayes
That never belch'd but blasphemy & treason, on Festivall
Sep. I am an altered man: altered indeed,
And I will give you cause to say I am a Roman.
Dol. Rogue, I grant thee.
Sep. Trust me, I'le make the passage smooth and easy,
For your escape.
Ant. I'le trust the Devill sooner,
And make a safer bargaine.
Sep. I am trusted,
With all Photinus secrets.
Ant. There's no doubt then,
Thou wilt be false.
Sep. Still to be true to you.
Dol. And very likely.
Cæsar. Be breife, the meanes?
Sep. Thus Cæsar:
To me alone, but bound by terrible oathes
Not to discover it, he hath reveal'd
A dismall vault, whose dreadfull mouth do's open
A mile beyond the Citty: in this cave
Lye but two houres conceal'd.
Ant. If you believe him,
Hee'le bury us alive.
Dol. I'le fly in the ayre first.
Sep. Then in the dead of night, I'le bring you backe
Into a private roome, where you shall finde

Photinus, and Achillas, and the reſt
Of their Commanders, cloſe at Counſell.
Cæſar. Good: what followes?
Sep. Fall me fairly on their throates,
Their heads cut off and ſhorn, the multitude
Will eaſily diſperſe.
Cæſar. O Devill! away with him:
Nor true to friend nor enemy? Cæſar ſcornes
To find his ſafety, or revenge his wrongs
So baſe a way: or owe the meanes of life
To ſuch a leaprous Traytor. I have tow'r'd
For victory like a Faulcon in the clouds,
Not dig'd for't like a Moale: our Swords, and Cauſe
Make way for us; and that it may appeare
We took a noble courſe, and hate baſe Treaſon,
Some ſouldiers, that would merit Cæſars favour,
Hang him on yonder turret, and then follow
The lane, this ſword makes for you. Exit.
1 Sold. Here's a Belt,
Though I dye for it I'le uſe it.
2 Sold. 'Tis too good
To truſſe a Cur in.
Sep. Save me, here's gold.
1 Sold. If Rome
Were offered for thy ranſome, it could not help thee.
2 Sold. Hang not an arſe.
1 Sold. Goad him on with thy ſword:
Thou doſt deſerve a worſer end; and may
All ſuch conclude ſo, that their friends betray.
Exeunt.

Scena Quarta.

Enter (ſeverally) Arſino, Eros, Cleopatra.

Ar. We are loſt.
Eros. Undon.
Ar. Confuſion, Fire, and Swords,
And fury in the ſouldiers face, more horrid
Circle us round.
Eros. The Kings command they laugh at,
And jeere at Cæſars threats.
Arſ. My brother ſeiz'd on
By the Roman, as thought guilty of the tumult,
And forc'd to beare him company, as mark'd out
For his protection, or revenge.
Eros. They have broke
Into my Cabinet: my Trunks are ranſak'd.
Ar. I have loſt my Jewels too; but thats the leaſt:
The barbarous Raſcalls, againſt all humanity,
Or ſenſe of pity, have kill'd my little dog,
And broke my monkeys chaine.
Eros. They ruffled me:
But that I could endure, and tire 'em too,
Would they proceed no further.
Ar. O my ſiſter!
Eros. My Queen, my Miſtreſſe!
Ar. Can you ſtand unmov'd
When an Earth-quake of rebellion ſhakes the City?
And the Court trembles?
Cleo. Yes Arſino,
And with a maſculine conſtancy deride
Fortunes worſt malice, as a ſervant to
My Vertues, not a Miſtreſs: then we forſake
The ſtrong fort of our ſelves, when we once yield,
Or ſhrink at her aſſaults; I am ſtill my ſelfe,
And though diſ-roab'd of Soveraignty, and raviſht
Of ceremonious duty, that attends it,
Nay, grant they had ſlav'd my body, my free mind
Like to the Palm-tree, walling fruitfull Nyle,
Shall grow up ſtraighter, and enlarge it ſelfe
Spight of the envious weight that loads it with:
Think of thy birth (Arſino) common burthens
Fit common ſhoulders: teach the multitude
By ſuffering nobly what they feare to touch at:
The greatneſſe of thy mind does ſoare a pitch,
Their dim eyes (darkned by their narrow ſoules)
Cannot arrive at.
Ar. I am new created,
And owe this ſecond being to you (beſt ſiſter)
For now I feele you have infus'd into me
Part of your fortitude.
Eros. I ſtill am fearfull:
I dare not tell a lye: you that were born
Daughters, and Siſters unto Kings, may nouriſh
Great thoughts, which I, that am your humble handmaid
Muſt not preſume to ryvall.
Cleo. Yet (my Eros)
Though thou haſt profited nothing, by obſerving
The whole courſe of my life, learn in my death,
Though not to equall, yet to imitate
Thy fearleſſe Miſtreſſe.

Enter Photinus.

Eros. O, a man in armes?
His weapon drawn too?
Cleo. Though upon the point
Death ſate, I'le meete it, and out-dare the danger.
Pho. Keep the watch ſtrong, and guard the paſſage ſure
That leads unto the Sea.
Cleo. What ſea of rudeneſſe
Breaks in upon us? or what Subjects breath
Dare raiſe a ſtorme, when we command a calm?
Are duty, and obedience fled to heaven,
And in their roome, ambition and pride
Sent into Ægypt? that face ſpeaks thee Photinus,
A thing thy Mother brought into the world:
My Brothers, and my Slave: but thy behaviour,
Oppos'd to that an inſolent Intruder
Upon that Soveraigney thou ſhouldſt bow to,
If in the gulph of baſe ingratitude,
All loyalty to Ptolomy the King
Be ſwallowed up, remember who I am,
Whoſe Daughter, and whoſe Siſter; or ſuppoſe
That is forgot too; let the name of Cæſar
Which Nations quake at, ſtop the deſperate madneſſe
From running headlong on to thy confuſion.
Throw from thee quickly thoſe rebellious armes,
Tnd let me read ſubmiſſion in thine eyes,
Ahy wrongs to us, we will not only pardon,
But be a ready advocate, to plead for thee
To Cæſar, and my Brother.
Pho. Plead my pardon?
To you I bow, but ſcorn as much to ſtoop thus
To Ptolomy, to Cæſar, Nay the gods,
As to put off the figure of a man,
And change my Eſſence, with a ſenſuall beaſt.
All my deſignes, my counſels, and dark ends
Were aym'd to purchaſe you.
Cleo. How durſt thou, being
The ſcorne of baſeneſſe, nouriſh ſuch a thought?

Pho. They

Pho. They that have power are royall: and those base
That live at the devotion of an other,
What birth gave Ptolomy, or fortune Cæsar,
By Engines fashiond in this Protean Anvill
I have made mine: and onely stoop at you,
Whom I would still preserve free to command me;
For Cæsars frownes, they are below thy thoughts,
And but in these faire eyes, I still have read
The story of a supreame Monarchy,
To which all hearts with mine, gladly pay tribute,
Pootinus name, had long since bin as great
As Ptolomies ere was, or Cæsars is,
This made me as a weaker eye to unloose
The knot of loyalty, that chain'd my freedom;
And slight the feare that Cæsars threats might cause,
That I and they might see no Sun appeare
But Cleopatra, in th' Egyptian Spheare.
Cleo. O gianticke Ambition! married to
Cymerian darknesse! in considerate foole,
(Though flatter'd with selve love) could'st thou beleeve,
Were all Crownes on the earth, made into one,
And that (by Kings) set on thy head: all Scepters,
Within thy grasp, and laid downe at my feete,
I would vouchsafe a kisse to a no-man?
A guelded Evenuch?
Phot. Fairest, that makes for me:
And shewes it is no sensuall appetite,
But true love to the greatnesse of thy spirit,
That when that you are mine shall yeild me pleasures:
Hymen, though blessing a new married paire
Shall blush to thinke on, and our certaine Issue,
The glorious splendour of dread Majesty:
Whose beames shall dazell Rome, and awe the world:
My wants in that kinde, others shall supply,
And I give way to it.
Cleo. Baser then thy birth:
Can there be Gods, and heare this, and no thunder,
Ram thee into the earth?
Pho. They are a sleepe,
And cannot heare thee:
Or with open eyes,
Did Jove looke on us, I would laugh and sweare
That his artillary is cloid by me:
Or if that they have power to hurt, his Bolts
Are in my hand.
Cleo. Most impious!
Pho. They are dreames,
Religious fooles shake at: yet to assure thee,
If Nemesis, that scourges pride, and scorne,
Be any thing but a name she lives in me:
For by my selfe (an oath to me more dreadfull
Then Stix is to your Gods) weake Ptolomy dead,
And Cæsar (both being in my toile) remov'd
The poorest Rascalls, that are in my Camp
Shall, in my presence, quench their lustfull heate
In thee, and young Arsinoe; while I laugh
To heare you howle in vaine:
I deride those Gods,
That you thinke can protect you,
Cleo. To prevent thee,
In that I am the Mistres of my fate:
So hope I of my Sister, to confirme it,
I spit at thee, and scorne thee.
Pho. I will tame,
That haughty courage, and make it stoop too.
Cleo. Never:
I was borne to command and I will dye so.

Enter Achillas and Souldiers, with the body of Ptolomy.

Pho. The King dead! this is a faire entrance to,
Our future happinesse.
Ar. O my Deare Brother?
Cleo. Weepe not Arsinoe, common women do soe,
Nor loose a teare for him, it cannot helpe him:
But study to dye nobly.
Pho. Cæsar dead?
'Tis deadly aconite to my cold heart:
It choakes my vitall spirits: where was your care?
Did the guardes sleepe?
Achil. He rowz'd them with his sword:
We talke of Mars, but I am sure his courage
Admits of no comparison but it selfe,
And (as inspir'd by him) his following friends
With such a confidence, as yon Eagle'ss prey
Under the large wing of their feircer dam,
Brake through our troopes, and scatterd 'em, he went on:
But still pursude by us: when on the sudaine,
He turn'd his head, and from his eyes flew terrour;
Which strooke in us no lesse feare, and amazement,
Then if we had encounter'd with the lightning,
Hurld from Joves clowdy brow.
Cleo. 'Twas like my Cæsar.
Achil. We falne back, he made on, and as our feare
Had parted from us, with his dreadfull lookes,
Againe we follow'd: but got neare the sea:
On which his navy anchord; in one hand
Holding a scroll he had, above the waves,
And in the other grasping fast his sword
As it had bin a trident, forg'd by Vulcan,
To calme the raging Ocean, he made away
As if he had bin Neptune: his friends like
So many Tritons follow'd their bold showts,
Yeilding a chearefull musique; we showr'd darts,
Upon them but in vaine, they reach'd their ships,
And in their safety we are sunck; for Cæsar
Prepares for war.
Pho. How fell the King?
Achil. Unable,
To follow Cæsar, he was trod to death
By the pursuers, and with him the Priest,
Of Isis good Acboreus.
Ar. May the Earth,
Lye gently on their ashes.
Pho. I feele now,
That there are powers above us: and that 'tis not
Within the searching policies of man,
To alter their decrees.
Cleo. I laugh at thee:
Where are thy threates now, (foole) thy scoffs, and scornes
Against the Gods? I see calamity
Is the best Mistris of Religion,
And can convert an Atheist.

Showt within.

Pho. O they come,
Mountaines fall on me! O, for him to dye
That plac'd his heaven on earth, is an assurance
Of his descent to hell; where shall I hide me?
The greatest daring to a man dishonest,
Is but a bastard courage, ever fainting. Exit.

Enter

Enter Cæsar, Sceva, Antony, Dollabella.

Cæsar. Looke on your Cæsar; banish feare (my fairest)
You now are safe.
Sce. By Venus, not a kisse
Till our worke be done: the Traitors once dispatch'd
To it, and wee'le cry aime.
Cæsar. I will be speedy. Exeunt.
Cleo. Farewell againe Arsinoe; how now Eros,
Ever faint-harted?
Eros. But that I am assur'd,
Your excellency can command the Generall,
I feare the Souldiers, for they looke as if
They would be nibling too.
Cleo. He is all honour,
Nor do I now repent me of my favours;
Nor can I thinke nature e're made a woman,
That in her prime deserv'd him.

Enter Cæsar, Sceva, Antony, Dollabella, Souldiers, With the heads.

Ars. He's come backe,
Pursue no farthers; curb the Souldiers fury.
See (beauteous Mistris) their accursed heads,
That did conspire against us.
Sceva. Furies plague 'em,
They had too faire an end, to dye like Souldiers,
Pompey fell by the sword; the crosse, or halter
Should have dispatch'd them.
Cæsar. All is but death (good Sceva)
Be therefore satisfied, and now (my dearest)
Looke up on Cæsar, as he still appear'd
A Conquerour, and this unfortunate King
Entomb'd with honour, wee'le for Rome, where Cæsar
Will shew he can give Kingdomes: for the Senate,
(Thy brother dead) shall willingly decree
The Crowne of Egypt, (that was his) to thee.
Exeunt omnes.

THE

The Prologue.

NEw Titles, warrant not a Play for new,
The ſubject being old: and'tis as true,
Freſh, and neate matter may with eaſe be fram'd
Out of their Stories, that have oft been nam'd
With glory on the Stage: what borrows he
From him that wrote olde Priams Tragedy.
That writes his love to Hecuba? Sure, to tell
Of Cæſars amorous heates, and how he fell
In the Capitoll, can never be the ſame
To the Judicious: Nor will ſuch blame
Thoſe that penn'd this, for Barrenneſſe when they finde
Young Cleopatra here, and her great mind
Expreſs'd to the height, with us a Maid, and free,
And how he rated her Virginity.
We treat not of what boldneſſe ſhe did dye,
Nor of her fatall Love to Anthony.
What wee preſent and offer to your view,
(Upon their Faiths) the Stage yet never knew.
Let Reaſon then, firſt to your wills give Lawes,
And after judge of them, and of their Cauſe.

The Epilogue.

I Now ſhould wiſh another had my place,
But that I hope to come off, and with grace.
And but expreſſe ſome ſigne that you are pleas'd,
We of our doubts, they of their feares are eas'd.
I would beg further (Gentlemen) and much ſay
In the favour of our ſelves, them, and the Play;
Did I not reſt aſſur'd; the moſt I ſee
Hate Impudence, and cheriſh modeſty.

The Prologue.

The Chances.

THE CHANCES.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Enter two Serving-men, Peter and Anthony.

Peter. (Anthony)

Would we were remov'd from this Town,
That we might taste some quiet: for mine owne part,
I'me almost melted with continuall trotting
After enquiries, dreames, and revelations,
Of who knowes whom, or where? serve wenching sol-
That know no other Paradice but Plackets: (diers,
Ile serve a Priest in Lent first, and eate Bell-ropes.

Anth. Thou art the froward'st foole ——

Pet. Why good tame Anthony?
Tell me but this: to what end came we hither?

An. To wait upon our Masters.

Pet. But how Anthony?
Answer me that; resolve me there good Anthony?

An. To serve their uses.

Pet. Shew your uses Anthony.

An. To be imploy'd in any thing.

Pet. No Anthony,
Not any thing I take it; nor that thing
We travell to discover, like new Islands;
A salt itch serve such uses; in things of moment,
Concerning things I grant yee, not things errant,
Sweet Ladies things, and things to thank the Surgeon?
In no such things, sweet Anthony, put case —— (man

An. Come, come, all will be mended: this invisible wo-
Of infinite report for shape and vertue,
That bred us all this trouble to no purpose,
They are determin'd now no more to thinke on,
But fall close to their studies.

Pet. Was there ever
Men knowne to run mad with report before?
Or wonder after that they know not where.
To finde? or if found, how to enjoy? are mens braines
Made now a dayes of Malt, that their affections
Are never sober? but like drunken people
Founder at every new fame? I do believe too
That men in love are ever drunke, as drunken men
Are ever loving.

An. Prethee be thou sober,
And know, that they are none of those, not guilty
Of the least vanity of love, onely a doubt
Fame might too farre report, or rather flatter
The graces of this woman, made them curious
To finde the truth, which since they finde so blotted
And lock'd up from their searches, they are now setled
To give the wonder ever.

Pet. Would they were setled
To give me some new shooes too: for Ile be sworne
These are e'ne worne out to the reasonable soules
In their good worships businesse; and some sleep
Would not doe much amisse, unlesse they meane
To make a Bell-man on me: and what now
Meane they to study, Anthony, Morall Philosophy
After their mar-all women?

An. Mar a fooles head.

Pet. 'Twill mar two fools heads, & they take not heed,
Besides the Giblets to 'em.

An. Will you walke Sir,
And talke more out of hearing? your fooles head
May chance to finde a wooden night-cap else.

Pet. I never lay in any. { Enter Don John

An. Then leave your lying, { and Fredrick,
And your blinde Prophesying: here they come,
You had best tell them as much.

Pet. I am no tell-tale. Exeunt.

John. I would we could have seen her though: for sure
She must be some rare creature, or report lyes,
All mens reports too.

Fred. I could well wish I had seen her;
But since she is so conceal'd, so beyond venture
Kept and preserv'd from view, so like a Paradice,
Plac't where no knowledg can come near her, so guarded
As 'twere impossible, though knowne to reach her,
I have made up my beliefe.

Joh. Hang me from this houre
If I more thinke upon her, or believe her,
But as she came a strong report unto me,
So the next Fame shall loose her.

Fred. 'Tis the next way:
But whither are you walking?

Joh. My old round
After my meat, and then to bed.

Fred. 'Tis healthfull.

Joh. Will not you stir?

Fred. I have a little businesse.

Jo. Upon my life this Lady still ——

Fr. Then you will loose it.

Jo. Pray let's walke together.

Fr. Now I cannot.

Jo. I have something to impart.

Fr. An houre hence
I will not misse to meet you.

Jo. Where?

Fr. Ith' high street;
For not to lye, I have a few Devotions
To doe first, then I am yours.

Jo. Remember. Exeunt.

Scen. 2. Enter Petruchio, Antonio, and two Gent.

Ant. Cut his winde-pipe, I say.

1 Gent. Fie Antonio.

Ant. Or knock his brains out first, & then forgive him

If you doe thruſt, be ſure it be to th' hilts,
A Surgeon may ſee through him.
1. You are too violent,
2. Too open, undiſcreet.
Pet. Am I not ruin'd?
The honour of my houſe crack'd? my bloud poyſon'd?
My credit, and my name?
2. Be ſure it be ſo,
Before ye uſe this violence. Let not doubt,
And a ſuſpecting anger ſo much ſway ye,
Your wiſedome may be queſtion'd.
Ant. I ſay kill him,
And then diſpute the cauſe; cut off what may be,
And what is, ſhall be ſafe.
2. Hang up a true man,
Becauſe 'tis poſſible he may be theeviſh:
Alas, is this good Juſtice?
Petr. I know as certaine,
As day muſt come againe; as cleare as truth,
And open as beliefe can lay it to me,
That I am baſely wrong'd, wrong'd above recompence;
Malitiouſly abus'd, blaſted for ever
In name and honour, loſt to all remembrance,
But what is ſmear'd, and ſhamefull; I muſt kill him,
Neceſſitie compells me.
1. But think better
Petr. There is no other cure left: yet witneſſe with me
All that is faire in man, all that is noble,
I am not greedy of this life I ſeek for,
Nor thirſt to ſhed mans bloud; and would 'twere poſſible
I wiſh it with my ſoule, ſo much I tremble
To offend the ſacred Image of my Maker,
My ſword could onely kill his crimes: no 'tis honour,
Honour, my noble friends, that idoll honour,
That all the world now worſhips, not Petruchio
Muſt doe this juſtice.
Ant. Let it once be done,
And 'tis no matter, whether you, or honour,
Or both be acceſſarie.
2. Doe you weigh Petruchio
The value of the perſon, power, and greatneſſe,
And what this ſparke may kindle?
Petr. To performe it,
So much I am ty'd to reputation,
And credit of my houſe, let it raiſe wild-fires,
That all this Dukedome ſmoak, and ſtormes that toſſe me
Into the ſtormes of everlaſting ruine,
Yet I muſt through; if yee dare ſide me.
Ant. Dare?
Petr. Ye're friends indeed, if not.
2. Here's none flies from you,
Doe it in what deſigne ye pleaſe, wee'll back ye.
1. But then be ſure yee kill him.
2. Is the cauſe
So mortall, nothing but his life?
Pet. Beleeve me,
A leſſe offence has been the deſolation
Of a whole name.
1. No other way to purge it?
Pet. There is, but never to be hoped for,
2. Thinke an houre more,
And if then ye finde no ſafer road to guide yee,
Wee'll ſet up our reſts too.
Ant. Mine's up already,
And hang him for my part,
Goes leſſe than life.
2. If we ſee noble cauſe, 'tis like our ſwords
May be as free and forward as your words. Exeunt.

Scene. 3. Enter Don John.

John. The civill order of this Towne Bellonia
Makes it belov'd, and honour'd of all travellers,
As a moſt ſafe retirement in all troubles;
Beſide the wholſome ſeat, and noble temper
Of thoſe mindes that inhabit it, ſafely wiſe,
And to all ſtrangers vertuous: But I ſee
My admiration has drawne night upon me,
And longer to expect my friend may pull me
Into ſuſpition of too late a ſtirrer,
Which all good Governments are jealous of.
Ile home, and thinke at liberty: yet certaine,
'Tis not ſo farre night as I thought; for ſee,
A faire houſe yet ſtands open, yet all about it
Are cloſe, and no lights ſtirring: there may be foule play:
Ile venture to look in: if there be knaves,
I may doe a good office. (Woman within.
Within. Signieur?
John. What? how is this?
Within. Signieur Fabritio?
John. Ile goe nearer.
Within. Fabritio?
Joh. This is a womans toague, here may be good done.
Within. Who's there?
Fabritio?
Joh. I.
Within. Where are ye?
Joh. Here.
Within. O come, for heavens ſake!
Joh. I muſt ſee what this meanes,
Enter Woman with a childe. (noiſe,
Within. I have ſtay'd this long houre for you, make no
For things are in ſtrange trouble: here, be ſecret,
'Tis worth your care; begone now; more eyes watch us,
Then may be for our ſafeties.
Joh. Harke ye?
Within. Peace: good night.
Joh. She is gone, and I am loaden; fortune for me;
It weighes well, and it feeles well; it may chance
To be ſome pack of worth: byth' maſſe 'tis heavie;
If it be Coyne or Jewels, 'tis worth welcome:
Ile ne're refuſe a fortune: I am confident
'Tis of no common price: now to my lodging:
If it hit right, Ile bleſſe this night. Exit.

Scene 4. Enter Fredrick,

Fred. 'Tis ſtrange,
I cannot meet him; ſure he has encountred
Some light o' love or other, and there meanes
To play at In and In for this night. Well Don John,
If you doe ſpring a leak, or get an itch,
Til ye claw off your curl'd pate, thank your night-walks:
You muſt be ſtill a bootehalling: one round more,
Though it be late, Ile venture to diſcover ye,
I doe not like your out-leaps.

Scene 5. Enter Duke, and 3. Gentlemen.

Duke. Welcome to Towne, are ye all fit?
1. To point Sir,
Duke. Where are the hotſes?
2. Where they were appointed.

Duke.

Duk. Be private, and whatſoever fortune
Offer it ſelfe, let's ſtand ſure.
3. Feare not us,
'Ere ye ſhall be endangered, or deluded,
Wee'll make a black night on't.
Du. No more, I know it;
You know your Quarters?
1. Will you goe alone ſir?
Du. Ye ſhall not be farre from me, the leaſt noiſe
Shall bring ye to my reſcue.
2. We are counſell'd. Exeunt.

Scene 6. Enter Don John.

John. Was ever man ſo paid for being curious?
Ever ſo bob'd for ſearching out adventures,
As I am? did the devill lead me? muſt I needs be peeping
Into mens houſes where I had no buſineſſe,
And make my ſelfe a nuſchiefe? 'Tis well carried;
I muſt take other mens occaſions on me,
And be I know not whom: moſt finely handled:
What have I got by this now? what's the purchaſe?
A piece of evening Arras worke, a childe,
Indeed an Infidell: this comes of peeping:
A lumpe got out of lazineſſe; good white bread
Let's have no bawling with yee: 'Idearh, have I
Knowne Wenches thus long, all the wayes of wenches,
Their ſnares and ſubtilties? have I read over
All their Schoole learnings, div'd into their quiddits,
And am I now bum-fidled with a Baſtard?
Fetch'd over with a Carde of five, and in mine old dayes,
After the dire maſſacre of a million
Of Maiden-heads? caught the common way, ith'night too
Under anothers name, to make the matter
Carry more weight about it? well Don Iohn,
You will be wiſer one day, when ye have purchas'd
A beavy of theſe Butter prints together,
With ſearching out conceal'd iniquities,
Without commiſſion: why, it would never grieve me,
If I had got this Ginger-bread: never ſtirr'd me,
So I had had a ſtroak for't: 't had been Juſtice,
Then to have kept it; but to raiſe a dayrie
For other mens adulteries, conſume my ſelfe in candles,
And ſcowring works, in Nurſes Bells and Babies,
Onely for charity, for meere I thank you,
A little troubles me: the leaſt touch for it,
Had but my breeches got it, had contented me.
Whoſe e're it is, ſure t' had a wealthy mother,
For 'tis well cloathed, and if I be not cozen'd,
Well lin'd within: to leave it here were barbarous,
And ten to one would kill it: a more ſin
Then his that got it: well, I will diſpoſe on't,
And keep it, as they keep deaths heads in rings,
To cry, memento to me; no more peeping.
Now all the danger is to qualifie
The good old gentlewoman, at whoſe houſe we live,
For ſhe will fall upon me with a Catechiſme
Of foure houres long: I muſt endure all;
For I will know this mother: Come good wonder,
Let you and I be jogging: your ſtarv'd trebble
Will waken the rude watch elſe: All that bee
Curious night-walkers, may they finde my fee. Exit.

Scen. 7. Enter Fredrick,

Fred. Sure hee's gone home:
I have beaten all the purlewes,
But cannot bolt him: if he be a bobbing
'Tis not my care can cure him: To morrow morning
I ſhall have further knowledge from a Surgeons——
Where he lyes moord, to mend his leaks.

Enter Conſtantia.

Con, I'me ready,
And through a world of dangers am flown to yee.
Be full of haſte and care, we are undone elſe:
Where are your people? which way muſt we travell?
For heaven ſake ſtay not here ſir.
Fred. What may this prove?
Con. Alas I am miſtaken, loſt, undone,
For ever periſh'd. Sir, for heaven ſake tell me,
Are ye a Gentleman?
Fred. I am.
Con. Of this place?
Fred. No, borne in Spain.
Con. As ever you lov'd honour,
As ever your deſires may gaine their ends,
Doe a poore wretched woman but this benefit,
For I am forc'd to truſt yee.
Fred. Y'ave charm'd me,
Humanity and honour bids me helpe ye;
And if I faile your truſt——
Con. The time's too dangerous
To ſtay your proteſtations: I beleeve ye,
Alas, I muſt believe ye: From this place,
Good noble Sir, remove me inſtantly,
And for a time, where nothing but your ſelfe,
And honeſt converſation may come neare me,
In ſome ſecure place ſettle me. What I am,
And why this boldly I commit my credit
Into a ſtrangers hand, the feares and dangers,
That force me to this wilde courſe, at more leiſure
I ſhall reveale unto you.
Fred. Come, be hearty,
He muſt ſtrike through my life that takes ye from me.
(Exi

Scene 8. Enter Petruchio, Antonio, and 2. Gent.

Petr. He will ſure come. Are yee well arm'd?
Ant. Never feare us.
Here's that will make 'em dance without a Fiddle.
Petr. We are to look for no weak foes, my friends,
Nor unadviſed ones.
Ant. Beſt gamſters make the beſt game,
We ſhall fight cloſe and handſome then.
1 Gent. Antonio,
You are a thought too bloudy.
Ant. Why? all Phyſitians
And penny Almanacks allow the opening
Of veines this moneth: why doe ye talke of bloudy?
What come we for, to fall to cuffes for apples?
What, would ye make the Cauſe a Cudgell quarell?
On what termes ſtands this man? is not his honour
Open'd to his hand, and pickt out like an Oyſter?
His credit like a quart pot knockt together,
Able to hold no liquor? cleare but this point.
Petr. Speak ſoftly, gentle Couzen.
Ant. Ile ſpeak truely;
What ſhould men doe ally'd to theſe diſgraces,
Lick o're his enemie, ſit downe, and dance him?
2. You are as farre o'th' bow hand now.
Ant. And crie;
That's my fine boy, thou wilt doe ſo no more child.
Pet. Here are no ſuch cold pitties.

Ant. By Saint Jaques
They ſhall not finde me one : here's old tough Andrew,
A ſpeciall friend of mine, and he but hold,
Ile ſtrike 'em ſuch a horne-pipe : knocks I come for,
And the beſt bloud I light on ; I profes it,
Not to ſcarre Coſter-mongers; If I looſe mine owne,
Mine audits loſt, and fare-well five and fifty.
Pet. Let's talke no longer, place your ſelves with ſilence,
As I directed yee ; and when time calls us,
As ye are friends, ſo ſhew your ſelves.
Ant. So be it. Exeunt.

Scæne. 9. Enter Don John and his Land-lady.

Land. Nay Son, if this be your regard.
Jo. Good mother.
Lan. Good me no goods ; your Cozen, and your ſelf
Are welcome to me, whilſt you beare your ſelves
Like honeſt and true Gentlemen : Bring hither
To my houſe, that have ever been reputed
A gentlewoman of a decent, and faire carriage,
And ſo behav'd my ſelf?
Jo. I know ye have.
Lan. Bring hither, as I ſay, to make my name
Stinke in my neighbours noſtrills? your Deviſes,
Your Brats, got out of Alligant, and broken oathes?
Your Linſey Woolſey worke, your haſty puddings?
I foſter up your filch'd iniquities?
Y'are deceiv'd in me, Sir, I am none
Of thoſe receivers.
Jo. Have I not ſworne unto you,
'Tis none of mine, and ſhew'd you how I found it?
Land. Yefound an eaſie foole, that let you get it,
She had better have worne paſtures.
Jo. Will yee heare me? (your ends,
Lan. Oathes? what doe you care for oathes to gaine
When ye are high and pamper'd? What Saint know ye?
Or what Religion, but your purpos'd lewdneſſe,
Is to be look'd for of ye? nay, I will tell ye,
You will then ſweare like accus'd Cut-purſes,
As far of truth too ; and lye beyond all Faulconers :
I'me ſick to ſee this dealing.
Jo. Heaven forbid Mother.
La. Nay, I am very ſick.
Jo. Who waits there?
Ant. Sir. within.
Jo. Bring down the bottle of Canary wine.
La. Exceeding ſick, heav'n helpe me.
Jo. Haſte ye ſirrah,
I muſt ev'n make her drunk; nay gentle mother;
Lan. Now fie upon ye, was it for this purpoſe
You fetch'd your evening walks for your digeſtions,
For this pretended holineſſe? no weather,
Not before day could hold ye from the Matins.
Were theſe your bo-peep prayers? ye'have praid well,
And with a learned zeale : watcht well too; your Saint
It ſeems was pleas'd as well : ſtill ſicker, ſicker.
Enter Anthony with a bottle of wine.
Jo. There is no talking to her till I have drencht her.
Give me : here mother take a good round draught,
'Twill purge ſpleen from your ſpirits : deeper mother.
Lan. I, I, ſonne ; you imagine this will mend all.
Jo. All y'faith Mother.
Lan. I confeſſe the Wine
Will doe his part.
Jo. Ile pledge ye.
La. But ſonne John,
Jo. I know your meaning mother, touch it once more,
Alas you look not well ; take a round draught,
It warmes the bloud well, and reſtores the colour,
And then wee'll talke at large.
Land. A civill gentleman?
A ſtranger? one the Town holds a good regard of?
Jo. Nay I will ſilence there.
Lan. One that ſhould weigh his faire name? oh, a ſtich!
Jo. There's nothing better for a ſtitch, good mother,
Make no ſpare of it, as you love your health,
Mince not the matter.
Land. As I ſaid, a gentleman,
Lodge in my houſe? now heav'ns my comfort, Signior!
Jo. I look'd for this.
Lan. I did not thinke you would have us'd me thus;
A woman of my credit : one, heaven knowes,
That lov'd you but too tenderly.
Jo. Deare mother,
I ever found your kindneſſe, and acknowledge it.
Lan. No, no, I am a fool to counſell yee. Where's the (infant?
Come, lets ſee your Workmanſhip.
Jo. None of mine, Mother.
But there 'tis, and a luſty one.
Land. Heaven bleſſe thee,
Thou hadſt a haſty making ; but the beſt is,
'Tis many a good mans fortune : as I live
Your owne eyes Signior, and the nether lip
As like yee, as ye had ſpit it.
Jo. I am glad on't.
Lan. Bleſſe me, what things are theſe?
Jo. I thought my labour
Was not all loſt, 'tis gold, & theſe are jewels,
Both rich, and right I hope.
Lan. Well, well ſonne John,
I ſee ye are a wood-man, and can chuſe
Your Deere, though it be i'th darke, all your diſcretion
Is not yet loſt ; this was well clapt aboard :
Here I am with you now ; when as they ſay
Your pleaſure comes with profit, when ye muſt needs do,
Doe where ye may be done to, 'tis a wiſedome
Becomes a young man well : be ſure of one thing,
Looſe not your labour and your time together,
It ſeaſons of a foole, ſonne, time is pretious,
Worke wary whilſt ye have it : ſince ye muſt traffick
Sometimes this ſlippery way, take ſure hold Signior,
Trade with no broken Merchants, make your lading,
As you would make your reſt, adventurouſly,
But with advantage ever.
Jo. All this time mother,
The childe wants looking too, wants meat and Nurſes.
Lan. Now bleſſing o' thy care ; it ſhall have all,
And inſtantly ; Ile ſeek a Nurſe my ſelfe, ſonne ;
'Tis a ſweet childe : ah my young Spaniard,
Take you no further care ſir.
Jo. Yes of theſe Jewels,
I muſt by your leave Mother : theſe are yours,
To make your care the ſtronger : for the reſt
Ile finde a Maſter ; the gold for bringing up on't,
I freely render to your charge.
Lan. No more words,
Nor no more children, (good ſonne) as you love me,
This may doe well.
Joh. I ſhall obſerve your Morals.
But where's Don Ferdinand (Mother)
Lan. Ten to one

About

About the like adventure: he told me,
He was to finde you out. Exit.
Io. Why ſhould he ſtay thus?
There may be ſome ill chance in't: ſleep I will not,
Before I have found him: now this woman's pleas'd,
Ile ſeek my friend out, and my care is eas'd. Exit.

Scæne. 10. Enter Duke and Gent.

1 Gen. Beleeve ſir, 'tis as poſſible to doe it,
As to remove the City; the maine faction,
Swarm throgh the ſtreets like hornets, arm'd with angers
Able to ruine States: no ſafety left us,
Nor meanes to dye like men, if inſtantly
You draw not back againe,
Duk. May he be drawne
And quarter'd too, that turnes now; were I furer
Of death then thou art of thy fears, and with death
More then thoſe feares are too.
1. Sir, I feare not.
Du. I would not crack my vow, ſtart from my honour,
Becauſe I may finde danger; wound my ſoule,
To keep my body ſafe.
1. I ſpeak not ſir,
Out of a baſeneſſe to you.
Du. No, nor doe not
Out of a baſeneſſe leave me: what is danger,
More then the weakneſſe of our apprehenſions?
A poor cold part o'th bloud? who takes it hold of?
Cowards, and wicked livers; valiant mindes
Were made the Maſters of it, and as hearty Seamen
In deſperate ſtormes, ſteer with a little Rudder
The tumbling ruines of the Ocean:
So with their cauſe & ſwords do they do dangers.
Say we were ſure to dye all in this venture,
As I am confident againſt it: is there any
Amongſt us of ſo fat a ſenſe, ſo pamper'd,
Would chuſe luxuriouſly to lye a bed,
And purge away his ſpirit, ſend his ſoule out
In Sugar-ſops, and Syrups? give me dying,
As dying ought to be, upon mine enemy,
Parting with man-kinde, by a man that's manly:
Let 'em be all the world, and bring along
Cain's envy with 'em, I will on.
2. You may ſir,
But with what ſafety?
1. Since 'tis come to dying,
You ſhall perceive ſir, here be thoſe amongſt us
Can dye as decently as other men,
And with as little ceremony: on brave ſir.
Duk. That's ſpoken heartily.
1. And he that flinches
May he dye lowzie in a ditch.
Du. No more dying,
There's no ſuch danger in it:
What's a clock?
3. Somewhat above your houre.
Du. Away then quickly,
Make no noiſe, and no trouble will attend us. Exeunt.

Scæne 11. Enter Fredericke, and Peter, (with a candle.)

Fred. Give me the candle: ſo goe you out that way.
Pet. What have we now to doe?
Fred. And o' your life ſirrah,
Let none come neare the doore without my knowledge,
No not my Landlady, nor my friend.
Pet. 'Tis done ſir.
Fr. Nor any ſerious buſineſſe that concerns me.
Pet. Is the winde there agen?
Fr. Be gone.
Pet. I am ſir. Exit.

Enter Conſtantia with a Jewell.

Fr. Now enter without feare. ——— And noble Lady
That ſafety and civility yee wiſh'd for
Shall truely here attend you: no rude tongue
Nor rough behaviour knows this place, no wiſhes
Beyond the moderation of a man,
Dare enter here: your owne deſires and Innocence,
Joyn'd to my vow'd obedience, ſhall protect you,
Were dangers more then doubts.
Conſt. Ye are truely noble,
And worth a womans truſt: let it become me,
(I doe beſeech you ſir) for all your kindneſſe,
To render with my thanks, this worthleſſe triſle;
I may be longer troubleſome.
Fred. Faire offices
Are ſtill their owne rewards: Heav'n bleſſe me Lady
From telling civill courteſies: may it pleaſe ye,
If ye will force a favour to oblige me,
Draw but that cloud aſide, to ſatiſfie me
For what good Angel I am engag'd.
Conſt. It ſhall be.
For I am truely confident yee are honeſt:
The Piece is ſcarce worth looking on.
Fred. Truſt me
The abſtract of all beauty, ſoule of ſweetneſſe,
Defend me honeſt thoughts, I ſhall grow wilde elſe:
What eyes are there, rather what little heavens,
To ſtirre mens contemplations? what a Paradice
Runs through each part ſhe has? good bloud be tempe-
I muſt look off: too excellent an object (rate:
Confounds the ſenſe that ſees it. Noble Lady,
If there be any further ſervice to caſt on me,
Let it be worth my life, ſo much I honour ye,
Or the engagement of whole Families.
Conſt. Your ſervice is too liberall, worthy ſir,
Thus farre I ſhall entreat.
Fred. Command me Lady.
You make your power too poore.
Conſt. That preſently
With all convenient haſte, you would retire
Unto the ſtreet you found me in.
Fred. 'Tis done.
Conſt. There, if you finde a gentleman oppreſt
With force and violence, doe a mans office,
And draw your ſword to reſcue him.
Fred. Hee's ſafe,
Be what he will, and let his foes be devills,
Arm'd with your pitty, I ſhall conjure 'em.
Retire, this key will guide ye: all things neceſſary
Are there before ye.
Conſt. All my prayers goe with ye. Exit.
Fred. Ye clap on proof upon me: men ſay gold
Do's all, engages all, works through all dangers:
Now I ſay beauty can do more: The Kings Exchequer,
Nor all his wealthy Indies, could not draw me
Through halfe thoſe miſeries this peece of pleaſure
Might make me leap into: we are all like ſea-Cards,
All our endeavours and our motions,
(As they doe to the North) ſtill point at beauty,
Still at the faireſt: for a handſome woman,
(Setting my ſoule a ſide) it ſhould goe hard,

But

But I would ſtraine my body : yet to her,
Unleſſe it be her owne free gratitude,
Hopes ye ſhall dye, and thou tongue rot within me,
E're I infringe my faith : now to my reſcue. Exit.

Actus Secundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Duke, purſued by Petruchio, Antonio, and that Faction.

Duke. YOu will not all oppreſſe me ? (to him.
Ant. Kill him ith' wanton eye : let me come
Duk. Then yee ſhall buy me dearely,
Petr. Say you ſo ſir ?
Ant. I ſay cut his Wezand ſpoile his peeping :
Have at your love-ſick heart ſir. { Enter Don
John. Sure 'tis fighting. { John.
My friend may be engag'd : fie gentlemen,
This is unmanly oddes.
Ant. Ile ſtop your mouth ſir. { Du. falls down,
John. Nay, then have at thee freely : { Don Ioh. beſtrides him.
Ther's a plumb ſir to ſatisfie your longing.
Pet. Away : I hope I have ſped him: here comes reſcue.
We ſhall be endangered : where's Antonio ?
Ant. I muſt have one thruſt more ſir.
Ioh. Come up to me.
Ant. A miſchiefe confound your fingers.
Petr. How is't ?
Ant. Well :
Ha's giv'n me my quietus eſt, I felt him
In my ſmall guts, I'me ſure, has feez'd me :
This comes of ſiding with ye.
2 Gent. Can you goe ſir ?
Ant. I ſhould goe man, and my head were of,
Never talke of going.
Pet. Come, all ſhall be well then. { Enter the Dukes
I heare more reſcue comming. { Faction.
Ant. Let's turne back then ;
My skull's uncloven yet, let me but kill.
Pet. Away for heaven ſake with him.
Ioh. How is't ?
Du. Well ſir,
Onely a little ſtagger'd.
Faction Du. Lets purſue 'em.
Du. No not a man, I charge yethanks good coat,
Thou haſt ſav'd me a ſhrewd welcome : 'twas put home (too,
With a good minde I'me ſure on't.
Ioh. Are ye ſafe then ?
Du. My thanks to you brave ſir, whoſe timely valour,
And manly courteſie came to my reſcue,
Io. Ye' had foule play offer'd ye, and ſhame befall him
That can paſſe by oppreſſion.
Du. May I crave ſir,
But thus much honour more, to know your name ?
And him I am ſo bound to ?
Ioh. For the Bond ſir,
'Tis every good mans tye : to know me further
Will little profit ye ; I am a ſtranger,
My Countrey Spaine ; my name Don Iohn, a gentleman
That lyes here for my ſtudy.
Du. I have heard ſir,
Much worthy mention of ye, yet I finde
Fame ſhort of what ye are.
Iohn You are pleas'd ſir,
To expreſſe your courteſie : may I demand
As freely what you are, and what miſchance
Caſt you into this danger ?
Du. For this preſent
I muſt deſire your pardon : you ſhall know me
Ere it be long ſir, and a nobler thanks,
Then now my will can render.
Ioh. Your will's your owne ſir.
Du. What is't you look for ſir, have yee loſt any thing ?
Io. Onely my hat i'th ſcuffle ; ſure theſe fellowes
Were night-ſnaps.
Du. No, believe ſir : pray ye uſe mine,
For 'twil be hard to finde your owne now.
Ioh. No ſir.
Du. Indeed ye ſhall, I can command another :
I doe beſeech ye honour me.
Io. I will ſir,
And ſo Ile take my leave.
Du. Within theſe few dayes
I hope I ſhall be happy in your knowledge.
Till when I love your memory. { Exit Duke, &c.
Io. I yours. { Enter Fredrick,
This is ſome noble fellow.
Fred. 'Tis his tongue ſure.
Don Iohn ?
Ioh. Don Fredrick ?
Fred. Ye' are fairely met ſir :
I thought ye had been a Bat-fowling : prethee tell me,
What Revelations haſt thou had to night,
That home was never thought of ?
Io. Revelations ?
Ile tell thee Fredrick : but before I tell thee,
Settle thy underſtanding.
Fred. 'Tis prepar'd, ſir.
Io. Why then mark what ſhall follow. This night Fredr.
This bawdy night.
Fred. I thought no leſſe.
Ioh. This blinde night,
What doſt think I have got ?
Fred. The Pox it may be.
Io. Would 'twere no worſe : ye talke of Revelations,
I have got a Revelation will reveale me,
An arrant Coxcombe while I live.
Fred. What is't ?
Thou haſt loſt nothing ?
Io. No, I have got I tell thee.
Fr. What haſt thou got ?
Io. One of the Infantry, a childe.
Fr. How ?
Io. A chopping child, man.
Fr. 'Give ye joy, ſir.
Io. A lump of lewdneſſe Fredrick, that's the truth on't :
This Town's abominable.
Fr. I ſtill told ye Iohn
Your whoring muſt come home ; I counſell'd ye :
But where no grace is——
Io. 'Tis none o' mine, man.
Fr. Anſwer the Pariſh ſo.
* Io. Cheated introth.
Peeping into a houſe, by whom I know not,
Nor where to find the place agen: no Fredricke,
Had I but kiſt the ring fort ; 'tis no poor one,
That's my beſt comfort, for't has brought about it
Enough to make it man.
Fr. Where is't ?
Io. At home.
Fr. A ſaving voyage : But what will you ſay Signior,

To

To him that ſearching out your ſerious Worſhip,
Has met a ſtranger fortune?
Joh. How, good Frederick?
A militant girle now to this boy would hit it?
Fred. No, mine's a nobler venture: What do you think
Of a diſtreſſed Lady, one whole beauty (Sir
Would overſell all Italy?
Joh. Where is ſhe——
Fred. A woman of that rare behaviour,
So qualified, as admiration
Dwels round about her: of that perfect ſpirit——
Joh. I marry Sir.
Fred. That admirable carriage,
That ſweetnes in diſcourſe; young as the morning,
Her bluſhes ſtaining his.
Joh. But where's this Creature?
Shew me but that.
Fred. That's all one, ſhee's forth comming,
I have her fare Boy.
Joh. Harke ye Fredrick,
What truck bet wixt my Infant?
Fred. 'Tis too light Sir,
Stick to your charges good Don John, I am well.
Joh. But is there ſuch a wench?
Fred. Firſt tell me this,
Did ye not lately as ye walk'd along,
Diſcover people that were arm'd, and likely
To doe offence?
Joh. Yes mary, and they urg'd it
As far as they had ſpirit.
Fred. Pray goe forward.
Joh. A Gentleman I found ingag'd amongſt e'm,
It ſeemes of noble breeding, I'm ſure brave mettall,
As I return'd to looke you, I ſet in to him,
And without hurt (I thanke heaven) reſcued him,
And came my ſelfe off ſafe too.
Fred. My work's done then:
And now to ſatisfie you, there is a woman,
Oh John, there is a woman——
Joh. Oh, where is ſhe?
Fred. And one of no leſſe worth then I aſſure ye;
And which is more, ſafne under my protection.
Joh. I am glad of that: forward ſweet Fredrick,
Fred. And which is more then that, by this nights wan-
And which is moſt of all, ſhe is at home too Sir. (dring,
Io. Come, lets be gone then.
Fred. Yes, but 'tis moſt certaine,
You cannot ſee her, John.
Joh. Why?
Fred. She has ſworne me
That none elſe ſhall come neare her: not my Mother
Till ſome few doubts are clear'd.
Joh. Not look upon her? What chamber is ſhe in?
Fred. In ours.
Joh. Let's goe I ſay:
A womans oathes are wafers, breake with making,
They muſt for modeſtie a little: we all know it.
Fred. No, I'le aſſure you Sir.
Joh. Not ſee her?
I ſmell an old dog trick of yours, well Fredrick,
Ye talkt to me of whoring, let's have faire play,
Square dealing I would with ye.
Fred. When 'tis come,
Which I know never will be, to that iſſue,
Your ſpoone ſhall be as deep as mine Sir.
Joh. Tell me,
And tell me true, is the cauſe honourable,
Or for your eaſe?
Fr. By all our friendſhip, John,
'Tis honeſt, and of great end.
Joh. I am anſwer'd:
But let me ſee her though: leave the doore open
As yee goe in.
Fr. I dare not.
Io. Not wide open,
But juſt ſo, as a jealous husband
Would levell at his wanton wife through.
Fr. That courteſie,
If ye deſire no more, and keep it ſtrictly,
I dare afford yee: come, 'tis now neare morning. Ex.

Scæne 2. Enter Peter and Anthony.

Pet. Nay the old woman's gone too.
Ant. Shee's a Catterwauling
Among the gutters: But conceive me, Peter,
Where our good Maſters ſhould be?
Pet. Where they ſhould be,
I doe conceive, but where they are, good Anthony——
Ant. I, there it goes: my Maſters bo-peep with me,
With his ſlye popping in and out agen,
Argued a cauſe, a trippery cauſe.
Pet. Beleeve me,
They bear up with ſome carvell.
Ant. I doe believe thee,
For thou haſt ſuch a Maſter for that chaſe,
That till he ſpend his maine Maſt——,
Pet. Pray remember
Your courteſie good Anthony; and withall,
How long 'tis ſince your Maſter ſprung a leak,
He had a ſound one ſince he came. { Lute ſounds within.
Ant. Harke.
Pet. What?
Ant. Doeſt not hear a Lute?
Agen?
Pet. Where is't?
Ant. Above in my Maſters chamber.
Pet. There's no creature: he hath the key himſelf man,
An. This is his Lute: let him have it. { Sing within a little.
Pet. I grant you; but who ſtrikes it?
Ant. An admirable voice too, harke ye.
Pet. Anthony,
Art ſure we are at home?
Ant. Without all doubt, Peter.
Pet. Then this muſt be the Devill.
Ant. Let it be. Sing agen.
Good Devill ſing againe: O dainty devill,
Peter believe it, a moſt delicate devill,
The ſweeteſt Devill—— { Enter Fredrick & Don Iohn.
Fred. If ye could leave peeping.
Iohn I cannot by no meanes.
Fred. Then come in ſoftly,
And as ye love your faith, preſume no further
Then yee have promiſed.
Ioh. Baſſo.
Fr. What make you up ſo early ſir?
Io. You ſir in your contemplations.
Pet. O pray ye peace ſir.
Fred. Why peace ſir?
Pet. Doe you heare?
Ioh. 'Tis your Lute.
Fred. Pray yee ſpeak ſoftly.

Shee's

She's playing on't.
Ant. The houſe is haunted ſir,
For this we have heard this halfe yeare,
Fred. Ye ſaw nothing;
Ant. Not I.
Pet. Nor I Sir.
Fred. Get us our breakfaſt then,
And make no words on't; wee'll undertake this ſpirit,
If it be one.
Ant. This is no devill Peter. Sing.
Mum, there be Bats abroad. Exeunt Servants.
Fred. Stay, now ſhe ſings.
Ioh. An Angels voice Ile ſweare.
Fred. Why did'ſt thou ſhrug ſo?
Either allay this heat; or as I live
I will not truſt ye.
Ioh. Paſſe: I warrant ye. Exeunt.

Enter Conſtantia.

Con. To curſe thoſe ſtarres, that men ſay governe us,
To raile at fortune, fall out with my Fate,
And taske the generall world, will helpe me nothing:
Alas, I am the ſame ſtill, neither are they
Subject to helpes, or hurts: Our owne deſires,
Are our owne fates, our owne ſtars, all our fortunes,
Which as we ſway 'em, ſo abuſe, or bleſſe us.

Enter Fredrick, and Don John peeping.

Fred. Peace to your meditations.
Joh. Pox upon ye,
Stand out oth' light.
Conſt. I crave your mercy ſir,
My minde o're-charg'd with care made me unmannerly.
Fr. Pray yee ſet that minde at reſt, all ſhall be perfect.
Io. I like the body rare; a handſome body,
A wondrous handſome body: would ſhe would turne:
See, and that ſpightfull puppy be not got
Between me and my light againe,
Fr. Tis done,
As all that you command ſhall bee: the gentleman
Is ſafely off all danger.
Ioh. O de dios.
Conſt. How ſhall I thank ye ſir? how ſatisfie?
Fr. Speak ſoftly, gentle Lady, all's rewarded,
Now does he melt like Marmalad.
Io. Nay, 'tis certaine,
Thou art the ſweeteſt woman I e're look'd on:
I hope thou art not honeſt.
Fred. None diſturb'd yee?
Conſt. Not any ſir, nor any ſound came neare me,
I thank your care.
Fred. 'Tis well.
Ioh. I would faine pray now,
But the Devill and that fleſh there, o' the world,
What are we made to ſuffer?
Fr. Hee'll enter;
Pull in your head and be hang'd.
Ioh. Harke ye Fredricke,
I have brought ye home your Pack-ſaddle.
Fr. Pox upon yee.
Con. Nay let him enter: fie my Lord the Duke,
Stand peeping at your friends.
Fr. Ye are cozen'd Lady,
Here is no Duke.
Conſt. I know him full well Signior.
Ioh. Hold thee there wench.
Fre. This mad-brain'd foole will ſpoile all.
Con. I doe beſeech your grace come in.
Ioh. My Grace,
There was a word of comfort.
Fred. Shall he enter,
Who e're he be?
Ioh. Well follow'd Fredrick,
Conſt. With all my heart.
Fred. Come in then. Enter Don John.
Jo. 'Bleſſe yee Lady:
Fr. Nay ſtart not, though he be a ſtranger to ye,
Hee's of a Noble ſtraine, my kinſman, Lady,
My Countrey-man, and fellow Traveller,
One bed containes us ever, one purſe feeds us,
And one faith free between us; do not fear him,
Hee's truely honeſt.
Jo. That's a lye.
Fred. And truſty:
Beyond your wiſhes: valiant to defend,
And modeſt to converſe with, as your bluſhes.
Jo. Now may I hang my ſelf; this commendation
Has broke the neck of all my hopes: for now
Muſt I cry, no forſooth, and I forſooth, and ſurely,
And truely as I live,, and as I am honeſt.
Has done theſe things for 'nonce too; for hee knowes,
Like a moſt envious Raſcall as he is,
I am not honeſt, nor deſire to be,
Eſpecially this way: h'as watch'd his time,
But I ſhall quit him.
Conſt. Sir, I credit ye.
Fred. Goe kiſſe her John.
Joh. Plague o' your commendations.
Con. Sir, I ſhall now deſire to be a trouble.
Jo. Never to me, ſweet Lady: Thus I ſeale
My faith, and all my ſervice.
Con. One word Signeur.
Jo. Now 'tis impoſſible I ſhould be honeſt,
She kiſſes with a conjuration
Would make the devill dance: what points ſhe at?
My leg I warrant, or my well knit body:
Sit faſt Don Fredrick,
Fred. 'Twas given him by that gentleman
You took ſuch care of, his owne being loſt ith' ſcuffle.
Con. With much joy may he weare it: 'tis a right one,
I can aſſure ye Gentleman, and right happy
May you be in all fights for that faire ſervice.
Fred. Why doe ye bluſh?
Con. 'T had almoſt cozen'd me,
For not to lye, when I ſaw that, I look'd for Another Maſter of it: but 'tis well. Knock within.
Fr. Who's there? Ent. Anthony.
Stand ye a little cloſe: Come in Sir,
Now what's the newes with you?
Anth. There is a gentlemen without,
Would ſpeak with Don John,
Ioh. Who ſir?
Ant. I do not know Sir, but he ſhews a man
Of no meane reckoning.
Fred. Let him ſhew his name,
And then returne a little wiſer.
Ant. Well Sir. Exit Anthony.
Fred. How doe you like her Iohn?
Ioh. As well as you Fredrick,
For all I am honeſt: you ſhall finde it ſo too.
Fred. Art thou not honeſt?
Ioh. Art thou an Aſſe?
And modeſt as her bluſhes? What a block-head
Would e're have popt out ſuch a dry Apologie,

For

For his deare friend? and to a Gentlewoman,
A woman of her youth, and delicacy:
They are arguments to draw them to abhorre us.
An honest morall man; 'tis for a Constable:
A handsome man, a wholsome man, a tough man,
A liberall man, a likely man, a man
Made up like Hercules, upstak'd with service:
The same to night, to morrow night, the next night,
And so to perpetuitie of pleasure.
These had been things to hearken too, things catching:
But you have such a spiced consideration,
Such qualmes upon your worships conscience,
Such- chil-blaines in your blood, that all things pinch ye,
Which nature, and the liberall world makes customes,
And nothing but faire honour, O sweet honour,
Hang up your Eunuch honour: That I was trusty,
And valiant, were things well put in; but modest!
A modest gentleman! ô wit where wast thou?
Fred. I am sorrie John,
John My Ladies gentlewoman
Would laugh me to a Schoole-boy, make me blush
With playing with my Codpeece point: fie on thee;
A man of thy discretion?
Fred. It shall be mended:
And henceforth yee shall have your due. Enter Anthony.
John I look for't: How now, who is't?
An. A gentleman of this towne
And calls himselfe Petruchio. Enter Constantia.
John Ile attend him.
Const. How did he call himselfe.
Fred. Petruchio,
Doe's it concerne you ought?
Const. O gentlemen,
The houre of my destruction is come on me,
I am discover'd, lost, left to my ruine:
As ever ye had pitty——
John Doe not feare,
Let the great devill come, he shall come through me:
Lost here, and we about ye?
Fred. Fall before us?
Const. O my unfortunate estate, all angers
Compar'd to his, to his——
Fred. Let his, and all mens,
Whilst we have power and life, stand up for heaven sake.
Con. I have offended heaven too; yet heaven knows——
John We are all evill:
Yet heaven forbid we should have our deserts.
What is a?
Con. Too too neare to my offence sir;
O he will cut me peece-meale.
Fred. Tis no Treason?
John Let it be what it will: if a cut here,
Ile finde him cut-worke.
Fred. He must buy you deare,
With more than common lives.
Joh. Feare not, nor weep not:
By heaven Ile fire the Towne before yee perish,
And then, the more the merrier, wee'll jog with yee.
Fred. Come in, and dry your eyes.
John Pray no more weeping:
Spoile a sweet face for nothing? my returne
Shall end all this I warrant you.
Con. Heaven grant it. Exeunt.

Scene 3. Enter Petruchio with a Letter.

Petr. This man should be of speciall rank:
For these commends carry no common way,
No slight worth with 'em:
A shall be he. Ent. Don John.
John 'Save yee sir: I am sorrie
My busines was so unmannerly, to make ye
Wait thus long here.
Petr. Occasions must be serv'd sir: but is your name Don John? Joh. It is Sir.
Petr. Then,
First, for your owne brave sake I must embrace yee:
Next, from the credit of your noble friend
Hernando de Aluara, make yee mine;
Who layes his charge upon me in this Letter
To look yee out, and for the goodnesse in yee,
Whilst your occasions make yee resident
In this place, to supply yee, love and honour yee;
Which had I knowne sooner,——
John Noble sir,
You'll make my thanks too poore: I weare a sword, sir,
And have a service to be still disposed of,
As you shall please command it.
Petr. Gentle sir,
That manly courtesie is half my businesse:
And to be short, to make ye know I honour ye,
And in all points believe your worth like Oracle,
And how above my friends, which are not few,
And those not slack, I estimate your vertues,
Make your selfe understand, This day Petruchio,
A man that may command the strength of this place,
Hazzard the boldest spirits, hath made choice
Onely of you, and in a noble office.
Joh. Forward, I am free to entertaine it.
Petr. Thus then:
I doe beseech ye mark me.
Joh. I shall doe it.
Pet. Ferrara's Duke, would I might call him wort hie,
But that he has raz'd out from his family,
As he has mine with infamie, This man,
Rather this powerfull Monster, we being left
But two of all our house, to stock out memories,
My Sister, and my selfe; with arts, and witch-crafts,
Vowes, and such oathes heaven has no mercy for,
Drew to dishonour this weak maid, by stealthes,
And secret passages I knew not of,
Oft he obtain'd his wishes, oft abus'd her:
I am asham'd to say the rest: This purchas'd,
And his hot bloud allay'd, as friends forsake us
At a miles end upon our way, he left her,
And all our name to ruine.
Joh. This was foule Play,
And ought to be rewarded so.
Petr. I hope so;
He scap'd me yester-night: which if he dare
Againe adventure for, heaven pardon him,
I shall with all my heart.
Joh. For me, brave Signior,
What doe yee intend?
Petr. Onely, faire sir, this trust,
Which from the commendations of this Letter,
I dare presume well placed, nobly to beare him
By word of mouth a single challenge from me,
That man to man, if he have honour in him,
We may decide all difference.
Joh. Faire, and noble,
And I will doe it home: When shall I visite ye?
Pet. Please you this after-noon, I will ride with yee:

For at a Caſtle ſix mile hence, we are ſure
To finde him.
Iohn Ile be ready.
Petr. To attend ye,
My man ſhall wait: with all my love Ex. Petr.
Iohn My ſervice ſhall not faile yee. Enter Fredr.
Fred. How now?
Iohn All's well: who doſt thou think this wench is?
Gheſſe, and thou canſt?
Fred. I cannot.
Iohn Be it knowne then,
To all men by theſe preſents, this is ſhe,
She, ſhe, and only ſhe, our curious coxcombs
Were errant two moneths after.
Fred. Who, Conſtantia?
Thou talk'ſt of Cocks and Bulls.
Ioh. I talke of wenches,
Of Cocks and Hens Don Frerdick; this is the Pullet
We two went proud after.
Fred. It cannot be.
Iohn It ſhall be;
Siſter to Don Petruchio: I know all man.
Fred. Now I beleeve.
Iohn Goe to, there has been ſtirring,
Fumbling with Linnen Fredrick,
Fred. 'Tis impoſſible,
You know her fame was pure as fire.
Ioh. That pure fire
Has melted out her maiden-head: ſhe is cracke;
We have all that hope of our ſide, boy.
Fred, Thou tell'ſt me,
To my imagination, things incredible:
I ſee no looſe thought in her.
Ioh. That's all one,
She is looſe ith' hilts by heaven: but the world muſt know
A faire way, upon vow of marriage.
Fred. There may be ſuch a ſlip.
Iohn And will be Fredrick,
Whil'ſt the old game's a foot: I feare the boy too
Will prove hers too I took up.
Fred. Good circumſtance
May cure all this yet.
Iohn There thou hitſt it, Fredrick:
Come, let's walke in and comfort her: her being here
Is nothing yet ſuſpected: anon Ile tell thee
Wherefore her brother came, who by this light
Is a brave noble fellow, and what honour
H'as done to me a ſtranger: there be Irons
Heating for ſome, will hiſſe into their heart bloods,
Ere all be ended; ſo much for this time.
Fred. Well ſir. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Eter Land-lady and Peter.

Land. COme ye doe know.
Pet. I do not by this hand Miſtris.
But I ſuſpect.
Land. What?
Pet. That if egges continue
At this price, women wil ne're be ſav'd
By their good works.
Land. I will know.
Pet. Yee ſhall, any thing
Lyes in my power: The Duke of Loraine now
Is ſeven thouſand ſtrong: I heard it of a fiſh-wife,
A woman of fine knowledge.
Land. Sirrah, ſirrah.
Pe. The Popes Buls are broke looſe too, and 'tis ſuſpected
They ſhall be baited in England.
Lan. Very well ſir.
Pet. No, 'tis not ſo well neither.
Lan. But I ſay to yee,
Who is it keeps your Maſter company?
Pet. I ſay to you, Don Iohn.
Lan. I ſay what woman?
Pet. I ſay ſo too.
Lan. I ſay againe, I will know.
Pet. I ſay 'tis fit yee ſhould.
Lan. And I tell thee
He has a woman here.
Pet. And I tell thee
'Tis then the better for him.
Lan. You are no Bawd now?
Pet. Would I were able to be call'd unto it:
A worſhipfull vocation for my elders;
For as I underſtand it is a place
Fitting my betters farr.
Lan. Was ever Gentlewoman
So frumpt off with a foole? well ſawcy ſirrah,
I will know who it is, and for what purpoſe:
I pay the rent, and I will know how my houſe
Comes by theſe Inflamations: if this geere hold,
Beſt hang a ſigne-poſt up, to tell the Signiors,
Here ye may have lewdneſſe at Liverie. Ent. Fredrick,
Pet, 'Twould be a great eaſe to your age.
Fred. How now?
Why what's the mater Land-lady?
Lan. What's the matter?
Ye uſe me decently among ye gentlemen.
Fr. Who has abus'd her, you ſir?
Lan. 'Ods my witneſſe
I will not be thus treated, that I will not.
Pet. I gave her no ill language.
Lan. Thou lyeſt lewdly,
Thou tookſt me up at every word I ſpoke,
As I had been a Mawkin, a ſlurt Gillian;
And thou thinkſt, becauſe thou canſt write & read,
Our noſes muſt be under thee.
Fr. Dare you ſirrah?
Pet. Let but the truth be known Sir, I beſeech ye,
She raves of wenches, and I know not what ſir:
La. Go to, thou know'ſt too well, thou wicked varlet,
Thou inſtrument of evill.
Pet. As I live Sir,
She is ever thus till dinner.
Fr. Get ye in,
Ile anſwer you anon ſir.
Pet. By this hand
Ile break your Poſſit pan. Exit.
Lan. Then by this hood
Ile lock the meat up.
Fr. Now your grief, what is't?
For I can gheſſe.
Lan. Ye may with ſhame enough,
If theer were ſhame amongſt yee; nothing thought on,
But how yee may abuſe my houſe: not ſatisfi'd
With bringing home your Baſtards to undoe me,
But you muſt drill your whores here too, my patience

Becauſe

(Becauſe I beare, and beare, and carry all,
And as they ſay am willing to groan under)
Muſt be your make-ſport now.
Fred. No more of theſe words,
Nor no more murmurings Lady: for you know
That I know ſomething. I did ſuſpect your anger,
But turne it preſently and handſomely,
And beare your ſelfe diſcreetly to this woman,
For ſuch a one there is indeed.
Land. 'Tis well ſonne.
Fr. Leaving your devils Matins, and your melanchollies,
Or we ſhall leave our lodgings.
Land. You have much need
To uſe theſe vagrant wayes, and to much profit:
Ye had that might content
(At home within your ſelves too) right good gentlemen,
Wholſome, and yee ſaid handſome: But you gallants,
Boaſt that I was to beleeve ye——
Fr. Leave your ſuſpicion:
For as I live there's no ſuch thing.
Land. Mine honour;
And 'twere not for mine honour.
Fr. Come, your honour,
Your houſe, and you too, if you dare beleeve me
Are well enough; ſleek up your ſelf, leave crying. } Bowle of wine ready.
For I muſt have yee entertain this Lady
With all civility, ſhe well deſerves it,
Together with all ſecreſie: I dare truſt yee,
For I have found yee faithfull: when you know her
You will find your owne fault; no more words, but doe it.
Land. You know you may command me. Ent. Don Iohn.
Io. Worſhipfull Lady.
How does thy Velvet ſcabbard? by this hand
Thou look'ſt moſt amiably: now could I willingly,
And 'twere not for abuſing thy Geneva print there,
Venture my body with thee.
Land. You'll leave this roperie,
When you come to my yeares.
Iob. By this light
Thou art not above fifteen yet, a meere girle,
Thou haſt not half thy teeth: come——
Fred. Prethee Iohn
Let her alone, ſhe has been vex'd already:
Shee'll grow ſtarke mad man.
Iob. I would ſee her mad,
An old mad woman
Fred. Prethee be patient.
Iob. Is like a Millers Mare, troubled with tooth-ache.
Shee'll make the rareſt faces.
Fred. Goe, and doe it,
And doe not mind this fellow.
Land. Well Don Iohn.
There will be times agen; when O good Mother,
What's good for a carnoſity in the Bladder?
O the green water, mother.
Iob. Doting take yee,
Doe ye remember that?
Fr. She has payd ye now ſir.
La. Clarry ſweet mother, Clarry.
Fr. Are ye ſatisfied?
Land. Ile never whore againe; never give Petticoats
And Waſtcoats at five pound a peece; good Mother,
Quickly Mother: now mock on Son.
Iob. A devill grinde your old chaps. Exit Land.
Fr. By this hand wench
Ile give thee a new hood for this.
Has ſhe met with your Lordſhip?
Touch-wood rake her. Enter Anthony.
Shee's a rare ghoſtly mother.
Ant. Below attends yee
The Gentlemans man ſir that was with yee.
Iob. Well Sir;
My time is come then: yet if my project hold,
You ſhall not ſtay behinde: Ile rather truſt. } Enter Conſtan.
A Cat with ſweet milk Fredrick; by her face
I feele her feares are working.
Conſt. Is there no way,
I doe beſeech yee think yet, to divert
This certaine danger?
Fr. 'Tis impoſſible:
Their honours are engag'd.
Con. Then there muſt be murther,
Which, Gentlemen, I ſhall no ſooner heare of,
Then make one in't: you may, if you pleaſe ſir,
Make all goe leſſe yet.
John. Lady wer't mine owne cauſe,
I could diſpence: but loaden with my friends truſt,
I muſt go on; though generall maſſacres
As much I feare——
Conſt. Doe ye heare ſir; for heavens pittie
Let me requeſt one love of you.
Fred. Yes any thing.
Con. This gentleman I find too reſolute,
Too hot, and fiery for the cauſe, as ever
You did a vertuous deed, for honours ſake
Go with him, and allay him: your fair temper
And noble diſpoſition, like wiſh'd ſhowres,
May quench thoſe eating fires, that would ſpoile all elſe.
I ſee in him deſtruction.
Fred. I will doe it;
And 'tis a wiſe conſideration,
To me, a bounteous favour: harke ye Iohn,
I will goe with yee.
Iob. No.
Fred. Indeed I will,
Ye goe upon a hazzard: no denyall;
For as I live, Ile goe.
John. Then make ye ready,
For I am ſtraight a horſe-back.
Fred. My ſword on,
I am as ready as you: what my beſt labour,
With all the Art I have can work upon 'em,
Be ſure of, and expect faire end: the old gentlewoman
Shall wait upon you; ſhe is both grave and private,
And yee may truſt her in all points.
Conſt. Ye're noble:
And ſo I kiſſe your hand.
John. That ſeale for me too,
And I hope happy iſſue Lady.
Conſt. All heavens care upon yee, and my prayers.
Iob. So,
Now my mind's at reſt.
Fred. Away, 'tis late John. Exeunt.

Scene 2. Enter Antonio, a Surgeon, and 2. Gent.

1 Gent. Come ſir, be hearty: all the worſt is paſt.
Ant. Give me ſome Wine.
Sur. 'Tis death Sir.
Ant. 'Tis a horſe ſir.
'Sbloud, to be dreſt to the tune of Ale onely,
Nothing but ſawces to my ſores.

2 Gen. Fie Antonie,
You must be govern'd.
Ant. Has given me a dam'd Glister,
Only of sand and snow water, gentlemen,
Has almost scour'd my guts out.
Surg. I have giv'n you that sir
Is fittest for your state.
Ant. And here he feeds me
With rotten ends of rooks, and drown'd chickens,
Stewd Pericraniums, and Pia-maters;
And when I goe to bed, by heaven 'tis true gentlemen,
He rolls me up in Lints, with Labels at 'em,
That I am just the man ith' Almanack,
In head and face, is Aries place.
Surg. Wilt please ye
To let your friends see ye open'd?
Ant. Will it please you sir
To let me have a wench: I feele my body
Open enough for that yet?
Surg. How, a wench?
Ant. Why look yee gentlemen; thus I am us'd still,
I can get nothing that I want.
1 Gent. Leave these things,
And let him open ye.
Ant. De' ye heare Surgeon?
Send for the Musick, let me have some pleasure
To entertaine my friends, beside your Sallads,
Your green salves, and your searches, and some wine too,
That I may onely smell to it: or by this light
Ile dye upon thy hand, and spoyle thy custome.
1 Gen. Let him have Musick. Ent. Bowl. with wine.
Surg. 'Tis ith' house, and ready,
If he will aske no more: but wine— Musick.
2 Gent. He shall not drink it.
Sur. Will these things please yee?
Ant. Yes, and let 'em sing
John Dorrie.
2 Gent. 'Tis too long.
Ant. Ile have John Dorrie,
For to that warlike tune I will be open'd.
Give me some drinke, have yee stopt the leakes well Surgeon,
All will runne out else?
Surg. Feare not.
Ant. Sit downe Gentlemen:
And now advance your plaisters. Song of Joh. Dorry.
Give 'em ten shillings friends: how doe ye finde me?
What Symptomes doe you see now?
Sur. None Sir, dangerous:
But if you will be rul'd——
Ant. What time?
Surg. I can cure ye
In forty dayes, so you will not transgresse me.
Ant. I have a dog shall lick me whole in twenty:
In how long canst thou kill me?
Surg. Presently.
Ant. Doe it; there's more delight in't.
1 Gent. You must have patience.
Ant. Man, I must have busines; this foolish fellow
Hinders himselfe: I have a dozen Rascalls
To hurt within these five dayes: good man mender,
Stop me up with Parsley, like stuft Beefe,
And let me walke abroad.
Surg. Ye shall walke shortly.
Ant. For I must finde Petruchio.
2. Gent. Time enough. (these three dayes
1 Gent. Come lead him in, and let him sleep: within
Wee'll beg yee leave to play.
2 Gent. And then how things fall,
Wee'll certainly informe yee.
Ant. But Surgion promise me
I shall drinke Wine then too.
Surg. A little temper'd.
Ant. Nay, Ile no tempering Surgion,
Surg. Well, ast please ye,
So ye exceed not.
Ant. Farewell: and if ye finde
The Mad slave, that thus slasht me, commend me to him,
And bid him keep his skin clote.
1 Gent. Take your rest sir. Exeunt.

Scæn. 3. Enter Constantia, and Land-lady.

Con. I have told yee all I can, and more then yet
Those Gentlemen know of me; ever trusting
Your Councell and concealement: for to me
You seem a worthy woman; one of those
Are seldome found in our sex, wise and vertuous,
Direct me I beseech ye.
Land. Ye say well Lady,
And hold yee to that point; for in these businesses
A womans counsell that conceives the matter,
(Doe ye marke me, that conceives the matter Lady)
Is worth ten mens engagements: She knows something
And out of that can worke like wax: when men
Are giddy-headed, either out of wine,
Or a more drunkennesse, vaine ostentation,
Discovering all: there is no more keep in 'em,
Then hold upon an Eeles taile: nay 'tis held fashion
To defame now all they can.
Con. I, but these gentlemen
Land. Doe not you trust to that: these gentlemen
Are as all Gentlemen of the same Barrell:
I, and the selfe same pickle too. Be it granted,
They have us'd yee with respect and faire behaviour,
Yet since ye came: doe you know what must follow?
They are Spaniards, Lady, Genners of high mettle,
Things that will thrash the devill, or his dam,
Let 'em appeare but cloven.
Con. Now heaven blesse me.
Lan. Mad Colts will court the wind: I know 'em Lady
To the least haire they have; and I tell you,
Old as I am, let but the pinte pot blesse 'em,
They'll offer to my yeares——
Con. How?
Lan. Such rude gambolls——
Con. To you?
Lan. I, and so handle me, that oft I am forc'd
To fight of all foure for my safety: there's the yonger,
Don John, the arrantst Jack in all this City:
The other, time has blasted, yet he will stoop,
If not ore-flowne, and freely on the quarry;
Has been a Dragon in his dayes. But Tarwom,
Don Jenkin is the Devill himselfe, the Dog-dayes,
The most incomprehensible whore-master,
Twenty a night is nothing: Beggers, Broom-women,
And those so miserable, they look like famine,
Are all sweet Ladies in his drinke.
Con. He's a handsome Gentleman.
Pitty he should be master of such follies.
Land. Hee's ne're without a roule of Sirtenges
In's pocket, those proclame him; birding pills,
Waters to coole his conscience, in small Viols;

With

With thousand such sufficient emblemes: the truth is,
Whose chastity he chops upon, he cares not.
He flies at all; Bastards upon my conscience,
He has now in making multitudes; The last night
He brought home one; I pitty her that bore it,
But we are all weake vessels, some rich woman
(For wife I dare not call her) was the mother,
For it was hung with Jewels; the bearing cloath
No lesse then Crimson Velvet.

Con. How?

Land. 'Tis true Lady.

Con. Was it a Boy too?

Land. A brave Boy; deliberation
And judgement shewd in's getting, as I'le say for him,
He's as well paced for that sport——

Con. May I see it?
For there is a neighbour of mine, a Gentle woman,
Has had a late mischance, which willingly
I would know further of; now if you please
To be so curteous to me.

Land. Ye shall see it:
But what do ye thinke of these men now ye know 'em,
And of the cause I told ye of? Be wise,
Ye may repent too late else; I but tell ye
For your owne good, and as you will find it Lady,

Con. I am advis'd.

Land. No more words then; do that,
And instantly, I told ye of be ready;
Don Iohn, I'le fit ye for your trumps,

Con. I shall be:
But shall I see this Child?

Land. Within this halfe houre,
Let's in, and there thinke better; she that's wise,
Leapes at occasion first; the rest pay for it. Exeunt.

Scene 4. Enter Petruchio, Don Iohn, and Fredrick.

Iohn Sir, he is worth your knowledge, and a Gentleman
If I that so much love him, may commend him,
Of free and vertuous parts; and one, if foule play
Should fall upon us, for which feare I brought him,
Will not flie backe for phillips.

Pet. Ye much honour me,
And once more I pronounce ye both mine.

Fred. Stay, what Troope
Is that below i'th valley there?

Iohn Hawking I take it.

Pet. They are so; 'tis the Duke, 'tis even he Gentlemen,
Sirrah, draw backe the Horses till we call ye,
I know him by his company.

Fred. I thinke too
He bends up this way.

Pet. So he does:

Iohn Stand you still
Within that Covert till I call: you Fredrick,
By no meanes be not seen, unlesse they offer
To bring on odds upon us; he comes forward,
Here will I waite him fairely: to your Cabins.

Pet. I need no more instruct ye?

Iohn Feare me not,
I'le give it him, and boldly. Ex: Pet. & Fred.

Enter Duke and his faction.

Duke Feed the Hawkes up,
We'l flie no more to day: O my blest fortune,
Have I so fairely met the man I

Iohn Ye have Sir,
And him you know by this,

Duke Sir all the honour,
And love——

Iohn I do beseech your Grace stay there,
(For I know you too now) that love and honour
I come not to receive, nor can you give it,
Till ye appeare faire to the world; I must beseech ye
Dismisse your traine a little.

Duke Walke aside,
And out of hearing I command ye: Now Sir,

Iohn Last time we met, I was a friend.

Duke And Nobly
You did a friends office: let your businesse
Be what it may, you must be still——

Iohn Your pardon,
Never a friend to him, cannot be friend
To his own honour.

Duke In what have I transgress'd it?
Ye make a bold breach at the first Sir.

Iohn Bolder,
You made that breach that let in infamy
And ruine, to surprize a noble stocke.

Duke Be plaine Sir.

Iohn I will, and short;
Ye have wrong'd a Gentleman
Little behind your selfe, beyond all justice,
Beyond mediation of all friends.

Duke The man, and manner of wrong?

Iohn Petruchio,
The wrong, ye have whord his Sister.

Duke What's his will in't?

Iohn His will is to oppose you like a Gentleman,
And single, to decide all.

Duke Now stay you Sir,
And heare me with the like beliefe: this Gentleman
His Sister that you named, 'tis true I have long loved,
Nor was that love lascivious, as he makes it;
As true, I have enjoy'd her: no lesse truth
I have a child by her: But that she, or he,
Or any of that family are tainted
Suffer disgrace, or ruine, by my pleasures,
I weare a Sword to satisfie the world no,
And him in this cause when he please; for know Sir,
She is my wife, contracted before Heaven,
(Witnesse I owe more tye to, then her Brother)
Nor will I flye from that name, which long since
Had had the Churches approbation,
But for his jealous danger.

Iohn Sir, your pardon,
And all that was my anger, now my service.

Duke Faire sir, I knew I should convert ye; had we
But that rough man here now too——

Iohn And ye shall Sir
Whoa, hoa, boo.

Duke I hope ye have laid no Ambush? Enter Petru.

Iohn Only friends.

Duke My noble Brother welcome:
Come put your Anger off, we'l have no fighting,
Unlesse you will maintaine I am unworthy
To beare that name.

Pet. Do you speake this hartely?

Duke upon my soule, and truly; the first Priest
Shall put you out of these doubts.

Pet. Now I love ye,
And I beseech you pardon my suspitions,
You are now more then a Brother, a brave friend too.

Iohn

John The good man's over-joy'd Enter Fred.
Fred. How now, how goes it?
John Why, the man 'has his mare agen, and all's well
The Duke profeſſes freely hee's her husband. (Fredrick,
Fred. 'Tis a good hearing.
John Yes, for modeſt Gentlemen.
I muſt preſent ye; may it pleaſe your Grace
To number this brave Gentleman, my friend,
And noble kinſman, amongſt thoſe your ſervants.
Duke O my brave friend, you ſhowre your bounties on Amongſt my beſt thoughts Signior, in which number (me
You being worthily diſpos'd already,
May place your friend to honour me.
Fred. My love ſir,
And where your Grace dares truſt me, all my ſervice.
Pet. Why? this is wondrous happy: But now Brother,
Now comes the bitter to our ſweet: Conſtantia,
Duke Why, what of her?
Pet. Nor what, nor where, do I know?
Wing'd with her feares laſt night, beyond my knowledge,
She quit my houſe, but whether——
Fred. Let not that——
Duke No more good Sir, I have heard too much.
Pet. Nay ſinke not,
She cannot be ſo loſt.
John Nor ſhall not Gentlemen;
Be free agen, the Ladie's found; that ſmile Sir,
Shewes ye diſtruct your Servant.
Duke I do beſeech ye.
John Ye ſhall beleeve me: by my ſoule ſhe is ſafe.
Duke. Heaven knows, I would beleeve Sir,
Fred. Ye may ſafely.
John And under noble uſage: this faire Gentleman
Met her in all her doubts laſt night, and to his guard
(Her feares being ſtrong upon her) ſhe gave her perſon,
who waited on her, to our lodging; where all reſpect,
Civill and honeſt ſervice now attend her.
Pet Ye may beleeve now.
Duke Yes, I do, and ſtrongly:
Well my good friends, or rather my good Angels,
For ye have both preſerved me; when theſe vertues
Dye in your friends remembrance——
John Good your grace
Loſe no more time in complement, 'tis too pretious,
I know it by my ſelfe, there can be no hell
To his that hangs upon his hopes; eſpecially
In way of luſtly pleaſures.
Pet. He has hit it.
Fred. To horſe againe then, for this night I'le crowne
With all the joyes ye wiſh for.
Pet. Happy Gentlemen Exeunt.

Enter Franciſco.

Fran. This is the maddeſt miſchiefe: never foole
Was ſo fubd off, as I am; made ridiculous,
And to my ſelfe, mine owne Aſſe: truſt a woman,
I'le truſt the Devill firſt; for he dare be Better then's word ſometime: what faith have I broke?
In what obſervance failed? Let me conſider, (Enter Don
For this is monſtrous uſage. (John and Fred.
Fred. Let them talke,
Wee'll ride on faire and ſoftly.
Fran. Well Conſtantia,
Fred. Conſtantia, what's this fellow? ſtay by all means.
Fran. Ye have ſpun your ſelfe a faire thred now.
Fred. Stand ſtill John.
Fran. What cauſe had you to fly? what feare poſſeſt ye?
Were you not ſafely lodg'd from all ſuſpition?
Us'd with all gentle meanes? did any know
How ye came thether, or what your ſin was.
Fred. John,
I ſmell ſome juggling John.
John Yes, Fredrick, I feare it will be found ſo.
Fran. So ſtrangely,
Without the counſell of your friends; ſo deſperately
To put all dangers on ye?
Fred. 'Tis ſhe.
Fran. So deceitfully
After a ſtrangers lure?
John Did ye marke that Fredrick?
Fran. To make ye appeare more monſter, and the Law
More cruell to reward ye? to leave all,
All that ſhould be your ſafegard, to ſeeke evils?
Was this your wiſedome? this your promiſe? well
He that incited ye——
Fred. Marke that too.
John Yes Sir.
Fran. Had better have plough'd farther off, now Lady,
What will your laſt friend, he that ſhould preſerve ye,
And hold your credit up, the brave Antonio,
Thinke of this ſlip? he'll to Petruchio,
And call for open juſtice.
John 'Tis the Fredrick,
Fred. But what, that he is John.
Fran. I do not doubt yet
To bolt ye out, for I know certainly
Ye are about the Towne ſtill: ha, no more words. Ex.
Fred. Well.
John Very well.
Fred. Diſcreetly.
John Finely carried.
Fred. You have no more of theſe tricks?
John Ten to one Sir,
I ſhall meet with 'em if ye have.
Fred. Is this honeſt?
John Was it in you a friends part to deale double?
I am no aſſe Don Fredrick,
Fred. And Don John,
It ſhall appeare I am no foole;
Diſgrace me to make your ſelfe a lecher?
'Tis boyiſh, 'tis baſe.
John 'Tis falſe, and moſt unmanly to upbraid me,
Nor will I be your bolſter Sir.
Fred. Thou wanton boy, thou hadſt better have been Thou common womans curteſie, then thus (Eunuch,
Laſcivious, baſely to have bent mine honour.
A friend? I'le make a horſe my friend firſt!
John Holla, holla,
Ye kicke to faſt ſir: what ſtrange braines have you got,
That dare crow out thus bravely? I better been a Eunuch?
I privy to this dog tricke? cleare your ſelfe,
For I know where the wind ſits, and moſt nobly.
Or as I have a life——
Fred. No more: they'r horſes. A noyſe within
Nor ſhew no diſcontent; to morrow comes; Like horſes.
Let's quietly away: if ſhe be at home,
Our jealouſies are put off.
John The fellow (Enter Duke,
We have loſt him in our ſpleenes, like fooles. (Petruchio.
Duke Come Gentlemen,
Now ſet on roundly: ſuppoſe ye have all miſtreſſes,
And mend your pace according.
Pet. Then have at ye. Exeunt

Actus

Actus Quartus. Scæna prima.

Enter Duke, Petruchio, Fredrick, and John.

Pet. NOw to Bellonia, my most honoured brother,
I dare pronounce ye a hearty, and safe welcome,
Our loves shall now way-lay ye; welcome Gentlemen.
John The same to you brave Sir; Don Fredrick,
Will ye step in, and give the Lady notice
Who comes to honour her?
Pet. Bid her be suddain,
We come to see no curious wench: a night-gowne
Will serve the turne: here's one that knowes her neerer.
Fred. Ile tell her what ye say Sir. Ex. Fred.
Duke My deare brother,
Ye are a merry Gentleman.
Pet. Now will the sport be
To observe her alterations; how like wildfire
She'll leap into your bosome; then seeing me,
Her conscience, and her feares creeping upon her
Dead as a fowle at sowse, she'll sinke.
Duke Faire brother,
I must entreat you——
Pet. I conceive your mind Sir,
I will not chide her: yet ten duckets Duke,
She falls upon he knees ten more she dare not——
Duke I must not have her frighted.
Pet. Well you shall not; Enter Fredd. and Peter.
But like a summers evening against heate,
Marke how I'le guild her cheekes?
John How now.
Fred. Ye may Sir:
Not to abuse your patience, noble friends,
Nor hold ye off with tedious circumstance,
For you must know,——
Petr. What?
Duke Where is she?
Fred. Gone Sir.
Duke How?
Petr. What did you say Sir?
Fred. Gone, by heaven removed,
The woman of the house too.
John Well Don Fredrick,
Fred. Don Iohn, it is not well, but——
Pet. Gone?
Fred. This fellow
Can testifie I lye not.
Peter Some foure houres after
My Master was departed with this Gentlemen,
My fellow and my selfe, being sent of businesse,
(As we must thinke) of purpose——
Petr. Hang these circumstances,
They appeare like owles, to ill ends.
John Now could I eate
The devil in his own broath, I am so tortur'd,
Gone?
Petr. Gone? (me say?
Fred. Directly gone, fled, shifted: what would you have
Duke Well Gentlemen,
Wrong not my good opinion.
Fred. For your Dukedome
I will not be a knave Sir.
John He that is
A rot run in his bloud.
Petr. But harke ye Gentlemen,
Are ye sure ye had her here, did ye not dreame this.
John Have you your nose Sir?
Petr. Yes Sir.
John Then we had her.
Petr. Since you are so short, beleeve your having her
Shall suffer more construction.
John Let it suffer,
But if I be not cleere of all dishonour,
Or practice that may taint my reputation,
And ignorant of where this woman is,
Make me your Cities monster.
Duke I beleeve ye.
John I could lye with a witch now, to be revenged
Upon that Rascall, did this.
Fred. Only thus much
I would desire your Grace, for my minde gives me
Before night yet she is yours: stop all opinion,
And let no anger out, till full cause call it,
Then every mans owne work's to justifie him,
And this day let us give to search: my man here
Tels me, by chance he saw out of a window
(Which place he has taken note of) such a face
Asour old Landladies, he beleeves the same too,
And by her hood assures it: Let's first thether,
For she being found, all's ended.
Duke Come, for heavens sake,
And Fortune, and thou beest not ever turning,
If there be one firme step in all thy reelings,
Now settle it, and save my hopes: away friends. Exeunt.

Scæne 2. Enter Antonio and his Servant.

Ant. With all my jewels?
Ser. All Sir.
Ant. And that money
I left i'th' trunke?
Ser. The Trunke broke, and that gone too.
Ant. Franscisco of the plot?
Ser. Gone with the wench too.
Ant. The mighty poxe go with 'em: belike they thought
I was no man of this world, and those trifles
Would but disturbe my conscience.
Ser. Sure they thought Sir,
You would not live to perfecute 'em.
Ant. Whore and Fidler,
Why, what a consort have they made? Hen and bacon?
Well my sweet Mistris, well good Madam mattaile?
You that have hung about my neck, and lick't me,
I'le try how handsomely your Ladyship
Can hang upon a Gallowes, there's your Master-piece;
But harke ye Sirrah, no imagination Bandi ready above.
Of where they should be?
Ser. None Sir, yet we have search'd
All places we suspected; I beleeve Sir,
They have taken towards the Ports.
Ant. Get me a conjurer,
One that can raise a water devill, I'le port 'em;
Play at duck and drake with my money? take heed Fidler;
I'le dance ye by this hand, your Fidle-stroke
I'le grease of a new fashion, for presuming
To medle with my degamboys: get me a Conjurer.
Enquire me out a man that lets out devils:
None but my C. Cliffe serve your turne?
Ser. I know not——

Ant.

Ant. In every ſtreet, Tom foole, any bleare-eyd people
With red heads, and flat noſes can performe it;
Thou ſhalt know 'em by their half gowns & no breeches:
Mount my mare Fidler? ha boy? up at firſt daſh?
Sit ſure, I'le clap a nettle, and a ſmart one,
Shall make your filly firck; I will find Fidler,
I'le put you to your plundge boy: Sirrah meet me
Some two houres hence at home; In the meane time
Find out a conjurer and know his price,
How he will let his devils by the day out,
I'le have 'em, and they be above ground. Exit Ant.
Ser. Now bleſſe me,
What a mad man is this? I muſt do ſomething
To pleaſe his humour: ſuch a man I'le aske for,
And tell him where he is: but to come neare him,
Or have any thing to do with his don devills,
I thanke my feare, I dare not, nor I will not. Exit.

Scæne 3. Enter Duke, Petruchio, Fredrick, John, Peter, Servant with bottles.

Fred. Whether wilt thou lead us?
Pet. 'Tis hard by ſir.
And ten to one this wine goes thether.
Duke Forward.
Petr. Are they growne ſo merry.
Duke 'Tis moſt likely
She has heard of this good fortune, and determines
To waſh her ſorrowes off.
Pet. 'Tis ſo; that houſe ſir
Is it: out of that window certainly
I ſaw my old Miſtriſſes face.
Petr. They are merry indeed, Muſicke.
Harke I here Muſicke too.
Duke Excellent Muſick.
John Would I were ev'n among 'em and alone now,
A pallat for the purpoſe in a corner,
And good rich wine within me; what gay ſport
Could I make in an houre now? Song.
Fred. Harke a voice too;
Let's not ſtir yet by any meanes.
John Was this her owne voyce?
Duke Yes ſure.
Fred. 'Tis a rare one. Enter Bawd (above)
Du. The Song confirmes her here too: for if ye marke it,
It ſpake of liberty, and free enjoying
The happy end of pleaſure.
Petr. Looke ye there ſir,
Do ye know that head?
Fred. 'Tis my good Landlady,
I find feare has done all this.
John Shee I ſweare,
And now do I know by the hanging of her hood,
She is parcell drunke: ſhall we go in?
Duke Not yet Sir.
Pet. No, let 'em take their pleaſure,
Duke When it is higheſt, Muſicke.
Wee'll ſtep in, and amaze 'em: peace more Muſicke.
John This Muſick murders me; what bloud have I now?
Fred. I ſhould know that face. Enter Fran. and John By this light 'tis he Fredrick, Exit.
That bred our firſt ſuſpitions, the ſame fellow.
Fred. He that we overtooke, and overheard too
Diſcourſing of Conſtantia.
John Still the ſame;
Now he ſlips in.
Du. What's that?
Fred. She muſt be here Sir:
This is the very fellow, I told your Grace Enter Fran.
We found upon the way; and what his talke was.
Petr. Why, ſure I know this fellow; yes, 'tis he,
Franciſco, Antonio's Boy, a rare Muſitian,
He taught my Siſter on the Lute, and is ever
(She loves his voice ſo well) about her certaine,
Without all doubt ſhe is here: it muſt be ſo.
John Here? that's no queſtion: what ſhould our hen o'th
Do here without her? if ſhe be not here (game elſe
(I am ſo confident) let your Grace beleeve,
We two are arrant Raſcalls, and have abus'd ye.
Fred. I ſay ſo too.
John Why there's the hood againe now,
The guard that guides us; I know the fabricke of it.
And know the old tree of that ſaddle yet, 'twas made of
A hunting hood, obſerve it.
Du. Who ſhall enter?
Petr. I'le make one.
John I, another.
Du. But ſo carry it,
That all her joyes flow not together.
John If we told her,
Your Grace would none of her?
Du. By no meanes Signior,
'Twould turne her wild, ſtarke frantick.
John Or aſſur'd her——
Du. Nothing of that? ſtarve nature? this ye may ſir.
That the conditions of our feare yet ſtand
On nyce and dangerous knittings: or that a little
I ſeeme to doubt the child.
Iohn Would I could draw her
To hate your Grace with theſe things.
Petr. Come let's enter, Exit Pet.
And now he ſees me not, I'le ſearch her ſoundly. and Iob.
Du. Now lacke of all ſides. Muſick.
Fred Doubt it not: more Muſicke;
Sure ſhe has heard ſome comfort.
Du. Yes, ſtand ſtill ſir.
Fred. This is the maddeſt ſong.
Du. Applyed for certaine Claping of a doore
To ſome ſtrange mellancholly ſhe is loden with.
Fred. Now all the ſport begins——harke?
Du. They are amongſt 'em,
The feares now, and the ſhakings? Trampling above.
Fred. Our old Lady
(Harke how they run) is euen now at this inſtant Ceaſe
Ready to looſe her head peice by Don Iohn, Muſick
Or creeping through a Cat hole. Petr. and Iohn within.
Petr. Bring 'em downe,
And you ſir, follow me.
Du. Hee's angry with 'em,
I muſt not ſuffer this.
Bowle downe the Bawd there Iohn within.
Old Erra mater: you Lady leachery
For the good will I beare to'th game, moſt tenderly
Shall be lead out, and laſh'd.
Enter Petruchio, John, Whore, and Bawd, with Franciſco.
Du. Is this Conſtantia?
Why Gentlemen? what do you meane? is this ſhe?
Whore I am Conſtantia ſir.
Du. A Whore ye are ſir.
Whore 'Tis very true: I am a Whore indeed ſir.
Petr. She will not lye yet, though ſhe ſtrade.
Whore A plaine whore,
If you pleaſe to imploy me.

Duke

Du. And an impudent---
Whore Plaine dealing now is impudence.
One if you will ſir, can I ſhew ye as much ſport
In one halfe houre, and with as much variety,
As a far wiſer woman can in halfe a yeare:
For there my way lies.
Du. Is ſhe not drunk too?
Whore A little guilded o're ſir,
Old ſack, old ſacke boyes.
Petr. This is ſaliant.
Iohn A brave bold queane.
Du. Is this your certainty?
Do ye know the man ye wrong thus, Gentlemen?
Is this the woman meant?
Fred. No.
Du. That your Landlady?
Iohn I know not what to ſay.
Du. Am I a perſon
To be your ſport Gentlemen?
Iohn I do beleeve now certaine
I am a knave; but how, or when---
Du. What are you?
Petr. Bawd to this peece of pye meat.
Bawd A poore Gentlewoman
That lyes in Towne, about Law buſineſſe,
And't like your worſhips.
Petr. You ſhall have law, beleeve it.
Bawd I'le ſhew your maſterſhip my caſe.
Petr. By no meanes,
I had rather ſee a Cuſtard.
Bawd My dead husband
Left it even thus ſir.
Iohn Bleſſe mine eyes from blaſting,
I was never ſo frighted with a caſe.
Bawd And ſo ſir---
Petr. Enough, put up good velvet head.
Du. What are you two now,
By your owne free confeſſions?
Fred. What you ſhall thinke us,
Though to my ſelfe I am certaine, and my life
Shall make that good and perfect, or fall with it.
Io. We are ſure of nothing (Fred) that's the truth on't:
I do not think my nam's Don John, nor dare not
Beleeve any thing that concernes me; but my debts,
Nor thoſe in way of payment: things are ſo carried,
What to entreat your Grace, or how to tell ye
We are, or we are not, is paſt my cunning,
But I would faine imagine we are honeſt,
And o' my conſcience, I ſhould fight in't---
Du. Thus then,
For we may be all abus'd.
Petr. 'Tis poſſible,
For how ſhould this concerne them?
Du. Here let's part
Untill to morrow this time: we to our way,
To make this doubt out, and you to your way;
Pawning our honours then to meet againe,
When if ſhe be not found.
Fred. We ſtand engaged
To anſwer any worthy way we are cald to.
Du. We aske no more.
Whore Ye have done with us then?
Petr. No Dame.
Du. But is her name Conſtantia?
Petr. Yes a moveable
Belonging to a friend of mine: come out Fidler,
What ſay you to this Lady; be not fearfull?
Fran. Saving the reverence of my Maſters pleaſure,
I ſay ſhe is a whore, and that ſhe has robb'd him,
Hoping his hurts would kill him.
Whore. Who provok't me?
Nay ſirrah ſqueak, Ile ſee your treble ſtrings
Ty'd up too; if I hang, Ile ſpoyle your piping,
Your ſweet face ſhall not ſave yee.
Petr. Thou dam'd impudence,
And thou dry'd devill; where's the Officer?
Petr Hee's here ſir. Enter Officer.
Petr. Lodge theſe ſafe, till I ſend for 'em;
Let none come to 'em, nor no noiſe be heard
Of where they are, or why: away.
John. By this hand
A handſome whore: Now will I be arreſted,
And brought home to this officers: a ſtout whore,
I love ſuch ſtirring ware: pox o' this buſineſſe,
A man muſt haunt out morſells for another,
And ſtarve himſelf: a quick-ey'd whore, that's wild-fire,
And makes the bloud dance through the veines like bil-
I will reprive this whore. ſlowes.
Duke. Well, good luck with ye.
Fred. As much attend your Grace.
Petr. To morrow certaine---
John If we out-live this night ſir.
Fred. Come Don John,
We have ſomething now to doe.
Joh. I am ſure I would have.
Fred. If ſhe be not found, we muſt fight.
Joh. I am glad on't,
I have not fought a great while.
Fred. If we dye---
Jo. Ther's ſo much money ſav'd in lecherie. Exeunt.

Actus Quintus. Scæna prima.

Enter Duke, Petruchio below, and Vecbio above.

Duke. IT ſhould be here abouts.
Petr. Your grace is right,
This is the houſe I know it.
Vech. Grace?
Duke 'Tis further
By the deſcription we received.
Petr. Good my Lord the Duke,
Believe me, for I know it certainly,
This is the very houſe.
Vech. My Lord the Duke?
Duke. Pray heaven this man Prove right now.
Petr. Beleeve it, hee's a moſt ſufficient Scholler,
And can doe rare tricks this way; for a figure,
Or raiſing an appearance, whole Chriſtendome
Has not a better; I have heard ſtrange wonders of him.
Duke. But can he ſhew us where ſhe is?
Petr. Moſt certaine,
And for what cauſe too ſhe departed.
Du. Knock then,
For I am great with expectation,
Till this man ſatiſfie me: I feare the Spaniards,
Yet they appeare brave fellowes: can he tell us?
Petr. With a wet finger, whether they be falſe.
Duke. Away then.
Petr. Who's within here? Enter Vecbio.

Vech. Your Grace may enter.
Du. How can he know me?
Petr. He knowes all.
Vech. And you sir. Exeunt.

Scæne. 2. Enter Don John, and Fredrick.

John What do you call his name?
Fred. Why, Peter Vechio.
John They say he can raise devills,
Can he make 'em
Tell truth too, when he has raisd 'em? for beleeve it,
These devils are the lyingst Rascalls.
Fred. He can compell 'em.
John With what? can he
Tye squibs in their tailes, and fire the truth out?
Or make 'em eate a bawling Puritan,
Whose sanctified zeale shall rumble like an Earthquake?
Fred. With Spels man?
John I with spoones as soone, dost thou thinke
The devill such an Asse as people make him?
Such a poore coxcomb? such a penny foot post?
Compell'd with crosse and pile to run of errands?
With Asteroth, and Behemoth, and Belfagor?
Why should he shake at sounds, that lives in a smiths forge?
Or if he do——
Fred. Without all doubt he do's John.
John Why should not Bilbo raise him, or a paire of bul-
They go as big as any? or an unshod Car, (lyons,
When he goes tumble, tumble o're the stones,
Like Anacreons drunken verses, make us tremble?
These make as fell a noyse; me thinkes the collick
Well handled, and fed with small beere——
Fred. 'Tis the vertue——
John The vertue? nay, and goodnesse fetch him up once,
'Has lost a friend of me; the wise old Gentleman
Knowes when, and how; I'le lay this hand to two pence,
Let all the Conjurers in Christendome,
With all their spells, and vertues call upon him,
And I but thinke upon a wench, and follow it,
He shall be sooner mine then theirs; where's vertue?
Fred. Thou art the most sufficient, (I'le say for thee)
Not to beleeve a thing——
John O sir, slow credit
Is the best child of knowledge; I'le go with ye,
And if he can do any thing, I'le thinke
As you would have me.
Fred. Let's enquire a long,
For certaine we are not far off.
John Nor much nearer. Exeunt.

Scæne 3. Enter Duke, Petruchio, and Vechio.

Vech. You lost her yesternight.
Pet. How thinke you sir?
Du. Is your name Vechio?
Vech. Yes sir.
Du. And you can shew me
These things you promise.
Vech. Your graces word bound to me,
No hand of Law shall seize me.
Du. As I live sir——
Petr. And as I live, that can do something too sir.
Vech. I take your promises: stay here a little,
Till I prepare some Ceremonies, and I'le satisfie ye.
The Ladies name's Constantia?
Pet. Yes
Vech. I come straight. Exit Vech.
Du. Sure bee's a learned man.
Petr. The most now living;
Did your grace marke when we told all these circumstan-
How ever and anon he bolted from us (ces,
To use his studies helpe?
Du. Now I thinke rather
To talke with some familiar.
Petr. Not unlikely,
For sure he has 'em subject.
Du. How could he else
Tell when she went, and who went with her?
Petr. True.
Du. Or hit upon mine honour: or assure me
The Lady lov'd me dearely?
Enter Vechio in his habiliments.
Pet. 'Twas so.
Vech. Now,
I do beseech your Grace sit downe, and you sir;
Nay pray sit close like brothers.
Petr. A rare fellow.
Vech. And what ye see, stir not at, nor use a word,
Untill I aske ye; for what shall appeare
Is but weake apparition and thin ayre
Not to be held, nor spoken too. Knocking within.
John, Fredrick, and a Servant within.
Du. We are counselled——
Vech. What noise is that without there?
Fred. Within. We must speake with him.
Ser. Within. Hee's busie Gentlemen.
John. Within. That's all one friend,
We must, and will speake with him.
Du. Let 'em in sir,
We know their tongues and busineſſe, 'tis our owne,
And in this very cause that we now come for,
They also come to be instructed.
Vech. Let 'em in then:
Sit down, I know your meaning.
Enter Fredrick, John, and Servant.
Fred. The Duke before us,
Now we shall sure know something.
Vech. Not a question,
But make your eyes, your tongues——
John This is a strange jugler,
Neither indent before hand for his payment,
Nor know the breadth of the busineſſe; sure his devell
Comes out of Lapland were they sell men winds,
For dead drinke, and old doublets.
Fred. Peace, he conjures.
John Let him, he cannot raise my devill.
Fred. Prethee peace.

Vech. Appeare, appeare, ——
And you soft winds so cleare,
That dance upon the leaves, and make them sing
Gentle love-layes to the Spring,
Gilding all the vales below
With your verdure as ye blow,
Raise these former from under ground
With a soft and happy sound. Soft Musick.

John. This is an honest Conjurer, and a pretty Poet;
I like his words well, there's no bumbast in 'em,
But do you thinke now, he can cudgell up the devill,
With this short staffe of Verses?

Fred.

Fred. Peace the ſpirits—— 2. Shapes of women paſſe by.
John Nay, and they be no worſe——
Vech. Do ye know theſe faces?
Duke No.
Vech. Sit ſtill upon your lives then: and marke what (follows;
Away, away.
John Theſe devils do not paint ſure?
Have they no ſweeter ſhapes in hell? Conſtantia paſſes by.
Fred. Harke now John.
John I marry, this moves ſomething like, this devill
Carries ſome metall in her gaze.
Vech. I find ye,
You would ſee her face unvail'd?
Du. Yes.
Vech. Be uncovered.
Du. O heaven!
Vech. Peace.
Petr. See how ſhe bluſhes.
John Fredrick,
This devill for my money; this is ſhe Boy,
Why doſt thou ſhake? I burne.
Vech. Sit ſtill, and ſilent.
Du. She lookes back at me; now ſhe ſmiles ſir.
Vech. Silence.
Du. I muſt riſe, or I burſt. Exit. Conſt.
Vech. Ye ſee what followes——
Du. O gentle ſir this ſhape agen.
Vech. I cannot,
'Tis all diſolv'd againe: this was the figure.
Du. The very ſame ſir.
Petr. No hope once more to ſee it?
Ve. You might have kept it longer, had ye ſpar'd it,
Now 'tis impoſſible.
Du. No meanes to find it?
Ve. Yes that there is: ſit ſtill a while, there's wine
To thaw the wonder from your hearts: drinke well ſir.
Ex. Vech.
John This Conjurer is a right good fellow too,
A lad of mettle; two ſuch devils more
Would make me a Conjurer: what wine is it?
Fred. Hollock.
John. The devil's in it then, looke how it dances?
Well if I be——
Petr. We are all before ye,
That's your beſt comfort ſir.
John Byth' mas brave wine;
Nay, and the Devils live in this hell, I dare venture
Within theſe two months yet to be delivered
Of a large legion of 'em. Enter Vechio.
Du. Here 'a comes,
Silence of all ſides Gentlemen.
Vec. Good your grace,
Obſerve a ſtricter temper, and you too gallants,
You'l be deluded all elſe. This merry devill
That next appeares, for ſuch a one you'l find it,
Muſt be cal'd up by a ſtrange incantation,
A Song, and I muſt ſing it: pray beare with me,
And pardon my rude pipe; for yet ere parting
Twenty to one I pleaſe ye.
Du. We are arm'd Sir.
Pet. Nor ſhall you ſee us more tranſgreſſe.
Fred. What think'ſt thou
Now John?
John Why, now do I thinke Fredrick,
(And if I thinke amiſſe heaven pardon me,)
This honeſt Conjurer, with ſome foure or five
Of his good fellow devils, and my ſelfe,
Shall be yet drunke ere midnight. Song.
Fred. Peace, he conjures.
John Why, this is the Song Fredrick: twenty pound now
To ſee but our Don Gillian.
Enter Landlady and the Child.
Fred. Peace it appeares.
John I cannot peace: devils in French hoods Fredrick?
Sathans old Siringes?
Du. What's this?
Vech. Peace.
John She, Boy.
Fred. What doſt thou meane?
John She, Boy, I ſay.
Fred. Ha?
John She, boy.
The very child too Fredrick;
Fred. She laughes on us
Aloud John, has the devill theſe affections?
I do beleeve 'tis ſhe indeed.
Vech. Stand ſtill.
John. I will not;
Who calls Jeronimo from his naked bed?
Sweet Lady, was it you? If thou beeſt the devill,
Firſt, having croſt my ſelfe, to keep out wildfire,
Then ſaid ſome ſpeciall prayers to defend me
Againſt thy moſt unhallowed hood: have at thee.
Land. Hold ſir, I am no devill.
John That's all one.
Land. I am your very Landlady.
John I defie thee:
Thus as St. Dunſtan blew the devils noſe
With a paire of tongs, even ſo right worſhipfull——
Land. Sweet ſon, I am old Gillian.
Du. This is no ſpirit.
John Art thou old Gillian, fleſh and bone?
Land. I am Son.
Vech. Sit ſtill ſir, now I'le ſhew you all. Ex. Vech.
John Where's thy bottle?
Land. Here, I beſeech ye ſon——
John For I know the devill
Cannot aſſume that ſhape.
Fred. 'Tis ſhe John, certaine——
John A hogs poxe o'your mouldy chaps, what make you
Tumbling and juggling here?
Land. I am quit now Signior,
For all the prankes you plaid, and railings at me,
For to tell true, out of a trick I put
Upon your high behaviours, which was a lye,
But then it ſerv'd my turne, I drew the Lady
Unto my kinſmans here, only to torture
Your Don-ſhips for a day or two; and ſecure her
Out of all thoughts of danger: here ſhe comes now.
Enter Vechio, and Conſtantia.
Du. May I yet ſpeake?
Vech. Yes, and embrace her too,
For one that loves you deerer——
Du. O my ſweeteſt.
Petr. Bluſh not, I will not chide ye.
Conſt. To add more
Unto the joy I know, I bring ye, ſee ſir,
The happy fruit of all our vowes.
Du. Heavens bleſſing
Be round about thee ever.
John Pray bleſſe me to,
For if your grace be well inſtructed this way,

You'l find the keeping halfe the getting.
Du. How sir?
Iohn I'le tell ye that anon.
Const. 'Tis true, this Gentleman
'Has done a charity worthy your favour,
And let him have it deare sir.
Du. My best Lady
She has, and ever shall have: so must you sir,
To whom I am equall bound, as to my being.
Fred. Your Graces humble servants----
Du. Why kneele you sir?
Ve. For pardon for my boldnesse: yet 'twas harmlesse
And all the art I have sir; those your grace saw
Which you thought spirits, were my neighbours children
Whom I instruct in Grammer, here, and Musick;
Their shapes, the peoples fond opinions,
Beleeving I can conjure, and oft repairing
To know of things stolne from 'em, I keepe about me,
And alwaies have in readinesse; by conjecture
Out of their owne confessions, I oft tell 'em
Things, that by chance have fallen out so: which way
(Having the persons here, I knew you sought for)
I wrought upon your grace: my end is mirth,
And pleasing, if I can, all parties.
Du. I beleeve it,
For you have pleas'd me truly: so well pleas'd me,
That when I shall forget it----
Petr. Here's old Antonio,
I spide him at a window, comming mainely
I know about his whore, the man you light on,
As you discovered unto me: good your Grace,
Let's stand by all, 'twill be a mirth above all,
To observe his pelting fury.
Vech. About a wench sir?
Petr. A young whore that has rob'd him.
Vech. But do you know sir,
Where she is?
Petr. Yes, and will make that perfect----
Vech. I am instructed well then.
Iohn If he come
To have a devill shew'd him, by all meanes
Let me be he, I can rore rarely.
Petr. Be so,
But take heed to his anger.
Vech. Slip in quickly,
There you shall find suites of all sorts: when I call,
Be ready and come forward. Ex. all but Vech.
Who's there come in?

Enter Antonio.

Ant. Are you the Conjurer?
Vech. Sir I can do a little
That way, if you please to imploy me.
Ant. Presently shew me a devill that can tell----
Vech. Where your wench is.
Ant. You are i'th'right; as also where the Fidler
That was consenting to her.
Vech. Sit ye there sir,
Ye shall know presently: can ye pray heartily?
Ant. Why, is your devill so furious?
Vech. I must shew ye
A forme, may chance affright ye.
Ant. He must fart fire then:
Take you no care for me.
Vech. Ascend Asterth, Enter Don Iohn like a Spirit.
Why, when, appeare I say---Now question him.
Ant. Where is my whore Don devill?
Iohn Gone to China,
To be the great Chams Mistris.
Ant. That's a lye devill:
Where are my jewels?
Iohn Pawn'd for Peticoates.
Ant. That may be; where's the Fidler?
Iohn Condemn'd to th' Gallowes,
For robbing of a Mill.
Ant. The lyingst devill
That e're I dealt withall, and the unlikeliest:
What was that Rascall hurt me?
Iohn I.
Ant. How?
Iohn I.
Ant. Who was he?
Iohn I.
Ant. Do ye here conjurer,
Dare you venture your devill?
Vech. Yes.
Ant. Then I'le venture my dagger;
Have at your devils pate: do ye mew? Enter all.
Vech. Hold.
Pet. Hold there,
I do commend ye hold.
Ant. Is this the devill?
Why Conjurer——
Pet. Has been a devill to you sir.
But now you shall forget all: your whores safe,
And all your Jewels: your Boy too.
Iohn Now the devill indeed
Lay his ten claws upon thee, for my pate
Finds what it is to be a fend.
Ant. All safe?
Pet. Pray ye know this person: all's right now.
Ant. Your grace
May now command me then: but where's my whore?
Petr. Ready to goe to whiping.
Ant. My whore whipt?
Petr. Yes, your whore without doubt Sir.
Ant. Whipt? pray Gentlemen.
Du. Why, would you have her once more rob ye? the young boy
You may forgive, he was intic'd.
Iohn The Whore sir,
Would rather carry pitty: a handsome Whore.
Ant. A Gentleman I warrant thee.
Petr. Let's in all,
And if we see contrition in your whore sir,
Much may be done.
Duke Now my deare faire, to you,
And the full consummation of my Vow.

Prologue.

APtneſſe for mirth to all, this inſtant night
Thalia hath prepar'd for your delight,
Her choice and curious Viands, in each part,
Seaſon'd with rarities of wit, as Art;
Nor feare I to be tax'd for a vaine boaſt,
My promiſe will finde credit with the moſt,
When they know Ingenuous Fletcher made it, hee
Being in himſelfe a perfect Comedie.
And ſome ſit here, I doubt not dare averre,
Living he made that houſe a Theater
Which he pleas'd to frequent; and thus much we Could not but pay to his loud memorie.
For our ſelves we doe entreat that you would not Expect ſtrange turnes, and windings in the Plot,
Objects of State, and now and then a Rhime,
To all particular perſons, with the time;
Or that his towring Muſe hath made her flight
Nearer your apprehenſion then your ſight:
But if that ſweet expreſſions, quick conceit,
Familiar language, faſhion'd to the weight
Of ſuch as ſpeake it, have the power to raiſe
Your grace to us, with Trophies to his praiſe:
We may profeſſe, preſuming on his skill,
If his Chances pleaſe not you, our fortune's ill.

Epilogue.

WE have not held you long, nor doe I ſee
One brow in this ſelected company
Aſſuring a diſlike, our paines were eas'd,
Could we be confident that all riſe pleas'd:
But ſuch ambition ſoares too high: If wee
Have ſatisfi'd the beſt, and they agree
In a faire cenſure, We have our reward;
And in them arm'd, deſire no ſurer guard.

FINIS.

Prologue.

A

THE LOYAL SVBIECT.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Enter Theodor and Purkie.

Theodor.

Captaine, your friend's prefer'd, the Princesse has (her,
Who, I assure my selfe, will use her nobly;
A prettie sweet one 'tis indeed.

Put. Well bred Sir,
I doe deliver that upon my credit,
And of an honest stock.

Theod. It seemes so Captaine,
And no doubt will doe well.

Put. Thanks to your care sir;
But tell me Noble Colonell, why this habit
Of discontent is put on through the Army?
And why your valiant father, our great Generall,
The hand that taught to strike, the Love that lead all;
Why he, that was the father of the warre,
He that begot, and bred the Souldier,
Why he sits shaking of his Armes, like Autumne,
His Collours folded, and his Drums cas'd up,
The tongue of war for ever ty'd within us?

Theod. It must be so, Captaine you are a stranger,
But of a small time here a souldier,
Yet that time shewes ye a right good, and great one,
Else I could tell yee houres are strangely alterd;
The young Duke has too many eyes upon him,
Too many feares 'tis thought too, and to nourish those,
Maintains too many Instruments.

Put. Turne their hearts,
Or turn their heeles up, heaven; 'Tis strange it should be.
The old Duke lov'd him dearely.

Theod. He deserv'd it;
And were he not my Father, I durst tell yee,
The memorable hazzards he has run through
Deserv'd of this man too; highly deserv'd too,
Had they been lesse, they had been safe Purkie,
And sooner reach'd regard.

Put. There you strook sure sir.

Theo. Did I never tell thee of a vow he made
Some yeares before the old Duke dyed?

Put. I have heard yee
Speake often of that vow; but how it was,
Or to what end, I never understood yet?

Theo. Ile tell thee then: and then thou wilt finde the reason:
The last great Master. ('twas before ye serv'd here,
Before the last Dukes death, whose honour'd bones
Now rest in peace) this yong Prince had the ordering
(To Crowne his fathers hopes) of all the Army;
Who (to be short) put all his power to practise,
Fashion'd, and drew 'em up: but alas, so poorely,
So raggedly and loosely, so unsouldier'd,
The good Duke blush'd, and call'd unto my father,
Who then was Generall: Goe Archou speedily,
And chide the Boy, before the souldier finde him,
Stand thou between his ignorance and them,
Fashion their bodies new to thy direction;
Then draw thou up, and shew the Prince his errours.
My Sire obey'd, and did so; with all duty
Inform'd the Prince, and read him all directions;
This bred distaste, distaste grew up to anger,
And anger into wilde words broke out thus;
Well Archou, if I live but to command here,
To be but Duke once, I shall then remember,
I shall remember truely, trust me, I shall,
And by my Fathers hand; the rest his eyes spoke.
To which my Father answer'd (somewhat mov'd too)
And with a vow he seal'd it: Royall sir,
Since for my faith and fights, your loorne and anger
Onely pursue me; if I live to that day,
That day so long expected to reward me,
By his so ever noble hand you swore by,
And by the hand of Justice, never Armes more
Shall rib this body in, nor I weare sword here, sir;
The Conflicts I will doe you service then in,
Shall be repentant prayers. So they parted.
The time is come; and now you know the wonder.

Put. I finde a feare too, which begins to tell me,
The Duke will have put poore and slight defences
If his hot humour raigne, and not his honour;
How stand you with him, Sir?

The. A perdue Captaine,
Full of my fathers danger.

Put. He has rais'd a young man.
They say a slight young man, I know him not,
For what desert?

The. Beleeve it, a brave Gentleman,
Worth the Dukes respect, a cleere sweet Gentleman,
And of a noble soule; Come, let's retire us,
And wait upon my father, when within this houre
You will finde an alter'd man.

Put. I am sorry for't, sir.

Exeunt.

Scæne 2. Enter Olimpia, and two Gentlewomen.

Olim. Is't not a handsome wench?

2. Wom. She is well enough, Madam;
I have seen a better face, and a straiter body,
And yet she is a pretty Gentlewoman.

Olim. What think'st thou Petes?

Petes. Alas, Madam, I have no skill, she has a black eye,
Which is of the least too and the dullest water;
And when her mouth was made, for certaine Madam,
Nature intended her a right good stomach.

Olim.

Olim. She has a good hand.
2 Wom. 'Tis good enough to hold fast.
And strong enough to strangle the neck of a Lute.
Olim. What thinke ye of her colour?
Petef. If it be her owne
Tis good black bloud right weather-proofe
I warrant it.
2 Wom. What a strange pace she has got!
Olim. That's but her breeding.
Petef. And what a manly body? me thinks she looks
As though she would pitch the Barre, or goe to Buffets.
2 Wom. Yet her behaviour's utterly against it,
For me thinks she is too bashfull.
Olim. Is that hurtfull?
2 Wo. Even equall to too bold: either of 'em Madam
May doe her injurie when time shall serve her.
Ol. You discourse learnedly, cal in the wench. Ex. Gent.
What envious fooles are you? Is the rule generall,
That women can speak handsomely of none,
But those they are bred withall?
Petef. Scarce well of those Madam,
If they believe they may out-shine 'em any way:
Our natures are like oyle, compound us with any thing,
Yet stil we strive to swim o'th' top:
Suppose there were here now,
Now in this court of Mosco, a stranger Princesse,
Of bloud and beauty equall to your excellence,
As many eyes and services stuck on her,
What would you think?
Olim. I would thinke she might deserve it.
Petef. Your grace shall give me leave not to believe ye,
I know you are a woman, and so humoured:
Ile tell yee Madam, I could then get more gownes on ye,
More caps & feathers, more scarfs, & more silk stockings,
With rocking you a sleep with nightly railings
Upon that woman, then if I had nine lives (our.
I could weare out: by this hand ye'would scratch her eyes
Olim. Thou art deceiv'd foole; Now let your own eyes mock ye. } Enter Gentlewom. and Alinda.
Come hither girle: hang me & she be not a handsom one.
Petef. I feare it will prove indeed so.
Olim. Did you ever serve yet
In any place of worth?
Alin. No Royall Lady.
Petef. Hold up your head; fie.
Olim. Let her alone, stand from her.
Alin. It shall be now,
Of all the blessings my poore youth has pray'd for,
The greatest and the happiest to serve you;
And might my promise carrie but that credit
To be believ'd, because I am yet a stranger,
Excellent Lady, when I fall from duetie,
From all the service that my life can lend me,
May ever-lasting miserie then finde me.
Olim. What think ye now? I doe believe, and thank ye;
And sure I shall not be so farre forgetfull,
To see that honest faith die unrewarded:
What must I call your name?
Alin. Alinda Madam.
Olim. Can yee sing?
Al. A little, when my griefe will give me leave, Lady.
Olim. What griefe canst thou have wench?
Thou art not in love?
Al. If I be Madam, 'tis onely with your goodnesse;
For yet I never saw that man I fighted for.
Olim. Of what yeares are you?
Al. My mother oft has told me,
That very day and houre this land was blest
With your most happy birth, I first saluted
This worlds faire light: Nature was then so busie,
And all the Graces to adorne your goodnesse,
I stole into the world poore and neglected. (thee,
Olim. Something there was, when I first look'd upon
Made me both like and love thee: now I know it;
And you shall find that knowledge shall not hurt you:
I hope ye are a Maid?
Al. I hope so too, Madam;
I am sure for any man: and were I otherwise,
Of all the services my hopes could point at,
I durst not touch at yours.

Flourish. Enter Duke, Burris, and Gent.

Pet. The great Duke, Madam.
Duk. Good morow, sister.
Olim. A good day to your highnesse.
Duk. I am come to pray you use no more perswasions
For this old stubborne man: nay to command ye:
His saule is swell'd too full: he is grown too insolent,
Too self-affected, proud: those poore slight services
He has done my father, and my self, has blowne him
To such a pitch, he flyes to stoop our favours.
Olim. I am sorry sir: I ever thought those services
Both great and noble.
Bur. However, may it please yee
But to consider 'em a true hearts servants,
Done out of faith to you, and not selfe-fame:
But to consider royall sir, the dangers;
When you have slept secure, the mid-night tempests,
That as he mareht sung through his aged locks;
When you have fed at full, the wants and famines;
The fires of heaven, when you have found all temperate,
Death with his thousand doores——
Duk. I have consider'd;
No more: and that I will have, shall be.
Olim. For the best,
I hope all still.
Duk. What handsome wench is that there?
Olim. My servant, sir.
Du. Prethee observe her Burris.
Is she not wondrous handsome? speak thy freedome.
Bur. Shee appeares no lesse to me sir.
Duk. Of whence is she?
Ol. Her father I am told is a good gentleman,
But farre off dwelling: her desire to serve me
Brought her to th' Court, & here her friends have left her.
Du. She may find better friends;
Ye are welcome faire one,
I have not seen a sweeter: By your Ladies leave:
Nay stand up sweet, we'll have no superstition:
You have got a servant; you may use him kindly,
And he may honour ye: } Exit Duke and Burris.
Good morrow sister.
Ol. Good morrow to your Grace. How the wench blushes!
How like an Angel now she looks!
1. Wom. At first jumpe
Jumpe into the Dukes armes? we must look to you,
Indeed we must, the next jump we are Journeymen.
Pet. I see the ruine of our hopes already,
Would she were at home again, milking her fathers cows
1 Wo. I feare shee'l make all the great Courtiers first.
Olim. This has not made yee proud?
Al. No certaine, Madam.
Ol. It was the Duke that kist yee.

Al.

Al. 'Twas your brother,
And therefore nothing can be meant but honour.
Ol. But say he love ye?
Al. That he may with safety:
A Princes love extends to all his subjects.
Ol. But say in more particular?
Al. Pray feare not:
For vertues sake deliver me from doubts, Lady:
'Tis not the name of King, nor all his promises,
His glories, and his greatnesse stuck about me,
Can make me prove a Traitor to your service:
You are my Mistris, and my noble Master,
Your vertues my ambition, and your favour
The end of all my love, and all my fortune:
And when I faile in that faith——
Ol. I beleeve thee,
Come wipe your eyes; I doe: take you example—
Petf. I would her eyes were out.
1 Wom. If the winde stand in this doore,
We shall have but cold custome: some trick or other,
And speedily.
Petef. Let me alone to think on't,
Ol. Come, be you neare me still.
Al. With all my duty. Exeunt.

Scene 3. Enter Archas, Theodor, Putskie, Ancient, and Souldiers, carrying his armour peece-meale, his Colours wound up, and his Drums in Cases.

Theod. This is the heaviest march we e're trod Captain,
Putf. This was not wont to be: these honour'd pieces
The fierie god of warre himselfe would smile at,
Buckl'd upon that body, were not wont thus,
Like Reliques to be offer'd to long rust,
And heavy-ey'd oblivion brood upon 'em
Arch. There set 'em downe: and glorious warr farewell,
Thou childe of honour and ambitious thoughts,
Begot in bloud, and nurl'd with Kingdomes ruines;
Thou golden danger, courted by thy followers
Through fires and famines, for one title from thee,
Prodigall man-kinde spending all his fortunes;
A long farewell I give thee: Noble Armes,
Your ribs for mighty minds, you Iron houses,
Made to defie the thunder-claps of Fortune,
Rust and consuming time must now dwell with yee:
And thou good Sword that knewst the way to conquest,
Upon whose fatall edge despaire and death dwelt,
That when I shooke thee thus, fore-shew'd destruction,
Sleep now from bloud, and grace my Monument:
Farewell my Eagle; when thou flew'st, whole Armies
Have stoopt below thee: At Passage I have seen thee,
Ruffle the Tartars, as they fled thy furie;
And bang 'em up together, as a Tassell,
Upon the streach, a flock of fearefull Pigeons.
I yet remember when the Volga curl'd,
The aged Volga, when he heav'd his head up,
And rais'd his waters high, to see the ruines,
The ruines our Swords made, the bloudy ruines;
Then flew this Bird of honour bravely, Gentlemen;
But these must be forgotten: so must these too,
And all that tend to Armes, by me for ever.
Take 'em you holy men; my Vow take with 'em,
Never to weare 'em more: Trophies I give 'em,
And sacred Rites of warre to adorne the Temple:
There let 'em hang, to tell the world their master
Is now Devotions souldier, fit for prayer.
Why doe ye hang your heads? why look you sad friends?
I am not dying yet.
Theod. Ye are indeed to us sir.
Putf. Dead to our fortunes, Generall.
Arch. Youll finde a better,
A greater, and a stronger man to lead yee,
And to a stronger fortune: I am old friends,
Time, and the wars together make me stoop, gentlemen,
Stoop to my grave: my minde unfurnish'd too,
Emptie and weak as I am: my poore body,
Able for nothing now but contemplation,
And that will be a taske too to a Souldier:
Yet had they but encourag'd me, or thought well
Of what I have done, I thinke I should have ventur'd
For one knock more, I should have made a shift yet
To have broke one staffe more handsomly, and have dyed
Like a good fellow, and an honest souldier,
In the head of ye all, with my sword in my hand,
And so have made an end of all with credit.
Theod. Well, there will come an houre, when all these
These secure slights—— (injuries
Ar. Ha! no more of that sirrah,
Not one word more of that I charge ye.
Theod. I must speak sir:
And may that tongue forget to sound your service,
That's dumbe to your abuses.
Ar. Understand foole,
That voluntary I sit downe.
Theod. You are forced sir,
Forced for your safety: I too well remember
The time and cause, and I may live to curle 'em,
You made this vow, and whose un-nobleness,
Indeed forgetfulnesse of good——
Ar. No more,
As thou art mine no more.
The. Whose doubts and envies——
But the devill will have his due.
Putf. Good gentle Colonell.
Theo. And though disgraces, and contempt of honour
Reigne now, the wheele must turne againe.
Ar. Peace sirrah,
Your tongue's too saucy: doe ye stare upon me?
Downe with that heart, downe suddenly, down with it,
Downe with that disobedience; tye that tongue up.
Theod. Tongue?
Ar. Doe not provoke me to forget my vow, sirrah,
And draw that fatall sword againe in anger.
Putf. For heavens sake, Colonell.
Ar. Doe not let me doubt
Whose Sonne thou art, because thou canst not suffer:
Doe not play with mine anger; if thou dost,
By all the loyalty my heart holds——
Theod. I have done sir,
'Pray pardon me.
Ar. I pray ye be worthy of it:
Beshrew your heart, you have vext me.
The. I am sorrie sir.
Arch. Goe to, no more of this: be true and honest,
I know ye are man enough, mold it to just ends,
And let not my disgraces, then I am miserable,
When I have nothing left me but thy angers.
Flourish. Enter Duke, Burris, Boroskie, Attend. & Gent.
Putf. And't please ye sir, the Duke.
Duke. Now, what's all this?
The meaning of this ceremonious Emblem?
Ar. Your Grace should first remember——

Boroſ. There's his nature.
Duke. I doe, and ſhall remember ſtill't hat injury,
That at the Muſter, where it pleas'd your greatneſſe
To laugh at my poore ſouldierſhip, to skorne it;
And more to make me ſeem ridiculous,
Took from my hands my charge.
Bur. O thinke not ſo Sir.
Du. And in my Fathers ſight.
Ar. Heaven be my witneſſe
I did no more, (and that with modeſtie,
With love and faith to you) then was my warrant,
And from your Father ſeal'd: nor durſt that rudeneſſe
And impudence of ſcorne fall from my haviour,
I ever yet knew duty.
Duke. We ſhall teach yee:
I well remember too, upon ſome words I told ye,
Then at that time, ſome angrie words ye anſwer'd,
If ever I were Duke, you were no ſouldier.
You have kept your word, and ſo it ſhall be to you.
From henceforth I diſmiſſe ye; take your eaſe ſir.
Ar. I humbly thanke your Grace; this waſted body,
Beaten and bruis'd with Armes, dry'd up with troubles,
Is good for nothing elſe but quiet, now ſir,
And holy prayers; in which, when I forget
To thanke high heaven for all your bounteous favours,
May that be deafe, and my Petitions periſh. (pride in?
Boroſ. What a ſmooth humble cloak he has cas'd his
And how he has pull'd his clawes in? ther's no truſting—
Bur. Speake for the beſt.
Bor. Beleeve I ſhall doe ever.
Du. To make yee vnderſtand we feele not yet
Such dearth of valour, and experience,
Such a declining age of doing ſpirits,
That all ſhould be confin'd within your Excellence,
And you, or none be honour'd, take Boroskie
The place he has commanded, lead the Souldier;
A little time will bring thee to his honour,
Which has been nothing, but the worlds opinion,
The ſouldiers fondneſſe, and a little fortune,
Which I believe his ſword had the leaſt ſhare in.
Theod. O that I durſt but anſwer now.
Putſ. Good Colonell.
Theod. My heart will break elſe: Royal ſir, I know not
What you eſteem mens lives, whoſe hourely labours,
And loſſe of bloud, conſumptions in your ſervice,
Whoſe bodies are acequainted with more miſeries,
And all to keep you ſafe, then Dogs or ſlaves are.
His ſword the leaſt ſhare gain'd?
Du. You will not fight with me?
Theod. No Sir, I dare not,
You are my Prince: but I dare ſpeake to yee,
And dare ſpeak truth, which none of their ambitions,
That be informers to you dare once thinke of;
Yet truth will now but anger yee: I am ſorry for't.
And ſo I take my leave.
Du. Ev'n when you pleaſe Sir.
Ar. Sirrah, ſee me no more.
Du. And ſo may you too:
You have a houſe ith' Countrey, keep you there Sir,
And when you have rull'd your ſelf, teach your ſon man-
For this time I forgive him. (ners.
Ar. Heaven forgive all:
And to your Grace a happie and long rule here.
And you Lord Generall, may your fights be proſperous.
In all your courſe, may Fame and Fortune Court you.
Fight for your Countrey, and your Princes ſafetie;
Boldly, and bravely face your enemie,
And when you ſtrike, ſtrike with that killing vertue,
As if a generall plague had ſeiz'd before ye;
Danger, and doubt, and labour caſt behinde yee,
And then come home an old and noble ſtorie.
Bur. A little comfort ſir.
Du. As little as may be:
Farewell, you know your limit. Exit Duke, &c.
Bur. Alas, brave gentleman.
Ar. I doe, and will obſerve it ſuddenly:
My grave; I, that's my limit: 'tis no new thing,
Nor that can make me ſtart, or tremble at it,
To buckle with that old grim ſouldier now:
I have ſeen him in his ſowreſt ſhapes and dreadfullſt;
I, and I thanke my honeſtie, haveſtood him:
That audits caſt: Farewell my honeſt ſouldiers,
Give me your hands: Farewell, fare-well good Ancient,
A ſtout man, and a true, thou art come in ſorrow.
Bleſſings upon your ſwords, may they ne're faile yee.
You doe but change a man: your fortunes conſtant;
That by your ancient valours is ty'd faſt ſtill:
Be valiant ſtill and good; and when ye fight next,
When flame and furie make but one face of horror,
When the great reſt of all your honour's up,
When you would thinke a ſpell to ſhake the enemy,
Remember me: my prayers ſhall be with yee.
So once againe farewell.
Putſ. Let's wait upon yee.
Ar. No, no, it muſt not be: I have now left me
A ſingle fortune to my ſelfe, no more,
Which needs no traine, nor complement: good Captain,
You are an honeſt and a ſober gentleman,
And one I thinke has lov'd me.
Putſ. I am ſure on't.
Ar. Look to my boy he's grown too head-ſtrong for me,
And if they think him fit to carrie Armes ſtill,
His life is theirs: I have a houſe ith' Countrey,
And when your better houres will give ye liberty
See me: you ſhall be welcome. Fortune to ye. Exit.
Anc. Ile cry no more, that will doe him no good,
And 'twill but make me drie, and I have no money:
Ile fight no more, and that will doe them harme;
And if I can do that I care not for money: (luck too
I could have curſt reaſonable well, and I have had the
To have 'em hit ſometimes: Whoſoever thou art,
That like a devill didſt poſſeſſe the Duke
With theſe malitious thoughts; mark what I ſay to thee,
A plague upon thee, that's but the Preamble.
Sold. O take the pox too:
An. They'll cure one another:
I muſt have none but kills, and thoſe kill ſtinking:
Or look ye, let the ſingle pox poſſeſſe them,
Or pox upon pox.
Putſ. That's but ill ith' Armes ſir.
Anc. Tis worſe ith' legs, I would not wiſh it elſe:
And may thoſe grow to ſcabs as big as Mole-hils,
And twice a day, the devill with a Currie-combe
Scratch 'em, and ſcrub 'em. I warrent him he has 'em.
Sold. May he be ever lowzie.
Anc. That's a pleaſure,
The Beggars Leacherie: ſometime the Souldiers:
May he be ever lazie, ſtink where he ſtands,
And Maggots breed in's braines.
2 Sould. I marrie ſir,
May he fall mad in love with his Grand-mother,
And kiſſing her, may her teeth drop into his mouth,

And

And one fall crosse his throat, then let him gargell.
Put. Now, what's the matter? Enter a Post.
Post. Where's the Duke pray gentlemen?
Put. Keep on your way, you cannot misse.
Post. I thanke yee. Exit.
An. If he be married, may he dreame hee's Cuckol'd,
And when he wakes, believe, and sweare he saw it:
Sue a divorce, and after finde her honest:
Then in a pleasant Pigsty with his owne garters,
And a fine running knot, ride to the devill.
Put. If these would doe ———
An. Ile never trust my minde more,
If all these faile.
1 Sould. What shall we doe now Captaine?
For by this honest hand Ile be torne a pieces,
Unlesse my old Generall goe, or some that love him,
And love us equall too, before I fight more:
I can make a shooe yet, and draw it on too,
If I like the legge well.
Anc. Fight? 'tis likely.
No, there Will be the sport boyes, when ther's need on's.
They thinke the other Crowne will doe, will carry us,
And the brave golden coat of Captain Cankro
Boroskie: What a noyse his very name carries?
'Tis gun enough to fright a nation,
He need no souldiers: if he doe, for my part,
I promise ye, he's like to seek 'em: so I thinke you thinke
And all the Army: No honest brave old Archas, (too,
We cannot so soon leave thy memory,
So soon forget thy goodnesse: he that does,
The scandall, and the scumme of Armes be counted.
Pu. You much rejoice me, now you have hit my meaning:
I durst not presse ye, till I found your spirits.
Continue thus.
Anc. Ile goe and tell the Duke on't. Ent. 2. Post.
Put. No, no, hee'll finde it soone enough, and feare it,
When once occasion comes: Another Packet.
From whence friend come yee?
2 Post. From the borders sir.
Put. What newes sir, I beseech yee?
2 Post. Fire and sword gentlemen;
The Tartar's up, and with a mighty force,
Comes forward like a tempest, all before him
Burning and killing.
Anc. Brave boyes; brave newes boyes.
2 Post. Either we must have present helpe———
Anc. Still braver.
2 Post. Where lyes the Duke?
Sold. Hee's there.
2 Post. 'Save ye gentlemen. Exit.
Anc. We are safe enough, I warrant thee:
Now the time's come.
Put. I now 'tis come indeed, and now stand firm boyes,
And let 'em burne on merrily.
Anc. This City would make a marvelous fine bone-fire:
'Tis old dry timber, and such wood has no fellow.
2 Sold. Here will be trim piping anon and whining,
Like so many Pigs in a storme,
When they heare the newes once, } Enter Boroskie
Put. Here's one has heard it already, } and Servant.
Room for the Generall.
Boros. Say I am falne exceeding sick oth' suddain,
And am not like to live.
Put. If ye goe on Sir,
For they will kill yee certainly: they look for yee.
Anc. I see your Lordships bound, take a suppository,
Tis I Sir; a poor cast Flag of yours. The foolish Tartars
They burne and kill, and't like your honour, kill us,
Kill with Guns, with Guns my Lord, with Guns Sir.
What sayes your Lordship to a chick in sorrell sops?
Put. Go, go thy wayes old true-peny;
Thou hast but one fault, Thou art ev'n too valiant.
Come toth' Army gentlemen, and let's make them ac- (quainted.
Sold. Away, we are for ye. Exeunt.

Scene 4. Enter Alinda, and two gentlewomen.

Al. Why whither run ye fools, wil ye leave my Lady?
Petes. The Tartar comes, the Tartar comes.
Al. Why let him,
I had thought you had feard no men: upon my conscience
You have try'd their strengths already: stay for shame.
Pet. Shift for thy selfe Alinda. Exit.
Al. Beauty blesse ye:
Into what Grooms Feather-bed will yee creep now?
And there mistake the enemy: sweet youths ye are,
And of a constant courage: are you afraid of foyning?
Enter Olimpia.
Olim. O my good wench, what shall become of us?
The Posts come hourely in, and bring new danger;
The Enemy is past the Volga, and beares hither
With all the bloud and crueltie he carries,
My brother now will find his fault.
Al. I doubt me.
Somewhat too late to Madam: but pray feare not,
All will be well I hope. Sweet Madam shake not.
Ol. How cam'st thou by this spirit? our Sex tremble.
Al. I am not unacquainted with these dangers:
And you shall know my truth; for e're you perish,
A hundred swords shall passe through me: 'tis but dying,
And Madam we must doe it: the manner's all:
You have a Princely Birth, take Princely thoughts to ye,
And take my councell too; goe presently,
With all the haste yee have, (I will attend ye)
With all the possible speed, to old Lord Archas,
He honours yee: with all your art perswade him,
('Twill be a dismall time else) wooe him hither,
But hither Madam; make him see the danger;
For your new Generall looks like an Asse;
There's nothing in his face but losse.
Olim. Ile doe it,
And thank thee sweet Alinda: O my Jewell,
How much I am bound to love thee: by this hand wench
If thou wert a man———
Al. I would I were to fight for yee.
But haste deare Madam.
Ol. I need no spurres Alinda. Exeunt.

Scen. 5. Enter Duke, 2. Posts, Attendants, Gent.

Duk. The Lord Generall sick now? is this a time
For men to creep into their beds? what's become Post
Of my Lieutenant?
Post. Beaten, and't please your Grace.
And all his forces sparkled.
Duk. That's but cold newes. Enter a Gent.
How now, what good newes? are the souldiers ready?
Ge. Yes sir, but fight they wil not, nor stir from that place
They stand in now, unlesse they have Lord Archas
To lead 'em out: they raile upon this Generall,
And sing songs of him, scurvy songs, to worse tunes:
And much they spare not you sir; here they sweare

They'll ſtand and ſee the Citie burnt,& dance about it,
Unleſſe Lord Archas come before they fight for't.
It muſt be ſo ſir.
Du. I could wiſh it ſo too:
And to that end I have ſent Lord Burris to him;
But all I feare will faile; we muſt dye gentlemen,
And one ſtroak wee'll have for't. Enter Burris.
What bringſt thou Burris?
Bur. That I am loath to tell: he will not come ſir.
I found him at his prayers: there he tells me,
The enemy ſhall take him, fit for heaven:
I urg'd to him all our dangers, his owne worthes,
The Countries ruine: nay, I kneeld and pray'd him;
He ſhook his head, let fall a teare, and pointed
Thus with his finger to the ground; a grave
I think he meant; and this was all he anſwer'd.
Your Grace was much too blame.
Where's the new Generall?
Duk. He is ſick poore man.
Bur. Hee's a poore man indeed Sir:
Your Grace muſt needs goe to the ſouldier.
Duke. They have ſent me word
They will not ſtirre: they raile at me,
And all the ſpight they have—— Shout within. Enter
What ſhout is that there? } Archas, Olimpia,
Is the enemy come ſo neare? } and Alinda.
Olim. I have brought him Sir;
At length I have woo'd him thus farre.
Duke. Happy ſiſter;
O bleſſed woman!
Olim. Uſe him nobly brother;
You never had more need: And gentlemen,
All the beſt powers yee have, to tongues turn preſently,
To winning and perſwading tongues: all my art,
Onely to bring him hither, I have utter'd;
Let it be yours to arme him: And good my Lord,
Though I exceed the limit you allow'd me,
Which was the happineſſe to bring ye hither,
And not to urge yee farther: yet, ſee your Countrey,
Out of your owne ſweet ſpirit now behold it:
Turne round, and look upon the miſeries,
Of every ſide the feares: ô ſee the dangers;
We finde 'em ſooneſt, therefore heare me firſt ſir.
Duke. Next heare your Prince;
You have ſaid you lov'd him Archas,
And thought your life too little for his ſervice:
Thinke not your vow to great now, now the time is,
And now you are brought toth'teſt, touch right now ſoul-
Now ſhew the manly pureneſs of thy mettle: (dier,
Now if thou beeſt that valued man, that vertue,
That great obedience teaching all, now ſtand it.
What I have ſaid forget, my youth was haſty,
And what you ſaid your ſelfe forgive, you were angry.
If men could live without their faults, they were gods
He weeps,& holds his hãds up: to him Burris. (Archas.
Bur. You have ſhew'd the Prince his faults:
And like a good Surgeon you have laid
That to 'em makes 'em ſmart: hee feeles it,
Let 'em not feſter now ſir: your owne honour,
The bountie of that minde, and your allegeance,
'Gainſt which I take it, heaven gives no command ſir,
Nor ſeales no vow, can better teach ye now
What yee have to doe, then I, or this neceſſity:
Onely this little's left: would ye doe nobly,
And in the eye of honour truely triumph?
Conquer that minde firſt, and then men are nothing.

Alin. Laſt, a poor virgin kneels: for loves ſake General,
If ever you have lov'd; for her ſake, ſir,
For your owne honeſty, which is a virgin,
Look up, and pitty us, be bold and fortunate.
You are a Knight, a good, and noble ſouldier,
And when your ſpurs were given ye, your ſword buckl'd,
Then were you ſworne for vertues cauſe, for beauties,
For chaſtity to ſtrike: ſtrike now, they ſuffer:
Now draw your ſword, or elſe you are recreant,
Onely a Knight ith' heeles, ith' heart a Coward:
Your firſt vow honour made, your laſt but anger. (too?
Ar. How like my vertuous wife this thing looks, ſpeaks
So would ſhe chide my dulneſſe: faire one I thank yee:
My gracious ſir, your pardon, next your hand:
Madam, your favour, and your prayers: gentlemen,
Your wiſhes and your loves; and pretty ſweet one,
A favour for your Souldier.
Olim. Give him this wench.
Al. Thus doe I tye on victory.
Ar. My Armour,
My horſe, my ſword, my tough ſtaffe, and my fortune,
And Olim now I come to ſhake thy glorie.
Duk. Goe brave and proſperous, our loves go with thee.
Ol. Full of thy vertue, and our prayers attend thee.
Bur.&c. Loden with victory, and we to honour thee.
Al. Come home the ſon of honour,
And Ile ſerve ye. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Duke, Burris, and two Gentlemen.

Duke. NO newes of Archas yet?
Bur. But now, and't pleaſe ye
A Poſt came in, Letters he brought none with him,
But this deliver'd: He ſaw the Armies joyne,
The game of bloud begun, and by our Generall,
Who never was acquainted, but with Conqueſt,
So bravely fought, he ſaw the Tartars ſhaken,
And there he ſaid he left 'em.
Duke. Where's Boroſkie?
1 Gen. He is up againe, and't pleaſe ye.
Bur. Sir, me thinks
This newes ſhould make yee lightſome, bring joy to ye,
It ſtrikes our hearts with generall comfort. Ex. Du.
Gone? What ſhould this meane, ſo ſuddenly?
Hee's well?
2. Gen. We ſee no other.
1. Would the reſt were well too,
That put theſe ſtarts into him.
Bur. Ile goe after him.
2. 'Twill not be fit Sir: h'as ſome ſecret in him
He would not be diſturb'd in: know you any thing
Has croſt him ſince the Generall went?
Bur. Not any.
If there had been, I am ſure I ſhould have found it;
Onely I have heard him oft complaine for money;
Money he ſayes he wants.
1. It may be that then.
Bur. To him that has ſo many wayes to raiſe it,
And thoſe ſo honeſt, it cannot be. } Enter Duke and
1. He comes back, } Boroskie.
And Lord Boroskie with him.

Bur.

Bur. There the game goes,
I feare ſome new thing hatching.
Du. Come hether Burris,
Go ſee my Siſter, and commend me to her,
And to my litle Miſtriſſe give this token;
Tell her I'le ſee her ſhortly.
Bur. Yes, I ſhall ſir. Ex. Bur and Gent.
Du. Waite you without: I would yet try him further.
Bor. 'Twill not be much amiſſe: has your grace heard
Of what he has done i'th' field? (yet
Du. A Poſt but now
Came in, who ſaw 'em joyne, and 'has deliver'd,
The enemy gave ground before he parted.
Bor. 'Tis well.
Du. Come, ſpeake thy mind man: 'tis not for fighting
And noiſe of War I keepe thee in my boſome;
Thy ends are nearer to me; from my childhood
Thou brought'ſt me up: and like another nature,
Made good all my neceſſities: ſpeake boldly.
Bor. Sir, what I utter, will be thought but envy
Though I intend, high heaven knows, but your honour,
When vaine and empty people ſhall proclaime me—
Good ſir excuſe me.
Du. Do you feare me for your enemy?
Speake on your dutie.
Bor. Then I muſt, and dare ſir.
When he comes home, take heed the Court receive him
Take heed he meet not with their loves, and praiſes, (not,
That glaſſe will ſhew him ten times greater Sir,
And make him ſtrive to make good that proportion,
Then ere his fortune bred him, he is honourable,
At leaſt I ſtrive to underſtand him ſo,
And of a nature, if not this way poyſon'd,
Perfect enough, eaſie, & ſweet, but thoſe are ſoone ſeduc'd
He's a great man, and what that pill may worke, (ſir;
Prepar'd by generall voyces of the people,
Is the end of all my councell: only this ſir,
Let him retire a while, there's more hangs by it
Then you know yet: there if he ſtand a while well,
But till the Souldier coole, who, for their ſervice
You muſt pay now moſt liberally, moſt freely,
And ſhewrd your ſelfe into 'em; 'tis the bounty
They follow with their loves, and not the bravery. Enter
Du. But wher's the money? how now? 2 Gent.
2 Gent. Sir the Collonell,
Son to the Lord Archai, with moſt happy newes
Of the Tartars overthrow, without here
Attends your graces pleaſure.
Bor. Be not ſeen ſir,
He's a bold fellow, let me ſtand his thunders,
Toth' Court he muſt not come: no bleſſing here ſir,
No face of favour, if you love your honour. Enter Theo:
Du. 'Do what you thinke is meeteſt; I'le retire ſir. Ex.
Bor. Conduct him in ſir—welcome noble Collonell,
The. That's much from your Lordſhip: pray where's the (Duke?
Bor. We heare you have beat the Tartar.
The. Is he buſie ſir?
Bor. Have ye taken Olin yet?
The. I would faine ſpeake with him,
Bor. How many men have ye loſt?
The. Do's he lye this way?
Bor. I am ſure you fought it bravely.
The. I muſt ſee him.
Bor. You cannot yet, ye muſt not, what's your Commiſ-
The. No gentleman o'th' Chamber here? ſion?
Bor. Why pray ye ſir?
Am not I fit to entertaine your buſineſſe?
The. I thinke you are not ſir; I am ſure ye ſhall not.
I bring no tales, nor flatteries: In my tongue ſir,
I carry no fork'd ſtings.
Bor. You keepe your bluntneſſe.
The. You are deceiv'd: it keeps me: I had felt elſe
Some of your plagues ere this: but good ſir trifle not,
I have buſineſſe to the Duke.
Bor. He's not well ſir,
And cannot now be ſpoke withall.
The. Not well ſir?
How would he ha' been, if we had loſt? not well ſir?
I bring him newes to make him well: his enemie
That would have burnt his City here, and your houſe too,
Your brave gilt houſe, my Lord, your honours hangings,
Where all your Anceſtors, and all their battles,
Their ſilke and golden battles are diſcipher'd:
That would not only have abus'd your buildings, (ries,
Your goodly buildings ſir, and have drunke dry your butte-
Purlcin'd your Lordſhips plate, the Duke beſtow'd on you,
For turning handſomely o'th' toe, and trim'd your Virgins,
Trim'd 'em of a new cut, and't like your Lordſhip,
'Tis ten to one, your wife too, and the curſe is
You had had no remedy againſt theſe Raſcals,
No Law, and't like your honour, would have kil'd you too
And roaſted ye, and eaten ye, ere this time.
Notable knaves my Lord, unruly Raſcals:
Theſe youths have we tide up, put muzzels on 'em,
And pair'd their nailes, that honeſt civill Gentlemen,
And ſuch moſt noble perſons as your ſelfe is,
May live in peace, and rule the land with a twine thread.
Theſe newes I bring,
Bor. And were they thus deliver'd ye?
Theod. My Lord, I am no pen-man, nor no Orator,
My tongue was never oyl'd with Here and't like ye,
There I beſeech yee, weigh, I am a ſouldier,
And truth I covet onely, no fine termes ſir;
I come not to ſtand treating here; my buſineſſe
Is with the Duke, and of ſuch generall bleſſing—
Bor. You have overthrowne the enemy, we know it,
And we rejoyce in't; ye have done like honeſt ſubjects,
You have done handſomely and well.
Theod. But well ſir?
But handſomly and well? what are we juglers?
Ile doe all that in cutting up a Capon.
But handſomely and well? does your Lordſhip take us
For the Dukes Tumblers? we have done bravely ſir,
Ventur'd our lives like men.
Bor. Then bravely be it.
Theod. And for as brave rewards we look, and graces,
We have ſweat and bled for't ſir.
Bor. And ye may have it,
If you will ſtay the giving. Men that thank themſelves
For any good they doe, take off the luſtre, (firſt,
And blot the benefit.
Theod. Are theſe the welcomes,
The Bells that ring out our rewards? pray heartily,
Early and late, there may be no more enemies:
Doe my good Lord, pray ſeriouſly, and figh too,
For if there be———.
Bor. They muſt be met, and fought with.
The. By whom? by you? they muſt be met & flatter'd.
Why, what a devill aild ye to do theſe things?
With what aſſurance dare ye mocke men thus?
You have but ſingle lives, and thoſe I take it
A Sword may find too: why do ye dam the Duke up?

And

And choake that course of love that like a River
Should fill our empty veines againe with comforts?
But if ye use these knick knacks,
This fast and loose, with faithfull men and honest,
You'l be the first will find it.
Enter Archas, Souldiers, Putskey, Ancient, and others,
Boros. You are too untemperate.
Theod. Better be so, and theefe too, then unthankfull:
Pray use this old man so, and then we are paid all.
The Duke thanks ye for your service, & the Court thanks ye,
And wonderfull desirous they are to see ye;
Pray heaven we have roome enough to march for May-games,
Pageants, & bonfires for your welcome home Sir;
Here your most noble friend the Lord Boroskey,
A Gentleman too tender of your credit,
And ever in the Dukes eare, for your good Sir,
Crazie and sickly, yet to be your servant,
Has leapt into the open aire to meet ye. (come home Sir.
Bor. The best is your words wound not, you are welHartily welcome home, and for your service,
The noble overthrow you gave the Enemy,
The Duke salutes ye too with all his thanks Sir.
Anc. Sure they will now regard us.
Puts. There's a reason:
But by the changing of the Colonels countenance,
The rolling of his eyes like angry billowes;
I feare the wind's not downe yet, Ancient.
Arch. Is the Duke well Sir?
Boros. Not much unhealthy,
Only a little grudging of an ague,
Which cannot last: he has heard, which makes him fearful,
And loath as yet to give your worth due welcome,
The sickness hath been somewhat hot i' th' Army,
Which happily may prove more doubt, then danger,
And more his feare then fate: yet howsoever,
An honest care ——
Ar. Ye say right, and it shall be;
For though upon my life 'tis but a rumor,
A meere opinion, without faith or feare in't;
For Sir, I thanke heaven, we never stood more healthy,
Never more high and lusty; yet to satisfie,
We cannot be too curious or too carefull
Of what concernes his state, wee'l draw away Sir,
And lodge at further distance, and lesse danger.
Boros. It will be well.
Anc. It will be very scurvy.
I smell it out, it stinks abominably,
Stir it no more.
Boros. The Duke Sir would have you too,
For a short day or two, retyre to your owne house,
Whither himselfe will come to visit ye,
And give ye thanks.
Arch. I shall attend his pleasure.
Anc. A trick, a lowsie trick: so hoa, a trick boyes.
Ar. How now, what's that?
Anc. I thought I had found a Hare Sir,
But 'tis a Fox, an old Fox, shall we hunt him?
Ar. No more such words.
Boros. The souldier's growne too sawcy,
You must tie him straiter up.
Ar. I doe my best Sir;
But men of free-born minds sometimes will flie out.
Anc. May not we see the Duke?
Boros. Not at this time Gentlemen,
Your Generall knowes the cause.
Anc. We have no plague Sir,
Unlesse it be in our pay, nor no pox neither;
Or if we had, I hope that good old Courtier
Will not deny us place there.
Puts. Certaine my Lord,
Considering what we are and what we have done;
If not, what need ye may have, 'twould be better,
A great deale nobler, and taste honester
To use us with more sweetnes; men that dig
And lash away their lives at the Carts taile,
Double our comforts; meat, and their Masters thanks too,
When they worke well, they have; Men of our qualitie,
When they doe well, and venture for't with valor,
Fight hard, lye hard, feed hard, when they come home Sir,
And know these are deserving things, things worthy,
Can you then blame 'em if their minds a little
Be stirr'd with glory? 'tis a pride becomes 'em,
A litle season'd with ambition,
To be respected, reckon'd well, and honour'd
For what they have don: when to come home thus poorly,
And met with such unjointed joy, so looked on,
As if we had done no more but drest a horse well;
So entertain'd, as if I thank ye Gentlemen,
Take that to drinke, had pow'r to please a souldier?
Where be the shouts, the bels rung out, the people?
The Prince himself?
Ar. Peace: I perceive your eye Sir
Is fixt upon this Captaine for his freedome,
And happily you find his tongue too forward;
As I am Master of the place, I carry,
'Tis fit I thinke so too; but were I this man,
No stronger tye upon me, then the truth
And tongue to tell it, I should speake as he do's,
And thinke with modestie enough, such Saints
That daily thrust their loves & lives through hazards,
And feareless for their Countries peace, march hourely
Through all the doores of death, and know the darkest,
Should better be caponiz'd for their service:
What labour would these men neglect, what danger
Where honour is, though seated in a billow,
Rising as high as heaven, would not these souldiers,
Like to so many Sea-gods charge up to it?
Doe you see these swords? times Sithe was ne're so sharp
Nor ever at one harvest mow'd such handfuls: (Sir;
Thoughts ne're so sudden, nor beliefe so sure,
When they are drawne, and were it not sometimes,
I swim upon their angers to allay 'em,
And like a calme depresse their fell intentions;
They are so deadly sure, nature would suffer ——
And whose are all these glories? why, their Princes,
Their Countries, and their Friends? Alas, of all these,
And all the happy ends they bring, the blessings,
They only share the labors, a little joy then,
And outside of a welcome, at an upshot
Would not have done amisse Sir; But howsoever
Between me and my duty, no crack Sir
Shall dare appeare: I hope by my example
No discontent in them: without doubt Gentlemen,
The Duke will both looke suddenly and truly
On your deserts: Methinks 'twere good they were paid
Bor. They shall be immediately; I stay for mony; (Sir.
And any favour else ——
Ar. We are all bound to ye;
And so I take my leave Sir; when the Duke pleases
To make me worthy of his eyes ——
Bor. Which will be suddenly,
I know his good thoughts to ye.

Ar.

Ar. With all duty,
And all humility, I ſhall attend Sir.
Bor. Once more you are welcome home: theſe ſhall be
The. Be ſure we be: and handſomely. (ſatisfied.
Ar. Waite you on me ſir.
The. And honeſtly: no jugling.
Ar. Will ye come in? Exit.
Bor. Pray do not doubt.
Theo. We are no Boyes. Exit. Enter a Gent.
Bor. Well ſir. and 2 or 3 with money.
Gent. Here's money from the Duke, and't pleaſe your Bor. 'Tis well. (Lordſhip.
Gent. How ſowre the Souldiers looke?
Bor. Is't told?
Gent. Yes: and for every company a double pay,
And the Dukes love to all.
Anc. That's worth a ducket.
Bor. You that be Officers, ſee it diſcharg'd then,
Why do not ye take it up?
Anc. 'Tis too heavy:
'Body o' me, I have ſtrain'd mine arme.
Bor. Do ye ſcorne it?
Anc. Has your Lordſhip any dice about ye? ſit round
And come on ſeaven for my ſhare. (Gentlemen.
Put. Do you thinke ſir,
This is the end we fight? can this dart draw us
To ſuch a ſtupid tameneſſe, that our ſervice
Neglected, and look'd lamely on, and skewd at
With a few honourable words, and this, is righted?
Have not we eyes and eares, to heare and ſee Sir,
And minds to underſtand the ſlights we carry?
I come home old, and full of hurts, men looke on me
As if I had got 'em from a whore, and ſhun me;
I tell my griefes, and feare my wants, I am anſwer'd,
Alas 'tis pity! pray dine with me on Sunday:
Theſe are the ſores we are ſicke of, the minds malladies,
And can this cure 'em? you ſhould have us'd us nobly,
And for our doing well, as well proclam'd us,
To the worlds eye, have ſhewd and painted us,
Then ye had paid us bravely: then we had ſhin'd ſir,
Not in this gilded ſtuffe but in our glory:
You may take backe your money.
Gent. This I fear'd ſtill.
Bor. Conſider better Gentlemen.
Anc. Thanke your Lordſhip:
And now I'l put on my conſidering cap:
My Lord, that I am no Courtier, you may gueſſe it
By having no ſute to you for this money:
For though I want, I want not this, nor ſhall not,
Whilſt you want that civility to ranke it
With thoſe rights we expected; money growes ſir,
And men muſt gather it, all is not put in one purſe.
And that I am no Carter, I could never whiſtle yet:
But that I am a Souldier, and a Gentleman,
And a fine Gentleman, and't like your honour,
And a moſt pleaſant companion: all you that are witty,
Come lift to my ditty: come ſet in boyes,
With your Lordſhips patience. Song.
How do you like my Song, my Lord? (better,
Bor. Even as I like your ſelf, but 'twould be a great deale
You would prove a great deale wiſer, and take this mony,
In your owne phrale I ſpeake now ſir, and 'tis very well
You have learn'd to ſing; for ſince you prove ſo liberall,
To refuſe ſuch meanes as this, maintaine your voice ſtill,
'Twill prove your beſt friend.
Anc. 'Tis a ſinging age ſir,
A merry moone here now: I'le follow it:
Fidling, and fooling now, gaines more then fighting.
Bor. What is't you blench at? what would you aske? ſpeak
Sol. And ſo we dare: a triumph for the Generall. (freely.
Put. And then an honour ſpeciall to his vertue.
Anc. That we may be prefer'd that have ſerv'd for it,
And cram'd up into favour like the worſhipfull,
At leaſt upon the Cities charge made drunke
For one whole year; we have done 'em ten yeares ſervice;
That we may enjoy our lechery without grudging,
And mine, or thine be nothing, all things equall,
And catch as catch may be proclaimed: that when we
And have no will to pay againe, no Law (borrow,
Lay hold upon us, nor no Court controule us.
Bor. Some of theſe may come to paſſe; the Duke may
And no doubt will: the Generall will find too, (do 'em,
And ſo will you, if you but ſtay with patience: I have no
Put. Nor will: come fellow Souldiers. (power.
Bor. Pray be not ſo diſtruſtfull.
Put. There are waies yet,
And honeſt waies; we are not brought up Statues.
Anc. If your Lordſhip
Have any ſilke ſtockings, that have holes i'th' heeles,
Or ever an honourable Caſſock that wants buttons,
I could have cur'd ſuch malladies: your Lordſhips cuſtome
And my good Ladies, if the bones want ſetting
In her old bodies----
Bor. This is diſobedience.
Anc. Eight pence a day, and hard Eggs.
Put. Troop off Gentlemen,
Some Coine we have, whilſt this laſts, or our credits,
Wee'll never ſell our Generalls worth for ſix-pence.
Ye are beholding to us.
Anc. Fare ye well Sir,
And buy a pipe with that: doe ye ſee this skarfe ſir?
By this hand Ile cry Brooms in't, birchen Brooms ſir,
Before I eate one bit from your benevolence.
Now, to our old occupations againe.
By your leave Lord. Exit.
Bor. You will bite when ye are ſharper; take up the
This love I muſt remove, this fondnes to him, (money.
This tenderneſſe of heart; I have loſt my way elſe.
There is no lending unto them, they will not take it,
They are yet too full of pillage,
They'll dance for't ere't be long:
Come, bring it after. Enter Duke.
Duke How now, refuſ'd their money?
Bor. Very bravely,
And ſtand upon ſuch termes 'tis terrible.
Du. Where's Archas?
Bor. Hee's retir'd Sir, to his houſe,
According to your pleaſure, full of duty
To outward ſhew: but what within——
Duk. Refuſe it?
Bor. Moſt confidently: 'tis not your revenewes
Can feed them ſir, and yet they have found a Generall
That knowes no ebbe of bountie: there they eate Sir,
And loath your invitations.
Du. 'Tis not poſſible,
Hee's poor as they.
Bor. You'll find it otherwiſe.
Pray make your journey further preſently,
And as ye goe Ile open yee a wonder,
Good ſir this morning.
Duke. Follow me, Ile doe it.
Exeunt.

Scene

Scæn. 2. Enter Olimpia, Alinda, Burrii, and Gentlewomen.

Olim. But doe you thinke my brother loves her.
Bur. Certaine Madam,
He ſpeaks much of her, and ſometimes with wonder,
Oft wiſhes ſhe were nobler borne.
Olim. Doe you thinke him honeſt?
Bur. Your Grace is nearer to his heart, then I am,
Upon my life I hold him ſo.
Olim. 'Tis a poore wench,
I would not have her wrong'd: methinks my Brother——
But I muſt not give rules to his affections;
Yet if he weigh her worth——
Bur. You need not feare Madam.
Olim. I hope I ſhall not: Lord Burris
I love her well; I know not, there is ſomething
Makes me beſtow more then a care upon her:
I doe not like that ring, from him to her;
I meane to women of her way, ſuch tokens
Rather appeare as baits, then royall bounties:
I would not have it ſo.
Bur. You will not find it,
Upon my troth I thinke his moſt ambition
Is but to let the world know 'has a hanſome Miſtris:
Will your Grace command me any ſervice to him?
Olim. Remember all my duty.
Bur. Bleſſings crowne ye:
What's your will Lady?
Al. Any thing that's honeſt;
And if you thinke it fits ſo poore a ſervice,
Clad in a ragged vertue, may reach him,
I doe beſeech your Lordſhip ſpeake it humbly.
Bur. Faire one I will: in the beſt phraſe I have too,
And ſo I kiſſe your hand Exit.
Al. Your Lordſhips ſervant.
Olim. Come hither wench, what art thou doing with (that Ring.
Al. I am looking on the poſie, Madam.
Olim. What is't?
Al. The Jewels let within.
Olim. But where the joy wench,
When that inviſible Jewel's loſt? why doſt thou ſmile ſo?
What unhappy meaning haſt thou?
Al. Nothing Madam,
But only thinking what ſtrange ſpels theſe Rings have,
And how they worke with ſome.
Pet. I feare with you too.
Al. This could not coſt above a Crowne.
Pet. 'Twill coſt you
The ſhaving of your crowne, if not the waſhing.
Olim. But he that ſent it, makes the vertue greater.
Al. I and the vice too Madam: goodnes bleſſe me:
How fit 'tis for my finger.
2 W. No doubt you'l find too
A finger fit for you.
Al. Sirrah, Peteſca,
What wilt thou give me for the good that followes this?
But thou haſt Rings enough, thou art provided:
Heigh ho, what muſt I doe now?
Pet. You'l be taught that,
The eaſieſt part that e're you learn't, I warrant you.
Al. Ay me, ay me.
Pet. You will divide too, ſhortly,
Your voice comes finely forward.
Olim. Come hither wanton,
Thou art not ſurely as thou ſaiſt.
Al. I would not:
But ſure there is a witchcraft in this Ring, Lady,
Lord how my heart leaps.
Pet. 'Twill goe pit a pat ſhortly.
Al. And now methinks a thouſand of the Dukes ſhapes
2 W. Will no leſſe ſerve ye?
Al. In ten thouſand ſmiles.
Olim. Heaven bleſſe the wench.
Al. With eyes that will not be denide to enter;
And ſuch ſoft ſweet embraces; take it from me,
I am undone elſe Madam: I 'm loſt elſe.
Olim. What ailes the girle?
Al. How ſuddenly I 'm alter'd?
And growne my ſelfe againe? doe not you feele it?
Olim. Weare that, and I'le weare this:
I'le try the ſtrength on't.
Al. How cold my blood growes now?
Here's ſacred vertue:
When I leave to honour this,
Every houre to pay a kiſſe,
When each morning I ariſe,
Or I forget a ſacrifice:
When this figure in my faith,
And the purenes that it hath,
I purſue not with my will,
Nearer to arrive at ſtill:
When I loſe, or change this Jewell,
Flie me faith, and heaven be cruell.
Olim. You have halfe confirm'd me,
Keep but that way ſure,
And what this charme can doe, let me endure. Exeunt.

Scæne 3. Enter Arethas, Theodore, 2 Daughters. Honoria and Viola.

Ar. Carry your ſelfe diſcreetly, it concernes me,
The Duke's come in, none of your froward paſſions,
Nor no diſtaſtes to any: Prethee Theodor,
By my life, boy, 'twill ruine me.
The. I have done Sir,
So there be no foule play he brings along with him.
Ar. What's that to you?
Let him bring what pleaſe him,
And whom, and how.
The. So they meane well——
Ar. Is't fit you be a Judge ſirrah,
The. 'Tis fit I feele Sir.
Ar. Get a banquet ready,
And trim your ſelves up hanſomly.
The. To what end?
Doe you meane to make 'em whores?
Hang up a ſigne then,
And ſet 'em out to Livery.
Ar. Whoſe ſonne art thou?
The. Yours Sir, I hope: but not of your diſgraces.
Ar. Full twenty thouſand men I have commanded,
And all their minds with this, calm'd all their angers;
And ſmall a boy of mine owne breed too, of mine owne (blood,
One crooked ſtick——
The. Pray take your way, and thrive in't,
I'le quit your houſe, if taint or black diſhonour
Light on ye, 'tis your owne, I have no ſhare in't.
Yet if it doe fall out ſo, as I feare it,
And partly find it too——
Ar. Haſt thou no reverence?

No

No dutie in thee ?
The. This shall shew I obey ye :
I dare not stay : I would have shew'd my love too,
And that you aske as duty, with my life sir,
Had you but thought me worthy of your hazzards,
Which heaven preserve ye from, and keep the Duke too:
And there's an end of my wishes, God be with ye. Exit.
Ar. Stubborne, yet full of that we all love, honesty,
Lord Burris, where's the Duke? Enter Burris.
Bur. In the great chamber Sir,
And there stayes till he see you, ye have a fine house here.
Ar. A poore contented lodge, unfit for his presence,
Yet all the joy it hath.
Bur. I hope a great one, and for your good, brave Sir.
Ar. I thanke ye Lord :
And now my service to the Duke.
Bur. I'le wait on ye. Exeunt.
Enter Duke, Borosky, Gent. and Attendants.
Du. May this be credited ?
Bor. Disgrace me else,
And never more with favour looke upon me.
Du. It seemes impossible.
Bor. It cannot chuse Sir,
Till your owne eies behold it ; but that it is so,
And that by this meanes the too haughtie souldier
Has been so cramm'd and fed, he cares not for ye ;
Beleeve, or let me perish : Let your eyes
As you observe the house, but where I point it,
Make stay, and take a view, and then you have found it.
Enter Archas, Burris, 2 Daughters and Servant.
Du. I'le follow your direction : welcome Archas,
You are welcome home brave Lord, we are come to visit
And thanke ye for your service. (ye,
Ar. 'Twas so poore Sir,
In true respect of what I owe your Highnesse,
It merits nothing.
Du. Are these faire ones yours Lord ?
Ar. Their Mother made me thinke so Sir.
Du. Stand up Ladies :
Beshrew my heart they are faire ones ; methinks fitter
The lustre of the Court, then thus live darken'd :
I would see your house Lord Archas, it appeares to me,
A handsome pile.
Ar. 'Tis neate, but no great structure ;
I'le be your Graces guide, give me the keyes there.
Du. Lead on, wee'l follow ye : begin with the Gallery,
I think that's one.
Ar. 'Tis so, and't please ye Sir,
The rest above are lodgings all.
Du. Goe on Sir. Exeunt.

Scene 4. Enter Theodore, Putskey, and Ancient.

Put. The Duke gone thither, doe you say ?
The. Yes marry doe I,
And all the ducklings too : but what they'l doe there.—
Put. I hope they'l crowne his service.
The. With a Custard ;
This is no weather for rewards ; they crowne his service?
Rather, they goe to shave his crowne : I was rated,
As if I had been a dog had worried sheep, out of doores,
For making but a doubt.
Put. They must now grace him.
The. Marke but the end.
Anc. I am sure they should reward him, they cannot want
The. They that want honesty, want any thing. (him.
Put. The Duke is so noble in his owne thoughts.
The. That I grant ye,
If those might only sway him : but 'tis most certaine,
So many new borne flyes, his light gave life too,
Buzze in his beames, flesh flies, and Butterflits,
Hornets, and humming Scarrabs, that not one honey Bee
That's loden with true labour, and brings home
Encrease, and credit, can scape rifling,
And what she sucks for sweet, they turne to bitternesse.
An. Shall we go see what they do, & talke our minds to
P. That we have done too much, & to no purpose. ('em?
Anc. Shall we be hang'd for him ?
I have a great mind to be hangd now
For doing some brave thing for him ; a worse end will
And for an action of no worth, not honour him? (take me
Upon my conscience even the devill, the very devill
(Not to belye him) thinkes him an honest man,
I am sure he has sent him soules any times these twenty Able to furnish all his fishmarket. (yeares,
The. Leave thy talking
And come, let's go to dinner and drinke to him,
We shall heare more ere supper time : if he be honour'd,
He has deserv'd it well, and we shall fight for't :
If he be ruin'd, so, we know the worst then,
And for my selfe I'le meet it.
Put. I ne're feare it. Exeunt.

Scene 5. Enter Duke, Archas, Borosky, Burris, Gentlemen, and Attendants.

Du. They are handsome roomes all, well contriv'd and Full of covenience, the prospects excellent. (fitted,
Ar. Now will your Grace passe downe, and do me but
To taste a Country banket ? (the honour
Du. What roome's that ?
I would see all now ; what conveyance has it ?
I see you have kept the best part yet ; pray open it.
Ar. Ha ? I misdoubted this : 'tis of no receipte sir,
For your eyes most unfit——
Du. I long to see it, (lent paintings,
Because I would judge of the whole peece : some excel-
Or some rare spoiles you would keep to entertaine me
An other time, I know.
Ar. In troth there is not,
Nor any thing worth your sight : below I have
Some fountaines, and some ponds.
Du. I would see this now.
Ar. Borosky, thou art a knave ; It containes nothing
But rubbish from the other roomes and unnecessaries :
Wil't please you see a strange Clocke ?
Du. This, or nothing : Little Trunke
Why should you barre it up thus with defences ready.
Above the rest, unlesse it contain'd something
More excellent, and curious of keeping :
Open't, for I will see't.
Ar. The keyes are lost sir ;
Do's your grace thinke if it were fit for you,
I could be so unmannerly ?
Du. I will see it, and either shew it——
Ar. Good sir——
Du. Thanke ye Archas,
You shew your love abundantly,
Do I use to entreat thus ? force it open,
Bur. That were inhospitable : you are his guest sir,
And with his greatest joy, to entertaine ye.
Du. Hold thy peace foole ; will ye open it ?
Ar. Sir, I cannot.

I must not if I could.
Duk. Goe breake it open.
Ar. I must withstand that force: Be not too rash Gentlemen.
Du. Unarme him first, then if he be not obstinate,
Preserve his life.
Ar. I thanke your grace, I take it:
And now take you the keyes, goe in and see Sir; (tor,
There feed your eyes with wonder, and thanke that trayThat thing that sels his faith for favor. Exit Duke.
Bur. Sir, what moves ye? (das,
Ar. I have kept mine pure: Lord Burris there's a Ju-
That for a smile will sell ye all: a Gentleman?
The Devill 'has more truth, and has maintain'd it;
A whores heart more beliefe in't. Enter Duke.
Du. What's all this Archas?
I cannot blame ye to conceale it so,
This most inestimable treasure.
Ar. Yours Sir.
Du. Nor doe I wonder now the souldier sleights me.
Ar. Be not deceiv'd; he has had no favor here Sir,
Nor had you knowne this now, but for that pickthank,
That lost man in his faith, he has reveal'd it,
To suck a little honey from ye has betray'd it.
I sweare he smiles upon me, and forsworne too,
Thou crackt, uncurrant Lord: I'le tell ye all Sir:
Your Sire, before his death, knowing your temper,
To be as bounteous as theaire, and open,
As flowing as the Sea to all that follow'd ye,
Your great mind fit for war and glory, thriftily
Like a great husband, to preserve yotir actions,
Collected all this treasure: to our trusts,
To mine I meane, and to that long-tongu'd Lords there,
He gave the knowledge, and the charge of all this,
Upon his death-bed too: And on the Sacrament
He swore us thus, never to let this treasure
Part from our secret keepings, till no hope
Of subject could relieve ye, all your owne wasted,
No help of those that lov'd ye could supply ye,
And then some great exploit afoot; my honestie
I would have kept till I had made this usefull;
I shew'd it, and I stood it to the tempest,
And usefull to the end 'twas left: I am cozen'd,
And so are you too, if you spend this vainly;
This worme that crept into ye has abus'd ye,
Abus'd your fathers care, abus'd his faith too:
Nor can this masse of money make him man more,
A flea'd dog has more soule, an Ape more honestie:
All mine ye have amongst it, farwell that,
I cannot part with't nobler; my hearts cleare,
My conscience smooth as that, no rub upon't,
But O thy hell.
Bor. I seeke no heaven from you Sir.
Ar. Thy gnawing hell Boroskey, it will find thee:
Would ye heape coles upon his head has wrong'd ye,
'Has ruin'd your estate? give him this money,
Melt it into his mouth.
Du. What little Trunck's that,
That there o'th' top, that's lockt?
Bor. You'l find it rich Sir,
Richer I think then all.
Ar. You were not covetous,
Nor wont to weave your thoughts with such a courseness;
Pray racke not honestie.
Bor. Be sure ye see it.
Du. Bring out the Trunck. Ent. with the Trunck.
Ar. You'l find that treasure too,
All I have left me now.
Du. What's this a poore gowne?
And this a peece of Seneca?
Ar. Yes sure Sir,
More worth then all your gold, yet ye have enough on't,
And of a Mine far purer, and more precious:
This sels no friends, nor searches into counsels,
And yet all counsell and all friends live here Sir,
Betrayes no faith, yet handles all that's trutty;
Wilt please ye leave me this.
Du. With all my heart Sir.
Ar. What sayes your Lordship to't?
Bor. I dare not rob ye. (both;
Ar. Poore miserable men, you have rob'd your selves
This gown, and this unvalu'd treasure, your brave Father,
Found me a childe at schoole with, in his progresse,
Where such a love he tooke to some few answers,
Unhappie boyish toyes hit in my head then,
That suddenly I made him thus as I was;
For here was all the wealth I brought his Highnes:
He carried me to Court, there bred me up,
Bestow'd his favours on me, taught me Armes first,
With those an honest mind; I serv'd him truly,
And where he gave me trust, I thinke I fail'd not;
Let the world speake: I humbly thanke your Highnes,
You have done more, and nobler, eas'd mine age Sir;
And to this care, a faire quietus given:
Now to my Booke againe.
Du. You have your wish Sir,
Let some bring off the treasure.
Bor. Some is his sir.
Ar. None, none my Lord: a poore unworthy reaper,
The harvest is his graces.
Du. Thanke ye Archas.
Ar. But will not you repent Lord? when this is gone,
Where will your Lordship?---
Bor. Pray take you no care sir.
Ar. Do's your Grace like my house?
Du. Wondrous well Archas,
You have made me richly welcome.
Ar. I did my best sir,
Is there any thing else may please your Grace?
Du. Your daughters
I had forgot, send them to Court.
Ar. How's that Sir?
Du. I said your daughters; see it done: I'le have 'em
Attend my sister, Archas.
Ar. Thanke your Highnes.
Du. And suddenly. Exit.
Ar. Through all the waies I dare,
I'le serve your temper, though you try me too far. Exit.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter Theodor, Putskey, Ancient, and Servant.

The. I wonder we heare no newes.
Put. Heere's your fathers servant,
He comes in haste too, now we shall know all sir.
The. How now?
Ser. I am glad I have met you sir; your father
Intreats ye presently make haste unto him.
The. What newes?

Ser.

Ser. None of the best Sir, I am asham'd to tell it,
Pray aske no more.
The. Did not I tell ye Gentlemen?
Did not I prophesie? he is undone then.
Ser. Not so Sir, but as neare it ——
Put. There's no help now;
The Armye's scatter'd all, though discontent,
Not to be rallied up in haste to help this.
Anc. Plague of the devill; have ye watch'd your seasons?
We shall watch you ere long.
The. Farewell, there's no cure, (& Ser.
We must endure all now: I know what I'le doe. Ex. The.
Put. Nay there's no striving, they have a hand upon us,
A heavy, and a hard one.
Anc. Now I have it,
We have yet some Gentlemen, some boyes of mettle,
(What, are we bob'd thus still, colted, and carted?)
And one mad trick wee'l have to shame these vipers;
Shall I blesse 'em?
Put. Farwell: I have thought my way too. Exit.
Anc. Were never such rare cryes in Christendome,
As Mosco shall affoord: wee'l live by fooling,
Now fightings gone, and they shall find & feele it. Exit.

Scæne 2. Enter Archas, Honora, and Viola.

Ar. No more: it must be so; do you think I would send ye
Your father, and your friend ——
Viol. Pray Sir be good to us,
Alas, we know no Court, nor seeke that knowledge;
We are content like harmles things at home,
Children of your content, bred up in quiet,
Only to know our selves, to seeke a wisedome
From that we understand, easie, and honest;
To make our actions worthy of your honour,
Their ends as innocent as we begot 'em:
What shall we looke for Sir, what shall we learne there,
That this more private sweetnesse cannot teach us?
Vertue was never built upon ambition,
Nor the soules beauties bred out of braverie:
What a terrible Father would you seeme to us,
Now you have moulded us, and wrought our tempers
To easie and obedient waies, uncrooked,
Where the faire minde can never lose, nor loiter,
Now to divert our Natures, now to stem us
Roughly against the tide of all this treasure?
Would ye have us proud? 'tis sooner bred, then buried;
Wickedly proud? for such things dwell at Court Sir.
Ho. Would you have your children learn to forget their
And when he dies dance on his Monument? (father,
Shall we seeke vertue in a Sattin gowne,
Imbroider'd vertue? faith in a well-curl'd feather?
And let our credits to the tune of green sleeves?
This may be done; and if you like, it shall be.
You should have sent us thither, when we were younger,
Our Maiden-heads at a higher rate, our Innocence
Able to make a Mart indeed: we are now too old Sir,
Perhaps they'l think too cunning too, and slight us,
Besides we are altogether unprovided,
Unfurnish'd utterly of the rules should guide us:
This Lord comes licks his hand; and protests to me:
Compares my beauty to a thousand fine things;
Mountaines, and fountaines, trees, and stars, and goblins;
Now have not I the fashion to beleeve him;
He offers me the honourable curtesie,
To lye with me all night, what a miserie is this?
I am bred up so foolishly alas I dare not;
And how madly these things will shew there.
Ar. I send ye not,
Like parts infected, to draw more corruption;
Like Spiders to grow great, with growing evill:
With your owne vertues season'd, and my prayers,
The card of goodnes in your minds, that showes ye
When ye saile false; the needle touch'd with honour,
That through the blackest stormes, still points at happines:
Your bodies the tall barks, rib'd round with goodnes;
Your heavenly soules the Pilots, thus I send you;
Thus I prepare your voyage, sound before ye,
And ever as you saile through this worlds vanitie,
Discover sholes, rocks, quicksands, cry out to ye,
Like a good Master rack about for honour:
The Court is vertue's schoole; at least it should be;
Nearer the Sun the Mine lies, the mettels purer:
Be it granted, if the Spring be once infected,
Those branches that flow from him must run muddy;
Say you find some sins there, and those no small ones,
And they like lazie fits begin to shake ye:
Say they affect your strengths, my happy children,
Great things through greatest hazards are atchiev'd still,
And then they shine, then goodnes has his glory,
His Crowne fast rivited, then time moves under,
Where, through the mist of errors, like the Sun,
Through thicke and pitchie clouds, he breaks out nobly.
Hon. I thanke you Sir, you have made me half a soul-
I will to court most willingly, most fondly. (dier,
And if there be such stirring things amongst 'em,
Such travellers into Virginia,
As fame reports, if they can win me, take me:
I thinke I have a close ward, and a sure one;
A honest mind I hope, 'tis petticote-proofe,
Chaine proofe, and jewell-proof: I know 'tis gold proof,
A Coach and foure horses cannot draw me from it:
As for your handsome faces, and filed tongues,
Curl'd Millers heads; I have another word for them,
And yet I'le flatter too, as fast as they doe,
And lye, but not as lewdly: Come, be valiant sister,
She that dares not stand the push o'th' Court, dares no-
And yet come off ungrased: Sir, like you, (thing,
We both affect great dangers now; & the world shall see
All glory lies not in mans victorie.
Ar. Mine owne Honora.
Viol. I am very fearfull,
Would I were stronger built? you would have me honest?
Ar. Or not at all my Viola.
Viol. I'le thinke on't,
For 'tis no easie promise, and live there;
Doe you thinke we shall doe well?
Hon. Why what should aile us?
Viol. Certaine they'l tempt us strongly: beside the glory
Which women may affect: they are handsome gentlemen,
Every part speaks: not is it one deniall,
Not two, not ten: from every looke we give 'em,
They'le frame a hope: even from our prayers, promises,
Ho. Let 'em feed so, & be fat: there is no feare weneh,
If thou bee'st fast to thy self.
Viol. I hope I shall be:
And your example will work more. Enter Theod.
Hon. Thou shalt not want it.
The. How doe you Sir, can you lend a man an Angell?
I heare you let out money.
Ar. Very well Sir,
You are pleasantly dispos'd: I am glad to see it,

Can you lend me your patience, and be rul'd by me?
Theod. Is't come to Patience now?
Arch. Is't not a vertue?
Theod. I know not. I ne're found it so.
Ar. That's because
Thy anger ever knowes, and not thy judgement.
Theod. I know you have been rift'd.
Ar. Nothing lesse boy:
Lord what opinions these vaine people publish?
Rift'd of what?
The. Study your vertue patience,
It may get Mustard to your meat. Why in such haste sir,
Sent ye for me?
Ar. For this end onely, Theodore,
To wait upon your sisters to the Court;
I am commanded they live there.
The. Toth' Court sir?
Ar. Toth' Court I say.
The. And must I wait upon 'em?
Ar. Yes, 'tis most fit yee should, ye are their brother.
The. Is this the businesse? I had thought your mind sir
Had been set forward on some noble action,
Something had truely stirr'd ye. Toth' Court with these?
Why they are your daughters sir.
Ar. All this I know sir.
The. The good old woman on a bed he threw.
Toth' Court?
Ar. Thou art not mad.
The. Nor drunke as you are:
Drunke with your duty sir: doe you call it duty?
A pox o' duty, what can these doe there?
What should they doe? Can ye look Babies sisters
In the young Gallants eyes, & twirle their Band-strings?
Can ye ride out to ayre your selves? pray sir,
Be serious with me: doe you speake this truely?
Ar. Why didst thou never heare of women
Yet at Court boy?
The. Yes, and good women too, very good women,
Excellent honest women: but are you sure sir,
That these will prove so?
Hon. There's the danger brother.
The. God a mercy wench, thou hast a grudging of it.
Ar. Now be you serious sir, and observe what I say,
Doe it, and doe it handsomely: goe with 'em.
The. With all my heart sir; I am in no fault now;
If they be thought whores for being in my company;
Pray write upon their backs, they are my sisters,
And where I shall deliver 'em.
Ar. Ye are wondrous jocund,
But prethee tell me, art thou so lewd a fellow,
I never knew thee faile a truth.
The. I am a souldier,
And spell you what that meanes.
Ar. A Souldier?
What dost thou make of me?
The. Your Pallat's downe sir.
Ar. I thanke yee sir.
The. Come, shall we to this matter?
You will to Court?
Hon. If you will please to honour us.
The. Ile honour yee, I warrant: Ile set yee off
With such a lustre wenches: Alas poore Viola,
Thou art a foole, thou crieſt for eating white-bread:
Be a good huswife of thy teares, and save 'em,
Thou wilt have time enough to shed 'em sister.
Doe you weep too? nay then Ile foole no more.
Come worthy sisters, since it must be so,
And since he thinks it fit to trie your vertues,
Be you as strong to truth, as I to guard yee,
And this old gentleman shall have joy of ye. Exeunt.

Scæne 3. Enter Duke and Burris.

Duke Burris take you ten thousand of those Crowns,
And those two chaines of Pearle they hold the richest,
I give 'em yee.
Bur. I humbly thanke your grace;
And may your great example worke in me
That noble charity to men more worthy,
And of more wants.
Duke You beare a good minde Burris;
Take twenty thousand now: Be not so modest,
It shall be so, I give 'em: goe, there's my ring for't.
Bur. Heaven blesse your Highnesse ever. Exit.
Duke You are honest.
Enter Alinda, and Putskie at doore.
Puts. They're comming now to Court, as faire as vertue:
Two brighter starres ne're rose here.
Al. Peace, I have it,
And what my Art can doe; the Duke——
Puts. I am gone,
Remember. Exit.
Al. I am counsell'd to the full sir.
Duke My prettie Mistris, whither lyes your businesse?
How kindly I should take this, were it to me now?
Al. I must confesse immediately to your grace,
At this time.
Du. You have no addresse, I doe believe ye,
I would yee had.
Al 'Twere too much boldnesse sir,
Upon so little knowledge, lesse deserving.
Du. You'll make a perfect Courtier.
Al. A very poore one.
Du. A very faire one sweet: come hither to me.
What killing eyes this wench has? in his glorie
Not the bright Sun, when the Sirian starre reignes,
Shines halfe so fierie.
Al. Why does your grace so view me?
Nothing but common handsomenesse dwells here sir,
Scarce that: your grace is pleas'd to mock my meannes.
Du. Thou shalt not goe: I doe not lie unto thee,
In my eye thou appearst——
Al. Dim not the sight sir,
I am too dull an object.
Duke Canst thou love me?
Canst thou love him will honour thee?
Al. I can love,
And love as you doe too: but 'twill not shew well:
Or if it doe shew here where all light lustres,
Tinsell affections, make a glorious glistering,
Twill halt ith' handsome way.
Du. Are yee so cunning?
Dost think I love not truely?
Al. No, ye cannot,
You never travell'd that way yet: pray pardon me,
I prate so boldly to you.
Du. There's no harme done:
But what's your reason, sweet?
Al. I would tell your grace,
But happily——
Du. It shall be pleasing to me.
Al. I should love you again, & then you would hate me.

With

With all my ſervice I ſhould follow yee,
And through all dangers.
Du. This would more provoke me,
More make me ſee thy worthes,
More make me meet 'em.
Al. You ſhould doe ſo, if yee did well and truely.
But though yee be a Prince, and have power in ye,
Power of example too, ye have fail'd and falter'd.
Du. Give me example where?
Al. You had a Miſtris,
Oh heaven, ſo bright, ſo brave a dame, ſo lovely,
In all her life ſo true.
Du. A Miſtris?
Al. That ſerv'd yee with that conſtancy, that care,
That lov'd your will, and woo'd it too.
Du. What Miſtris?
Al. That nus'rd your honour up, held faſt your vertue,
And when ſhe kiſt encreas'd, not ſtole your goodneſſe.
Du. And I neglected her?
Al. Loſt her, forſook her,
Wantonly flung her off.
Du. What was her name?
Al. Her name as lovely as her ſelfe, as noble,
And in it all that's excellent.
Du. What was it?
Al. Her name was Beau-deſert:
Doe you know her now ſir?
Du. Beau-deſert? I not remember——
Al. I know you doe not:
Yet ſhe has a plainer name; Lord Arabas ſervice;
Do you yet remember her? there was a Miſtris
Fairer then women, far fonder to you then,
Then Mothers to their firſt-borne joyes: Can you love?
Dare you profeſſe that truth to me a ſtranger,
A thing of no regard, no blame, no luſtre,
When your moſt noble love you have neglected,
A beautie all the world would woe and honour?
Would you have me credit this? thinke ye can love me,
And hold ye conſtant, when I have read this ſtorie?
Is't poſſible you ſhould ever favour me,
To a ſlight pleaſure prove a friend, and faſt too,
When, where you were moſt ty'd, moſt bound to benefit,
Bound by the chaines of honeſty and honour,
You have broke and boldly too? I am a weak one,
Arm'd onely with my feares: I beſeech your Grace
Tempt me no further.
Du. Who taught you this Leſſon?
Al. Woefull experience Sir: if you ſeek a faire one,
Worthy your love, if yet you have that perfect,
Two daughters of his ruin'd vertue now
Arive at Court, excellent faire indeed ſir,
But this will be the plague on't, they're excellent honeſt.
Enter Olimpia and Peteſca privately.
Duk. I love thy face.
Al. Upon my life yee cannot.
I doe not love it my ſelfe Sir, 'tis a lewd one,
So truely ill Art cannot mend it, God it 'twere handſome,
At leaſt if I thought ſo, you ſhould heare me talke ſir
In a new ſtraine; and though ye are a Prince,
Make ye Petition to me too, and wait my anſwers;
Yet o' my conſcience I ſhould pitty yee,
After ſome ten yeares ſiege.
Du. Prethee doe now.
Al. What would ye doe?
Du. Why I would lye with yee.
Al. I doe not think yee would.
Du. Introth I would wench.
Here, take this Jewell.
Al. Out upon't that's ſcurvee.
Nay, if we doe, ſure wee'll doe for good fellowſhip,
For pure love, or nothing: thus you ſhall be ſure ſir
You ſhall not pay too deare for't.
Duke Sure I cannot.
Alin. By'r Lady but yee may: when ye have found me
To doe your work well, ye may pay my wages. (able,
Pet. Why does your Grace ſtart back?
Olim. I ha' ſeen that ſhakes me:
Chills all my blood: O where is faith or goodneſſe?
Alinda thou art falſe, falſe, falſe thou faire one,
Wickedly falſe; and (woe is me) I ſee it.
For ever falſe.
Pet. I am glad 't has taken thus right. Exit.
Alin. He goe aske my Lady, ſir.
Du. What? (willing——
Al. Whether I ſhall lye with ye, or no: If I find he-
For look ye ſir, I have ſworn, while I am in her ſervice——
('Twas a raſh oath I muſt confeſſe.)
Duke Thou mockſt me.
Al. Why, would yee lye with me, if I were willing?
Would you abuſe my weakneſſe?
Du. I would peece it,
And make it ſtronger.
Al. I humbly thank your highneſſe,
When you piece me, you muſt piece me to my Coffin:
When you have got my Maiden-head, I take it,
'Tis not an inch of an Apes taile will reſtore it;
I love ye, and I honour yee, but this way
Ile neither love nor ſerve yee:
Heaven change your minde ſir. Exit.
Duke And thine too:
For it muſt be chang'd, it ſhall be. Exit.

Scene 4. Enter Boroskie, Burris, Theodore, Viola, and Honora.

Bor. They are goodly gentlewomen.
Bur. They are,
Wondrous ſweet women both.
The. Does your Lordſhid like 'em?
They are my ſiſters ſir; good luſty Laſſes,
They'll doe their labour well, I warrant yee
You'll finde no bed-ſtraw here ſir.
Hon. Thanke yee brother.
The. This is not ſo ſtrongly built: but ſhe is good mettle,
Of a good ſtirring ſtraine too. ſhe goes tith ſir. } Enter 2.
Here they be gentlemen muſt make ye merry, } Gent.
The toyes you wot of: doe you like their complexions?
They be no Moors: what think ye of this hand gentlemen?
Here's a white Altar for your ſacrifice:
A thouſand kiſſes here. Nay, keep off yet gentlemen,
Let's ſtart firſt, & have fair play: what would ye give now
To turne the globe up, and finde the rich Molucca's?
To paſſe the ſtraights? here (doe ye itch) by St. Nicolas,
Here's that will make ye ſcratch and claw,
Claw my fine Gentlemen, move ye in divers ſorts:
Pray ye let me requeſt yee, to forget
To ſay your prayers, whilſt theſe are Courtiers;
Or if yee needs will thinke of heaven, let it be no higher
Then their eyes?
Bor. How will ye have 'em beſtow'd ſir?
The. Even how your Lordſhip pleaſe,
So you doe not bake 'em.

Bor.

Bor. Bake 'em.
Th. They are too high a meat that way, they run to gelly.
But if you'l have 'em for your own dyet, take my counsel,
Stew 'em between two feather-beds.
Bur. Please you Colonell
To let 'em wait upon the Princesse?
Theo. Yes sir,
And thanke your honour too: but then happily,
These noble Gentlemen shall have no accesse to 'em,
And to have 'em buy new cloathes, studdy new faces,
And keep a stinking stirre with themselves for nothing,
'Twill not be well y'faith: they have kept their bodies,
And bin at charge for Bathes: do you see that shirt there?
Way but the morall meaning, 'twill be grievous:
Alas, I brought 'em to delight these gentlemen,
I weigh their wants by mine: I brought 'em wholsome,
Wholsome, and young my Lord, and two such blessings
They will not light upon againe in ten yeare.
Bor. 'Tis fit they wait upon her.
The. They are fit for any thing.
They'll wait upon a man, they are not bashfull,
Carrie his cloak, or untie his points, or any thing,
Drink drunk, and take Tobacco; the familiarst fooles---
This wench will leap over stools too, & sound a Trumpet,
Wrastle, and pitch the Bar; they are finely brought up,
Bor. Ladies, ye are bound to your brother,
And have much cause to thank him:
Ile ease ye of this charge, and to the Princesse,
So please you, Ile attend 'em.
The. Thank your Lordship:
If there be e're a private corner as yee goe Sir,
A foolish lobbie out oth' way, make danger,
Trie what they are, trie.
Bor. Ye are a merrie gentleman.
The. I would faine be your honours kinseman.
Bor. Ye are to curst sir. (else.
Th. Farewel wenches, keep close your ports, y'are washt
Ho. Brother bestow your fears where they are needfull.
Exit Boros. Honor. Viol.
The. Honor thy name is, and I hope thy nature.
Goe after, Gentlemen, goe, get a snatch if you can,
Yond'old Erra Pater will never please 'em.
Alas I brought 'em for you, but see the luck on't,
I sweare I meant as honestlie toward ye---
Nay doe not crie good gentlemen: a little counsell
Will doe no harme: they'll walke abroad ith' evenings,
Ye may surprize 'em easily, they weare no Pistols.
Set downe your mindes in Metre, flowing Metre,
And get some good old linnen woman to deliver it,
That has the trick on't: you cannot faile:
Farewell gentlemen. Exit.
Bur. You have frighted off these flesh-flies.
The. Flesh-flies indeed my Lord. Enter a Serv.
And it must be verie stinking flesh they will not seize on.
Serv. Your Lordship bid me bring this Casket.
Bur. Yes. Good Colonell
Commend me to your worthy father, and as a pledge
He ever holds my love, and service to him,
Deliver him this poore, but hearty token,
And where I may be his_____
The. Ye are too noble;
A wonder here my Lord, that dare be honest,
When all men hold it vitious: I shall deliver it,
And with it your most noble love. Your servant. Ex. Bur.
Were there but two more such at Court, 'twere Sainted,
This wil buy brawn this Christmas yet, & Muscadine. Ex.

Scene 5. Enter Ancient, crying Broomes, and after him severally, foure Souldiers, crying other things. Boroskie and Gent. over the Stage observing them.

1. Song.

Anc. Broom, Broom, the bonnie Broom,
Come buy my Birchen Brooms,
Ith' warres we have no more roome,
Buy all my bonnie Broom.
For a kisse take two;
If those will not doe,
For a little, little pleasure,
Take all my whole treasure:
If all these will not do't,
Take the Broom-man to boot.
Broom, Broom, the bonnie Brooms.

2. Song.

1 Sol. The warr are done and gone,
And Souldiers now neglected, Pedlers are,
Come maidens, come alone,
For I can shew you handsome, handsome ware.
Powders for, for the head,
And drinks for your bed,
To make you blith and bonney.
As well in the night we souldiers can fight,
And please a young wench as any.

2 Sol. I have fine Potato's,
Ripe Potato's.

3. Song.

3 Sol. Will ye buy any Honesty, come away,
I sell it openly by day,
I bring no forced light, nor no Candle
To cozen yee; come buy and handle:
This will shew the great man good,
The Tradesman where he sweares and lyes,
Each Lady of a noble blood,
The Citie dame to rule her eyes:
Ye are rich men now: come buy, and then
Ile make yee richer, honest-men.

4. Song.

(mend?
4 Sol. Have ye any cracke maiden-heads, to new leach or
Have ye any old maiden-heads to sell or to change?
Bring 'em to me with a little pretty gin,
Ile clout 'em, Ile mend 'em, Ile knock in a pin,
Shall make 'em as good maids agen,
As ever they have bin.

Bor. What means all this, why do y'sel Brooms Ancient?
Is it in wantonnesse, or want?
An. The onely reason is, (nonce.
To sweep your Lordships conscience: here's one for the Gape sir, you have swallowed many a goodlier matter
The onely casting for a crazie conscience.
3 Sol. Will your Lordship buy any honestie? 'twill be Bor. How is this? (worth your money.
3 Sol. Honestie my Lord, 'tis here in a quill.
An. Take heed you open it not, for 'tis so subtle,
The least puffe of wind will blow it out oth' kingdome.

2 Sol.

2 Sol. Will your Lordſhip to taſte a fine Potato?
'Twill advance your wither'd ſtate.
Anc. Fill your honour full of moſt noble itches,
And make Jack dance in your Lordſhips breeches.

1 Sol. If your daughters on their beds,
Have bow'd, or crackt their maiden-heads;
If in a Coach with two much tumbling,
They chance to crie, fie, fo, what fumbling;
If her foot ſlip, and downe fall ſhee,
And break her leg betwe the knee,
The one and thirtieth of Februarie let this be tane,
And they ſhall be ſervant maids againe.

Bor. Ye are brave ſouldiers; keep your wantonneſſe,
A winter will come on to ſhake this wilfulneſſe.
Diſport your ſelves, & when you want your money--Ex.
Anc. Broom, Broom, &c. Exit ſinging.

Scæne 6. Enter Alinda, Honora, Viola.

Al. You muſt not be ſo fearefull, little one,
Nor Lady you ſo ſad, you will ne're make Courtiers
With theſe dull ſullen thoughts; this place is pleaſure,
Preſerv'd to that uſe, ſo inhabited;
And thoſe that live here, live delightfull, joyfull:
Theſe are the Gardens of Adonis, Ladies,
Where all ſweets to their free and noble uſes,
Grow ever young and courted.
Hon. Bleſſe me heaven,
Can things of her yeares arrive at theſe rudiments?
By your leave fair gentlewoman, how long have you bin here?
Al. Faith much about a week.
Hon. You have ſtudied hard,
And by my faith arriv'd at a great knowledge.
Viol. Were not you baſhfull at firſt?
Al. I, I, for an houre or two:
But when I ſaw people laugh'd at me for it,
And thought it a dull breeding——
Hon. You are govern'd here then
Much after the mens opinions.
Al. Ever Ladie.
Hon. And what they think is honourable——
Al. Moſt preciſely
We follow with all faith.
Hon. A goodly Catechiſme.
Viol. But baſhfull for an houre or two?
Al. Faith to ſay true,
I do not think I was ſo long: for look yee,
'Tis to no end here, put on what ſhape ye will,
And foure your ſelfe with ne're ſo much auſteritie,
You ſhall be courted in the ſame, and won too,
'Tis but ſome two houres more; and ſo much time loſt,
Which we hold pretious here: In ſo much time now
As I have told you this, you may loſe a ſervant,
Your age, nor all your Art can e're recover.
Catch me occaſion as ſhe comes, hold faſt there,
Till what you doe affect is ripn'd to yee.
Has the Duke ſeen yee yet?
Ho. What if he have not?
Al. You doe your beauties too much wrong, appearing
So full of ſweetneſſe, newneſſe; ſet ſo richly,
As if a Councell beyond nature fram'd yee.
Hon. If we were thus? ſay heaven had given theſe bleſſ-
Muſt we turne theſe to ſin-oblations? (ings,
Al. How fooliſhly this Countrey way ſhewes in ye?
How full of ſlegme? doe you come here to pray Ladies?
You had beſt crie, ſtand away, let me alone gentlemen,
Ile tell my father elſe.
Viol. This woman's naught ſure,
A verie naughtie woman.
Hon. Come, ſay on friend;
Ile be inſtructed by ye.
Al. You'll thank me for't. (king of.
Ho. Either I or the devil ſhal: The Duke you were ſpea-
Al. 'Tis well remembred: yes, let him firſt ſee you,
Appeare not openly till he has view'd yee.
Hon. Hee's a very noble Prince they ſay.
Al. O wondrous gracious;
And as you may deliver your ſelfe at the firſt viewing.
For look ye, you muſt beare your ſelfe; yet take heed
It be ſo ſeaſon'd with a ſweet humilitie,
And grac'd with ſuch a bountie in your beautie——
Hon. But I hope he will offer me no ill?
Al. No, no:
'Tis like he will kiſſe ye, and play with ye.
Hon. Plaie with me, how?
Al. Why, good Lord, that you are ſuch a foole now.
No harme aſſure your ſelfe.
Viol. Will ye play with me too?
Al. Look babies in your eyes, my prettie ſweet one:
That's a fine ſport: doe you know your lodgings yet?
Hon. I heare of none.
Al. I doe then, they are handſome,
Convenient for acceſſe.
Viol. Acceſſe?
Al. Yes little one,
For viſitation of thoſe friends and ſervants,
Your beauties ſhall make choice of: friends and viſits:
Doe not you know thoſe uſes? Alas poore novice;
There's a cloſe Cowch or two, handſomely placed too.
Viol. What are thoſe I pray you? (are to lie upon,
Al. Who would be troubled with ſuch raw things? they
And your love by ye; and diſcourſe, and toy in.
Viol. Alas I have no love.
Al. You muſt by any meanes:
You'll have a hundred, feare not.
Viol. Honeſtie keep me:
What ſhall I doe with all thoſe?
Al. You'll finde uſes:
Ye are ignorant yet, let time work; you muſt learne too,
To lie handſomly in your bed a mornings, neatly dreſt
In a moſt curious VVaſtcoat, to ſet ye off well,
Play with your Bracelets, ſing; you muſt learn to rhime to,
And riddle neatlie; ſtudie the hardeſt language,
And 'tis no matter whether it be ſenſe, or no,
So it goe ſeemlie off. Be ſure yee profit
In kiſſing, kiſſing ſweetly: there lies a maine point,
A key that opens to all practick pleaſure;
Ile helpe yee to a friend of mine ſhal teach ye,
And ſuddenlie: your Countrey way is fulſome.
Hon. Have ye ſchooles for all theſe myſteries?
Al. O yes,
And ſeverall houres prefix'd to ſtudie in:
Ye may have Kalanders to know the good houre,
And when to take a jewell: for the ill too,
VVhen to refuſe, with obſervations on 'em;
Under what Signe 'tis beſt meeting in an Arbor,
And in what Bower, and houre it works; a thouſand,
VVhen in a Coach, when in a private lodging,
VVith all their vertues.
Hon. Have ye ſtudied theſe?

How

How beastly they become your youth? how bawdily?
A woman of your tenderneſſe, a teacher,
Teacher of theſe lewd Arts? of your full beauty?
A man made up in luſt would loath this in yee:
The rankeſt Leacher, hate ſuch impudence.
They ſay the devill can aſſume heavens brightneſſe,
And ſo appeare to tempt us: ſure thou art no woman.
Al. I joy to finde ye thus,
Hon. Thou haſt no tenderneſſe,
No reluctation in thy heart: 'tis miſchiefe.
Al. All's one for that; read theſe and then be ſatisfi'd,
A few more private rules I have gather'd for ye,
Read 'em, and well obſerve 'em: ſo I leave ye. Exit.
Viol. A wondrous wicked woman: ſhame go with thee.
Hon. What new Pandoras box is this? Ile ſee it,
Though preſently I teare it. Read Thine Viola,
'Tis in our owne wills to believe and follow.

Worthy Honora, as you have begun
In vertues ſpotleſſe ſchoole, ſo forward run:
Purſue that nobleneſſe, and chaſte deſire
You ever had, burne in that holy fire;
And a white Martyr to faire memorie
Give up your name, unſoil'd of infamy.

How's this? Read yours out ſiſter: this amazes me.

Vio. Feare not thou yet unblaſted Violet,
Nor let my wanton words a doubt beget,
Live in that peace and ſweetneſſe of thy bud,
Remember whoſe thou art, and grow ſtill good.
Remember what thou art, and ſtand a ſtorie
Fit for thy noble Sex, and thine owne glorie.

Hon. I know not what to thinke.
Viol. Sure a good woman,
An excellent woman, ſiſter.
Hon. It confounds me;
Let 'em uſe all their arts, if theſe be their ends,
The Court I ſay breeds the beſt foes and friends.
Come, let's be honeſt wench, and doe our beſt ſervice.
Vio. A moſt excellent woman, I will love her. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus. Scena prima.

Enter Olimpia with a Casket, and Alinda.

Al. MAdam, the Duke has ſent for the two Ladies.
Olim. I prethee go: I know thy thoughts are Go, go Alinda, do not mock me more. (with him.
I have found thy heart wench, doe not wrong thy Miſtris,
Thy too much loving Miſtris: doe not abuſe her.
Al. By your owne faire hands I underſtand ye not.
Ol. By thy own faire eyes I underſtand thee too much,
Too farre, and built a faith there thou haſt ruine.
Goe, and enjoy thy wiſh, thy youth, thy pleaſure,
Enjoy the greatneſſe no doubt he has promiſed,
Enjoy the ſervice of all eyes that ſee thee,
The glory thou haſt aim'd at, and the triumph:
Onely this laſt love I aske, forget thy Miſtris.
Al. Oh, who has wrong'd me? who has ruin'd me?
Poore wretched Girle, what poyſon is flung on thee?
Excellent vertue, from whence flowes this anger?
Ol. Go, aſk my Brother, aſk the faith thou gav'ſt me,
Aske all my favours to thee, aske my love,
Laſt, thy forgetfulneſſe of good: then flye me,
For we muſt part Alinda.
Al. You are wearie of me;
I muſt confeſſe, I was never worth your ſervice,
Your bounteous favours leſſe; but that my duty,
My ready will, and all I had to ſerve ye —
O heaven thou know'ſt my honeſtie.
Ol. No more:
Take heed, heaven has a juſtice: take this ring with yee,
This doting ſpell you gave mee: too well Alinda,
Thou knew'ſt the vertue in't; too well I feele it:
Nay keep that too, it may ſometimes remember ye,
When you are willing to forget who gave it,
And to what vertuous end.
Al. Muſt I goe from yee?
Of all the ſorrowes ſorrow has — muſt I part with yee?
Part with my noble Miſtris?
Ol. Or I with thee wench.
Al. And part ſtain'd with opinion? Farewell Lady,
Happy and bleſſed Lady, goodneſſe keep yee:
Thus your poore ſervant full of griefe turnes from yee,
For ever full of griefe, for ever from yee.
I have no being now, no friends, no Countrey,
I wander heaven knowes whither, heaven knows how.
No life, now you are loſt: onely mine innocence,
That little left me of my ſelfe, goes with me,
That's all my bread and comfort. I confeſſe Madam,
Truely confeſſe, the Duke has often courted me.
Ol. And powr'd his ſoule into thee, won thee.
Al. Doe you think ſo?
Well, time that told this tale, will tell my truth too,
And ſay ye had a faithfull, honeſt ſervant:
The buſineſſe of my life is now to pray for ye,
Pray for your vertuous loves; Pray for your children,
When heaven ſhall make ye happy.
Ol. How ſhe wounds me?
Either I am undone, or ſhe muſt go: take theſe with yee,
Some toyes may doe ye ſervice; and this money;
And when ye want, I love ye not ſo poorely,
Not yet Alinda, that I would ſee ye periſh.
Prethee be good, and let me heare: look on me,
I love thoſe eyes yet dearely; I have kiſs'd thee,
And now Ile doe't againe: farewell Alinda,
I am too full to ſpeak more, and too wretched. Exit.
Al. You have my faith,
And all the world my fortune. Exit.

Scene 2. Enter Theodore.

The. I would faine heare
What becomes of theſe two Wenches:
And if I can, I will doe 'em good. } Enter Gentleman
Doe you heare my honeſt friend? } paſſing over the
He knowes no ſuch name: } Stage.
What a world of buſineſſe,
Which by interpretation are meere nothings,
Theſe things have here? 'Maſſe now I think on't better,
I wiſh he be not ſent for one of them
To ſome of theſe by-lodgings: me thought I ſaw
A kinde of reference in his face to Bawderie.
Enter Gent. with a Gentlewom. paſſing over the Stage.
He has her, but 'tis none of them: hold faſt theefe:
An excellent touzing knave. Miſtris
You are to ſuffer your penance ſome half hour hence now
And

How farre a fine Court Custard with Plumbs it
Will prevaile with one of these waiting gentlewomen,
They are taken with these soluble things exceedingly;
This is some yeoman oth'bottles now that has sent for hir,
That she calls father: now woe to this Ale incence.
By your leave sir.

Enter a Servant.

Ser. Well sir; what's your pleasure with me?
The. You do not know the way to the maids lodgings?
Ser. Yes indeed doe I sir.
The. But you will not tell me?
Ser. No indeed will not I, because you doubt it. Exit.

Enter 2. Servant.

Th. These are fine gim-cracks: hey, here comes another,
A Flaggon full of wine in's hand, I take it.
Well met my friend, is that wine?
2 Ser. Yes indeed is it.
The. Faith Ile drink on't then.
2 Ser. Ye may, because ye have sworne sir.
The. 'Tis very good, Ile drinke a great deale now sir.
2 Ser. I cannot helpe it sir.
The. Ile drinke more yet.
2 Ser. 'Tis in your owne hands.
The. There's your pot, I thank ye.
Pray let me drinke againe.
2 Ser. Faith but ye shall not.
Now have I sworn I take it. Fare ye well sir. Exit.
Th. This is the fin'st place to live in I e're enterd. { Enter
Here comes a gentlewoman, & alone; Ile to her. { Lady.
Madam, My Lord my Master.
Lady. Who's your Lord sir?
The. The Lord Boroskie, Lady.
Lady. Pray excuse me a
Here's something for your paines: within this houre sir,
One of the choise young Ladies shall attend him:
Pray let it be in that Chamber juts out to the water;
'Tis private and convenient: doe my humble service
To my honourable good Lord, I beseech ye sir;
If it please you to visit a poore Lady_____
You carrie the 'haviour of a noble Gentleman,
The. I shall be bold.
Lady 'Tis a good aptnesse in ye.
I lye here in the Wood-yard, the blew lodgings sir;
They call me merily the Lady of the_____Sir;
A little I know what belongs to a gentleman,
And if it please you take the paines. Exit.
The. Deare Lady, take the paines? (now,
Why a horse would not take the pains that thou requir'st
To cleave old crab-tree? one of the choise yong Ladies:
I would I had let this Bawd goe, she has frighted me;
I am cruelly afraid of one of my Tribe now;
But if they will doe, the devill cannot stop 'em.
Why should he have a young Lady? are women now
Oth' nature of Bottles, to be stopt with Corks?
O the thousand little furies that flye here now?
How now Captaine? Enter Putskie.
Puts. I come to seek you out sir,
And all the Town I have travell'd.
Tie. What's the newes man?
Puts. That that concernes us all, and very neerely:
The Duke this night holds a great feast at Court,
To which he bids for guests all his old Counsellors,
And all his favourites: your Father's sent for.
The. Why he is neither in conncell, nor in favour.
Pu. Thats it: have an eye now, or never, & a quick one,
An eye that must not wink from good intelligence.
I heard a Bird sing, they mean him no good office.
The. Art sure he sups here? Enter Ancient.
Puts. Sure as 'tis day.
The. 'Tis like then:
How now, where hast thou been Ancient?
Anc. Measuring the City:
I have left my Brooms at gate here;
By this time the Porter has stole 'em to sweep out rascals.
Theod. Brooms?
An. I have been crying Brooms all the towne over,
And such a Mart I have made, there's no trade neare it.
O the young handsome wenches, how they twitter'd,
When they but saw me shake my ware, and sing too;
Come hither Master Broom-man I beseech ye:
Good Master Broom-man hither cries another.
The. Thou art a mad fellow.
An. They are all as mad as I: they all have trades now,
And roare about the streets like Bull-beggers.
The. What company of souldiers are they?
Anc. By this meanes I have gather'd
Above a thousand tall and hardy souldiers,
If need be Colonell.
The. That need's come Ancient,
And 'twas discreetly done: goe, draw 'em presently,
But without suspition: this night we shall need 'em;
Let 'em be neare the Court, let Putskie guide 'em;
And wait me for occasion: here Ile stay still.
Puts. If it fall out we are ready; if not we are scatter'd:
Ile wait ye at an inch.
The. Doe, farewell. Exeunt.

Scene 3. Enter Duke, Boroskie.

Duke Are the Souldiers still so mutinous?
Bor. More then ever,
No Law nor Justice frights 'em: all the Towne over
They play new pranks and gambols: no mans person,
Of what degree soever, free from abuses:
And durst they doe this, (let your grace consider)
These monstrous, most offensive things, these villanies,
If not set on, and fed? if not by one
They honour more then you? and more aw'd by him?
Du. Happily their owne wants.
Boros. I offer to supply 'em,
And every houre make tender of their moneyes:
They scorne it, laugh at me that offer it:
I feare the next device will be my life sir;
And willingly Ile give it, so they stay there.
Duke Doe you think Lord Archas privie?
Bor. More then thought,
I know it Sir, I know they durst not doe
These violent rude things, abuse the State thus,
But that they have a hope by his ambitions_____
Du. No more: he's sent for?
Boros. Yes, and will be here sure.
Du. Let me talke further with you anon.
Bor. Ile wait sir.
Du. Did you speak to the Ladies?
Bor. They'll attend your grace presently.
Du. How doe you like 'em?
Bor. My eyes are too dull Judges.
They wait here sir. Exit. { Enter Honora
Du. Be you gone then: Come in Ladies. { and Viola.
Welcom to th'court sweet beauties; now the court shines,
When such true beames of beauty strike amongst us:
Welcome, welcome, even as your owne joyes welcome.

How doe you like the Court? how ſeems it to you?
Is't not a place created for all ſweetneſſe?
Why were you made ſuch ſtrangers to this happineſſe?
Barr'd the delights this holds? the richeſt jewels
Set ne're ſo well, if then not worne to wonder,
By judging eyes not ſet off, loſe their luſtre:
Your Countrey ſhades are faint; blaſters of beauty;
The manners like the place, obſcure and heavie;
The Roſe buds of your beauties turne to cankers,
Eaten with inward thoughts: whilſt there ye wander.
Here Ladies, here, you were not made for Cloiſters,
Here is the Sphere you move in: here ſhine nobly,
And by your powerfull influence command all:
What a ſweet modeſtie dwells round about 'em,
And like a nipping morne pulls in their bloſſoms?
Hon. Your grace ſpeaks cunningly, you doe not this,
I hope ſir, to betray us; wee are poore triumphs;
Nor can our loſſe of honour adde to you ſir:
Great men, and great thoughts, ſeek things great & wor-
Subjects to make 'em live, and not to loſe 'em; (thy,
Conqueſts ſo nobly won, can never periſh;
We are two ſimple maids, untutor'd here ſir;
Two honeſt maids, is that a ſin at Court ſir?
Our breeding is obedience, but to good things,
To vertuous and to faire: what wou'd you win on us?
Why doe I aske that queſtion, when I have found yee?
Your Preamble has pow'rd your heart out to us;
You would diſhonour us; which in your tranſlation
Here at the Court reads thus, your grace would love us,
Moſt dearely love us: ſticke us up for miſtreſſes:
Moſt certaine, there are thouſands of our Sex ſir
That would be glad of this, and handſome women,
And crowd into this favour, faire young women,
Excellent beauties ſir: when ye have enjoyd 'em, (then?
And ſuckt thoſe ſweets they have, what Saints are theſe
What worſhip have they won? what name you gheſſe ſir,
What ſtorie added to their time, a ſweet one?
Du. A brave ſpirited wench.
Hon. Ile tell your grace,
And tell yee true: ye are deceiv'd in us two,
Extreamly cozend ſir: And yet in my eye
You are the handſomſt man I ever lookt on,
The goodlieſt gentleman; take that hope with yee;
And were I fit to be your wife (ſo much I honour yee)
Truſt me I would ſcratch for ye but I would have yee.
I would wooe you then.
Du. She amazes me:
But how am I deceiv'd?
Hon. O we are too honeſt,
Believe it ſir, too honeſt, far too honeſt,
The way that you propound too ignorant,
And there is no medling with us; for we are fooles too,
Obſtinate, peeviſh fooles: if I would be ill,
And had a wantons itch, to kick my heeles up,
I would not leap into th' Sun, and doe't there,
That all the world might ſee me: an obſcure ſhade ſir,
Darke as the deed, there is no truſting light with it,
Nor thats that lighter far, vain-glorious greatneſſe.
Du. You will love me as your friend?
Ho. I will honour yee,
As your poore humble handmaid ſerve, and pray for ye.
Du. What ſayes my little one; you are not ſo obſtinate?
Lord how ſhe bluſhes: here are truely faire ſoules:
Come you will be my love?
Viol. Good ſir be good to me,
Indeed Ile doe the beſt I can to pleaſe yee,
I doe beſeech your grace: Alas I feare ye.
Du. What ſhouldſt thou feare?
Hon. Fie ſir, this is not noble.
Du. Why doe I ſtand entreating, where my power—
Ho. You have no power, at leaſt you ought to have none
In bad and beaſtly things: arm'd thus, Ile dye here,
Before ſhe ſuffer wrong.
Du. Another Archas?
Ho. His childe ſir, and his ſpirit.
Du. Ile deale with you then,
For here's the honour to be won: ſit down ſweet,
Prethee Honora ſit.
Ho. Now ye intreat I will ſir.
Du. I doe, and will deſerve it.
Ho. That's too much kindneſſe.
Du. Prethee look on me.
Ho. Yes: I love to ſee yee,
And could look on an age thus, and admire ye:
Whilſt ye are good and temperate I dare touch ye,
Kiſſe your white hand.
Du. Why not my lips?
Ho. I dare ſir.
Du. I doe not thinke ye dare.
Ho. I am no coward.
Doe you believe me now? or now? or now ſir?
You make me bluſh: but ſure I mean no ill ſir:
It had been fitter you had kiſs'd me.
Du. That Ile doe too.
What haſt thou wrought into me?
Ho. I hope all goodneſſe:
Whilſt ye are thus, thus honeſt, I dare doe any thing,
Thus hang about your neck, and thus doat on yee;
Bleſſe thoſe faire lights: hell take me if I durſt not—
But good Sir pardon me. Siſter come hither,
Come hither, feare not wench: come hither, bluſh not,
Come kiſſe the Prince, the vertuous Prince, the good
Certaine he is excellent honeſt. (Prince:
Du. Thou wilt make me———
Ho. Sit downe, and hug him ſoftly.
Du. Fie Honora,
Wanton Honora; is this the modeſty,
The noble chaſtity your on-ſet ſhew'd me,
At firſt charge beaten back? Away.
Hon. Thank ye:
Upon my knees I pray, heaven too may thank ye;
Ye have deceiv'd me cunningly, yet nobly
Ye have cozen'd me: In all your hopefull life yet,
A Scene of greater honour, you ne're acted:
I knew Fame was a lyar, too long, and loud tongu'd,
And now I have found it: O my vertuous Maſter.
Viol. My vertuous Maſter too.
Hon. Now you are thus,
What ſhall become of me let Fortune caſt for't.
Du. Ile be that fortune, if I live Honora, Enter Alin.
Thou haſt done a cure upon me, counſell could not.
Al. Here take your ring ſir, & whom ye mean to ruine,
Give it to her next; I have paid for't dearely.
Hon. A Ring to her?
Du. Why frownes my faire Alinda?
I have forgot both theſe againe.
Al. Stand ſtill ſir,
Ye have that violent killing fire upon ye,
Conſumes all honour, credit, faith.
Hon. How's this?
Al. My Royall Miſtris favour towards me,
Woe-worth ye ſir, ye have poyſon'd, blaſted.

Duke.

Duke I ſweet?
Al. You have taken that unmanly liberty,
Which in a worſe man, is vaine-glorious feigning,
And kild my truth.
Du. Upon my life 'tis falſe wench.
Al. Ladies,
Take heed, ye have a cunning gamſter,
A handſome, and a high; come ſtoar'd with Antidotes,
He has infections elſe will fire your bloods.
Du. Prethee Alinda heare me.
Al. Words ſteept in honey,
That will ſo melt into your mindes, buy Chaſtity,
A thouſand wayes, a thouſand knots to tie ye;
And when he has bound ye his, a thouſand ruines.
A poore loſt woman ye have made me.
Du. Ile maintaine thee,
And nobly too.
Al. That Gin's too weak to take me:
Take heed, take heed young Ladies: ſtill take heed,
Take heed of promiſes, take heed of gifts,
Of forced feigned ſorrowes, ſighes, take heed.
Du. By all that's mine, Alinda——
Al. Sweare
By your miſchiefes:
O whither ſhall I goe?
Du. Goe back againe,
Ile force her take thee, love thee.
Al. Fare ye well Sir,
I will not curſe ye; onely this dwell with ye,
When ever you love, a falſe beliefe light on ye. Exit.
Hon. Wee'll take our leaves too ſir.
Duk. Part all the world now,
Since ſhe is gone.
Hon. You are crooked yet, deare Maſter,
And ſtill I feare—— Exeunt.
Duke I am vext,
And ſome ſhall finde it. Exit.

Scene 4. Enter Archas and a Servant.

Ar. 'Tis ſtrange
To me to ſee the Court, and welcome:
O royall place, how have I lov'd and ſerv'd thee?
Who lies on this ſide, know'ſt thou?
Ser. The Lord Burris.
Ar. Thou haſt nam'd a gentleman
I ſtand much bound to.
I think he ſent the Casket ſir?
Ser. The ſame Sir.
Ar. An honeſt minded man, a noble Courtier:
The Duke made perfect choice when he took him.
Goe you home, I ſhall hit the way
Without a guide now.
Ser. You may want ſomething ſir.
Ar. Onely my horſes,
Which after Supper let the Groom wait with:
Ile have no more attendance here.
Ser. Your will ſir? Exit.

Enter Theodore.

Theod. You are well met here ſir.
Ar. How now boy,
How do'ſt thou?
The. I ſhould aske
You that queſtion: how doe you ſir?
How doe you feele your ſelfe?
Ar. Why well, and luſtie.
The. What doe you here then?
Ar. Why I am ſent for
To Supper with the Duke.
The. Have you no meat at home?
Or doe you long to feed as hunted Deere doe,
In doubt and feare?
Ar. I have an excellent ſtomach,
And can I uſe it better
Then among my friends boy?
How doe the wenches?
The. They doe well enough ſir,
They know the worſt by this time: pray be rul'd ſir,
Goe home againe, and if ye have a Supper
Eate it in quiet there: this is no place for ye,
Eſpecially at this time,
Take my word for't.
Ar. May be they'll drink hard;
I could have drunk my ſhare Boy.
Though I am old, I will not out.
The. I hope you will.
Hark in your eare; the Court's
Too quick of hearing.
Ar. Not mean me wel?
Thou art abus'd and cozen'd.
Away, away.
The. To that end ſir I tell ye.
Away, if ye love your ſelfe.
Ar. Who dare doe theſe things,
That ever heard of honeſty?
The. Old Gntleman,
Take a fooles counſell.
Ar. 'Tis a fooles indeed;
A very fooles: thou haſt more of
Theſe flams in thee, theſe muſty doubts:
Is't fit the Duke ſend for me,
And honour me to eate within his preſence,
And I, like a tal fellow, play at bo-peep
With his pleaſure?
The. Take heed
Of bo-peep with your pate, your pate ſir,
I ſpeak plain language now.
Ar. If twere not here,
Where reverence bids me hold,
I would ſo ſwinge thee, thou rude,
Unmanner'd knave; take from his bounty,
His honour that he gives me, to beget
Sawcy, and ſallen feares?
The. You are not mad ſure:
By this faire light, I ſpeak
But what is whiſper'd,
And whiſper'd for a truth.
Ar. A dog: drunken people,
That in their Pot ſee viſions,
And turne ſtates, mad-men and children:
Prethee doe not follow me;
I tell thee I am angrie:
Doe not follow me.
The. I am as angrie
As you for your heart.
I and as willfull too: goe, like a Wood-cock,
And thruſt your neck ith' nooſe.
Ar. Ile kill thee.

And thou ſpeakſt but three words more.
Doe not follow me. Exit.
The. A ſtrange old fooliſh fellow: I ſhall heare yet,
And if I doe not my part hiſſe at me. Exit.

Scæne 5. Enter two Servants preparing a Banquet.

1. Ser. Beleeve me fellow here will be luſty drinking.
Many a waſht pate in wine I warrant thee. (ſcience
2 Ser. I am glad the old Generall's come upon my con-
That joy will make half the Court drunk. Hark the Trum-
They are comming on; away. (pets,
1 Ser. Wee'll have a rowſe too. Exit.
Enter Duke, Archas, Burris, Boroskie, Attend. Gent.
Duk. Come ſeat your ſelves: Lord Archas ſit you there.
Ar. Tis farre above my worth.
Duke Ile have it ſo:
Are all things ready?
Bor. All the Guards are ſet,
The Court gates ſhut.
Duk. Then doe as I preſcrib'd yee.
Be ſure no further.
Bor. I ſhall well obſerve ye. (men;
Du. Come bring ſome wine: here's to my ſiſter gentle-
A health, and mirth to all.
Ar. Pray fill it full ſir.
'Tis a high health to vertue: here Lord Burris,
A maiden health: you are moſt fit to pledge it,
You have a maiden ſoule, and much I honour it.
Paſſion o'me, ye are ſad man.
Du. How now Burris.
Goe to, no more of this.
Ar. Take the rowſe freely,
'Twill warme your bloud, and make ye fit for jollity.
Your graces pardon: when we get a cup ſir,
We old men prate a pace.
Du. Mirth makes a banque;
As you love me no more.
Bur. I thank your grace.
Give me it; Lord Boroskie.
Boroſ. I have ill braines ſir.
Bur. Damnable ill, I know it.
Boroſ. But Ile pledge ſir
This vertuous health. Enter two Servants with Cloaks.
Bu. The more unfit for thy mouth.
Du. Come, bring out Robes, & let my gueſts look nobly,
Fit for my love, and preſence: begin downward.
Off with your cloaks, take new.
Ar. Your grace deales truely
Like a munificent Prince, with your poor ſubjects,
Who would not fight for you? what cold dull coward
Durſt ſeek to ſave his life when you would aske it?
Begin a new health in your new adornments,
The Dukes, the Royall Dukes: ha, what have I got
Sir? ha! the robe of death!
Duke. You have deſerv'd it.
Ar. The livorie of the grave? do you ſtart all from me?
Doe I ſmell of earth already? Sir look on me,
And like a man; is this your entertainment?
Doe you bid your worthieſt gueſts to bloudy Banquets.
Enter a Guard.
A Guard upon me too? this is too foule play
Boy to thy good, thine honour, thou wretched Ruler,
Thou ſonne of fooles and flatterers, heire of hypocrites,
Am I ſerv'd in a hearſe that ſav'd ye all?
Are ye men or devills? doe ye gape upon me,
Wider, and ſwallow all my ſervices?
Entombe them firſt, my faith next, then my integritie,
And let theſe ſtruggle with your mangy mindes,
Your ſear'd, and ſeal'd up conſciences, till ye burſt.
Boroſ. Theſe words are death.
Ar. No thoſe deeds that want rewards, ſirrah,
Thoſe Battells I have fought, thoſe horrid dangers,
Leaner then death, and wilder then deſtruction,
I have march'd upon, theſe honour'd wounds, times ſtory,
The bloud I have loſt, the youth, the ſorrowes ſuffer'd,
Theſe are my death, theſe that can ne're be recompenced,
Theſe that ye ſit a brooding on like Toads,
Sucking from my deſerts the ſweets and favours,
And render me no pay againe but poiſons.
Bor. The proud vaine ſouldier thou haſt ſet---
Ar. Thou lyeſt.
Now by my little time of life lyeſt baſely,
Malitiouſly and loudly: how I ſcorne thee?
If I had ſweld the ſouldier, or intended
An act in perſon, leaning to diſhonour,
As ye would faine have forced me, witneſſe heaven,
Where cleareſt underſtanding of all truth is,
(For theſe are ſpightfull men, and know no piety)
When Olin came, grim Olin, when his marches,
His laſt Incurſions made the City ſwear,
And drove before him, as a ſtorme drives Haile,
Such ſhowrs of froſted fears, ſhook all your heart-ſtrings;
Then when the Volga trembled at his terrour,
And hid his ſeven curl'd heads, afraid of bruiſing,
By his arm'd horſes hoofes; had I been falſe then,
Or blowne a treacherous fire into the ſouldier,
Had but one ſparke of villanie liv'd within me,
Ye'ad had ſome ſhadow for this black about me.
Where was your ſouldierſhip? why went not you out?
And all your right honourable valour with ye?
Why met ye not the Tartar, and defi'd him?
Drew your dead-doing ſword, and buckl'd with him?
Shot through his Squadrons like a fierie Meteor?
And as we ſee a dreadfull clap of thunder
Rend the ſtiffe hearted Oakes, and toſſe their roots up:
Why did not you ſo charge him? you were ſick then,
You that dare taint my credit ſlipt to bed then,
Stewing and fainting with the feares ye had,
A whorſon ſhaking fit oppreſt your Lordſhip:
Bluſh Coward knave, and all the world hiſſe at thee.
Duk. Exceed not my command. Exit.
Bor. I ſhall obſerve it. Exit.
Ar. Are you gone too? Come weep not honeſt Burris,
Good loving Lord, no more teares: 'Tis not his malice,
This fellowes malice, nor the Dukes diſpleaſure,
By bold bad men, crowded into his nature,
Can ſtartle me: fortune ne're raz'd this Fort yet:
I am the ſame, the ſame man, living, dying;
The ſame mind to 'em both, I poize thus equall;
Onely the jugling way that told me to it,
The Judas way, to kiſſe me, bid me welcome,
And cut my throat, a little ſticks upon me.
Farewell, commend me to his grace, and tell him,
The world is full of ſervants, he may have many:
And ſome I wiſh him honeſt: hee's undone elſe:
But ſuch another doating Archas never,
So try'd and touch'd a faith: farewell for ever.
Bur. Be ſtrong my Lord: you muſt not go thus lightly.
Ar. Now, what's to doe? what ſayes the Law unto me?
Give me my great offence that ſpeaks me guilty,
Bor. Laying aſide a thouſand petty matters,

As

As ſcornes, and inſolencies both from your ſelfe and fol-
Which you put firſt fire to, and theſe are deadly, (lowers,
I come to one maine cauſe, which though it carries
A ſtrangeneſſe in the circumſtance, it carries death too,
Not to be pardon'd neither: ye have done a ſacriledge.
Ar. High heaven defend me man: how, how Boroſky?
Bor. Ye have tooke from the Temple thoſe vow'd Arms,
The holy Ornament you hung up there,
No abſolution of your vow, no order
From holy Church to give 'em backe unto you
After they were purified from war, and reſted
From bloud, made cleane by ceremony: from the Altar
You ſnatch'd 'em up againe, againe ye wore 'em,
Againe you ſtaind 'em, ſtaind your vow, the Church too,
And rob'd it of that right was none of yours ſir,
For which the Law requires your head, ye know it.
Ar. Thoſe Armes I fought in laſt?
Bor. The ſame.
Ar. God a mercy,
Thou haſt hunted out a notable cauſe to kill me:
A ſubtle one: I dye, for ſaving all you;
Good ſir remember if you can, the neceſſitie,
The ſuddaineſſe of time, the State all ſtood in,
I was entreated to, kneel'd to, and prai'd to,
The Duke himſelfe, the Princes, all the Nobles,
The cries of Infants, bedrid fathers, virgins;
Prethee find out a better cauſe, a hanſomer,
This will undo thee too: people will ſpit at thee,
The devill himſelfe would be aſham'd of this cauſe;
Becauſe my haſt made me forget the ceremony,
The preſent danger every where, muſt my life ſatisfie?
Bor. It muſt, and ſhall.
Ar. O baſe ungratefull people,
Have ye no other Sword to cut my throat with
But mine owne poulerieſſe? I confeſſe, I tooke 'em,
The vow not yet abſolv'd, I hung 'em up with:
Wore 'em, fought in 'em, gilded 'em againe
In the fierce Tartars blouds; for you I tooke 'em,
For your peculiar ſafety, Lord, for all,
I wore 'em for my Countries health, that gron'd then:
Tooke from the Temple, to preſerve the Temple;
That holy place, and all the ſacred monuments,
The reverent ſhrines of Saints, ador'd and honour'd,
Had been conſum'd to aſhes, their owne ſacrifice,
Had I been ſlacke, or ſtaid that abſolution,
No Prieſt had liv'd to give it; my owne honour
Cure of my Country murder me?
Bor. No, no ſir,
I ſhall force that from ye, will make this cauſe light too;
Away with him: I ſhall plucke downe that heart ſir.
Ar. Breake it thou maieſt; but if it bend, for pitty,
Doggs, and Kits eate it: come I am honours Martyr. Ex.

Scene 6. Enter Duke, and Burris.

Du. Exceed my warrant?
Bur. You know he loves him not.
Du. He dares as well meet death, as do it, eat wildfire,
Through a few feares I meane to trye his goodneſſe,
That I may find him fit, to weare here Burris;
I know Boroſkie hates him, to death hates him,
I know he's a Serpent too, a ſwolne one Noiſe within.
But I have puld his ſting out; what noiſe is that?
The. Within. Down with 'em, down with 'em, down
Sold. Within. Stand, ſtand, ſtand. (with the gates.
Put. Within. Fire the Pallace before ye.
Bur. Upon my life the Souldier, ſir, the Souldier,
A miſerable time is come. Enter Gent.
Gent. Oh ſave him,
Upon my knees, my hearts knees, ſave Lord Archas,
We are undone elſe.
Du. Dares he touch his body?
Gent. He racks him fearefully, moſt fearefully.
Du. Away Burris,
Take men, and take him from him; clap him up,
And if I live, I'le find a ſtrange death for him: Ex. Bur.
Are the Souldiers broke in?
Gent. By this time ſure they are ſir,
They beate the gates extreamely, beate the people.
Du. Get me a guard about me; make ſure the lodgings
And ſpeake the Souldiers faire.
Gent. Pray heaven that take ſir. Exit.
Enter Putſky, Ancient, Souldiers, with Torches.
Put. Give us the Generall, wee'l fire the Court elſe,
Render him ſafe and well,
An. Do not fire the Cellar,
There's excellent wine in't Captain, and though it be cold
I do not love it mul'd: bring out the Generall, (whether,
Wee'l light ye, ſuch a bonefire elſe; where are ye?
Speak, or wee'l toſſe your Turrets, peep out of your hives
Wee'l ſmoake ye elſe: is not that a noſe there?
Put out that noſe againe, and if thou dar'ſt
But blow it before us: now he creepes out on's burrough.
Putſ. Give us the Generall. Enter Gent.
Gent. Yes, Gentlemen;
Or any thing ye can deſire.
Anc. You muſk-cat
Cordevan-skin, we will not take your anſwer.
Put. Where is the Duke? ſpeak ſuddenly, and ſend him
Anc. Or wee'l fo frie your buttucks. (hether.
Gent. Good ſweet Gentlemen——
Anc. We are neither good, nor ſweet, we are Souldiers
And you miſcreants that abuſe the Generall,
Give fire, my boyes 'tis a darke evening,
Let's light 'em to their lodgings.
Enter Olimpia, Honora, Viola, Theodore, Women.
Hon. Good brother be not fierce.
The. I will not hurt her,
Feare not ſweet Lady.
Ol. May do what you pleaſe ſir,
I have a ſorrow that exceeds all yours,
And more, contemnes all danger. Enter Duke above
The. Where is the Duke?
Du. He's here; what would ye Souldiers? Wherefore
Like mutinous mad-men thus? (troop ye
The. Give me my father.
Put. Anc. Give us our Generall.
The. Set him here before us,
Ye ſee the pledge we have got; ye ſee theſe torches;
All ſhall to aſhes, as I live, immediately,
A thouſand lives for one.
Du. But heare me?
Put. No, we come not to diſpute. Enter Archas and
The. By heaven I ſweare he's rackt and whipt. Bur.
Hon. Oh my poore father!
Put. Burne, kill, and burne.
Ar. Hold, hold I ſay: hold Souldiers,
On your allegeance hold.
The. We muſt not.
Ar. Hold:
I ſweare by heaven he it a barbarous Traitour ſtirs firſt,
A villaine, and a ſtranger to obedience,

Never

Never my Souldier more,nor friend to honour:
Why did you uſe your old man thus? thus cruelly
Torture his poore weake body? I ever lov'd ye.
Du. Forget me in theſe wrongs,moſt noble Archas.
Ar. I have balme enough for all my hurts: weep no more
A ſatisfaction for a thouſand ſorrowes: (ſir,
I do beleeve ye innocent,a good man,
And heaven forgive that naughty thing that wrong'd me.
Why looke ye wild my friends? why ſtare ye one me?
I charge ye as ye are men, my men,my lovers,
As ye are honeſt faithfull men,faire Souldiers,
Let downe your anger: Is not this our Soveraigne,
The head of mercie, and of Law? who dares then,
But Rebels ſcorning Law, appeare thus violent?
Is this a place for Swords? for threatning fires?
The reverence of this houſe dares any touch,
But with obedient knees, and pious duties?
Are we not all his Subjects? all ſworn to him?
Has not he power to puniſh our offences?
And do not we dayly fall into 'em? aſſure your ſelves
I did offend and highly, grievouſly,
This good ſweet Prince I offended, my life forfeited,
Which yet his mercy, and his old love met with,
And only let me feele his light rod this way:
Ye are to thanke him for your Generall,
Pray for his life, and fortune: ſweat your blouds for him.
You are offenders too,daily offenders,
Proud inſolencies dwell in your hearts, and ye do 'em,
Do 'em againſt his peace,his Law,his Perſon;
Ye ſee he only ſorrowes for your ſins,
And where his power might perſecute, forgives ye:
For ſhame put up your Swords,for honeſty,
For orders ſake and whoſe ye are, my Souldiers,
Be not ſo rude.
The. They have drawne bloud from ye ſir.
Ar. That was the bloud rebel'd, the naughty bloud,
The proud provoking bloud; 'tis well 'tis out boy;
Give you example firſt; draw out,and orderly.
Hon. Good brother doe.
Ar. Honeſt and high example,
As thou wilt haue my bleſſing follow thee,
Inherit all mine honours: thanke ye Theodore,
My worthy ſon.
The. If harme come,thanke your ſelfe ſir;
I muſt obey ye. Exit.
Ar. Captaine,you know the way now:
A good man,and a valiant,you were ever,
Inclind to honeſt things: I thanke ye Captaine. Ex. Soul.
Souldiers,I thanke ye all: and love me ſtill,
But do not love me ſo you loſe allegeance,
Love that above your lives: once more I thanke ye.
Du. Bring him to reſt,and let our cares waite on him;
Thou excellent old man,thou top of honour,
Where juſtice, and obedience onlie build,
Thou ſtocke of vertue, how am I bound to love thee?
In all thy noble waies to follow thee?
Bur. Remember him that vext him ſir.
Du. Remember?
When I forget that villaine,and to pay him
For all his miſchiefes,may all good thoughts forget me.
Ar. I am very ſore,
Du. Bring him to bed with eaſe Gentlemen,
For everie ſtripe I'le drop a teare to waſh 'em,
And in my ſad repentance----
Ar. 'Tis too much,
I have a life yet left to gaine that love ſir. Exeunt

Actus Quintus, Scæna Prima.

Enter Duke,Burris,and Gentlemen.

Duke HOw do's Lord Archas yet?
Bur. But weake and't pleaſe ye,
Yet all the helpes that art can,are applied to him;
His heart's untouch't, and whole yet; and no doubt ſir,
His minde being ſound, his body ſoone will follow.
Du. O that baſe knave that wrong'd him,without leave
But I ſhall find an houre to give him thankes for't; (too,
He's faſt I hope?
Bur. As faſt as irons can keep him:
But the moſt fearefull wretch----
Du. He has a conſcience,
A cruell ſtinging one I warrant him,
A loaden one: But what newes of the Souldier?
I did not like their parting,'twas too ſullen.
Bur. That they keep ſtill, and I feare a worſe clap:
They are drawn out of the Towne,and ſtand in counſels,
Hatching unquiet thoughts,and cruell purpoſes:
I went my ſelfe unto 'em, talk't with the Captaines,
Whom I found fraught with nothing but loud murmurs,
And deſperate curſes, ſounding theſe words often
Like trumpets to their angers: we are ruin'd,
Our ſervices turn'd to diſgraces, miſchiefes,
Our brave old Generall,like one had pilfer'd,
Tortur'd, and whipt: the Collonells eyes like torches,
Blaze everie where and fright faire peace.
Gent. Yet worſe ſir:
The newes is currant now,they meane to leave ye,
Leave their allegiance: and under Olins charge
The bloudy Enemy march ſtrait againſt ye.
Bur. I have heard this too ſir.
Du. This muſt be prevented,
And ſuddenly, and warily.
Bur. 'Tis time ſir,
But what to miniſter,or how?
Du. Go in with me,
And there wee'l thinke upon't: ſuch blows as theſe,
Equall defences aske,elſe they diſpleaſe. Exeunt.

Scæne 2. Enter Peteſca,and Gentlewoman.

Pet. Lord,what a coile has here been with theſe Soul- (diers?
They are cruell fellowes.
Wo. And yet me thought we found 'em
Hanſome enough; I'le tell thee true Peteſca,
I look'd for other manner of dealings from 'em,
And had prepar'd my ſelfe; but where's my Lady?
Pet. In her old dumps within: monſtrous mellancholly;
Sure ſhe was mad of this wench.
Wo. And ſhe had been a man, (is ſhifted.
She would have been a great deale madder, I am glad ſhe
Pet. 'Twas a wicked thing for me to betray her, Ent.
And yet I muſt confeſſe ſhe ſtood in our lights, Alinda
What young thing's this?
Al. Good morrow beuteous Gentlewomen:
Pray you is the Princeſſe ſtirring yet?
Wo. He has her face.
Pe. Her very tongue,and tone too: her youth upon him.
Al. I gheſſe ye to be the Princeſſe women.
Pet. Yes, We are ſir.

Al.

Al. Pray is there not a Gentlewoman waiting on her Grace,
Ye call Alinda?
Pet. The devill ſure in her ſhape.
Wo. I have heard her tell my Lady of a brother,
An only brother that ſhe had: in travell---
Pet. 'Mas, I remember that: this may be he too:
I would this thing would ſerve her. Enter Olimpia
Wo. So would I wench,
We ſhould love him better ſure: ſir, here's the Princes,
She beſt can ſatisfie ye.
Al. How I love that preſence!
O bleſſed eyes how nobly ſhines your comforts!
Ol. What Gentleman is that?
Wo. We know not Madam:
He ask'd us for your Grace: and as we gueſſe it,
He is Alindas Brother.
Ol. Ha? let me marke him:
My griefe has almoſt blinded me: her brother?
By Venus, he has all her ſweetneſſe upon him:
Two ſilver drops of dew, were never liker.
Al. Gratious Lady---
Ol. That pleaſant pipe he has too.
Al. Bringing my happineſſe to paſſe by this way,
And having as I underſtand by Letters,
A ſiſter in your vertuous ſervice Madam---
Ol. O now my heart, my heart akes.
Al. All the comfort
My poore youth has, all that my hopes have built me,
I thought it my firſt duty, my beſt ſervice
Here to arive firſt, humbly to thanke your Grace
For my poore ſiſter, humbly to thanke your noble neſſe,
That bounteous goodneſſe in ye.
Ol. 'Tis he certainly.
Al. That ſpring of favour to her: with my life Madam
If any ſuch moſt happy meanes might meet me,
To ſhew my thankefulneſſe.
Ol. What have I done foole?
Al. She came a ſtranger to your Grace, no Courtier;
Nor of that curious breed befits your ſervice,
Yet one I dare aſſure my ſoule, that lov'd ye
Before ſhe ſaw ye; doated on your vertues;
Before ſhe knew thoſe faire eyes long'd to read 'em,
You only had her prayers, you her wiſhes;
And that one hope to be yours once, preſerv'd her,
Ol. I have done wickedly.
Al. A little beauty,
Such as a Cottage breeds, ſhe brought along with her;
And yet our Countrie eyes eſteem'd it much too:
But for her beauteous mind forget great Lady
I am her brother, and let me ſpeake a ſtranger,
Since ſhe was able to beget a thought, 'twas honeſt,
The dayly ſtuddy how to fit your ſervices,
Truly to tread that vertuous path you walke in,
So fir'd her honeſt ſoule, we thought her Sainted;
I preſume ſhe is ſtill the ſame: I would faine ſee her,
For Madam, 'tis no little love I owe her.
Ol. Sir, ſuch a maid there was, I had---
Al. There was Madam?
Ol. O my poore wench: eyes, I will ever curſe ye
For your credulity, Alinda.
Al. That's her name, Madam.
Ol. Give me a little leave ſir to lament her.
Al. Is ſhe dead Lady?
Ol. Dead ſir, to my ſervice.
She is gone, pray ye aske no further,
Al. I obey Madam:
Gone? now muſt I lament too: ſaid ye gone, Madam?
Ol. Gone, gone for ever.
Al. That's a cruell ſaying:
Her honour too?
Ol. Prethee looke angry on me,
And if thou ever lovedſt her, ſpit upon me;
Doe ſomething like a brother, like a friend,
And do not only ſay thou lov'ſt her---
Al. Ye amaze me.
Ol. I ruin'd her, I wrong'd her, I abus'd her;
Poore innocent ſoule, I ſtung her; ſweet Alinda,
Thou vertuous maid, my ſoule now cals thee vertuous.
Why do ye not raile now at me?
Al. For what Lady?
Ol. Call me baſe treacherous woman.
Al. Heaven defend me.
Ol. Raſhly I thought her falſe, and put her from me,
Raſhly, and madly I betrai'd her modeſty,
Put her to wander, heaven knows where: nay, more ſir,
Stucke a blacke brand upon her.
Al. 'Twas not well Lady,
Ol. 'Twas damnable: ſhe loving me ſo deerely,
Never poore wench lov'd ſo: Sir, beleeve me,
'Twas the moſt dutious wench, the beſt companion,
When I was pleas'd, the happieſt, and the gladdeſt,
The modeſteſt ſweet nature dwelt within her:
I ſaw all this, I knew all this, I lov'd it,
I doated on it too, and yet I kil'd it:
O what have I forſaken? what have I loſt?
Al. Madam, I'le take my leave, ſince ſhe is wandring,
'Tis fit I know no reſt.
Ol. Will you go too ſir?
I have not wrong'd you yet, if you dare truſt me,
For yet I love Alinda there, I honour her,
I love to looke upon thoſe eyes that ſpeake her,
To read that face againe, modeſty keepe me,
Alinda, in that ſhape: but why ſhould you truſt me,
'Twas I betray'd your ſiſter, I undid her;
And beleeve me, gentle youth, 'tis I weep for her:
Appoint what pennance you pleaſe: but ſtay then,
And ſee me performe it: aske what honour this place
Is able to heape on ye, or what wealth:
If following me will like ye, my care of ye,
Which for your ſiſters ſake, for your owne goodneſſe---
Al. Not all the honour earth has, now ſhe's gone Lady,
Not all the favour; yet if I ſought preferment,
Under your bounteous Grace I would only take it.
Peace reſt upon ye: one ſad teare every day
For poore Alindas ſake, 'tis fit ye pay, Exit.
Ol. A thouſand noble youth, and when I ſleep,
Even in my ſilver ſlumbers ſtill I'le weep. Exit.

Scene 3. Enter Duke and Gentlemen.

Duke Have ye been with 'em?
Gent. Yes, and't pleaſe your Grace,
But no perſwaſion ſerves 'em, nor no promiſe,
They are fearefull angry, and by this time ſir,
Upon their march to the enemy.
Du. They muſt be ſtopt. Enter Burris.
Gent. I, but what force is able? and what leader---
Du. How now, have you been with Archas?
Bur. Yes, and't pleaſe ye,
And told him all: he frets like a chaf'd Lyon,
And cals for his Armes: and all thoſe honeſt Courtiers
That dare draw Swords.

Duke

Du Is he able to do any thing?
Bur. His mind is well enough; and where his charge is,
Let him be ne're so sore, 'tis a full Army.
Du. Who commands the Rebels?
Bur. The young Collonell,
That makes the old man almost mad: he sweares sir,
He will not spare his Sons head for the Dukedome.
Du. Is the Court in Armes?
Bur. As fast as they can bussell,
Every man mad to goe now: inspir'd strangely,
As if they were to force the Enemie,
I beseech your Grace to give me leave.
Du. Pray go sir,
And looke to the old man well; take up all fairely,
And let no bloud be spilt; take generall pardons,
And quench this fury with faire peace.
Bur. I shall sir,
Or seale it with my service; they are villaines;
The Court is up: good sir, go strengthen 'em,
Your Royall sight will make 'em scorne all dangers;
The Generall needs no proofe.
Du. Come let's go view 'em. Exeunt.

Scæne 4. Enter Theodore, Putskie, Ancient, Souldiers, Drums, and Collours.

The. Tis known we are up, and marching: no submission,
No promise of base peace can cure our maladies,
We have suffer'd beyond all repaire of honour:
Your valiant old man's whipt; whipt Gentlemen,
Whipt like a slave: that flesh that never trembled,
Nor shrunke one sinew at a thousand charges,
That noble body rib'd in armes, the Enemy
So often shooke at, and then shun'd like thunder,
That bodies torne with lashes.
Anc. Let's turne head:
Put. Turne nothing Gentlemen, let's march on fairely,
Unlesse they charge us.
The. Thinke still of his abuses,
And keep your angers.
Anc. He was whipt like a top,
I never saw a whore so lac'd: Court schoole-butter?
Is this their diet? I'le dresse 'em one running banquet:
What Oracle can alter us? did not we see him?
See him we lov'd?
The. And though we did obey him,
Forc'd by his reverence for that time; is't fit Gentlemen?
My noble friends, is't fit we men, and Souldiers,
Live to endure this, and looke on too?
Put. Forward:
They may call backe the Sun as soone, stay time,
Prescribe a Law to death, as we endure this.
The. They will make ye all faire promises.
Anc. We care not.
The. Use all their arts upon ye.
Anc. Hang all their arts.
Put. And happily they'l bring him with 'em.
Anc. March apace then,
He is old and cannot overtake us.
Put. Say he doe.
An. Wee'l run away with him: they shall never see him
The truth is, wee'l heare nothing, stop at nothing, (more:
Consider nothing but our way; beleeve nothing, (thing,
Not though they say their prayers: be content with no-
But the knocking out their braines: and last, do nothing
But ban 'em and curse 'em, till we come to kill 'em.
The. Remove then forwards bravely; keep your minds
And the next time we face 'em, shall be fatall. Ex. (whole,

Scæne 5. Enter Archas, Duke, Bur. Gent. and Sould.

Ar. Peace to your Grace; take rest sir, they are before Gent. They are sir, and upon the march (us. Ex. Du.
Ar. Lord Burris, (tage,
Take you those horse and coast 'em: upon the first advan-
If they will not slacke their march, charge 'em up round-
By that time I'le come in. (ly,
Bur. I'le do it truly. Exit.
Gent. How do you feele your selfe sir?
Ar. Well, I thanke ye;
A little weake, but anger shall supply that;
You will all stand bravely to it?
All. Whilst we have lives sir. (know,
Ar. Ye speake like Gentlemen; I'le make the knaves
The proudest, and the strongest hearted Rebell,
They have a law to live in, and they shall have;
Beat up a pace, by this time he is upon 'em, Drum within.
And sword, but hold me now, thou shalt play ever. Ex.
Enter Drums beating, Theodore, Putskie, Ancient, and their Souldiers.
The. Stand, stand, stand close, and sure; Enter Bur.
The horse will charge us. and 1 or 2 Sould.
Anc. Let 'em come one, we have provender fit for 'em.
Put. Here comes Lord Burris sir, I thinke to parley.
The. You are welcome noble sir, I hope to our part.
Bur. No, valiant Collonell, I am come to chide ye,
To pitty ye; to kill ye, if these faile me;
Fie, what dishonour seeke ye? what blacke infamy!
Why do ye draw out thus? draw all shame with ye?
Are these fit cares in subjects? I command ye
Lay downe your armes againe, move in that peace,
That faire obedience you were bred in.
Put. Charge us?
We come not here to argue.
The. Charge up bravely,
And hotly too, we have hot spleenes to meet ye, Enter
Hot as the shames are offer'd us. Ar. Gent. & Soul.
Bur. Looke behind ye.
Do you see that old man? do you know him Souldiers?
Put. Your father sir, beleeve me——
Bur. You know his marches,
You have seene his executions: is it yet peace?
The. Wee'l dye here first.
Bur. Farewell: you'l heare on's presently.
Ar. Stay Burris: this is too poore, too beggerly a body
To beare the honour of a charge from me,
A sort of tatterd Rebels; go provide Gallowses;
Ye are troubled with hot heads, I'le coole ye presently:
These looke like men that were my Souldiers
Now I behold 'em neerly, and more narrowly,
My honest friends: where got they these faire figures?
Where did they steale these shapes?
Bur. They are strooke already.
Ar. Do you see that fellow there, that goodly Rebell?
He lookes as like a Captaine, I lov'd tenderly:
A fellow of a faith indeed.
Bur. He has tham'd him.
Ar. And that that beares the Collors there, most certaine
So like an Ancient of mine owne, a brave fellow,
A loving and obedient, that beleeve me Burris,
I am amaz'd and troubled: and were it not
I know the generall goodnesse of my people,

The duty, and the truth, the ſteadfaſt honeſtie,
And am aſſur'd they would as ſoone turne devils
As Rebells to allegeance, for mine honour.
Bu. Here needs no wars.
Put. I pray forgive us ſir.
Anc. Good Generall forgive us, or uſe your ſword,
Your words are double death.
All. Good noble Generall.
Bur. Pray ſir be mercifull.
Ar. Weep out your ſhames firſt,
Ye make me foole for companie: fie Souldiers,
My Souldiers too, and play theſe tricks: what's he there?
Sure I have ſeen his face too; yes, moſt certaine
I have a ſon, but I hope he is not here now,
'Would much reſemble this man, wondrous neare him,
Juſt of his height and making too, you ſeeme a Leader.
The. Good ſir, do not ſhame me more: I know your anger,
And leſſe then death, I looke not for.
Ar. You ſhall be my charge ſir, it ſeemes you want foes,
When you would make your friends your Enemies:
A running bloud ye have, but I ſhall cure ye.
Bur. Good ſir——
Ar. No more good Lord: beate forward Souldiers:
And you, march in the reare, you have loſt your places. Ex.

Scene 6. Enter Duke, Olimpia, Honora, Viola.

Du. You ſhall not thus ſullen ſtill, with me ſiſter
You doe the moſt unnobly to be angry,
For as I have a ſoule, I never touch'd her,
I never yet knew one unchaſt thought in her:
I muſt confeſſe, I lov'd her: as who would not?
I muſt confeſſe I doated on her ſtrangely,
I offer'd all, yet ſo ſtrong was her honour,
So fortifi'd as faire, no hope could reach her,
And whilſt the world beheld this, and confirmed it,
Why would you be ſo jealous?
Ol. Good ſir pardon me,
I feele ſufficiently my follies pennance,
And am aſham'd, that ſhame a thouſand ſorrowes
Feed on continually, would I had never ſeen her,
Or with a clearer judgement look'd upon her,
She was too good for me, ſo heavenly good ſir,
Nothing but heaven can love that ſoule ſufficiently. Enter
Where I ſhall ſee her once againe. Burris.
Du. No more teares,
If ſhe be within the Dukedome, wee'l recover her:
Welcome Lord Burris, faire newes I hope.
Bu. Moſt faire ſir,
Without one drop of bloud theſe wars are ended,
The Souldier coold againe, indeed aſham'd ſir,
And all his anger ended.
Du. Where's Lord Archas?
Bur. Not far off ſir: with him his valiant ſon,
Head of this fire, but now a priſoner,
And if by your ſweet mercie not prevented,
I feare ſome fatall ſtroke. Drums.
Enter Archas, Theodore, Gentlemen, Souldiers.
Du. I heare the drums beate,
Welcome, my worthy friend.
Ar. Stand where ye are ſir,
Even as you love your Country, move not forward,
Nor plead for peace, till I have done a juſtice,
A juſtice on this villaine; none of mine now,
A juſtice on this Rebell.
Hon. O my Brother.
Ar. This fatall firebrand——
Du. Forget not old man,
He is thy ſon of thine owne bloud.
Ar. In theſe veines
No treacherie e're harbour'd yet, no mutinie,
I ne're gave life to lewd and headſtrong Rebels.
Du. 'Tis his firſt fault.
Ar. Not of a thouſand ſir,
Or were it ſo, it is a fault ſo mightie,
So ſtrong againſt the nature of all mercie,
His mother were ſhe living, would not weep for him,
He dare not ſay he would live.
The. I muſt not ſir,
Whilſt you ſay 'tis not fit: your Graces mercy
Not to my life appli'd, but to my fault ſir,
The worlds forgiveneſſe next, laſt, on my knees ſir,
I humbly beg,
Do not take from me yet the name of father,
Strike me a thouſand blowes, but let me dye yours.
Ar. He moves my heart: i muſt be ſtiddaine with him,
I ſhall grow faint elſe, in my execution; (bravely.
Come, come ſir, you have ſeen death; now meet him
Du. Hold, hold I ſay, a little hold, conſider
Thou haſt no more ſons Archas to inherit thee.
Ar. Yes ſir, I have another, and a nobler:
No treaſon ſhall inherit me: young Archas
A boy, as ſweet as young, my brother breeds him,
My noble brother Briskie, breeds him nobly,
Him let your favour find: give him your honour.
Enter Putskie (alias Briskie) and Alinda (alias Archas.
Pu. Thou haſt no child left Archas, none to inherit thee
If thou ſtrikſt that ſtroke now: behold young Archas;
Behold thy brother here, thou bloudy brother,
As bloudy to this ſacrifice as thou art:
Heave up thy ſword, and mine's heav'd up: ſtrike Archas,
And I'le ſtrike too, as ſuddenly, as deadly:
Have mercy, and I'le have mercy: the Duke gives it,
Looke upon all theſe, how they weep it from thee,
Chooſe quickly, and begin.
Du. On your obedience,
On your allegeance ſave him.
Ar. Take him to ye, Soul ſhout.
And ſirha, be an honeſt man, ye have reaſon:
I thanke ye worthy Brother; welcome child,
Mine owne ſweet child.
Du. Why was this boy concealed thus?
Put. Your graces pardon:
Fearing the vow you made againſt my brother
And that your anger would not only light
On him, but find out all his familie,
This young boy, to preſerve from after danger,
Like a young wench, hether I brought; my ſelfe
In the habit of an ordinarie Captaine
Diſguis'd, got entertainement, and ſerv'd here
That I might ſtill be ready to all fortunes:
The boy your Grace tooke, nobly entertain'd him,
But thought a Girle, Alinda, Madam.
Ol. Stand away,
And let me looke upon him.
Du. My young Miſtris?
This is a ſtrange metamorphoſis, Alinda?
Al. Your graces humble ſervant.
Du. Come hether ſiſter:
I dare yet ſcarce beleeve mine eyes? how they view one
Doſt thou not love this boy well? (another?
Ol. I ſhould lye elſe,
Truſt me, extreamely lye ſir.

Du. Didst thou never wish Olimpia,
It might be thus?
Ol. A thousand times.
Du. Here take him:
Nay, do not blush; I do not jest; kisse sweetly:
Boy, ye kisse faintly boy; heaven give ye comfort;
Teach him, he'l quickly learne: there's two hearts eas'd (now.
Ar. You do me too much honour sir.
Du. No Archas,
But all I can, I will; can you love me? speake truly.
Hon. Yes sir, dearly.
Du. Come hether Viola, can you love this man?
Vio. I'le do the best I can sir.
Du. Seale it Burrio:
Wee'l all to Church together instantly:
And then a vie for boyes; stay, bring Boroskie. Enter
I had almost forgot that lumpe of mischiefe. Boroskie
There Archas, take the enemie to honour,
The knave to worth: do with him what thou wilt.
Ar. Then to my sword againe; you to your prayers;
Wash off your villanies, you feele the burthen.
Bor. Forgive me ere I die, most honest Archas;
'Tis too much honour that I perish thus;
O strike my faults to kill them that no memorie,
No blacke and blasted infamy hereafter——
Ar. Come, are ye ready?
Bor. Yes.
Ar. And truly penitent, to make your way straight?
Bor. Thus I wash off my sins.
Ar. Stand up, and live then,
And live an honest man; I scorne mens ruin's:
Take him againe, Sir, trie him: and beleeve
This thing wil be a perfect man.
Du. I take him.
Bor. And when I faile those hopes, heavens hopes faile me.
Du. You are old: no more wars Father:
Theodore take you the charge, be Generall.
The. All good blesse ye.
Du. And my good father, you dwell in my bosome,
From you rise all my good thoughts: when I would think
And examine time for one that's fairely noble,
And the same man through all the straights of vertue,
Upon this silver booke I'le looke, and read him.
Now forward merrily to Hymens rights,
To joyes, and revels, sports, and he that can
Most honour Archas, is the noblest man. Exeunt.

Prologue.

WE need not noble Gentlemen to invite
Attention, pretious truth you who did write
This worthy Story, being considerd
The match join'd with grave matter, &
To yeild the hearers profit, with delight, (Intent
Will speake the maker: and to do him right,
Would aske a Genius like to his; the age
Mourning his losse, and our now widowed stage
In vaine lamenting. I could adde, so far
Behind him the most moderne writers are,
That when they would commend him, their best praise
Ruins the buildings which they strive to raise,
To his best memory, so much a friend
Presumes to write, scorne will not offend
The living that are modest, with the rest
That may repine he cares not to contest.
This debt to Fletcher paid; it is profest
By us the Actors, we will do our best
To send such favouring friends, as hither come
To grace the Scene, pleas'd, and contented home.

Epilogue.

THough something well assur'd, few here repent
Three houres of pretious time, or money spent
On our endeavours, Yet not to relye
Too much upon our care, and industrie,
'Tis fit we should aske, but a modest way
How you approve our action in the play.
If you vouchsafe to crowne it with applause,
It is your bounty, and you give us cause
Hereafter with a generall consent
To study, as becomes us, your content.

FINIS.

The Lavves of Candy.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Enter Gaſpero, and Melitus.

Mel. Sir, you're the very friend I wiſh'd to meet (with,
I have a large diſcourſe invites your eare
To be an Auditor.

Gaſ. And what concernes it?

Mel. The ſadly thriving progreſſe of the loves
Betweene my Lord the Prince, and that great Lady,
Whoſe inolencie, and never-yet-match'd pride,
Can by no Character be well expreſt,
But in her onlie name, the prow'd Erota.

Gaſ. Alas Melitus, I ſhould gheſſe, the beſt
Succeſſe your Prince could find from her, to be
As harſh as the event doth prove: but now
'Tis not a time to pity paſſionate griefes,
When a whole Kingdome in a manner lies
Upon its death-bed bleeding.

Mel. Who can tell
Whether or no, theſe many plagues at once
Hang over this unhappie Land, for her ſake,
That is a monſter in it.

Gaſ. Here's the miſerie
Of having a child our Prince: elſe I preſume
The bold Venecians had not dar'd to attempt
So bloudie an Invaſion.

Mel. Yet I wonder
Why, Maſter Secretarie, ſtill the Senate
So almoſt ſuperſtitiouſlie adores,
Gonzalo the Venetian Lord, conſidering
The outrage of his Countrymen——

Gaſ. The Senate
Is wiſe, and therein juſt, for this Gonzalo,
Upon a Maſſacre performed at Sea
By the Admirall of Venice, on a Merchant
Of Candy, when the cauſe was to be heard
Before the Senate there, in open Court
Profeſſed, that the crueltie the Admirall
Had ſhewed, deſerved not only fine, but death:
For Candy then, and Venice were at peace:
Since when upon a motion in the Senate,
For conqueſt of our Land, 'tis known for certaine,
That only this Gonzalo dar'd to oppoſe it,
His reaſon was, becauſe it too much favoured
Of Lawleſſe, and unjuſt ambition.
The wars were ſcarce begun, but he (in feare
Of quarrels 'gainſt his life) fled from his Countrie,
And hether came, where (to confirme his truth)
I know (Melitus) he, out of his owne ſtore,
Hath monied Caſſilanes the Generall.

Mel. What, without other pledges then Caſſilanes
Bare promiſe of payment?

Gaſ. No, it may be
He has ſome pettie Lordſhip to retire to:
But this he hath done; now 'tis fit Melitus,
The Senate ſhould be thankefull, otherwiſe,
They ſhould annihilate one of thoſe Laws,
For which this Kingdome is throughout the world
Unfollowed, and admired.

Mel. What Lawes are theſe? ſir,
Let me ſo much importune you.

Gaſ. You ſhall,
And they be worth your knowledge; briefly thus:
Who ere he be that can detect apparantly
Another of ingratitude, for any
Received benefit, the Plaintiffe may Require the offenders life; unleſſe he pleaſe
Freely, and willingly to grant remiſſion.

Mel. By which ſtrict Law the Senate is in danger,
Should they neglect Gonzalo.

Caſ. Right; the Law
Permits a like equalitie to Aliens,
As to a home-borne Patriot.

Mel. Pray ſir the other?

Gaſ. Know Melitus,
The elder Cretans flouriſhed many yeares,
In War, in Peace, unparalel'd, and they
(To ſpurre heroicke ſpirits on to vertue)
Enacted that what man ſo ere he were,
Did nobleſt in the field againſt his enemie,
So by the generall voice approv'd, and knowne,
Might at his home-returne, make his demand
For ſatisfaction, and reward.

Mel. They are
Both famous Lawes indeed. Enter a Meſſenger.

Meſ. Maſter Secretarie,
The Senate is about to ſit, and crave
Your preſence.

Gaſ. What, ſo ſuddenly?

Meſ. Theſe Letters
Will ſhew the cauſes why.

Gaſ. Heaven thou art great,
And worthie to be thanked.

Mel. Your countenance ſir
Doth promiſe ſome good tidings.

Gaſ. O the beſt
And happieſt for this land, that e're was told!
All the Venetian Forces are defeated.

Mel. How Sir?

Gaſ. And what doth adde ſome delight more,
There is amongſt the Souldiers a contention
Who ſhall be the triumpher, and it ſtands
Doubtfull betweene a Father and his Son,
Old Caſſilanes, and young Antinous.

Mel. Why may not both demand it?

Gaſ. The Law denies it:
But where the Souldiers do not all conſent,
The parties in contention, are refer'd
To plead before the Senate; and from them,
Upon an open Audience, to be judg'd
The Chiefe, and then to make demands.

Mel. You raviſh me
With wonder and delight,

Gaſ. Come: as we walke,
I ſhall more fully informe you. Exeunt.

Scæn. 2. Enter Caſſilanes, Arcanes, Antinous, and Decius.

Caſ. Admit no Souldier neare us, till the Senate
Have tooke their places.

Arc. You are obey'd, my Lord.
Ant. Decius, fall off.
Dec. I ſhall.
Caſ. Give leave Arcanes:
Young-man come nearer to me: who am I?
Ant. It were a ſin againſt the piety
Of filiall duty, If I ſhould forget
The debt I owe my father on my knee;
Your pleaſure?
Caſ. What, ſo low? canſt thou finde joynts,
Yet be an Elephant? Antinous, riſe:
Thou wilt belye opinion, and rebate
The ambition of thy gallantry, that they
Whoſe confidence thou haſt bewitched, ſhould ſee
Their little God of War, kneele to his father,
Though in my hand I did graſpe Thunder.
Ant. Sir,
For proofe that I acknowledge you the Author
Of giving me my birth, I have diſcharg'd
A part of my obedience. But if now
You ſhould (as cruell fathers do) proclame
Your right, and Tyrant like uſurp the glory
Of my peculiar honours, not deriv'd
From ſucceſſary, but purchas'd with my bloud,
Then I muſt ſtand firſt Champion for my ſelfe,
Againſt all interpoſers.
Caſ. Boldly urg'd,
And proudly, I could love thee, did not anger
Conſult with juſt diſdaine, in open language
To call thee moſt ungratefull. Say freely,
Wilt thou reſigne the flatteries, whereon
The reeling pillars of a popular breath,
Have rais'd thy Giant-like conceit; to adde
A ſuffrage to thy fathers merit, ſpeake?
Ant. Sir, heare me: were there not a Chronicle
Well pend by all their tongues, who can report
What they have ſeene you do; or had you not
Beſt in your owne performance writ your ſelfe,
And been your own Text, I would undertake
Alone, without the helpe of Art, or Character,
But only to recount you deeds in Armes,
And you ſhould ever then be fam'd a preſident
Of living victory: But as you are
Great, and well worthy to be ſtiled great,
It would betray a povertie of ſpirit
In me to obſtruct my fortunes, or diſcent,
If I ſhould coward-like ſurrender up
The intereſt, which the inheritance of your vertue,
And mine owne thriftie fate can claime in honour:
My Lord, of all the maſſe of fame, which any
That weares a ſword, and hath but ſeen me fight,
Gives me, I will not ſhare, nor yeild one jot,
One tittle.
Caſ. Not to me?
Ant. You are my father,
Yet not to you.
Caſ. Ambitious boy, how darſt thou
To tell me, that thou wilt contend?
Ant. Had I
Been ſloathfull, and not followed you in all
The ſtreights of death, you might have juſtly then
Reputed me a baſtard; 'tis a cruelty,
More then to murther Innocents, to take
The life of my yet Infant-honour from me.
Caſ. Antinous, looke upon this badge of age,
Thy fathers gray-hair'd beard: full fifty yeares,
(And more then halfe of this, ere thou wert borne)
I have been knowne a Souldier, in which time
I found no difference 'twixt War and Peace,
For War was peace to me, and Peace was war;
Antinous, marke me well; there hath not liv'd
Theſe fifty yeares, a man whom Crete prefer'd
Before thy father; let me boldly boaſt,
Thy father, both for Diſcipline, and Action,
Hath ſo long been the firſt of all his Nation;
Now canſt thou thinke it honeſt, charitable,
Nay humane, being ſo young, my ſon, my child,
Begot, bred, taught by me, by me thy father,
For one dayes ſervice, and that on thy firſt,
To rob me of a glory which I fought for
A halfe of hundred yeares.
Ant. My caſe obſerves
Both equity, and preſidents; for ſir,
That very day whereon you got your fame,
You tooke it from ſome other, who was then
Chiefe in repute, as you are now; and had been
Perhaps as many yeares deſerving that,
Which you gain'd in a day; as I have mine.
Caſ. But he was not my father then Antinous.
Thou leav'ſt out that.
Ant. Sir had he been your father,
He had been then immortall: for a father
Heightens his reputation, where his ſon
Inherits it, as when you give us life,
Your life is not diminiſh'd, but renew'd
In us, when you are dead, and we are ſtill
Your living Images.
Caſ. So be thou curs'd
In thy poſterity, as I in thee,
Diſhonorable boy: O ſhall that Sun,
Which not a yeare yet ſince, beheld me mounted
Upon a fierie ſteed, waving my ſword,
And teaching this young-man to manage Armes,
That was a raw, freſh novice in the feates
Of Chivalrie, ſhall that fame ſun be witneſſe
Againſt this brat, of his ingratitude?
Who to ecclipſe the light of my renowne,
Can no way hope to get a Noble name,
But by the treading on his fathers greatneſſe;
Thou wilt not yeald? Enter Arcanes.
Ant. My life, but not the prize
My Sword hath purchas'd.
Arc. The Senate
My Lord are here at hand; and all the ſouldiers
Begin to throng about them.
Caſ. Now Arcanes the——
Arc. What ſir?
Caſ. Trifles will affront us: that
Fine fighting Stripling,
Arc. Let him have the ſhame on't:
Pleaſe you withdraw on this ſide.
Caſ. My great heart
Was never quaild before.
Dec. My Lord be confident,
Let not your father dant you.
Ant. Decius, whether
Muſt I withdraw?
Dec. On this ſide.——See the Souldiers
Attend your pleaſure--courage ſir; the Senate.
Caſ. Way for the Senate.
Enter Perphicio, Poſſenne (3 Senators) Gonzalo, Gaſpero, Souldiers.

My

My good Lords I know not
What taxe of arrogance I may incurre,
Should I presume, though courted by your favours,
To take a place amongst you: I had rather
Give proofe of my unfeign'd humility
By force, though meane, yet more becomming place,
Then run the hazard of a doubtfull censure.
Pos. My Lord, your wisedome is both known & try'd;
We cannot ranke ye in a nobler friendship,
Then your great service to the state deserves.
Por. Wil't please you sit? Enter Fernando with Sold.
Gonz. What here my Lord Porphicio?
It must not be.
Porp. My Lord you are too modest.
Gonz. It is no season to be troublesome,
Else---But I have done: Your Lordships are observ'd.
Gosp. Is the demandant ready?
Ars. He is ready.
Gasp. Produce him then.
Arc. Before this sacred presence,
I, by a generall consent, am made
The Souldiers voice, and to your gratious wisedomes,
Present as chiefe in Armes, his Countries Champion,
Cassilanes.
Dec. Most reverend Lords, you heare the lesser number
Of those who have been Guardians to this Countrey,
Approve this Champion; I in all their names
Who fought for Candy, here present before you
The mightiest man in Armes, Antinous.
Speak fellow souldiers.
Sold. Antinous, Antinous.
Gasp. Stand by all, save the two competitors.
Poss. My Lords, how much your Countrey owes you both,
The due reward of your desertfull glories
Must to posterity remain: But yet
Since, by our Law, one onely can make claime
To the proposed honours which you both
(It seems) have truely merited, take leave
Freely to plead your rights: we shall attend you.
Porp. Wherein priority of voyce is granted
Lord Cassilanes to you: for that your rare
And long experience in the course of war,
As well doth challenge it, as the best priviledge
Of Order and civility, for that
You are your brave opponents worthy father.
Say Countrey-men, are you content?
Sold. I, I.
Cass. Right grave, right gratious fathers; how unfit
It is for me, that all my life time have
Been practis'd in the schoole of bloud, and slaughter,
To bandy words now in my lifes last farewell,
Your wisedomes will consider; were there pitcht
Another, and another field, like that
Which not yet three days since, this arme hath scatter'd,
Defeated, and made nothing, then the man
That had a heart to thinke he could but follow,
(For equall me he should not) through the lanes
Of danger and amazement, might in that,
That onely of but folowing me, be happy,
Reputed worthy to be made my rivall:
For 'tis not Lords, unknowne to those about me,
(My fellow souldiers) first with what a confidence
I led them on to fight, went on still, and
And as if I could have beene a second Nature,
As well in heartning them by my example,
As by my exhortation, I gave life
To quicken courage, to inflame revenge,
To heighten resolution; in a word,
To out-doe action: It boots not to discover,
How that yong-man, who was not fledg'd nor skil'd
In Martiall play, was even as ignorant
As childish: But I list not to disparage
His non-ability: The signall given
Of Battaile, when our enemies came on,
(Directed more by fuerie, then warrant
Of Policy and Stratagem) I met them,
I in the fore-front of the Armies met them;
And as if this old weather-beaten body
Had been compos'd of Cannon-proof, I stood
The volleys of their shot. I, I my selfe
Was he that first dis-ranke their woods of Pikes:
But when we came to handy-stroaks, as often
As I lent blowes, so often I gave wounds,
And every wound a death. I may be bold
To justifie a truth, this very sword
Of mine slew more then any twaine besides:
And, which is not the least of all my glorie,
When he, this young man, hand to hand in fight,
Was by the Generall of the Venetians,
And such as were his retinue, unhors'd,
I stept between, and rescu'd him my selfe,
Or horses hoofs had trampled him to dirt;
And whilst he was re-mounting, I maintain'd
The combate with the gallant Generall,
Till having taken breath, he throng'd before me,
Renew'd the fight, and with a fatall blow,
Stole both that honour from me, and his life
From him, whom I before my selfe alone,
Had more then full three quarters kill'd: A man
Well worthy onely by this hand to have dy'd,
Not by a Boyes weak push: I talke too much,
But 'tis a fault of Age: If to bring home
Long peace, long victorie, even to your Capitoll;
If to secure your Kingdome, Wives, and Children,
Your lives and liberties; if to renowne
Your honours through the world, to fix your names,
Like Blazing starres, admir'd, and fear'd by all,
That have but heard of Candy, or a Cretane,
Be to deserve the approvement of my man-hood,
Then thus much have I done: what more, examine
The Annalls of my life; and then consider
What I have been, and am. Lords I have said.
Gonz. With reverence to the Senate, is it lawfull,
Without your Customes breach, to say a word?
Pos. Say on my Lord Gonzalo.
Gonz. I have heard,
And with no little wonder, such high deeds
Of Chivalrie discours'd, that I confesse,
I doe not think the Worthies while they liv'd
All nine, deserv'd as much applause, or memorie,
As this one: But who can doe ought to gaine
The Crowne of honour from him, must be somewhat
More then a man; you tread a dangerous path,
Yet I shall heare you gladly: for believe me,
Thus much let me professe, in honours cause,
I would not to my father, nor my King,
(My Countries father) yield: if you transcend
What we have heard, I can but onely say,
That miracles are yet in use. I feare
I have offended.
Porp. You have spoken nobly,
Antinous use your priviledge.

Ant.

Ant. Princely fathers,
E're I begin, one ſuit I have to make,
'Tis juſt, and honourable.
Porp. Poſſ. Speak, and have it.
Ant. That you would pleaſe the ſouldiers might all ſtand
Together by their Generall.
Poſſ. 'Tis granted.
All fall to yonder ſide: Goe on, Antinous.
Ant. I ſhall be briefe and plaine: All what my father
(This Countries Patron) hath diſcours'd, is true.
Fellowes in Armes: ſpeak you is't true?
Sol. True, true.
Ant. It followes, that the blaze of my performance
Took light from what I ſaw him doe; and thus
A City (though the flame be much more dreadfull)
May from a little ſparke be ſet on fire;
Of all what I have done, I ſhall give inſtance
Onely in three maine proofs of my deſert.
Firſt I fought out (but through how many dangers
My Lords judge ye) the chiefe, the great Commander,
The head of that huge body, whoſe prowd weight
Our Land ſhrunke under, him I found and fought with,
Fought with, and ſlew. Fellowes in Armes, ſpeak you,
Is't true or not?
Sold. True, true.
Ant. When he was ſalne,
The hearts of all our adverſaries
Began to quaile, till young Fernando, ſonne
To the laſt Duke of Venice gather'd head,
And ſoone renew'd the field, by whoſe example
The bold Venetians doubling ſtrength and courage
Had got the better of the day, our men
Suppoſing that their adverſaries grew
Like Hydra's head, recoyle, and 'gan to flye:
I follow'd them; and what I ſaid, they know;
The ſumme on't is; I call'd them back, new rankt them;
Lead on, they follow'd, ſhrunk not till the end:
Fellowes in Armes is't true, or no.
Sold. True, true.
Ant. Laſtly, to finiſh all, there was but one,
The onely great exploit; which was to take
Fernando priſoner, and that hand to hand
In ſingle fight I did: my ſelfe without
The helpe of any arme, ſave the arme of heaven.
Speak ſouldiers, is it true, or no?
Sol. Antinous, Antinous.
Ant. Behold my priſoner, Fathers.
Fern. This one man
Ruin'd our Army, and hath glorifi'd
Creete in her robes of mightineſſe and conqueſt.
Poſ. We need not uſe long circumſtance of words,
Antinous thou art conquerer: the Senate,
The ſouldiers, and thy valour have pronounc'd it.
All. Antinous, Antinous.
Porp. Make thy demand.
Caſ. Pleaſe ye (my Lord) give leave
That I may part.
Poſ. No Caſſilanes, the Court
Should therein be diſhonour'd, doe not imagine
We prize your preſence at ſo ſlight a rate.
Demand Antinous.
Ant. Thus (my Lords) to witneſſe
How far I am from arrogance, or thinking
I am more valiant, though more favour'd
Then my moſt matchleſſe father, my demand is,
That for a laſting memorie of his name,
His deeds, his reall, nay his royall worth,
You ſet up in your Capitoll in Braſſe
My fathers Statue, there to ſtand for ever
A Monument and Trophy of his victories,
With this Inſcription to ſucceeding ages,
Great Caſſilanes, Patron of Candy's Peace,
Perpetuall Triumpher.
Por. Poſ. It is granted. What more?
Ant. No more.
Caſ. How boy?
Gonz. Thou art immortall,
Both for thy Son-like pietie, and beauties
Of an unconquer'd minde.
Ant. My Priſoner (Lords)
To your more ſacred wiſedomes I ſurrender:
Fit you his ranſome; halfe whereof I give
For largeſſe to the Souldiers: the other halfe
To the erection of this monument.
Caſſ. Ambitious villaine.
Gonz. Thou art all un-immitable.
My Lords to work a certaine peace for Candy
With Venice, uſe Fernando like a Prince;
His ranſome Ile diſburſe what e're it be:
Yet you may ſtay him with you, till conditions
Of amitie ſhall be concluded on:
Are yee content?
Porp. We are, and ever reſt
Both friends add debters to your nobleneſſe.
Gonz. Souldiers attend me in the Market-place,
Ile thither ſend your largeſſe.
Sold. Antinous, Antinous. Exeunt.
Caſ. I have a ſute too, Lords.
Porp. Poſ. Propoſe it, 'tis yours, if fit and juſt.
Caſ. Let not my ſervices,
My being forty yeares a drudge, a pack-horſe
To you, and to the State, be branded now
With Ignominy ne're to be forgotten:
Reare me no Monument, unleſſe you meane
To have me fam'd a Coward, and be ſtamp'd ſo.
Poſ. We underſtand you not.
Caſ. Proud boy, thou doſt,
And Tyrant-like inſult'ſt upon my ſhame.
Ant. Sir, heaven can tell, and my integrity,
What I did, was but onely to inforce
The Senates gratitude. I now acknowledge it.
Caſ. Obſerve it Fathers, how this haughty boy
Growes cunning in his envy of mine honours:
He knowes no mention can of me be made,
But that it ever likewiſe muſt be told,
How I by him was maſter'd; and for ſurety
That all ſucceeding times may ſo report it,
He would have my diſhonour, and his Triumphs
Ingrav'd in Braſſe: hence, hence proceeds the falſhood
Of his inſinuating piety.
Thou art no childe of mine: thee and thy bloud,
Here in the Capitoll, before the Senate,
I utterly renounce: So thrift and fate
Confirme me; henceforth never ſee my face,
Be, as thou art, a villaine to thy father.
Lords I muſt crave your leaves: come, come Arcanti. Ex.
Gonz. Here's a ſtrange high-borne ſpirit.
Poſ. 'Tis but heat
Of ſuddaine preſent rage; I dare aſſure
Antinous of his favour.
Ant. I not doubt it,
He is both a good man, and a good father.

I ſhall

I shall attend your Lordships.
Poss. Doe Antinam.
Gonz. Yes: feast thy Triumphs,
With applause and pleasures.
Per. Poss. Lead on, Exeunt. Flor. Cornets.
Ant. I utterly renounce—— I was so?
Was't not, my Decius?
Dec. Pish, you know my Lord,
Old men are chollerick.
Ant. And lastly parted
With never henceforth see my face: O me,
How have I lost a Father? Such a father?
Such a one Decius! I am miserable,
Beyond expression.
Dec. Fie, how unbecomming
This shewes upon your day of fame?
Ant. O mischiefe:
I must no more come neare him, that I know,
And am assur'd on't.
Dec. Say you doe not?
Ant. True:
Put case I doe not: what is Candy then
To lost Antinous? Malta, I resolve
To end my dayes in thee.
Dec. How's that?
Ant. Lie trie
All humble meanes of being reconcil'd,
Which if deny'd, then I may justly say,
This day has prov'd my worst: Decius my worst. Exeunt

Actus Secundus. Scena prima.

Enter Gonzalo, and Gaspero.

Gasp. NOw to what you have heard, as no man can Better then I, give you her Character;
For I have been both nurs'd, and traind up to
Her petulant humours, and been glad to beare them,
Her brother, my late Master, did no lesse:
Strong apprehensions of her beauty hath
Made her believe that she is more then woman:
And as these did not want those flatterers
'Bout the worlds Conquerour, to make him think,
And did perswade him that he was a god;
So there be those base flies, that will not stick
To buzze into her eares she is an Angel,
And that the food she feeds on is Ambrosia.
Gonz. She should not touch it then, 'tis Poets fare.
Gasp. I may take leave to say, she may as well
Determine of her selfe to be a goddesse,
With lesser flatterie then be a god:
For she does conquer more, although not farther.
Every one looks on her dyes in despaire,
And would be glad to doe it actually,
To have the next age tell how worthily,
And what good cause he had to perish so:
Her beauty is superlative, she knowes it,
And knowing it, thinks no man can deserve,
But ought to perish, and to dye for her:
Many great Princes for her love have languish'd,
And given themselves a willing sacrifice,
Proud to have ended so: And now there is
A Prince so manded in his owne passions,
That he forgets the Royaltie he was borne to,
And deems it happinesse so be her slave.
Gonz. You talke as if you meant to winde me in,
And make me of the number.
Gasp. Sir, mistake me not, the service that I owe ye
Shall plead for me: I tell you what she is,
What she expects, and what she will effect,
Unlesse you be the miracle of men,
That come with a purpose to behold,
And goe away your selfe.
Gon. I thanke you, I will doe it: But pray resolve me,
How is she stor'd with wit?
Gasp. As with beauty,
Infinite, and more to be admired at,
Then medled with.
Gonz. And walks her tongue the same gate with her
Gasp. Much beyond: she ere her heart thinks, she utters:
And so bold, so readily, as you would judge
It penn'd and studied.
Gonz. She comes.
Gasp. I must leave you then,
But my best wishes shall remain with you.
Gonz. Still I must thanke you.
This is the most passionate,
Most pitifull Prince,
Who in the Caldron of affections,
Looks as he had been par-boyl'd.
Enter Erota, Philander, Amiphil, Hyppatha, Moobingo, Attendants.
Phil. If I offend with too much loving you,
It is a fault that I must still commit,
To make your mercy shine the more on me.
Erot. You are the selfe-same creature you condemne,
Or else you durst not follow me with hope
That I can pittie you, who am so farre
From granting any comfort in this kinde,
That you and all men else shall perish first:
I will live free and single, till I finde
Something above a man to equall me;
Put all your brave Heroes into one,
Your Kings and Emperours, and let him come
In person of a man, and I should scorne him:
Must, and will scorne him.
The god of Love himselfe hath lost his eyes,
His Bow and Torch extinguish'd, and the Poets
That made him first a god, have lost their fire
Since I appear'd, and from my eyes must steale it.
This I dare speak, and let me see the man,
Now I have spoke it, that doth dare deny;
Nay, not believe it.
Mo. He is mad that does not.
Erot. Have not all the nations of the earth heard of me?
Most come to see me, and seeing me, return'd
Full of my praises? teaching there Chroniclers
To make their Stories perfect? for where the name,
Meerely the word of faire Erota stands,
It is a lasting History to time,
Begetting admiration in the men,
And in my owne Sex envie; which glorie's lost,
When I shall stick my beautie in a cloud,
And clearly shine through it.
Gonz. This Woman's in the altitudes, and he must be
A good Astrologer shall know her Zodiack.
Phil. For any man to thinke
Himselfe an able purchaser of you,
But in the bargaine there must be declar'd
Infinite bounty: other wise I vow,
By all that's excellent and gracious in you,

I would

I would untenant every hope lodg'd in me,
And yield my ſelfe up Loves, or your owne Martyr.
Erot. So you ſhall pleaſe us.
Phil. O you cannot be
So heavenly; and ſo abſolute in all things,
And yet retaine ſuch cruell tyranny.
Erot. I can, I doe, I will.
Gonz. She is in her
Moods, and her Tences: Ile Gramer with you,
And make a triall how I can decline you:
By your leave (great Lady.)
Erot. What are you?
Gonz. A man, a good man, that's a wealthy;
A Proper man, and a proud man too; one
That underſtands himſelfe, and knowes, unleſſe
It be your ſelf, no woman on the Univerſe deſerves him.
Nay, Lady, I muſt tell you too withall.
I may make doubt of that, unleſſe you paint
With better judgement next day then on this;
For (plaine I muſt be with you) 'tis a dull Fucus.
Erot. Knowes any one here what this fellow is?
Attend. He is of Venice (Madam) a great Magnifico,
And gracious with the Senate. (here?
Erot. Let him keep then among them; what makes he
Heres ſtate enough where I am: here's a doe——
You, tell him, if he have ought with us, let him
Look lower, and give it in Petition.
Mo. Mighty Magnifico, my Miſtris bid me tell you,
If you have ought with her, you muſt look lower,
And yeeld it in Petition.
Gonz. Here is for thee a Ducket.
Mon. You ſay well ſir, take your owne courſe.
Gonz. I will not grace you
(Lady) ſo much as take you by the hand;
But when I ſhall vouchſafe to touch your lip,
It ſhall be through your Court a holy-day
Proclamed for ſo high favour.
Erot. This is ſome
Great mans Jeſter: Sirrah, begone, here is
No place to foole in.
Gonz. Where are the fooles you talke of?
I doe keep two.
Erot. No queſtion of it: for
In your ſelfe you doe maintaine an hundred.
Gonz. And beſides them I keep a noble traine,
Statiſts, and men of action: my purſe is large and deep,
Beyond the reach of riot to draw drie:
Fortune did vie with Nature, to beſtow
(When I was borne) her bountie equally:
'Tis not amiſſe you turne your eyes from me;
For ſhould you ſtand and gaze me in the face,
You periſh would, like Semele by Iolus:
In Venice at this inſtant there do lye
No leſſe then threeſcore Ladies in their graves,
And in their Beds five hundred for my love.
Mo. You lie more then they; yet it becomes him bravely;
Would I could walke and talke ſo? Ile endeavour it.
Erot. Sir, doe you know me?
Gon. Yes, you were ſiſter to the late Prince of Candy,
Aunt to this young one: And I in Venice,
I am borne a Lord; equall to you in fortunes,
In ſhape; Ile ſay no more, but view.
Mon. There needs no more be ſaid, were I a woman——
O he does rarely: in ſhape; Ile ſay no more,
But view: Who could ſay more, who better?
Man is no man, nor woman woman is,
Unleſſe they have a pride like one of theſe.
How poore the Prince of Cyprus ſhewes to him?
How poore another Lady unto her:
Carriage and State makes us ſeem demi-gods,
Humility, like beaſts, wormes of the earth.

Enter Antinous and Decius.

Ant. Royall Lady, I kiſſe your hand.
Erot. Sir, I know you not.
Anno. O my noble Brother, welcome from the wars.
Ant. Deare ſiſter.
Ann. Where is my father, that you come without him?
We have news of your ſucceſſe: he has his health I hope?
Ant. Yes ſiſter, he has his health, but is not well.
Ann. How not well? what Riddles do you utter?
Ant. Ile tell you more in private.
Gonz. Noble ſir,
I cannot be unmindfull of your merit,
Since I laſt heard it: you are a hopefull youth,
And (indeed) the ſoule of Candy.
I muſt ſpeak my thoughts.
Ann. The Prince of Cyprus Brother, Good Decius.
Ant. I am his ſervant.
Phil. You are the Patron of your Countrie, ſir,
So your unimitable deeds proclame you,
It is no language of my owne, but all mens.
Gonz. Your Enemies muſt needs acknowledge it:
Then doe not thinke it flatterie in your friends,
For if they had a heart, they could not want a tongue.
Erot. Is this your brother Annophill?
Anno. Yes Madam.
Erot. Your name's Antinous?
Ant. I am (Lady) that moſt unfortunate man.
Erot. How unfortunate? are you not the ſouldier,
The Captaine of thoſe Captaines, that did bring
Conqueſt and victory home along with you?
Ant. I had ſome ſhare in't; but was the leaſt
Of the leaſt worthy.
Gonz. O ſir, in your modeſty youl'd make
A double Conqueſt: I was an eare-witneſſe
When this young man ſpoke leſſer then he acted,
And had the ſouldiers voice to helpe him out:
But that the Law compell'd him for his honour,
To inforce him make a claime for his reward,
I well perceive he would have ſtood the man
That he does now, buried his worth in ſilence.
Erot. Sir, I hearken not to him, but looke on you,
And finde more in you then he can relate?
You ſhall attend on me.
Ant. Madam, your pardon.
Ero. Deny it not ſir, for it is more honour
Then you have gotten ith' field: for know you ſhall,
Upon Erota's asking, ſerve Erota.
Ant. I may want anſwers, Lady,
But never want a will to doe you ſervice.
I came here to my ſiſter, to take leave,
Having enjoyn'd my ſelfe to baniſhment,
For ſome cauſe that hereafter you may heare,
And wiſh with me I had not the occaſion.
Anno. There ſhall be no occaſion to divide us:
Deare Madam for my ſake uſe your power,
Even for the ſervice that he ought to owe,
Muſt, and does owe to you, his friends, and countrey.
Erot. Upon your Loyalty to the ſtate and me,
I doe command you Sir, not depart Candy:
Am I not your Princeſſe?
Ant. You are a great Lady.

Ero.

Ero. Then shew your selfe a Servant and a Subject.
Ant. I am your vassaile.
Mon. You are a Coward: that dare not fight,
Scorne to be vassaile to any Prince in Europe.
Great is my heart with pride, which Ile encrease
When they are gone, with practise on my Vassailes.
Atten. The noble Castilane is come to see you Madam,
Dec. There's comfort in those words, Antinous:
For here's the place, and persons that have power,
To reconcile you to his love againe.
Ant. That were a fortunate meeting.
Enter Castilane and Arcanes.
Cas. Greatnesse still wait you Lady.
Ero. Good Castilane, we doe maintain our greatnesse,
Through your valour.
Cas. My prayers pull dayly blessings on thy head,
My un-offending childe, my Annophill,
Good Prince, worthy Gonzalo! ha? art thou here
Before me? in every action art thou ambitious?
My duty (Lady) first offered here,
And love to thee (my childe) though he out-strip me;
Thus in the wars he got the start on me,
By being forward, but performing lesse;
All the endeavours of my life are lost,
And throwne upon that evill of mine owne
Cursed begetting, whom I shame to father.
O that the heat thou robd'st me off, had burnt
Within my Entrailes, and begot a feaver,
Or some worse sicknesse, for thou art a disease
Sharper then any physick gives a name to.
Ann. Why doe you say so?
Cas. O Annophill; there is good cause my girle:
He has plaid the thiefe with me, and filch'd away
The richest jewell of my life, my honour,
Wearing it publikely with that applause,
As if he justly did inherit it.
Ant. Would I had in my Infancy been laid
Within my grave, covered with you blessings,
Then growne up to a man, to meet your curses.
Cas. O that thou hadst.
Then I had been the father of a childe,
Dearer then thou wert even unto me,
When hope perswaded me I had begot
Another selfe in thee: Out of mine eyes,
As farre as I have throwne thee from my heart,
That I may live and dye forgetting thee.
Ero. How has he deserv'd this untam'd anger,
That when he might have ask't for his reward
Some honour for himselfe, or masse of pelfe,
He onely did request to have erected
Your Statue in the Capitoll, with Titles
Ingrav'd upon't, The Patron of his Countrey?
Cas. That, that's the poison in the gilded cup,
The Serpent in the flowers, that stings my honour,
And leaves me dead in fame: Gods doe a justice,
And rip his bosome up, that men may see,
Seeing, believe the subtle practises
Written within his heart: But I am heated,
And doe forget this presence, and my selfe.
Your pardon, Lady.
Ero. You should not aske, lesse you knew how to give.
For my sake Castilane, cast out of your thoughts
All ill conceptions of your worthy son,
That (questionlesse) has ignorantly offended,
Declared in his penitence.
Cas. Bid me dye (Lady) for your sake Ile doe it;
But that you'll say is nothing, for a man
That has out-liv'd his honour: But command me
In any thing save that, and Castilane
Shall ever be your servant. Come Annophill,
(My joy in this world) thou shalt live with me,
Retired in some solitarie nook,)
The comfort of my age; my dayes are short,
And ought to be well spent: and I desire
No other witnesse of them but thy selfe,
And good Arcanes.
Anno. I shall obey you sir.
Gonz. Noble sir:
If you taste any want of worldly meanes,
Let not that discontent you: know me your friend,
That hath, and can supply you.
Cas. Sir, I am too much bound to you already,
And 'tis not of my cares the least, to give you
Faire satisfaction.
Gonz. You may imagine I doe speak to that end,
But trust me, 'tis to make you bolder with me.
Cas. Sir, I thanke you, and may make triall of you,
Meane time my service.
Ann. Brother be comforted; so long as I continue
Within my fathers love, you cannot long
Stand out an Exile: I must goe live with him,
And I will prove so good an Orator
In your behalfe, that you againe shall gaine him,
Or I will stirre in him another anger,
And be lost with you.
Ant. Better I were neglected: for he is hasty,
And through the Choller that abounds in him,
(Which for the time divides from him his judgement)
He may cast you off, and with you his life;
For griefe will strait surprize him, and that way
Must be his death: the sword has try'd too often,
And all the deadly Instruments of warre
Have aim'd at his great heart, but ne're could touch it:
Yet not a limbe about him wants a scarre.
Cas. Madam my duty———
Ero. Will you be gone?
Cas. I must (Lady) but I shall be ready,
When you are pleas'd command me, for your service.
Excellent Prince———To all my heartie love,
And a good farewell.
Mon. Thanks honest Castilane.
Cas. Come Annophill.
Gonz. Shall I not wait upon you sir?
Cas. From hence you shall not stirre a foot:
Loving Gonzalo, it must be all my study
To requite you.
Gonz. I may be so fortunate to deserve
The name of friend from you, I have enough.
Cas. You are so, and you have made your selfe so.
Gonz. I will then preserve it.
Ero. Antinous you are my servant, are you not?
Ant. It hath pleased you so to grace me.
Ero. Why are you then dejected? you will say,
You have lost a father; but you have found a Mistris
Doubles that losse: be master of your spirit;
You have a cause for it: which is my favour,
Gonz. And mine.
Ero. Will no man ease me of this foole?
Gonz. Your fellow.
Ero. Antinous wait upon us.
Ant. I shall Madam.
Gonz. Nay but Ladie, Ladie.

Erot. Sir, you are rude: and if you be the Master
Of such meanes as you doe talk of, you should
Learne good manners.
Gonz. O Lady, you can finde a fault in me,
But not perceive it in your selfe, you must, shall heare me:
I love you for your pride, 'tis the best vertue
In you.
Erot. I could hang this fellow now; by whom
Are you supported, that you dare doe this?
Have you not example here in a Prince
Tranicending you in all things, yet beates himselfe
As doth become a man had seen my beautie?
Back to your Countrey, and your Curtizans,
Where you may be admired for your wealth,
Which being consum'd, may be a meanes to gaine you
The opinion of some wit. Here's nothing
To be got but scorne, and losse of time.
Gonz. Which are things I delight in.
Erot. Antinous follow me. Exit.
Gonz. She is vext to the soule.
Mon. Let her be vext, 'tis fit she should be so:
Give me thy hand Gonzalo, thou art in our favour,
For we doe love to cherish lofty spirits,
Such as percussecre the earrh, and bound
With an erected countenance to the clouds.
Gonz. 'S-foot, what thing is this?
Mon. I doe love fire-works, because they mount:
An Exhalation I professe to adore,
Beyond a fixed starre, 'tis more illustrious,
As every thing rais'd out of smoak is so:
Their vertue is in action: what doe you think of me?
Gonz. Troth sir,
You are beyond my ghesse, I know you not.
Mo. Doe you know your selfe?
Gonz. Yes sir.
Mon. Why you and I are one: I am proud, and
Very proud too, that I must tell you; I saw
It did become you, cousin Gonzalo, prethee
Let it be so.
Gonz. Let it be so good cousin.
Mon. I am no great ones foole.
Gonz. I hope so, for alliance sake. (nimous
Mo. Yet I do serve the Mighty, Monstrous, and Magna-Invincible Erota. (your Coat.
Gonz. O good cousin, now I have you: Ile meet you in
Mo. Coat? I have my horse-mans coat I must confesse
Lin'd through with Velvet, and a Scarlet out-side;
If you'll meet me in't, Ile send fort;
And cousin you shall see me with much comfort,
For it is both a new one, and a right one,
It did not come collaterall.
Gon. Adieu good cousin; at this present I have some bu-
Mo. Farewell (excellent cousin.) (sinesse.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter Gonzalo and Fernando.

Gonz. CAndy, I say, is lost already.
Fer. Yes,
If to be conqueror be to be lost. (them,
Gonz. You have it; one dayes conquest hath undone
And sold them to their vassalage; for what
Have I else toyl'd my braines, profusely emptied
My moneyes, but to make them slaves to Venice,
That so in case the sword did lose his edge,
Then Art might sharpen hers?
Fer. Gonzalo how?
Gonz. Fernando thus: you see how through this Land,
Both of the best and basest I am honour'd;
I onely gave the State of Venice notice,
When, where, and how to land, or you had found
A better entertainment: I was he
Encourag'd young Antinous to affront
The devill his father: for the devill I think
Dares not doe more in battaile.
Fer. But why did ye?
I finde no such great policie in that.
Gonz. Indeed Fernando, thou canst fight, not plot:
Had they continu'd one, they two alone
Were of sufficient courage and performance
To beat an Armie.
Fern. Now by all my hopes,
I rather shall admire, then envy vertue.
Gonz. Why then by all your hopes you'll rather have
Your Braines knockt out, then learne how to be wise,
You States-man? Well sir, I did more then this,
When Cassilane crav'd from the common treasure
Pay for his Souldiers, I strook home, and lent him
An hundred thousand Duckets,
Fer. Marry sir,
The policy was little, the love lesse,
And honesty least of all.
Gonz. How say ye by that?
Go fight, I say goe fight, Ile talke no more with you,
You are insensible.
Fer. Well, I shall observe ye,
Gonz. Why look you sir, by this meanes have I got
The greatest part of Cassilanes estate
Into my hands, which he can ne're redeem,
But must of force sinke: do you conceive me now?
Fer. So:
But why have you importuned the Senate,
For me to sojourne with them?
Gonz. There's the quintessence,
The soule, and grand elixer of my wit:
For he (according to his noble nature)
Will not be knowne to want, though he do want,
And will be bankrupted so much the sooner,
And made the subject of our scorne and laughter.
Fern. Here's a perfect plotted stratagem.
Gonz. Why? could you
Imagine, that I did not hate in heart
My Countreyes enemies? yes, yes, Fernando,
And I will be the man that shall undoe them.
Fer. Ye are in a ready way.
Gonz. I was never out on't.
Enter Gaspero.
Gonz. Peace,
Here comes a wise Coxcombe, a tame Coward.
Now worthy Gaspero, what,
You come (I know) to be my Lord Fernando's
Conducter to old Cassilane?
Gas. To wait upon him.
Gonz. And my Lords the Senators sent you?
Gasp. My noble Lord they did.
Gonz. My Lord Fernando,
This gentleman (as humble as you see him)
Is even this Kingdomes treasure; In a word,

'Tis his chiefe glory that he is not wiſer
Then honeſt, nor more honeſt then approv'd
In truth and faith.
Gaſp. My Lord.
Gonz. You may be bold
To truſt him with your boſome, he'll not deceive,
If you relie upon him once.
Ferd. Your name is Gaſpero?
Gaſp. Your ſervant.
Gonz. Goe commend me
(Right honeſt Gaſpero) commend me heartily
To noble Caſſilane, tell him my love
Is vow'd to him.
Gaſ. I ſhall.
Gonz. I know you will.
My Lord I cannot long be abſent from you.
Fer. Sir, you are now my guide. Exit.
Gonz. Thus my deſignes
Run uncontroul'd; yet Venice though I be Intelligencer to thee, in my braine
Are other large Projects: for if proud Erota
Bend to my lure, I will be Candy's King,
And Duke of Venice too. Ha? Venice too?
O'twas prettily ſhov'd in: why not? Erota
May in her love ſeale all ſure: if ſhe ſwallow
The bait, I am Lord of both; if not, yet Candy
Deſpight of all her power ſhall be ruin'd.

Enter Caſſilane, Arcanes, and Annophill.

Caſ. Urge me no farther Annophill.
Anno. My Lord.
Caſ. Thy fathers poverty has made thee happie;
For though 'tis true, this ſolitary life
Sutes not with youth and beautie, O my childe,
Yet 'tis the ſweeteſt Guardian to protect
Chaſte names from Court-aſperſions; there a Lady,
Tender and delicate in yeares and graces,
That doats upon the charmes of eaſe and pleaſure,
Is ſhip-wrackt on the ſhore; for 'tis much ſafer
To truſt the Ocean in a leaking ſhip,
Then follow greatneſſe in the wanton rites
Of luxurie and ſloth.
Ann. My wiſhes ſir,
Have never ſoar'd a higher flight, then truely
To finde occaſion wherein I might witneſſe
My duty and obedience.
Caſ. 'Tis well ſaid,
Canſt thou forbeare to laugh Arcanes?
Arc. Why ſir?
Caſ. To look upon my beggerie, to look upon
My patience in my beggerie: Tell me,
Does it ſhew handſome? bravely?
Handſome? thou wilt flatter me,
And ſweare that I am miſerable.
Arc. Nothing
More glorifies the noble, and the valiant,
Then to deſpiſe contempt: if you continue
But to enjoy your ſelfe, you in your ſelfe
Enjoy all ſtore beſides.
Caſ. An excellent change:
I that ſome ſeven Apprentice-ſhips commanded
A hundred Miniſters, that waited on
My nod, and ſometimes twenty thouſand ſouldiers,
Am now retir'd, attended in my age
By one poore maid, followed by one old man.
Arc. Sir, you are lower in your owne repute
Then you have reaſon for.
Caſ. The Romane Captaines,
I meane the beſt, ſuch as with their bloods
Purchas'd their Countreyes peace, the Empires glorie,
Were glad at laſt to get them to ſome Farmes,
Off-from the clamours of the ingratefull great ones,
And the unſteddy multitude, to live
As I doe now, and 'twas their bleſſing too,
Let it be ours Arcanes.
Arc. I cannot but
Applaud your ſcorne of injuries.
Caſ. Of injuries?
Arcanes, Annophill, lend both your hands.
So, what ſay yee now?
Arc. Why now my Lord ——
Caſ. I ſweare
By all my paſt proſperities; thus ſtanding
Between you two, I thinke my ſelfe as great,
As mighty, as if in the Capitoll
I ſtood amidſt the Senators, with all
The Cretans ſubjects proſtrate at my feet.
Ann. Sir, you are here more ſafe.
Caſ. And more beloved:
Why look yee ſirs, I can forget the weakneſſe
Of the traduced ſouldiers, the neglect
Of the faire-ſpoken Senate, the impietie
Of him, the villaine, whom (to my diſhonour)
The World miſcalls my ſon.
But by the ——
Arc. Sir, remember that you promis'd no occaſion
Should move your patience.
Caſ. Thou do'ſt chide me friendly,
He ſhall not have the honour to be thought upon
Amongſt us. Enter a Servant.
Now? the newes?
Ser. The Secretarie,
With the Venetian priſoner, deſire
Admittance to your Lordſhip.
Caſ. How? to me?
What myſterie is this? Arcanes can they
Thinke thou, meane any good?
Arc. My Lord, they dare not Intend ought elſe but good.
Caſ. Tis true, they dare not;
Arcanes welcome them: Come hither Annophill,
Stand cloſe to me, wee'l change our affability
Into a forme of State: and they ſhall know
Our heart is ſtill our owne.
Enter Arcanes, Fernando, and Gaſpero.
Arc. My Lord ——
Caſ. Arcanes,
I know them both: Fernando, as you are
A man of greatneſſe, I ſhould under-value
The right my ſword hath fought for, to obſerve
Low-fawning complements, but as you are
A Captive and a ſtranger, I can love you,
And muſt be kinde. You are welcome.
Fern. 'Tis the all
Of my ambition.
Gaſ. And for proof how much
He truely honours your heroick vertues,
The Senate on his importunity,
Commend him to your Lordſhips guard.
Caſ. For what?
Gaſ. During the time of his abode in Candy.

o be your houſhold gueſt.
Fer. Wherein my Lord,
You ſhall more make me debtor to your nobleneſſe,
Then if you had return'd me without ranſome.
Caſſ. Are you in earneſt Sir?
Fern. My ſute to the Senate
Shall beſt reſolve you that.
Caſſ. Come hither Secretarie,
Look that this be no trick now put upon me:
For if it be——Sirrah——
Gaſ. As I have troth
(My Lord) it onely is a favour granted
Upon Fernando's motion, from himſelfe:
Your Lordſhip muſt conceive, I'de not partake
Ought, but what ſhould concerne your honour; who
Has been the prop, our Countries ſhield, and ſafety,
But the renowned Caſſilane?
Caſſ. Applauſe?
Is Gaſpero——puffe——nothing——why, young Lord,
Would you ſo much be ſequeſter'd from thoſe
That are the blazing Comets of the time,
To live a ſolitarie life with me?
A man forſaken? all my hoſpitality
Is now contracted to a few; theſe two,
This tempeſt-wearied ſouldier, and this Virgin;
We cannot feaſt your eyes with Maſques and Revells,
Or Courtly Anticks: the ſad ſports we riot in,
Are Tales of foughten fields, of Martiall ſcarres,
And things done long agoe, when men of courage
Were held the beſt, not thoſe well-ſpoken youths,
Who onely carry conqueſt in their tongues;
Now ſtories of this nature are unſeaſonable
To entertaine a great Dukes ſon with.
Fer. Herein
Shall my Captivity be made my happineſſe,
Since what I loſe in freedome, I regaine
(With int'reſt) by converſing with a Souldier
So matchleſſe for experience, as great Caſſilane.
Pray ſir admit me.
Caſ. If you come to mock me,
I ſhall be angrie.
Fer. By the love I beare
To goodneſſe, my intents are honourable.
Caſ. Then in a word, my Lord, your viſitations
Shall find all due reſpect: But I am now
Growne old, and have forgot to be an hoſt;
Come when you pleaſe you are welcome.
Fer. Sir, I thank you.
Ann. Good ſir be not too urgent; for my father
Will ſoon be mov'd: yet in a noble way
Of courteſie he is as eaſily conquer'd.
Fer. Lady, your words are like your beauty, powerfull;
I ſhall not ſtrive more how to doe him ſervice,
Then how to be your ſervant.
Caſ. Shee's my daughter,
And does command this houſe.
Fer. I ſo conceive her.
Caſ. Doe you heare?
Gaſ. My honour'd Lord.
Caſ. Commend me to them.
Tell 'em I thank them.
Gaſ. Whom my Lord?
Caſ. The Senate:
Why how come you ſo dull? O they are gratious,
And infinitely gratefull——Thou art eloquent,
Speak modeſtly in mentioning my ſervices:
And if ought fall out in the By, that muſt
Of meere neceſſity touch any act
Of my deſerving praiſes, bluſh when you talke on't,
'Twill make them bluſh to heare on't.
Gaſ. Why my Lord——
Caſ. Nay, nay, you are too wiſe now; good, obſerve me,
I doe not raile againſt the hopefull Springall,
That builds up monuments in Braſſe; reares Trophies
With Mottoes and Inſcriptions, quaint devices
Of Poetrie and fiction; let's be quiet.
Arc. You muſt not croſſe him.
Gaſ. Not for Candys wealth.
Fer. You ſhall for ever make me yours.
Ann. 'Twere pitty to double your captivity.
Arc. Who's here, Decius? Enter Decius.
Caſ. Ha! Decius? who nam'd Decius?
Dec. My duty to your Lordſhip: I am bold,
Preſuming on your noble and knowne goodneſſe
To——
Caſ. What?
Dec. Preſent you with this——
Caſ. Letter?
Dec. Yes my honour'd Lord.
Caſ. From whom?
Dec. Pleaſe you peruſe
The in-ſide, you ſhall finde a name ſubſcrib'd,
In ſuch humility, in ſuch obedience,
That you your ſelfe will judge it tyranny
Not to receive it favourably.
Caſ. Hey-day.
Good words my Maſters; this is Court-infection,
And none but Cowards ply them: Tell me, Decius,
Without more circumſtance, who is the ſender?
Dec. Your much griev'd ſonne Antinous.
Caſ. On my life
A challenge; ſpeak, as thou art worthy ſpeak:
Ile anſwer't.
Dec. Honour'd Sir,
Caſ. No honour'd Sirs——
Foole your yong Idoll with ſuch pompous Attributes.
Say briefely, what containes it?
Dec. 'Tis a lowly
Petition for your favour.
Caſ. Raſh young man,
But that thou art under my owne roofe, and know'ſt
I dare not any way infringe the Lawes
Of hoſpitality, thou ſhould'ſt repent
Thy bold and rude intruſion. But preſume not
Againe to ſhew thy Letter, for thy life;
Decius, not for thy life.
Arc. Nay then (my Lord)
I can with-hold no longer: you are too rough,
And wreſtle againſt nature, with a violence
More then becomes a father: wherein would you
Come nearer to the likeneſſe of God,
Then in your being entreated? Let not thirſt
Of honour, make you quite forget you are
A man, and what makes perfect man-hoods, comforts
A father.
Ann. If a memory remaine
Of my departed mother; if the purity
Of her unblemiſh'd faith deſerve to live
In your remembrance, let me yet by theſe
Awake your love to my uncomforted Brother.
Fer. I am a ſtranger: but ſo much I tender
Your ſons deſertfull vertues, that I vow

His Sword nere conquer'd me so absolutely,
As shall your curteſie, if you vouchsafe
At my instances, to new receive him,
Into your wonted favour.
Gaſ. Sir, you cannot
Require more low submiſſion.
Anno. Am I not
Growne vile yet in your eyes? then by the name
Of father, let me once more sue for him,
Who is the only now remaining branch
With me, of that moſt ancient roote, whoſe body
You are, deare sir.
Caſ. 'Tis well: an hoſt of furies
Could not have baited me, more torturingly,
More rudely, or more moſt unnaturally?
Decius, I say, let me no more heare from him;
For this time goe thou hence, and know from me
Thou art beholding to me that I have not
Killed thee already, looke to't next, looke to't.
Arcanes fie, fie Annophil, Exit.
Arc. He's gone.
Chaf'd beyond sufferance: we muſt follow him.
Dec. Lady, this letter is to you.
Anno. Come with me,
For we muſt speake in private: pleaſe you sir,
To see what entertainement our sad houſe
Can yeild? Ex.
Fer. I shall attend you Lady.
Gaſ. How do ye like
To sojourne here, my Lord?
Fer. More then to feaſt
With all the Princes of the earth beſides:
Gonzalo told me that thou wert honeſt.
Gaſ. Yes sir,
And you shall find it.
Fer. Shall I?
Gaſ. All my follies
Be else recorded to my shame.
Fer. Enough,
My heart is here for ever lodg'd.
Gaſ. The Lady,
Fer. The place admits no time to utter all,
But Gaſpero if thou wilt prove my friend,
He say thou art——
Gaſ. Your servant: I conceive ye,
Wee'll chooſe some fitter leiſure.
Fer. Never man
Was (in a moment) or more bleſt'd, or wretched. Exeunt.

Enter Hyparcha, (placing two chaires) Antinous, and Erota.

Er. Leave us.
Hy. I shall. Ex.
Er. Antinous sit downe.
Ant. Madam:
Er. I say sit downe: I do command you sit;
For, looke what honour thou didſt gaine by me,
I cannot loſe by it: happy Antinous,
The graces, and the higher Deities
Smil'd at thy birth, and ſtill continue it:
Then thinke that I (who ſcorne leſſer examples)
Muſt doe the like: ſuch as do taſte my power,
And talke of it, with feare and reverence,
Shall do the ſame unto the man I favour.
I tel thee youth, thou haſt a conqueſt won,
Since thou cam'ſt home, greater then that laſt,
Which dignified thy fame; greater then if
Thou ſhouldſt goe out againe, and conquer farther;
For I am not aſham'd to acknowledge
My ſelfe ſubdued by thee.
Ant. Great Lady——
Er. Sit ſtill, I will not heare thee elſe: now ſpeake,
And ſpeake like my Antinous, like my Souldier,
Whom Cupid, and not Mars, hath ſent to Battle.
Ant. I muſt (I ſee) be ſilent.
Er. So thou maiſt:
There's greater Action in it than in clamour,
A looke, (if it be gratious) will begin the War,
A word conclude it: then prove no Coward,
Since thou haſt ſuch a friendly enemie,
That teaches thee to conquer.
Ant. You do amaze me Madam,
I have no skill, no practice in this War,
And whether you be ſerious, or pleaſe
To make your ſport on a dejected man,
I cannot rightly gheſſe: but be it as it will,
It is a like unhappineſſe to me:
My diſcontents beare thoſe conditions in them, Muſick.
And lay me out ſo wretched, no deſignes
(How ever truly promiſing a good)
Can make me reliſh ought, but a ſweet-bitter,
Voluntarie Exile. Muſick againe
Er. Why an Exile?
What comfort can there be in thoſe companions Enter
Which ſad thoughts bring along with? Hyparcha.
Hyp. Madam.
Er. Whence comes this well-tun'd ſound?
Hyp. I know not Madam.
Er. Liſten wench:
What ever friendly hands they are that ſend it Song.
Let 'em play on; they are Maſters of their facultie.
Doth it pleaſe you ſir?
Ant. According to the time.
Er. Go to 'em wench,
And tell 'em, we ſhall thanke 'em; for they have kept
As good time to our diſpoſition, as to their inſtruments;
Unleſſe Antinous ſhall ſay he loves, Enter
There never can be ſweeter accents uttered. Philander.
Phi. Let then the heart, that did imploy thoſe hands,
Receive ſome ſmall ſhare of your thankes with them,
'Tis happineſſe enough that you did like it;
A fortune unto me, that I ſhould ſend it
In ſuch a lucky minute; but to obtaine
So gratious welcome, did exceed my hopes.
Ero. Good Prince, I thanke you for it.
Phi. O Madam, poure not (to ſalt) joyes on me,
But ſprinkle 'em ſo gently, I may ſtand 'em:
It is enough at firſt, you have laid aſide
Thoſe cruell angry lookes out of your eyes,
With which (as with your lovely) you did ſtrike
All your beholders in an Extaſie.
Ero. Philander, you have long profeſs'd to love me,
Phi. Have I but profeſt it Madam?
Er. Nay, but heare me?
Phi. More attentively, then to an Oracle.
Er. And I will ſpeake more truly, if more can be:
Nor ſhall my language be wrapt up in Riddles,
But plaine as truth it ſelfe: I love this Gentleman,
Whoſe griefes has made him ſo uncapable
Of Love, he will not heare, at leaſt not underſtand it.
I that have looke with ſcorneſull eyes on thee,
And other Princes mighty in their ſtates,

And

And in their friends as fortunate, have now prai'd,
In a petitionary kind almoſt,
This man, this wel-deſerving man, (that I muſt ſay)
To looke upon this beauty, yet you ſee
He caſts his eyes rather upon the ground,
Then he will turne 'em this way: Philander
You looke pale; I'le talke no more.
Phi. Pray go forward: I would be your Martyr,
To dye thus, were immortally to live.
Ero. Will you goe to him then, and ſpeake for me?
You have loved longer, but not ferventer,
Know how to ſpeake, for you have done it like
An Orator, even for your ſelfe: then how will you for me
Whom you profeſſe to love above your ſelfe.
Phi. The curſes of diſſemblers follow me
Unto my grave, and if I do not ſo.
Er. You may (as all men do) ſpeake boldlier, better
In their friends cauſe ſtill, then in your owne;
But ſpeake your utmoſt, yet you cannot feigne,
I will ſtand by, and bluſh to witneſſe it.
Tell him ſince I beheld him, I have loſt
The happineſſe of this life, food, and reſt;
A quiet boſome, and the ſtate I went with.
Tell him how he has humbled the proud,
And made the living, but a dead Erota.
Tell him withall, that ſhe is better pleas'd
With thinking on him, then enjoying theſe.
Tell him——Philander, Prince; I talke in vaine
To you, you do not marke me.
Phi. Indeed, I do.
Er. But thou doſt looke ſo pale,
As thou wilt ſpoyle the ſtory in relating.
Phi. Not, if I can but live to tell it.
Er. It may be you have not the heart.
Phi. I have a will I am ſure, how e're my heart
May play the coward, but if you pleaſe, I'le trie.
Er. If a kiſſe will ſtrengthen thee, I give you leave
To challenge it, nay, I will give it you.
Phi. O that a man ſhould taſte ſuch heavenly bliſſe!
And be enjoyn'd to beg it for another.
Er. Alas, it is a miſerie I grieve
To put you to, and I will ſuffer rather
In his tyranny, than thou in mine.
Phi. Nay Madam, ſince I cannot have your love,
I will endeavour to deſerve your pitty:
For I had rather have within the grave
Your love, then you ſhould want it upon earth.
But how can I hope, with a feeble tongue
To inſtruct him in the radiments of love,
When your moſt powerfull beauty cannot worke it?
Er. Do what thou wilt (Philander) the requeſt
Is ſo unreaſonable, that I quit thee of it.
I deſire now no more, but the true patience,
And fortitude of Lovers, with thoſe helpes
Of ſighes and teares, which I think is all the Phiſick——
Phi. O if he did but heare you, 'twere enough;
And I will wake him from his Appoplexie.
Antinous.
Ant. My Lord?
Phi. Nay pray,
No curteſie to me, you are my Lord,
(Indeed you are) for you command her heart,
That commands mine: nor can you want to know it.
For looke you, ſhe that told it you in words,
Explaines it now more paſſionately in teares;
Either thou haſt no heart, or a marble one,
If theſe drops cannot melt it; prethee looke up,
And ſee how ſorrow ſits within her eyes,
And love the griefe ſhe goes with (if not her)
Of which thou art the parent: and never yet
Was there (by nature) that thing made ſo ſtony,
But it would love what ever it begot.
Ant. He that begot me, did beget theſe cares
Which are good iſſues, though happily by him
Eſteemed monſters: nay, the ill-judging world
Is likely enough to give them thoſe Characters.
Phi. What's this to love, and to the Lady? he's old,
Wrathfull, perverſe, ſelfe-will'd, and full of anger,
Which are his faults; but let them not be thine;
He thruſts you from his love, ſhe puls thee on,
He doubts your vertues, ſhe doth double them:
O either uſe thy owne eyes, or take mine,
And with them, my heart, then thou wilt love her,
Nay, doate upon her, more then on thy duty,
And men will praiſe thee equally for it;
Neglecting her, condemne thee, as a man
Unworthy ſuch a fortune: O Antinous,
'Tis not the friendſhip that I beare to thee,
But her command, that makes me utter this:
And when I have prevail'd, let her but ſay,
Philander, you muſt dye or this is nothing,
It ſhall be done together with a breath,
With the ſame willingneſſe, I live to ſerve her.
Er. No more Philander.
Phi. All I have done, is little yet to purpoſe,
But ere I leave him, I will perceive him bluſh;
And make him feele the paſſions that I do,
And every true lover will aſſiſt me in't,
And lend me their ſad ſighs to blow it home,
For Cupid wants a dart to wound this boſome.
Er. No more, no more Philander, I can endure no more,
Pray let him goe; go good Antinous, make peace
With your owne mind, no matter though I periſh. Ex.

Actus Quartus. Scæna prima.

Enter Hypercha, and Mochingo.

Hyp. I Cannot help it.
Mo. Nor do I require it,
The malady needs no Phiſitian,
Helpe hoſpitall people.
Hyp. I am glad to heare
You are ſo valliant.
Mo. Valiant?
Can any man be proud that is not valiant;
Fooliſh woman, what wouldſt thou ſay? thou——
I know not what to call thee.
Hyp. I can you,
For I can call you Coxcome, Aſſe, and Puppy.
Mo. You do do it, I thanke you.
Hyp. That you'l loſe a fortune,
Which a Cobler better deſerves, then thou doſt.
Mo. Do not provoke my magnanimity,
For when I am inſens'd, I am inſenſible;
Go tell thy Lady, that hath ſent me word
She will diſcard me, that I diſcard her,
And throw a ſcorne upon her, which I would not,
But that ſhe does me wrong.

Enter Erota, and Antinous.

Ant. Do you not glory in your conqueſt more,

To

To take some great man prisoner, then to kill him?
And shall a Lady find lesse mercie from you,
That yeilds her selfe your Captive, and for her Ransome,
Will give the jewell of her life, her heart,
Which she hath lockt from all men but thy selfe?
For shame (Antinous) throw this dulnesse off,
Art thou a man no where but in the field?

Hyp. He must here Drums, and Trumpets ere he sleepe,
And at this instant dreames he's in his Armour:
These Iron-hearted Souldiers are so cold,
Till they be beaten to a womans armes,
And then they love 'em better then their owne;
No Fort can hold them out.

Ant. What pitty is it (Madam) that your selfe,
Who are all excellence, should become so wretched,
To thinke on such a wretch as griefe hath made me?
Seldom despairing men looke up to heaven,
Although it still speake to 'em in its glories;
For when sad thoughts perplexe the mind of man,
There is a plumit in the heart, that waighs,
And puls us (living) to the dust we came from;
Did you but see the miseries you pursue,
(As I the happinesse that I avoid
That doubles my afflictions) you would flye
Unto some wilderneſſe, or to your grave,
And there find better comforts then in me,
For love, and cares can never dwell together.

Er. They should,
If thou hadst but my love, and I thy cares.

Ant. What wild beast in the Desart, but would be Taught by this Tongue to leave his crueltie,
Though all the beauties of the face were vail'd?
But I am savager than any beast,
And shall be so till Decius do arive,
Whom with so much submission I have sent
Under my hand, that if he do not bring
His Benediction backe, he must to me
Be much more crueller, then I to you.

Ero. Is't but your fathers pardon you desire?

An. With his love, & then nothing next that, like yours.

Er. Decius is come. Enter Decius.

Ant. O welcome friend; If I apprehend not
Too much of joy, there's comfort in thy lookes.

Er. There is indeed: I prethee Decius speake it.

De. How? prethee Decius? this woman's strangly alter'd.

An. Why dost not speake (good friend) and tell me how
The reverent blessing of my life, received
My humble lines; wept he for joy?

Dec. No, ther's a letter will informe you more:
Yet I can tell you, what I think will grieve you,
The old man is in want, and angry still,
And povertie is the bellowes to the Coale,
More then distaste from you as I imagine.

Ant. What's here? how's this? it cannot be now sure
My griefes delude my senses.

Er. In his lookes,
I read a world of changes: Decius marke
With what a sad amazement he surveies
The newes: canst thou ghesse what 'tis?

Dec. None good I feare.

Er. I feare so too: and then——

Ant. It is her hand.

Er. Are you not well?

Ant. Too well: if I were ought
But Rock, this Letter would conclude my miseries,
Peruse it (Lady) and resolve me then,
In what a case I stand.

Dec. Sir, the worst is,
Your fathers lowrnesse, and distaste.

Ant. No Decius,
My sister writes, Fernando has made suite
For love to her: and to expresse sincerely
His constant truth, hath like a noble Gentleman,
Discovered plots of treachery; contriv'd
By false Gonzalo, not intending more
The quiet ruine of our house, then generally
Candies confusion.

Dec. 'Tis a generous part
Of young Fernando.

Ant. 'Tis, and I could wish
All thrift to his affections Decius.
You find the summe on't Madam.

Er. Yes, I do.

Ant. And can you now yet think a heart oppresst
With such a throng of cares, can entertaine
An amorous thought? love frees all toyles but one,
Calamitie and it can ill agree.

Er. Will't please ye speake my doome?

Ant. Alas great Lady,
Why will you flatter thus a desperate man,
That is quite cast away? O had you not Procured the Senates warrant to enforce
My stay, I had not heard of these sad newes.
What would you have me do?

Er. Love me, or kill me,
One word shall sentence either: for as truth
Is just, if you refuse me, I am resolute
Not to out-live my threatdome.

Ant. Gentle Lady,

Er. Say, must I live, or dye?

Dec. My Lord, how can you
Be so inexorable: here's occasion
Of succouring your father in his wants,
Securely proffer'd: pray sir, entertaine it.

Er. What is my sentence?

Ant. What you please to have it?

Er. As thou art Gentle, speake those words againe.

Ant. Madam, you have prevail'd; yet give me leave
Without offence, ere I resigne the interest
Your heart hath in my heart, to prove your secresie.

Er. Antinous, 'tis the greatest Argument
Of thy affections to me.

Ant. Madam, thus then,
My father stands for certaine summes engag'd
To treacherous Gonzalo; and 'has more 'gag'd
The greatest part of his estate to him:
If you receive this morgage, and procure
Acquitance from Gonzalo to my father,
I am what you would have me be.

Er. You'l love me then?

Ant. Provided (Madam) that my father know not
I am an Agent for him.

Er. If I faile
In this, I am unworthy to be lov'd.

Ant. Then (with your favour) thus I seale my truth,
To day, and Decius witnesse how unchangingly
I shall still love Erota.

Er. Thou hast quickned
A dying heart Antinous.

Dec. This is well:
Much happinesse to both. Enter Hyparchus

Hyp. The Lord Gonzalo

Attends

Attends you Madam.
Er. Comes as we could wish,
Withdraw Antinous, here's a Closset, where
You may partake his errand; let him enter. Enter
Ant. Madam you must be wary. Ex. Gonzalo
Er. Feare it not,
I will be ready for him; to entertaine him
With smiling welcome: Noble sir, you take Advantage of the time; it had been fit
Some notice of your presence, might have fashion'd
A more prepared state.
Gonz. Do ye mocke me Madam?
Er. Trust me, you wrong your judgement, to repute
My gratitude a fault: I have examin'd
Your portly carriage, and will now confesse
It hath not slightly won me.
Gonz. The wind's turn'd;
I thought 'twould come to this: it pleas'd us Madam,
At our last interview, to mention love,
Have you consider'd on't?
Er. With more then common
Content: but sir, if what you spake, you meant,
(As I have cause to doubt) then——
Gonz. What, (sweet Lady?)
Er. Methinks me should lay by this forme of statelinesse.
Loves courtship is familiar, and for instance,
See what a change it hath begot in me,
I could talke humbly now, as Lovers use.
Gonz. And I: and I: we meet in one selfe-center,
Of blest content.
Er. I hope my weakenesse sir,
Shall not deserve neglect: but if it prove so,
I am not the first Lady has been ruin'd
By being too credulous: you will smart for't one day.
Gon. Angell-like-Lady, let me be held a villaine,
If I love not sincerely.
Fr. Would I knew it?
Gonz. Make proofe by any fit command.
Er. What, do ye meane to marry me?
Gonz. How? meane? nay more, I meane
To make you Empresse of my earthly fortunes,
Regent of my desires, for did ye covet
To be a reall Queene, I could advance you.
Er. Now I perceive you slight me, and would make me
More simple then my sexes frailety warrants.
Gon. But say your mind, and you shall be a Queene.
Er. On those conditions, call me yours.
Gon. Enough,
But are we safe?
Er. Assuredly.
Gon. In short,
Yet Lady first be plaine: would you not choose
Much rather to prefer your own Sun-rising,
Then any's else though ne're so neere entituled
By bloud, or right of birth?
Er. 'Tis a question
Needs not a resolution.
Gonz. Good: what if
I set the Crowne of Candy on your head?
Er. I were a Queene indeed then.
Gon. Madam, know
There's but a boy 'twixt you, and it: suppose him
Transhap'd into an Angell.
Er. Wise Gonzalo,
I cannot but admire thee.
Gonz. 'Tis worth thinking on:
Besides your husband shall be Duke of Venice.
Er. Gonzalo, Duke of Venice?
Gonz. Ye are mine ye say.
Er. Pish; you but dally with me; and would lull me
In a rich golden dreame.
Gonz. You are too much distrustfull of my truth.
Er. Then you must give me leave to apprehend
The meanes, and manner how.
Gonz. Why thus——
Er. You shall not,
We may be over-heard; Affaires and counsels
Of such high nature, are not to be trusted
Not to the Aire it selfe, you shall in writing,
Draw out the full designe; which if effected,
I am as I professe.
Gonz. O I applaud
Your ready care, and secretie.
Er. Gonzalo,
There is a bar yet, twixt our hopes and us,
And that must be remov'd.
Gonz. What is't?
Er. Old Cassilane.
Gonz. He? feare not him: I build upon his ruines
Already.
Er. I would find a smoother course
To shift him off.
Gonz. As how?
Er. Wee'l talke in private,
I have a ready plot.
Gonz. I shall adore you. Exeunt.

Enter Fernando, and Annophil.

Fer. Madam, although I hate unnoble practices,
And therefore have perform'd no more then what
I ought, for honours safety: yet Annophil,
Thy love hath been the spur, to urge me forward
For speedier diligence.
Anno. Sir your owne fame
And memory will best reward themselves.
Fer. All gaine is losse (sweet beauty) if I misse
My comforts here: The brother and the sister
Have double conquer'd me, but thou maist triumph.
Anno. Good sir, I have a father.
Fer. Yes, a brave one;
Could'st thou obscure thy Beauty, yet the happinesse
Of being but his daughter, were a dowre
Fit for a Prince: what say ye?
An. You have deserv'd
As much as I should grant.
Fer. By this faire hand
I take possession.
Anno. What in words I dare not,
Imagine in my silence.
Fer. Thou art all vertue.

Enter Cassilanes, and Arcanes,

Cas. I'le tell thee how: Baldwin the Emperour,
Pretending title, more through tyranny,
Then right of conquest, or descent, usurp'd
The stile of Lord o're all the Grecian Islands,
And under colour of an amity
With Crete, preferd the Marquesse Mountferato
To be our Governor; the Cretians vex'd
By the ambitious Turkes, in hope of aide
From the Emperour, received for Generall,
This Mountferato; he (the wars appeased)

Plots

Plots with the state of Venice, and takes money
Of them for Candy: they paid well, he steales
Away in secret; since which time, that right
The state of Venice claimes o're Candy, is
By purchase, not inheritance, or Conquest:
And hence growes all our quarrell.
Arc. So a usurer
Or Lumbard-Jew, might with some bags of trash,
Buy halfe the Westerne world.
Cas. Money Arcanes
Is now a God on earth: it cracks virginities,
And turnes a Christian, Turke;
Bribes justice, cut-throats honour, does what not?
Arc. Not captives Candy.
Cas. Nor makes thee dishonest,
Nor me a Coward——Now sir, here is homely,
But friendly entertainment.
Fer. Sir, I find it.
Arc. And like it, do ye not?
Fer. My repaire speakes for me.
Cas. Fernando we were speaking off—— how this?

Enter Gonzalo, and Gaspero, with a Casket.

Gon. Your friend, and servant.
Cas. Creditors, my Lord,
Are Masters and no Servants: as the world goes,
Debters are very slaves to those to whom
They have been beholding to; in which respect,
I should feare you Gonzalo.
Gon. Me my Lord?
You owe me nothing.
Cas. What, nor love, nor money?
Gon. Yes, love, I hope not money.
Cas. All this braverie,
Will scarcely make that good.
Gonz. 'Tis done already:
See sir, your Morgage which I only tooke,
In case you and your son had in the wars
Miscarried: I yeild it up againe: 'tis yours.
Cas. Are ye so conscionable?
Gon. 'Tis your owne.
Cas. Pish, pish, I'le not receive what is not mine,
That were a dangerous businesse.
Gon. Sir, I am paid for't,
The summes you borrowed, are return'd; The bonds
Cancell'd, and your acquittance formerly seal'd:
Looke here sir, Gaspero is witnesse to it.
Gas. My honoured Lord, I am
Gon. My Lord Fernando,
Arcanes and the rest, you all shall testifie,
That I acquit Lord Cassilane for ever,
Of any debts to me.
Gas. 'Tis plaine and ample:
Fortune will once againe smile on us fairely.
Cas. But hearke ye, hearke ye, if you be in earnest,
Whence comes this bounty? or whose is't?
Gon. In short,
The great Erota, by this Secretary,
Returned me my full due.
Cas. Erota? why
Should she do this?
Gon. You must aske her the cause,
She knowes it best.
Cas. So ho; Arcanes, none
But women pitty us? soft-hearted women,
I am become a brave fellow now, Arcanes,
Am I not?
Arc. Why sir, if the gracious Princesse
Have tooke more speciall notice of your services,
And meanes to be more thankfull than some others,
It were an injury to gratitude,
To disesteeme her favours.
Anno. Sir she ever
For your sake most respectively lov'd me.
Cas. The Senate, and the body of this Kingdom,
Are herein (let me speake it without arrogance)
Beholding to her: I will thanke her for it;
And if she have reserv'd a meanes whereby
I may repay this bounty with some service,
She shall be then my Patroneesse. come sirs,
Wee'l taste a cup of wine together now.
Gonz. Fernando, I must speake with you in secret.
Fer. You shall——Now Gaspero, all's well.
Gas. There's newes
You must be acquainted with.
Come, there is no master-peece in Art, like Policie. Ex.

Actus Quintus. Scena prima.

Enter Fernando, and Michael.

Fer. THe Senate is inform'd at full.
Mi. Gonzalo.
Dreames not of my arivall yet.
Fer. Nor thinkes
'Tis possible his plots can be discover'd.
He fats himselfe with hopes of Crownes, and Kingdoms,
And laughes securely, to imagine how
He meanes to gull all but himselfe: when truly,
None is so grosely gull'd as he.
Mich. There was never
A more arch villain.
Fer. Peace, the Senate comes.

Enter Porphino, Posi. Senators, and Gaspero, Attend.

Por. How closely, Treason cloakes it selfe in formes
Of Civill honesty?
Pos. And yet how palpably
Does heaven reveale it?
Fer. Gratious Lords,
Gas. The Embassadour,
Lord Paulo Michael, Advocate
To the great Duke of Venice.
Por. You are most welcome;
Your Master is a just and noble Prince.
Mic. My Lords, he bad me say; that you may know
How much he scornes, and (as good Princes ought)
Defies base indirect, and godlesse treacheries;
To your more Sacred wisdomes he refers
The punishment due to the false Gonzalo;
Or else to send him home to Venice.
Pos. Herein
The Duke is royall: Gaspero the Prince
Of Cyprus answer'd he would come.
Gas. My Lords,
He will not long be absent Enter Pothinus.
Porp. You Fernando,
Have made the State your debter: worthy Prince,
We shall be furors to you for your prefence,
In hearing, and determining of matters
Greatly concerning Candy.
Phi. Fathers, I am

A ſtranger.
Poſ. Why, the cauſe (my Lord) concernes
A ſtranger: pleaſe you ſeat your ſelfe.
Phi. How e're
Unfit, ſince you will have it ſo (my Lords)
You ſhall command me.
Por. You my Lord Fernando,
With the Ambaſſador, withdraw a while.
Fer. My Lords, we ſhall. Ex.
Poſ. Melitus, and the Secretary,
Give notice to Gonzalo, that the Senate
Requires his preſence. Ex. Gaſ. and Mel.
Phi. What concernes the buſineſſe? Enter Caſ. and Arca.
Por. Thus noble Priuce ——
Caſ. Let me alone, thou troubleſt me,
I will be heard.
Arc. You know not what you doe.
Poſ. Forbeare: who's he that is ſo rude? whats he that (dares
To interrupt our counſels?
Caſ. One that has guarded,
Thoſe Purple roabes from Cankers worſe then Moaths,
One that hath kept your fleeces on your backs,
That would have been ſnatch'd from you: but I ſee
'Tis better now to be a dog, a Spanniell
In times of Peace, then boaſt the brnſed ſcars,
Purchas'd with loſſe of bloud in noble wars:
My Lords, I ſpeake to you.
Por. Lord Caſſilane,
We know not what you meane.
Caſ. Yes, you are ſet
Upon a bench of juſtice; and a day
Will come (heare this, and quake ye potent great ones)
When you your ſelves ſhall ſtand before a judge,
Who in a paire of ſcales will weigh your actions,
Without abatement of one graine: as then
You would be found full weight, I charge ye fathers
Let me have juſtice now.
Poſ. Lord Caſſilane,
What ſtrange diſtemperature provokes diſtruſt
Of our impartiality? be ſure
Wee'l flatter no mans injuries.
Caſ. 'Tis well;
You have a Law (Lords) that without remorſe
Dooms ſuch as are beleapred with the curſe
Of foule ingratitude unto death.
Por. We have.
Caſ. Then do me juſtice.
Enter Antinous, Decius, Erota, Hyparcha.
Dec. Mad-man, whether run'ſt thou?
Ant. Peace Decius, I am deafe.
Hyp. Will you forget
Your greatneſſe and your modeſty?
Er. Hyparcha leave, I will not heare.
Ant. Lady; great, gentle, Lady.
Er. Prethee young-man forbeare to interrupt me,
Triumph not in thy fortunes; I will ſpeake.
Poſ. More uproares yet; who are they that diſturb us?
Caſ. The viper's come; his feares have drawn him he-(ther,
And now (My Lords) be Chronicled for ever,
And give me juſtice againſt this vile Monſter,
This baſtard of my bloud.
Er. 'Tis juſtice fathers,
I ſue for too: and though I might command it,
(If you remember Lords, whoſe child I was)
Yet I will humbly beg it; this old wretch
Has forfeited his life to me.

Caſ. Tricks, tricks;
Complots, devices, twixt theſe paire of young-ones,
To blunt the edge of your well temper'd Swords,
Wherewith you ſtrike offendors, (Lords) but I
Am not a baby to be fear'd with bug-beares,
'Tis juſtice I require.
Er. And I.
Ant. You ſpeak too tenderly; and too much, like your (ſelf
To meane a cruelty; which would make monſtrous
Your Sexe: yet for the loves ſake, which you once
Pleas'd to pretend, give my griev'd father leave
To vrge his owne revenge; you have no cauſe
For yours: keep peace about ye.
Caſ. Will you heare me?
Phi. Here's ſome ſtrange novelty.
Poſ. Sure we are mock'd,
Speake one at once: ſay wherein hath your Son
Transgreſs'd the Law?
Caſ. O the groſſe miſts of dulneſſe;
Are you this Kingdomes Oracles, yet can be
So ignorant? firſt heare, and then conſider,
That I begot him, gave him birth and life,
And education, were I muſt confeſſe,
But duties of a father: I did more;
I taught him how to manage Armes, to dare
An Enemy; to court both death and dangers;
Yet theſe were but additions to compleate
A well accompliſh'd Souldier: I did more yet.
I made him chiefe Commander in the field
Next to my ſelfe, and gave him the full proſpect
Of honour, and preferment; train'd him up
In all perfections of a martialliſt:
But he unmindfull of his gratitude,
You know with what contempt of my deſerts,
Firſt kick'd againſt mine honour, ſcorn'd all
My ſervices; then got the palme of glory
Unto himſelfe: yet not content with this,
He (laſtly) hath conſpir'd my death, and fought
Means to engage me to this Lady's debt,
Whoſe bounty, all my whole eſtate could never
Give ſatisfaction too: now honoured fathers,
For this cauſe only, if your Law be law,
And you the Miniſters of juſtice; then
Thinke of this ſtrange ingratitude in him.
Phi. Can this be ſo Antinous?
Ant. 'Tis all true,
Nor hath my much wrong'd father limn'd my faults
In colours halfe ſo black, as in themſelves,
My guilt hath dyed them: were there mercy left,
Yet mine owne ſhame would be my Executioner:
Lords, I am guilty.
Er. Thou believſt Antinous,
Thine innocence: alas (my lords) hee's deſperate,
And talkes he knowes not what: you muſt not credit
His lunacy; I can my ſelfe diſprove
This accuſation: Caſſilane, be yet
More mercifull; I beg it.
Caſ. Time, nor fate,
The world, or what is in it, ſhall not alter
My reſolution; he ſhall dye.
Er. The Senats
Prayers; or weeping Lovers, ſhall not alter
My reſolution: thou ſhalt dye.
Ant. Why Madam,
Are ye all Marble?
Poſ. Leave your ſhifts Antinous,

What

What plead you to your fathers accusation?
Ant. Most fully guilty.
Pos. You have doom'd your selfe,
We cannot quit you now.
Cas. A burthen'd conscience
Will never need a hang-man: hadst thou dar'd
To have denide it, then this Sword of mine
Should on thy head have prov'd thy tongue a lyar.
Er. Thy sword? wretched old man, thou hast liv'd too (long
To carry peace or comfort to thy grave;
Thou art a man condemn'd: my Lords this tyrant
Had perish'd but for me, I still suppli'd
His miserable wants; I lent his daughter
Mony to buy him food; the bread he eate,
Was from my purse: when he (vainglorioufly)
To dive into the peoples hearts, had pawn'd
His birth-right, I redeemed it, sent it to him,
And for requital, only made my suite,
That he would please to new receive his son
Into his favour, for whose love I told him
I had been still so friendly: But then he
As void of gratitude, as all good nature,
Distracted like a mad man, poasted hether
To pull this vengeance on himselfe, and us;
For why, (my Lords) since by the Law, all meanes
Is blotted out of your commission,
As this hard hearted father hath accus'd
Noble Antinous, his unblemished Son,
So I accuse this father, and crave judgement.
Cas. All this is but deceit, meere trifles forg'd
By combination to defeat the processe
Of Justice, I will have Antinous life.
Arc. Sir, what do ye meane?
Er. I will have Cassilane's.
Ant. Cunning and cruell Lady, runs the streame
Of your affections this way? have you not
Conquest enough by treading on my grave?
Unlesse you send me thether in a shrowd
Steept in my fathers blood? as you are woman,
As the protests of love you vow'd were honest;
Be gentler to my father.
Er. Cassilane,
Thou hast a heart of flint; let my intreates,
My teares, the Sacrifice of griefes unfained,
Melt it: yet be a father to thy son,
Unmaske thy long besotted judgement, see
A low obedience kneeling at the feet
Of nature: I beseech you.
Cas. Pish, you coisen
Your hopes: your plots are idle; I am resolute.
Er. Antinous, urge no further.
Ant. Hence thou Sorcery
Of a beguiling softnesse, I will stand,
Like the earths Center, unmoved; Lords your breath
Must finish these divisions: I confesse
Civility doth teach I should not speake
Against a Lady of her birth, so high
As great Erota, but her injuries
And thankelesse wrongs to me, urge me to cry
Alowd for justice, Fathers,
Dec. Whether run you?
Ant. For (honoured fathers) that you all may know
That I alone am not unmatchable,
In crimes of this condition, lest perhaps
You might conceive, as yet the case appeares,
That this foule staine, and guilt runs in a blood;
Before this presence, I accuse this Lady
Of as much vile ingratitude to me.
Cas. Impudent Traitor!
Phi. Her? O spare Antinous;
The world reputes thee valiant, do not foyle
All thy past nobleness with such a cowardize,
As murthering innocent Ladies will stampe on thee?
Ant. Brave Prince, with what unwillingnesse I force
Her follies, and in those her sin, be witnesse,
All these about me: she is bloudy minded,
And turnes the justice of the Law to rigor:
It is her cruelties, not I accuse her:
Shall I have Audience?
Er. Let him speake my Lords.
Dec. Your memory will rot.
Ant. Cast all your eyes
On this, what shall I call her? truthlesse woman,
When often in my discontents, the sway
Of her unruly bloud, her untam'd passion,
(Or name it as you list) had houre by houre
Sollicited my love, she vow'd at last
She could not, would not live unlesse I granted
What she long sued for: I in tender pity,
To save a Lady of her birth, from ruine,
Gave her her life, and promis'd to be hers:
Nor urg'd I ought from her, but secresie,
And then enjoyn'd her to supply such wants
As I perceiv'd my fathers late engagements
Had made him subject to; what, shall I heape up
Long repetitions? she to quit my pity,
Not only hath discover'd to my father
What she had promis'd to conceale, but also
Hath drawne my life into this fatall forfeit;
For which, since I must dye, I crave alike
Equality of justice against her,
Not that I covet bloud, but that she may not
Practice this art of falsehood on some other,
Perhaps more worthy of her love hereafter.
Por. If this be true——
Er. My Lords, be as the Law is,
Indifferent, upright, I do plead guilty:
Now sir, what glory have you got by this?
'Las man, I meant not to outlive thy doome;
Shall we be friends in death?
Cas. Heare me, the villaine
Seduces her, honour'd Lords.
Er. Leave off to doate,
And dye a wise man.
Ant. I am over-reach'd,
And mastred in my own resolution.
Phi. Will ye be wilfull Madam? here's the curse
Of loves disdaine.
Cas. Why sit you like dumb Statues?
Demur no longer in this difference.
Pos. Cassilane, Erota, Antinous, death ye aske; and 'tis your doomes,
You in your follies liv'd, dye in your follies.
Cas. I am revenged, and thanke you for it.
Er. Yes, and I Antinous hath been gracious.
Ant. Sir, may I presume to crave a blessing from you
Before we part?
Cas. Yes, such a one as Parents
Bestow on cursed sons, now, now I laugh
To see how those poore younglings are both cheated
Of life and comfort: looke ye, looke ye, Lords,
I go but some ten minutes (more or lesse)

Before my time, but they have finely cozn'd
Themſelves of many, many hopefull yeares
Amidſt their prime of youth and glory, now } Enter
My vengeance is made ful. Welcome my joy, } Annoph.
Thou com'ſt to take a ſeaſonable bleſsing
From thy halfe buried fathers hand; I am dead
Already girle, and ſo is ſhe and he,
We all are wormes-meat now.
Anno. I have heard all;
Nor ſhall you dye alone: Lords on my knees
I beg for juſtice too.
Porp. 'Gainſt whom, for what?
Ann. Firſt let me be reſolv'd; does the Law favour
None, be they ne're ſo mighty?
Porp. Not the greateſt.
Ann. Then juſtly I accuſe of foule ingratitude
(My Lords) you of the Senate all, not one Excepted.
Poſ. Porp. Us?
Phil. Annophill——
Ann. You are the Authors
Of this unthrifty bloud-ſhed; when your enemies
Came marching to your gates, your children ſuck'd not Safe at their mothers breaſts, your very Cloyſters
Were not ſecure, your ſtarting-holes of refuge
Not free from danger, nor your lives your owne;
In this moſt deſperate Extaſie, my father,
This aged man, not onely undertook
To guard your lives, but did ſo; and beat off
The daring foe; for you he pawn'd his lands,
To pay your ſouldiers, who without their pay
Refus'd to ſtrike a blow: but (Lords) when peace
Was purchas'd for you, and victorie brought home;
Where was your gratitude, who in your Coffers
Hoarded the ruſtie treaſure which was due
To my unminded father? he was glad
To live retir'd in want, in penurie,
Whilſt you made feaſts of ſurfeit, and forgot
Your debts to him: The ſum of all is this,
You have been unthankfull to him; and I crave
The rigor of the Law againſt you all.
Caſ. My Royall ſpirited daughter!
Ero. Annophill
Thou art a worthy wench; let me embrace thee.
Ann. Lords, why doe ye keep your ſeats? they are no
For ſuch as are offenders. places
Poſ. Though our ignorance
Of Caſsilanes engagements might aſſwage
Severity of juſtice, yet to ſhew
How no excuſe ſhould ſmooth a breach of Law,
I yeeld me to the triall of it.
Porp. So muſt I:
Great Prince of Cyprus, you are left
The onely Moderator in this differences
And as you are a Prince be a Protector
To wofull Candy.
Phil. What a Scene of miſerie
Hath thine obdurate frowardneſſe (old man)
Drawne on thy Countries boſome? and for that
Thy proud ambition could not mount ſo high
As to be ſtil'd thy Countries onely Patron,
Thy malice hath deſcended to the depth
Of hell, to be renowned in the Title
Of the deſtroyer? doſt thou yet perceive
What curſes all poſterity will brand
Thy grave with? that at once haſt rob'd this kingdome
Of honour and of ſafety.
Ero. Children yet unborne
Will ſtop their eares when thou art nam'd.
Arc. The world will be too little to containe
The memorie of this deteſted deed;
The Furies will abhorre it.
Dec. What the ſword
Could not enforce, your peeviſh thirſt of honour
(A brave, cold, weak, imaginarie fame)
Hath brought on Candy: Candy groans, not theſe
That are to die.
Phil. 'Tis happineſſe enough
For them, that they ſhall not ſurvive to ſee
The wounds wherewith thou ſtab'ſt the land that gave Thee life and name.
Dec. 'Tis Candy's wrack ſhall feele——
Caſ. The miſchief of your folly.
Porp. Poſ. Annophill——
Ann. I will not be entreated.
Caſ. Prethee Annophill.
Ann. Why would ye urge me to a mercy which
You in your ſelfe allow not?
Caſ. 'Tis the Law,
That if the party who complaines, remit
The offender, he is freed: is't not ſo Lords?
Porp. Poſ. 'Tis ſo.
Caſ. Antinous, By my ſhame obſerve
What a cloſe witch-craft popular applauſe is:
I am awak'd, and with cleare eyes behold
The Lethargie wherein my reaſon long
Hath been be-charm'd: Live, live, my matchleſſe ſonne,
Bleſt in thy fathers bleſsing; much more bleſt
In thine owne vertues: let me dew thy cheeks
With my unmanly teares: Riſe, I forgive thee:
And good Antinous, if I ſhall be thy father
Forgive me: I can ſpeak no more.
Ant. Deare Sir,
You new beget me now——Madam your pardon,
I hartily remit you.
Ero. I as freely
Diſcharge thee Caſsilane.
Ann. My gracious Lords,
Repute me not a blemiſh to my Sex,
In that I ſtrove to cure a deſperate evill
With a more violent remedy: your lives,
Your honours are your owne.
Phil. Then with conſent
Be reconcil'd on all ſides: Pleaſe you fathers
To take your places.
Poſ. Let us againe aſcend,
With joy and thankfulneſſe to heaven: And now
To other buſineſſe Lords.

Enter Gaſpero, and Melitus, with Gonzalo.

Mel. Two howres and more Sir,
The Senate hath been ſet.
Gonz. And I not know it?
Who ſits with them?
Mel. My Lord, the Prince of Cyprus.
Gonz. Gaſpero,
VVhy how comes that to paſſe?
Gaſ. Some waighty cauſe
I warrant you.
Gonz. Now Lords the buſineſſe? ha?
VVho's here, Erota?
Porp. Secretarie doe your charge
Upon that Traitor.

Gonz.

Gonz. Traytor?
Gaſ. Yes, Gonzalo, Traitor,
Of treaſon to the peace and ſtate of Candy,
I doe arreſt thee.
Gonz. Me? thou dog?
Enter Fernando and Michael.
Mich. With Licenſe
From this grave Senate, I arreſt thee likewiſe
Of Treaſon to the State of Venice.
Gonz. Ha?
Is Michael here? nay then I ſee
I am undone.
Ero. I ſhall not be your Queen,
Your Dutcheſſe, or your Empreſſe.
Gonz. Dull, dull braine.
O I am fool'd?
Gaſ. Look Sir, do you know this hand? (to Venice,
Mic. Do you know this Seale? Firſt (Lords) he writes
To make a perfect league, during which time
He would in private keep ſome Troops in pay,
Bribe all the Centinells throughout this kindom,
Corrupt the Captaines; at a Banquet poyſon
The Prince, and greateſt Peeres, and in concluſion
Yield Candy ſlave to Venice.
Gaſ. Next, he contracted
With the Illuſtrious Princeſſe, the Lady Erota,
In hope of marriage with her, to deliver
All the Venetian gallantry, and ſtrength,
Upon their firſt arrivall, to the mercy
Of her and Candy.
Erot. This is true Gonzalo.
Gon. Let it be true: what then?
Poſ. My Lord Ambaſſadour,
What's your demand?
Mich. As likes the State of Candy,
Either to ſentence him as he deſerves
Here, or to ſend him like a ſlave to Venice.
Porph. We ſhall adviſe upon it.
Gonz. O the devills,
That had not thruſt this trick into my pate----
A Politician foole? deſtruction, plague
Candy and Venice both.
Poſ. Porp. Away with him.
Mel. Come ſir, Ile ſee you ſafe. Exeunt. Gonz. Mel.
Ero. Lords, e're you part
Be witneſſe to another change of wonder;
Antinous, now be bold, before this preſence,
Freely to ſpeak, whether or no I tis'd
The humbleſt meanes affection could contrive,
To gaine thy love.
Ant. Madam, I muſt confeſſe it,
And ever am your ſervant.
Ero. Yes Antinous,
My ſervant, for my Lord thou ſhalt be never:
I here diſclaim the intereſt thou hadſt once
In my too paſsionate thoughts. Moſt noble Prince,
If yet a relique of thy wonted flames
Live warme within thy boſome, then I bluſh not
To offer up the aſſurance of my faith,
To thee that haſt deſerv'd it beſt.
Phil. O Madam,
You play with my calamity.
Ero. Let heaven
Record my truth for ever.
Phil. With more joy
Then I have words to utter, I accept it.
I alſo pawne you mine.
Ero. The man that in requitall
Of noble and un-ſought affection
Growes cruell, never lov'd, nor did Antinous.
Yet herein (Prince) ye are beholding to him;
For his neglect of me humbled a pride,
Which to a vertuous wife had been a Monſter.
Phil. For which Ile ranke him my deſerving friend.
Ant. Much comfort dwell with you, as I could wiſh
To him I honour moſt.
Caſ. O my Antinous,
My owne, my owne good ſon.
Fer. One ſuit I have to make.
Phil. To whom Fernando?
Fer. Lord Caſſilane to you.
Caſ. To me?
Fer. This Lady
Hath promiſed to be mine.
Ann. Your bleſsing ſir;
Brother your love.
Ant. You cannot ſir beſtow her
On a more noble gentleman.
Caſ. Saiſt thou ſo?
Antinous I confirm it. Here Fernando,
Live both as one; ſhe is thine.
Ant. And herein ſiſter,
I honour you for your wiſe ſetled love.
This is a day of Triumph, all Contentions
Are happily accorded: Candy's peace
Secur'd, and Venice vow'd a worthy friend. Exeunt.

FINIS.

THE LOVERS PROGRES.

Actus primus. Scæna prima

Enter Leon and Malfort.

Malfort.

AND as I told you Sir.

Leon. I understand you,
Clarinda's still perverse.

Malf. Shee's worse, obdurate,
Flinty, relentlesse, my love-passions jeer'd at,
My presents scorn'd.

Leon. 'Tis strange a waiting-woman,
In her condition apt to yield, should hold out,
A man of your place, reverend beard and shape,
Besieging her.

Mal. You might adde too my wealth,
Which she contemnes, five hundred Crowns per annum,
For which I have ventur'd hard, my conscience knows it,
Not thought upon, though offer'd for a Joyinture:
This Chaine which my Lords Pesants worship, flouted;
My solemne hums and ha's, the servants quake at,
No Rhetorick with her; every houre she hangs out
Some new flag of defiance to torment me:
Last Lent my Lady cal'd me her poor John,
But now I am growne a walking Skelliton,
You may see through and through me.

Leon. Indeed you are much falne away.

Malf. I am a kinde of nothing,
As she hath made me: love's a terrible glister,
And if some Cordiall of her favours help not,
I shall like an Italian dye backward,
And breath my last the wrong way.

Leo. As I live you have my pity; but this is cold comfort,
And in a friend lip-physick, and now I think on't,
I should doe more, and will, so you deny not
Your selfe the meanes of comfort.

Malf. Ile be hang'd first: one dram oft I beseech you.

Leo. You are not jealous of any mans accesse to her?

Mal. I would not receive the Dor, but as a bosome friend
You shall direct me, still provided that
I understand who is the man, and what
His purpose that pleads for me.

Leon. By all meanes.
First, for the undertaker I am he:
The meanes that I will practise, thus——

Mal. Pray you forward,

Leon. You know your Lady chaste Calisto loves her.

Malf. Too well, that makes her proud.

Leon. Nay, give me leave.
This beauteous Lady, I may stile her so,
(Being the paragon of France for feature)
Is not alone contented in her selfe
To seeem, and be good, but desires to make
All such as have dependance on her like her;
For this Clarinda's liberty is restrain'd;
And though her kinsman the gate's shut against me;
Now if you please to make your selfe the doore,
For my conveyance to her, though you run
The hazard of a check for't, 'tis no matter.

Malf. It being for mine owne ends.

Leo. Ile give it o're,
If that you make the least doubt otherwise:
Studying upon't? good morrow.

Malf. Pray you stay sir;
You are my friend: yet as the Proverb saies,
When love puts in, friendship is gone: suppose
You should your selfe affect her?

Leon. Do you think Ile commit Incest; for it is no lesse,
She being my cousin Germane. Fare you well sir.

Malf. I had forgot that; for this once forgive me.
Onely to ease the throbbing of my heart,
(For I doe feele strange pangs) instruct me what
You will say for me.

Leon. First, Ile tell her that
She hath so far besotted you, that you have Almost forgot to cast accompt.

Malf. Meere truth sir.

Leon. That of a wise and provident Steward,
You are turn'd starke Asse.

Malf. Urge that point home, I am so.

Leon. That you adore the ground she treads upon,
And kisse her foot-steps.

Mal. As I doe when I finde their print in the Snow.

Leon. A loving foole I know it,
By your bloudlesse-frosty lips: then having related
How much you suffer for her, and how well
You doe deserve it.——

Malf. How? to suffer?

Leon. No sir, to have your love return'd.

Malf. That's good, I thank you.

Leon. I will deliver her an Inventorie
Of your good parts: as this your precious nose,
Dropping affection: your high-forehead, reaching
Almost to the crowne of your head; your slender waste,
And a back not like a thresher's, but a bending
And Court-like back, and so forth, for your body.
But when I touch your minde, for that must take her,
(Since your out-side promises little) Ile enlarge it,
(Though ne're so narrow) as your Arts to thrive,
Your composition with the Cook, and Butler,
Fory Coney-skins and Chippings, and halfe a share
With all the under-officers of the house,
In strangers bounties, that she shall have all,
And you as 'twere her Bailiffe.

Malf. As I will be.

Leon. As you shall, so Ile promise. Then your qualities.

As playing on a Gytterne, or a Jewes Trumpe.
Malf. A little too on the Viall.
Leon. Feare you nothing.
Then ſinging her aſleep with curious catches
Of your owne making: for as I have heard,
You are Poeticall.
Mal. Something given that way.
Yet my works ſeldome thrive: and the main reaſon
The Poets urge for't, is, becauſe I am not
As poore as they are.
Leon. Very likely: fetch her,
While I am in the vaine.
Mal. 'Tis an apt time, my Lady being at her prayers.
Leon. Let her pray on.
Nay goe, and if upon my interceſſion
She doe you not ſome favour, Ile diſclaime her;
Ile ruminate on't the while.
Malf. A hundred Crownes is your reward.
Leo. Without 'em----nay, no trifling. Ex. Malf.
That this dull clod of ignorance ſhould know
How to get money, yet want eyes to ſee
How groſſely hee's abus'd, and wrought upon,
When he ſhould make his will, the rogues turn'd rampant,
As he had renew'd his youth: A handſome wench
Love one a ſpittle-whore would run away from?
Well Maſter Steward, I will plead for you
In ſuch a Method, as it ſhall appeare
You are fit to be a propertie.
Enter Malfort and Clarinda.
Mal. Yonder he walks
That knowes my worth and value, though you ſcorn it.
Clar. If my Lady know not this——
Mal. Ile anſwer it:
If you were a Nun, I hope your couſin German
Might talke with you through a grate, but you are none,
And therefore may come cloſer: ne're hang off,
As I live you ſhall bill: you may ſalute as ſtrangers,
Cuſtome allowes it. Now, now, come upon her
With all your Oratory, tickle her to the quick,
As a young advocate ſhould, and leave no vertue
Of mine unmentioned, Ile ſtand Centinell;
Nay keep the doore my ſelfe. Exit.
Clar. How have you work'd
This piece of motley to your ends?
Leon. Of that at leaſure, Miſtris. Kiſſing.
Clar. Lower, you are too loud,
Though the fool be deaf, ſome of the houſe may hear you.
Leon. Suppoſe they ſhould, I am a gentleman,
And held your kinſeman, under that I hope
I may be free.
Clar. I grant it, but with caution;
But be not ſeen to talke with me familiarly,
But at fit diſtance, or not ſeen at all,
It were the better: you know my Ladies humour,
Shee is all honour, and compos'd of goodneſſe,
(As ſhe pretends) and you having no buſineſſe,
How jealous may ſhe grow?
Leon. I will be rul'd.
But you have promis'd, and I muſt enjoy you.
Clar. We ſhall finde time for that; you are too haſtie:
Make your ſelfe fit, and I ſhall make occaſion,
Deliberation makes beſt in that buſineſſe,
And contents every way.
Leon. But yon muſt feed
This fooliſh Steward with ſome ſhadow of
A future favour, that we may preſerve him
To be our inſtrument.
Clar. Hang him.
Leon. For my ſake ſweet,
I undertook to ſpeak for him, any bauble,
Or ſlight employment in the way of ſervice,
Will feed him fat.
Clar. Leave him to me, Enter Malfort.
Malf. She comes. My Lady.
Clar. I will ſatisfie her.
Mal. How far have you prevail'd?
Leon. Obſerve.
Clar. Mounſieur Malfort.
I muſt be briefe, my couſin hath ſpoke much
In your behalfe, and to give you ſome proof,
I entertaine you as my ſervant,
You ſhall have the grace.
Leon Upon your knee receive it,
Clar. And take it a ſpeciall favour from me,
To tye my ſhooe.
Malf. I am orc-joy'd.
Leon. Good reaſon.
Clar. You may come higher in time.
Leon. No more, the Lady. Enter Caliſta.
Malf. She frownes.
Clar. I thanke you for this viſit couſin,
But without leave hereafter from my Lady,
I dare not change diſcourſe with you.
Malf. Pray you take your mornings draught.
Leon. I thank you: } Exeunt Leon.
Happineſſe attend your honour. } Malfort.
Caliſt. Who gave warrant to this private parle?
Clar. My innocence; I hope
My conference with a kinſeman cannot call
Your anger on me.
Caliſt. Kinſman? Let me have
No more of this, as you deſire you may continue mine.
Clar. Why Madam (under pardon)
Suppoſe him otherwiſe: yet comming in
A lawfull way it is excuſable.
Caliſt. How's this?
Clar. I grant you are made of pureneſſe,
And that your tenderneſſe of honour holds
The ſoveraigntie o're your paſſions. Yet you have
A noble Husband, with allow'd embraces,
To quench laſcivious fires, ſhould ſuch flame in you,
As I muſt ne're believe. Were I the wife
Of one that could but zanie brave Cleander,
Even in his leaſt perfections, (excuſe
My ore-bold inference) I ſhould deſire
To meet no other object.
Cal. You grow ſaucie. Doe I look further?
Clar. No, deare Madam: and
It is my wonder or aſtoniſhment rather,
You could deny the ſervice of Liſander;
A man without a rivall: one the King
And Kingdome gazes on with admiration,
For all the excellencies a mother could
Wiſh in her onely ſonne.
Cal. Did not mine honour
And Obligation to Cleander, force me
To be deafe to his complaints?
Clar. Tis true; but yet
Your rigor to command him from your preſence,
Argu'd but ſmall compaſſion; the Groves
Witneſſe his grievous ſufferings, your faire name
Upon the rhinde of every gentle Poplar,

And

And amorous Myrtle, (trees to Venus sacred)
With adoration carv'd, and kneel'd unto,
This you (unseen of him) both saw and heard
Without compassion, and what receiv'd he
For his true sorrowes? but the heavy knowledge,
That 'twas your peremptory will and pleasure,
(How e're my Lord liv'd in him) he should quit
Your sight and house for ever.
Cal. I confesse I gave him a strong potion to worke
Upon his hot bloud, and I hope 'twill cure him:
Yet I could wish the cause had concern'd others,
I might have met his sorrowes with more pittie;
At least have lent some counsell to his miseries,
Though now for honour sake, I must forget him,
And never know the name more of Lisander:
Yet in my justice I am bound to grant him,
(Laying his love aside) most truely noble.
But mention him no more, this instant houre
My brother Lidian, new return'd from travaile,
And his brave friend Clarange, long since rivalls
For faire and rich Olinda, are to heare
Her absolute determination, whom
She pleases to elect; see all things ready
To entertain 'em: and on my displeasure
No more words of Lisander. (but her owne:
Clar. She endures to heare him nam'd by no tongue
How e're she carries it, I know she loves him. Exit.
Cal. Hard nature: hard condition of poore women!
That where we are most su'd too, we must flye most.
The trees grow up, and mixe together freely;
The Oke not envious of the failing Cedar t
The lustie Vine not jealous of the Ivie
Because she clips the Elme; the flowers shoot up,
And wantonly kisse one another hourely,
This blossome glorying in the others beauty,
And yet they smell as sweet, and look as lovely:
But we are ty'd to grow alone. O honour,
Thou nard Law to our lives, chaine to our freedomes;
He that invented thee had many curses;
How is my soule divided? O Cleander,
My best deserving husband! O Lisander!
The truest lover that e're sacrific'd
To Cupid against Hymen: O mine honour;
A Tyrant, yet to be obey'd, and 'tis
But justice we should thy strict Lawes endure,
Since our obedience to thee keeps us pure. Exit.

Enter Cleander, Lidian, and Clarange.

Clean. How insupportable the difference
Of deare friends is, the sorrow that I feele
For my Lisanders absence, one that stampes
A reverend print on friendship, does assure me
You are rivals for a Lady, a faire Lady,
And in the acquisition of her favours,
Hazard the cutting of that Gordion knot
From your first childhood to this present houre,
By all the tyes of love and amity fastend,
I am blest in a wife (heaven make me thankefull)
Inferiour to none (sans pride I speake it)
Yet if I were a free-man, and could purchase
At any rate the certainty to enjoy
Lisanders conversation while I liv'd,
Forgive me my Calista and the Sexe,
I never would seeke change.
Lid. My Lord and brother,
I dare not blame your choice, Lisanders worth,
Being a Mistris to be ever courted;
Nor shall our equall suit to faire Olinda
Weaken, but adde strength to our true affection,
With zeale so long continued.
Claran. When we know
Whom she prefers, as she can choose but one,
By our so long tride friendship we have vow'd
The other shall desist.
Clea. 'Tis yet your purpose,
But how this resolution will hold
In him that is refus'd, is not alone
Doubtfull, but dangerous.

Enter Malfort.

Malf. The rich heire is come sir.
Cleand. Madam Olinda.
Malf. Yes sir, and makes choice,
After some little conference with my Lady,
Of this room to give answer to her suitors.
Cle. Already both look pale, between your hopes
To win the prize, and your despaire to lose
What you contended for.
Lid. No sir, I am arm'd.
Clar. I confident of my interest.
Cle. Ile beleeve ye when you have endur'd the test.

Enter Calista, Olinda, and Clarinda.

Malf. Is not your garter
Unty'd? you promis'd that I should grow higher
In doing you service.
Clar. Fall off or you lose mee. Exit Malf.
Cle. Nay take your place, no Paris now sits judge
On the contending goddesses. You are
The Deitie that must make curst or happy,
One of your languishing servants.
Ol. I thus look with equal eyes on both, either deserves
A fairer fortune then they can in reason
Hope for from me; from Lidian I expect,
When I have made him mine, all pleasures that
The sweetnesse of his manners, youth, and vertues
Can give assurance of: but turning this way
To brave Clarange, in his face appeares
A kinde of majesty which should command,
Not sue for favour. If the fairest Lady
Of France, set forth with natures best endowments
Nay should I adde a Princesse of the bloud,
Did now lay claime to either for a husband,
So vehement my affection is to both,
My envie at her happinesse would kill me.
Cle. The strangest love I ever heard.
Cal. You can enjoy but one.
Clar. The more I say the merrier.
Olin. Witnesse these teares I love both, as I know
You burne with equall flames, and so affect me;
Abundance makes me poore; such is the hard
Condition of my fortune; be your owne judges;
If I should favour both, 'twill taint my honour,
And that before my life I must prefer,
If one I leane to, the other is disvalewed;
You are fierie both, and love will make you warmer,
Clar. The warmer still the fitter. You are a foole Lady.
Oli. To what may love, and the devill jealousie spur you
Is too apparent: my name's cal'd in question:
Your swords flie out, your angers range at large:
Then what a murther of my modesty followes?
Clar. Take heed of that by any meanes: O innocent,
That will deny a blessing when 'tis offer'd,
Would I were murther'd so, I would thank my modesty.
Cle. What pause you on? Oli. It is at length resolved.

Clara. We are on the Rack, uncertain expectation,
The greatest torture.
Lidian. Command what you please,
And you shall see how willingly we will execute.
Olinda. Then heare what for your satisfaction,
And to preserve your friendship I resolve
Against my selfe, and 'tis not to be alter'd:
You are both brave gentlemen, Ile still professe it,
Both noble servants, for whose gentle offers,
The undeserving, and the poore Olinda
Is ever bound; you love both, faire, and vertuously;
Would I could be so happy to content both:
Which since I cannot, take this resolute answer;
Goe from me both contentedly, and he
That last makes his returne, and comes to visit,
Comes to my bed. You know my will: farewell;
My heart's too big to utter more: come friend.
Cal. Ile wait on you to your Coach.
Exeunt Olinda, Caliste, Clarinda.
Clean. You both look blank, I cannot blame you.
Lid. We have our dispatches.
Clara. Ile home.
Lid. And Ile abroad again, Farewell. } Exit Clarange
Clara. Farewell to yee. } and Lidian.
Clean. Their blunted departure troubles me: I feare
A suddaine and a dangerous division
Of their long love will follow: have you took
Your leave of faire Olinda? } Enter Caliste with a
Cal. She is gone sir. } purse.
Cle. Had you brought news Lisander were return'd too,
I were most happy.
Cal. Still upon Lasander?
Cle. I know he loves me, as he loves his health:
And heaven knowes I love him.
Cal. I finde it so:
For me you have forgot, and what I am to you.
Cle. O think not so. If you had lost a sister,
You lock'd all your delights in, it would grieve you:
A little you would wander from the fondnesse,
You ow'd your husband: I have lost a friend,
A noble friend, all that was excellent
In man, or man-kinde, was contain'd within him.
That losse my wife———
Enter Malfort.
Malf. Madam, your noble Father----
A fee for my good newes.
Cal. Why? what of him sir?
Mal. Is lighted at the doore, and longs to see you.
Caliste. Attend him hither.
Clean. O my deare Lisander.
But Ile bee merry: lets meet him my Caliste.
Cal. I hope Lisanders love will now be buried:
My father will bring joy enough for one moneth,
To put him out of his memorie.
Enter Dorilaus, his arme in a scarffe.
Dor. How doe you sonne?
Blesse my faire child, I am come to visit yee,
To see what house you keep, they say you are bountifull,
I like the noyse well, and I come to trie it.
Ne're a great belly yet? how have you trifl'd?
If I had done so (sonne) I should have heard on't
On both sides by Saint Denis.
Clean. You are nobly welcome sir:
We have time enough for that.
Dorilaus. See how she blushes:
'Tis a good signe you'll mend your fault, how dost thou,
My good Caliste?
Cal. Well, now I see you sir;
I hope you bring a fruitfulnesse along with yé.
Dor. Good luck, I never misse, I was ever good at it:
Your mother groand for't wench, so did some other,
But I durst never tell.
Cal. How does your arme sir?
Clean. Have you been let bloud of late?
Dor. Against my will sir.
Cal. A fall deare father?
Dor. No, a Gun, deare daughter;
Two or three Guns; I have one here in my buttock,
'Twould trouble a Surgeons teeth to pull it out.
Cal. O me! O me!
Dor. Nay, if you fall to fainting,
'Tis time for me to trudge: art such a coward,
At the meere name of hurt to change thy colour?
I have been shot that men might see clean through me,
And yet I fainted not: besides my selfe,
Here are an hospitall of hurt men for yee.
Enter Servants, wounded in severall places.
Clean. What should this wonder be?
Cal. I am amaz'd at it. (soundly,
Dor. What think ye of these? they are every one hurt
Hurt to the proof, they are through, & through I assure ye;
And that's good game, they scorne your puling scratches.
Cal. Who did this sir?
Dor. Leave crying, and Ile tell you,
And get your plaisters, and your warme stupes ready:
Have you ne're a Shepheard that can tarre us over?
'Twill proove a businesse else, we are so many.
Comming to see you, I was set upon,
I and my men, as we were singing frolickly,
Not dreaming of an ambush of base rogues,
Set on ith' forrest, I have forgot the name---
Cle. 'Twixt this, and Fountaine-Bleau?
In the wilde Forrest?
Dor. The same, the same, in that accurst Forrest,
Set on by villaines, that make boot of all men.
The Peeres of France are pillage there, they shot at us,
Hurt us, un-hors'd us, came to the sword, there plide us,
Oppress us with fresh multitudes, fresh shot still,
Rogues that would hang themselves for a fresh doublet,
And for a Skarlet Cassock kill their fathers.
Cle. Lighted you among these?
Dor. Among these murtherers,
Our poore blouds were ingag'd: yet we strook bravely,
And more then once or twice we made them shun us,
And shrink their rugged heads: but we were hurt all.
Cle. How came you off? for I even long to hear that.
Dor. After our prayers made to heaven to help us,
Or to be mercifull unto our soules,
So neare we were. Alas poore wench, wipe, wipe.
See heaven sends remedy.
Cal. I am glad 'tis come sir,
My heart was even a bleeding in my body.
Dor. A curl'd haire gentleman stept in, a stranger,
As he rod by, belike he heard our bickering,
Saw our distresses, drew his sword, and prov'd
He came to execute, and not to argue.
Lord what a lightning me thought flew about him,
When he once tos's'd his blade; in face Adonis,
While peace inhabited between his eye-browes:
But when his noble anger stirr'd his mettle,
And blew his firie parts into a flame,
Like Pallas, when she sits between two armies,

Viewing

Viewing with horrid browes their ſad events,
Such then hee look'd: and as her ſhield had arm'd him.
Cal. This man ſir were a friend to give an age for.
This gentleman I muſt love naturally:
Nothing can keep me off; I pray you goe on ſir.
Dor. I will, for now you pleaſe me: this brave youth,
This bud of Mars, for yet he is no riper,
When once he had drawne bloud, and fleſh'd his ſword,
Fitted his manly mettle to his ſpirit,
How he beſtirr'd him? what a lane he made?
And through their fierie Bullets thruſt ſecurely:
The hardned villaines wondring at his confidence,
Lame as I was I follow'd, and admir'd too,
And ſtirr'd, and laid about me with new ſpirit,
My men too with new hearts thruſt into action,
And down the rogues went.
Cle. I am ſtrook with wonder.
Dor. Remember but the ſtorie of ſtrong Hector,
When like to lightning he broke through his van-guard,
How the Greeks frighted ran away by Troops,
And trod downe Troops to ſave their lives: ſo this man,
Diſpers'd theſe ſlaves: had they been more and mightier,
He had come off the greater, and more wonder.
Cle. Where is the man, good ſir, that we may honor him?
Cal. That we may fall in ſuperſtition to him.
Dor. I know not that, from me he late departed,
But not without that pious care to ſee ſafe
Me, and my weak men lodg'd, and dreſs'd; I urg'd him
Firſt hither, that I might more freely thanke him:
He told me he had buſineſſe crav'd my pardon,
Buſineſſe of much import.
Clean. Know you his name?
Dor. That he deny'd me too: a vow had bard him.
Cal. In that he was not noble to be nameleſſe.
Dor. Daughter you muſt remember him when I am dead,
And in a noble ſort requite his piety,
'Twas his deſire to dedicate this ſervice
To your faire thoughts. Cal. He knowes me then?
Dor. I nam'd you,
And nam'd you mine: I think that's all his knowledge.
Cle. No name, no being?
Cal. Now I am mad to know him:
Saving mine honour, any thing I had now
But to enjoy his ſight, but his bare picture;
Make me his Saint, I muſt needs honour him.
Serv. I know his name.
Cal. There's thy reward for't; ſpeak it.
Ser. His man told me, but he deſir'd my ſilence.
Cal. O Jaſper ſpeak, 'tis thy good Maſters cauſe too:
We all are bound in gratitude to compell thee.
Serv Liſander, Yes, I am ſure it was Liſander.
Cal. Liſander? 'twas Liſander.
Cle. 'Tis Liſander. O my baſe thoughts? my wicked?
To make queſtion this act could be another mans:
'Tis Liſander, a handſome timber'd man.
Serv. Yes. (mourn'd?
Cle. My Liſander! was this friends abſence to bee
Cal. I grant it:
Ile mourne his going now, and mourne it ſeriouſly:
When you weep for him, ſir, Ile beare you company.
That ſo much honour, ſo much honeſty
Should be in one man, to doe things thus bravely,
Make me his Saint, to me give this brave ſervice:
What may I doe to recompence his goodneſſe?
I cannot tell.
Cle. Come ſir, I know you are ſickly, ſo are your men.
Dor. I muſt confeſſe I am weake,
And fitter for a bed then long diſcourſes.
Cle. You ſhall hear to morrow, to morrow provide Dor. Liſander——— (Surgeons.
Cal. What new fire is this? Liſander——Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Liſander, and Lancelot.

Liſ. PRethee good Lancelot remember that Thy Maſters life is in thy truſt, and therefore
Be very careful.
Lance. I will loſe mine owne, rather then hazard yours.
Liſ. Take what diſguiſe
You in your owne diſcretion ſhall think fitteſt,
To keep your ſelfe unknowne.
Lanc. I warrant yee;
'Tis not the firſt time I have gone inviſible:
I am as fine a Fairie in a buſineſſe
Concerning night-worke———
Liſ. Leave your vanities:
With this purſe (which deliver'd,
You may ſpare your Oratory) convey this Letter to Caliſte's woman.
Lanc. 'Tis a handſome girle, Miſtris Clarinda.
Liſ. I have made her mine. You know your work.
Lanc. And if I ſweat not in it,
At my returne diſcarde me. Exit.
Liſand. O Caliſte! the faireſt! crualleſt!
Enter Clarange.
Clar. So early ſtirring? a good day to you.
Liſ. I was viewing ſir,
The ſite of your houſe, and the handſomneſſe about it:
Believe me it ſtands healthfully and ſweetly.
Clara. The houſe and maſter of it really
Are ever at your ſervice. Liſ. I returne it:
Now if you pleaſe goe forward in your ſtorie
Of your deare friend and Miſtris.
Clara. I will tell it,
And tell it ſhort, becauſe 'tis breakfaſt time,
(And love a tedious thing to a quick ſtomach)
You eate not yeſter-night.
Liſ. I ſhall endure ſir.
Clara. My ſelfe (and as I then deliver'd to you)
A gentleman of noble hope, one Lidian,
Both brought up from our infancy together,
One company, one friendſhip, and one exerciſe,
Ever affecting, one bed holding us,
One griefe, and one joy parted ſtill between us,
More then companions, twins in all our actions,
We grew up till we were men, held one heart ſtill:
Time call'd us on to Armes, we were one ſouldier,
Alike we ſought our dangers and our honours,
Gloried alike one in anothers nobleneſſe:
When Armes had made us fit, we were one lover,
We lov'd one woman, lov'd without diviſion,
And woo'd a long time with one faire affection;
And ſhe, as it appeares, loves us alike too.
At length conſidering what our love muſt grow to,
And covet in the end, this one was parted,
Rivalls and honours make men ſtand at diſtance.
We then woo'd with advantage, but were friends ſtill,

Saluted fairely, kept the peace of love,
We could not both enjoy the Ladies favour,
Without some scandall to her reputation,
We put it to her choice, this was her sentence,
To part both from her, and the last returning
Should be her Lord; we obey'd, and now you know it;
And for my part, (so truely I am touch'd with't)
I will goe farre enough, and be the last too,
Or ne're returne.

Lisand. A sentence of much cruelty;
But milde, compar'd with whats pronounc'd on me.
Our loving youth is borne to many miseries.
What is that Lidian pray ye? (faire Ladie.

Claran. Calistes brother, if ever you have heard of that

Lisan. I have seen her sir.

Claran. Then you have seen a wonder.

Lisan. I doe confesse: of what yeares is this Lidian?

Clara. About my years: there is not much between us.

Lisan. I long to know him.

Clara. 'Tis a vertuous longing,
As many hopes hang on his noble head,
As blossoms on a bough in May, and sweet ones.

Lis. Ye are a faire storie of your friend.

Clar. Of truth sir: now what's the matter?

Enter a Servant.

Serv. There is a gentleman
At doore, would speak with you on private businesse.

Clara. With me?

Serv. He saies so, and brings haste about him.

Clara. Wait on him in. Exit Serv.

Lisan. I will retire the while, to the next room.

Clar. We shall not long disturbe you. Exe. Alcidon.

Alc. Save ye sir.

Clara. The like to you fair sir: pray you come neare.

Alc. Pray you instruct me for I know you not.
With Monsieur Clarange I would speake.

Clar. I am he sir:
Ye are nobly welcome; I wait your businesse.

Alcid. This will informe you.

Clara. Will you please to sit down? Reads.
He shall command me sir, Ile wait upon him
Within this houre.

Alcid. Y'are a noble gentleman,
Wil't please you bring a friend? we are two of us,
And pitty either sir should be unfurnish'd.

Clara. I have none now, and the time is set so short,
'Twill not be possible.

Alc. Doe me the honour:
I know you are so full of brave acquaintance,
And worthy friends, you cannot want a partner:
I would be loath to stand still sir; besides,
You know the custome, and the vantage of it,
If you come in alone.

Clar. And I must meet it.

Alc. Send, wee'l defer an houre, let us be equall:
Games won and lost on equall tearmes shew fairest.

Clar. 'Tis to no purpose to send any whither,
Unlesse men be at home by Revelation:
So please you breath a while; when I have done with him
You may be exercis'd too: Ile trouble no man.

Enter Lisander.

Lis. They are very loud. Now what's the newes?

Clara. I must leave you,
Leave you a while, two houres hence Ile returne friend.

Lisan. Why, what's the matter?

Clar. A little businesse.

Lis. And't be but a little, you may take me with ye.

Clar. 'Twill be a trouble to you.

Lis. No indeed, to do you service, I account a pleasure.

Clar. I must alone. Lisan. Why?

Clarang. 'Tis necessity—
Before you passe the walks, and back agen,
I will be with ye. Lis. If it be not unmannerly
To presse you, I would goe.

Claran. Ile tell you true sir,
This gentleman and I upon appointment,
Are going to visit a Lady.

Lisan. I am no Capuchin, why should not I goe?

Alc. Take the gentleman,
Come he may see the gentlewoman too,
And be most welcome, I do beseech you take him.

Lisan. By any means, I love to see a gentlewoman,
A prettie wench too.

Clar. Well sir, wee'll meet you,
And at the place: My service to the Lady.

Alc. I kisse your hand. Exit.

Clara. Prethee read o're her Letter.

Lisander reads.

Monsieur,

I Know you have consider'd the dark sentence Olinda gave us, and that (however she disguis'd it) it pointed more at our swords edges then our bodies banishments; the last must enjoy her: if we retire, our youths are lost in wandring; in emulation we shall grow old men, and feeble, Which is the scorne of love, and rust of honour, and so return more fit to wed our Sepulchers, then the Saint we aime at; let us therefore make our journey short, and our hearts ready, and with our swords in our hands put it to fortune, which shall be worthy to receive that blessing, Ile stay you on the mountaine, our old hunting place, this gentleman alone runs the hazzard with me, and so I kisse your hand.

Your servant Lidian.

Is this your wench? you'll finde her a sharp Mistris.
What have I thrust my selfe into? is this that Lidian
You told me of? Clara. The same.

Lisan. My Ladies brother?
No cause to heave my sword against but his?
To save the father yesterday, and this morning,
To help to kill the son? this is most courteous?
The onely way to make the daughter doat on me.

Clara. Why doe you muse? would ye goe off?

Lis. No, no, I must on now; this will be kindly taken;
No life to sacrifice, but part of hers?
Doe you fight straight? Clara. Yes, presently.

Lis. To morrow then,
The balefull tidings of this day will break out,
And this nights Sun will set in bloud; I am troubl'd:
If I am kill'd, I am happy.

Clara. Will you goe friend?

Lis. I am ready sir, fortune thou hast made me monstrous.

Enter Malfort and Clarinda. (Exeunt.

Malf. Your cousin, and my true friend, lusty Leon,
Shall know how you use me.

Clar. Be more temperate,
Or I will never use, nor know you more
Ith' way of a seruant: all the house takes notice
Of your ridiculous fopperie; I have no sooner
Perform'd my duties in my Ladies chamber,
And she scarce down the staires, but you appeare
Like my evill spirit to me. (der

Mal. Can the fish live out of the water, or the Salaman-

Out

Out of the fire? or I live warme, but in
The frying-pan of your favour?
Cla. Pray you forget
Your curious comparisons, borrowed from
The pond, and kitchin, and remember what
My Ladies pleasure is for th' entertainment
Of her noble father.
Mal. I would learn the art of memory in your table book.
Cla. Very good sir, no more but up and ride, I apprehend
Your meaning, soft fire makes sweet mault sir:
I'le answer you in a Provetbe,
Mal. But one kisse from thy honey lippe.
Cla. You fight too high, my hand is
A faire ascent from my foot, his slavering kisses
Spoyle me more gloves,---enough for once, you'l surfet
With too much grace.
Mal. Have you no imployment for me?
Cla. Yes, yes, go send for Leon, and convey him
Into the private Arbour, from his mouth
I heare your praises with more faith.
Mal. I am gone-yet one thing ere I go, there's at the dore
The rarest Fortune-teller, he hath told me
The strangest things; he knows ye are my Mistris,
And under seale deliver'd how many children
I shall beget on you, pray you give him hearing,
He'l make it good to you.
Cla. A cunning man
Of your own making, howsoe're I'le heare him
At your intreaty.
Mal. Now I perceive ye love me,
At my entreaty, come in friend --- remember
To speake as I directed, he knows his lesson,
And the right way to please her; this it is
To have a head-peece. Exit.

Enter Lancelot like a Fortune-teller, with a Purse, and two Letters in it.

Cla. 'Tis said you can tell Fortunes to come.
Lan. Yes Mistris, and what's past;
Unglove your hand, by this straight line, I see
You have laine crooked.
Cla. How? laine crooked?
Lan. Yes; and in that posture plaid at the old game,
(No body heares me, and I'le be no blab)
And at it lost your maiden-head.
Cla. A shrewd fellow;
'Tis truth, but not to be confess'd; in this
Your palmestry deceaves you, some thing else sir.
Lan. Ye are a great woman with your Lady, and Acquainted with her counsels.
Cla. Still more strange.
Lan. There is a noble Knight Lisander loves her,
Whom she regards not, and the destinies
With whom I am familiar, have deliver'd
That by your meanes alone, he must enjoy her.
Your hand agen, Yes, yes; you have already
Promis'd him your assistance, and what's more,
Tasted his bounty, for which, from the skye
There are 200. crownes dropp'd in a Purse,
Looke backe, you'l find it true; nay, open it,
'Tis good Gold I assure you.
Cla. How, two Letters? the first indors'd to me? this to (my Lady?
Subscrib'd Lisander.
Lan. And the Fortuneteller, his servant Lancelot.
Cla. How had I lost my eyes,
That I could not know thee? not a word of the losse
Of my virginity.
Lanc. Nor who I am.
Cla. I'le use all speedy meanes for your dispatch,
With a welcome answer, but till you receive it,
Continue thus disguis'd, Mounsieur Malfort
(You know the way to humour him) shall provide
A lodging for you, and good entertainment;
Nay, since we trade both one way, thou shalt have
Some feeling with me, take that.
Lan. Bountifull wench may'st thou ne're want imploy- (ment,
Cla. Nor such pay boy. Exeunt.

Enter Lidian, Alcidon, (at one dore) Lisander, Clarange, (at another.)

Lid. You'r welcome.
Alc. Let us do our office first,
And then make choice of a new peece of ground
To try our fortunes.
Lis. All's faire here.
Alc. And here, their swords are equall.
Lis. If there be any odds in mine, we will exchange.
Alc. Wee'l talke of that
When we are farther off, farwell.
Lis. Farewell friend. Ex. Lisand and Alcid
Lid. Come let us not be idle?
Cla. I will find you imployment, feare not.
Lid. You know sir, the cause that brings us hether
Cla. There needs no more discoursing,
No time, nor place for repetition now.
Lid. Let our Swords argue, and I wish Clarange,
The proud Olinda saw us.
Cla. Would she did;
What ever estimation she holds of me,
She should behold me like a man fight for her.
Lid. 'Tis nobly said; set on love; and my fortune---
Cla. The same for me, come home brave Lidian,
'Twas manly thrust, this token to the Lady,
Ye have it sir, deliver it, take breath,
I see ye bleed apace, ye shall have faire play.

Enter Lisander.

Lis. You must lye there a while, I cannot help you,
Lid. Nay, then my fortunes gone, I know I must dye:
Yet dearely will I sell my love, come on both,
And use your fortunes, I expect no favour;
Weake as I am, my confidence shall meet ye.
Cla. Yeild up your cause and live.
Lid. What dost thou hold me?
A recreant, that prefers life before credit?
Though I bleed hard, my honour finds no Issue,
That's constant to my heart.
Cla. Have at your life then.
Lis. Hold, or I'le turne, and bend my sword against ye;
My cause Clarange too, view this brave Gentleman,
That yet may live to kill you, he stands nobly,
And has as great a promise of the day
As you can tye unto your selfe, he's ready,
His Sword as sharpe, view him with that remembrance,
That you deliver'd him to me Clarange:
And with those eyes, that clearnesse will become ye:
View him, as you reported him; survey him,
Fixe on your friendship sir, I know you are noble,
And step but Inward to your old affection,
Examine but that soule grew to your bosome,
And try then if your Sword will bite, it cannot,
The edge will turne againe, asham'd, and blunted;
Lidian, you are the patterne of faire friendship,

Exampled

Exampled for your Love, and imitated,
The Temple of true hearts, stor'd with affections,
For sweetnesse of your spirit made a Saint,
Can you decline this nobleneſſe to anger?
To mortall anger? 'gainſt the man ye love moſt?
Have ye the name of vertuous, not the nature?
Lid. I will ſit downe.
Clarin. And I'le ſit by you Lidian.
Liſ. And I'le go on, can heaven be pleas'd with theſe
To ſee two hearts that have been twin'd together (things?
Married in friendſhip to the world, to wonder,
Of one growth, of one nouriſhment, one health,
Thus mortally divorc'd for one weake woman?
Can love be pleas'd? love is a gentle ſpirit,
The wind that blowes the Aprill flowers, not ſofter;
She is drawne with doves to ſhew her peacefulneſſe,
Lions and bloudy Pards are Mars's ſervants;
Would ye ſerve love? do it with humbleneſſe,
Without a noiſe, with ſtill prayers, and ſoft murmurs;
Upon her Altars offer your obedience,
And not your brawles; ſhe's won with teares, not terrors:
That fire ye kindle to her deity,
Is only gratefull when it blowes with ſighs,
And holy Incenſe flung with white hand-innocence;
Ye wound her now; ye are too ſuperſtitious,
No ſacrifice of bloud, or death ſhe longs for:
Lid. Came he from heaven?
Clarin. He tels us truth good Lidian.
Liſ. That part of Noble love which is moſt ſweet,
And gives eternall being to faire beauty,
Honour. You hack a peeces with your ſwords,
And that ye fight to crowne, ye kill faire credit.
Clara. Thus we embrace, no more fight, but all friendſhip,
And where love pleaſes to beſtow his benefits,
Let us not argue.
Lid. Nay brave ſir, come in too;
You may love alſo, and may hope, If he do,
And not rewarded for't, there is no juſtice;
Farwell friend, here let's part upon our pilgrimage,
It muſt be ſo, Cupid draws on our ſorrowes.
And where the lot lights——
Clara. I ſhall count it happineſſe,
Farewell deare friend.
Liſ. Firſt, let's relieve the Gentleman
That lyes hurt in your cauſe, and bring him off,
And take ſome cure for your hurts, then I will part too,
A third unfortunate, and willing wanderer. Exeunt.

Enter Olinda, and Caliſte.

Olin. My feares foreſaw 'twould come to this.
Cal. I would your ſentence had been milder.
Olin. 'Tis paſt helpe now.
Cal. I ſhare in your deſpaire, and yet my hopes
Have not quite left me, ſince all poſſible meanes
Are practiſed to prevent the miſchiefe following
Their mortall meeting, my Lord is coaſted one way;
My father, though his hurts forbad his travell,
Hath tooke another, my brother in Law Beronte,
A third, and every minute we muſt looke for
The certaine knowledge, which we muſt endure
With that calme patience heav'n ſhall pleaſe to lend us.

Enter Dorilaus, and Cleander, ſeverally.

Dor. Dead both?
Clea. Such is the rumour, and 'tis generall.
Olin. I heare my paſſing-bell.
Cal. I am in a ſwoun.
Clea. They ſay their ſeconds too; but what they are,
Is not known yet, ſome worthy fellows certain.
Dor. Where had you knowledge?
Clea. Of the Country people, 'tis ſpoken every where.
Dor. I heard it ſo too;
And 'tis ſo common, I do halfe beleeve it,
You have loſt a brother wench, he lov'd you well,
And might have liv'd to have done his countrie ſervice,
But he is gone, thou feld'ſt untimely Lidian,
But by a valiant hand, that's ſome ſmall comfort,
And tooke him with thee too, thou lov'ſt brave company,
Weeping will do no good, you loſt a ſervant,
He might have liv'd to have been your Maſter Lady,
But you fear'd that.
Olind. Good ſir, be tender to me,
The newes is bad enough, you need not preſſe it,
I lov'd him well, I lov'd 'em both.
Dor. It ſeemes ſo.
How many more have you to love ſo Lady?
They were both fooles to fight for ſuch a Fidle;
Certaine there was a dearth of noble anger,
When a ſlight woman was thought worth a quarrell.
Olin. Pray you thinke nobler.
Do. I'le tell thee what I thinke, the plague, war, famine,
Nay put in dice and drunkenneſſe, and thoſe
You'l grant are pretty helpes, kill not ſo many
(I meane ſo many noble) as your loves do,
Rather your lewdneſſe, I crave your mercy women.
Be not offended if I anger ye.
I am ſure ye have touch'd me deep, I came to be merry,
And with my children, but to ſee one ruin'd
By this fell accident——are they all dead?
If they be, ſpeake?
Clean. What newes?

Enter Beronte, Alcidon, Clarinda, following with a letter,

Ber. What dead? ye poſe me;
I underſtand you not.
Clea. My brother Lidian, Clarange, and their ſeconds.
Ber. Here is one of 'em, and ſure this Gentleman's alive.
Alc. I hope ſo, ſo is your ſon ſir, ſo is brave Clarange:
They fought indeed, and they were hurt ſufficiently;
We were all hurt, that bred the generall rumour,
But friends againe all, and like friends we parted.
Clea. Heard ye of Liſander?
Ber. Yes, and miſſ'd him narrowly:
He was one of the combatants, fought with this Gentle-
Second againſt your brother, by his wiſdome (man,
(For certainly good fortune followes him)
All was made peace, I'le tell you the reſt at dinner,
For we are hungry.
Alc. I before I eate
Muſt pay a vow I am ſworne to; my life Madam
Was at Liſander's mercy, I live by it;
And for the noble favour, he deſir'd me
To kiſſe your faire hand for him, offering
This ſecond ſervice as a Sacrifice
At the Altar of your vertues.
Dor. Come, joy on all ſides;
Heaven will not ſuffer honeſt men to periſh.
Clean. Be proud of ſuch a friend.
Dor. Forgive me Madam,
It was a griefe might have concern'd you neare too.
Clea. No worke of excellence but ſtill Liſander,
Go thy waies worthy. * Ex. Manet. Cal.
Olin. Wee'l be merry too, Clarin. ſtayes Caliſt.
Were I to ſpeake againe, I would be wiſer. *

Cal. Too much of this rare cordiall makes me ſick,
However I obey you.
Clarin. Now or never is an apt time to move her, Ma-
Cal. Who's that? (dam.
Clari. Your ſervant, I would ſpeake with your Ladyſhip.
Cal. Why doſt thou looke about?
Clarin. I have private buſineſſe
That none muſt heare but you. Liſander——
Cal. Where?
Clarin. Nay, is not here, but would entreat this favor,
Some of your Balſome from your own hand given,
For he is much hurt, and that he thinkes would cure him.
Cal. He ſhall have all, my prayers too.
Clarind. But conceive, me,
It muſt be from your ſelfe immediately,
Pitty ſo brave a Gentleman ſhould periſh,
He is ſuperſtitious, and he holds your hand
Of infinite power: I would not urge this Madam,
But only in a mans extreames, to helpe him.
Cal. Let him come (good wench) 'tis that I wiſh, I am
My husband his true friend, my noble father, (happy in't,
The faire Olinda, all deſire to ſee him;
He ſhall have many hands.
Clarind. That he deſires not,
Nor eyes, but yours to looke upon his miſeries,
For then he thinkes 'twould be no perfect cure (Madam)
He would come private.
Cal. How can that be here?
I ſhall do wrong unto all thoſe that honour him,
Beſides my credit.
Clarin. Dare ye not truſt a hurt man?
Not ſtraine a curteſie to ſave a Gentleman?
To ſave his life that has ſav'd all your family?
A man that comes like a poore mortifi'd Pilgrim;
Only to beg a bleſſing, and depart againe?
He would but ſee you, that he thinkes would cure him.
But ſince you find fit reaſons to the contrary,
And that it cannot ſtand with your cleare honour,
Though you beſt know how well he has deſerv'd of ye:
I'l ſend him word backe, though I grieve to do it,
Grieve at my ſoule, for certainly 'twill kill him,
What your will is.
Cal. Stay, I will thinke upon't; where is he wench?
Clarin. If you deſire to ſee him,
Let not that trouble you, he ſhall be with ye,
And in that time, that no man ſhall ſuſpect ye;
Your honour Madam, is in your own free keeping;
Your care in me, in him all honeſty;
If ye deſire him not, let him paſſe by ye:
And all this buſineſſe reckon but a dreame.
Cal. Go in, and counſell me, I would faine ſee him,
And willingly comfort him.
Clarin. 'Tis in your power.
And if you dare truſt me, you ſhall do it ſafely,
Read that, and let that tell you, how he honours you.
Exeunt.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter Clarinda, with a Key, and Leon.

Leon. THis happy night. Kiſſes her.
Clarin. Preſerve this eagerneſſe
Till we meet nearer, there is ſomething done
Will give us opportunity.
Leon. Witty girle, the plot?
Clarind. You ſhall heare that at leaſure,
The whole houſe reeles with joy at the report
Of Lidians ſafety, and that joy increas'd
From their affection to the brave Liſander,
In being made the happy inſtrument to compound
The bloudy difference.
Leon. They will heare ſhortly that
Will turne their mirth to mourning, he was then
The principall meanes to ſave two lives, but ſince
There are two ſlaine, and by his ſingle hand,
For which his life muſt anſwer, if the King,
Whoſe arme is long, can reach him. (this key,
Cla. We have now no ſpare time to heare ſtories, take
'Twill make your paſſage to the banquetting houſe
I'the garden free.
Leon. You will not faile to come?
Cla. For mine owne ſake ne're doubt it? now for Li- (ſander. Exit.
Enter Dorilaus, Cleander, Servants with lights.
Dor. To bed, to bed, 'tis very late.
Clea. To bed all, I have dranke a health too much,
Dor. You'l ſleep the better,
My uſuall phiſicke that way.
Clean. Where's your Miſtris?
Clarin. She is above, but very ill and aguiſh:
The late fright of her brother, has much troubl'd her;
She would entreate to lye alone.
Clea. Her pleaſure. (health,
Do. Commend my love to her, and my prayers for her
I'le ſee her ere I goe. Ex. Manet Clarin.
Clarin. All good reſt to ye:
Now to my watch for Liſander, when he's furniſh'd,
For mine own friend, ſince I ſtand Centinell,
I love to laugh i'th' evenings too, and may,
The priviledge of my place will warrant it. Exit.
Enter Liſander, and Lancelot.
Liſ. You have done well hetherto; where are we now?
Lan. Not far from the houſe, I heare by th'owles,
There are many of your welch falkoners about it;
Here were a night to chooſe to run away with
Another mans wife, and do the feate.
Liſ. Peace knave,
The houſe is here before us, and ſome may heare us;
The candles are all out.
Lanc. But one i'the parlor,
I ſee it ſimper hether, pray come this way.
Liſ. Step to the garden doore, and feele and't be open.
Lan. I am going, lucke deliver me from the ſaw pits,
Or I am buried quicke: I heare a dog,
No, 'tis a cricket, ha? here's a cuckold buried,
Take heed of his horns ſir, here's the doore, 'tis open.
Clarinda at the doore. Whoſe there?
Liſan. Friend.
Cla. Sir, Liſander?
Liſ. I.
Clarin. Ye are welcome, follow me, and make no noiſe.
Liſ. Go to your horſe, and keep your watch with care,
And be ſure ye ſleep not. Ex. Liſan. Clarin. (ſirah
Lanc. Send me out the dairy-maid
To play at trump with me, and keep me waking,
My fellow horſe, and I now muſt diſcourſe
Like two learned Almanack-makers, of the ſtars,
And tell what a plentifull year 'twil prove of drunkards,

If

If I had but a pottle of Sacke, like a ſharp prickle,
To knock my noſe againſt when I am nodding,
I ſhould ſing like a Nightingall, but I muſt
Keepe watch without it, I am apt to dance,
Good fortune guide me from the faires circles. Exit.

Enter Clarinda with a Taper, and Liſander with a Piſtole, two Chaires ſet out.

Clarin. Come neare, Caliſte ſitting behind a
I'le leave ye now, draw but that Curtaine,
And have your wiſh; now Leon I am for thee. Curtaine.
We that are ſervants muſt make uſe of ſtoln houres,
And be glad of ſnatch'd occaſions. Exit.
Liſand. Shee is aſleepe,
Fierce love hath cloſ'd his lights, I may looke on her,
Within her eyes 'has lock'd his graces up,
I may behold and live; how ſweet ſhe breathes?
The orient morning breaking out in odors,
Is not ſo full of perfumes, as her breath is;
She is the abſtract of all excellence, and ſcornes a paralell.
Cal. Who's there?
Lif. Your ſervant, your moſt obedient ſlave (adored
That comes but to behold thoſe eyes againe, (Lady)
And pay ſome vowes I have to ſacred beauty,
And ſo paſſe by; I am blind as ignorance,
And know not where I wander, how I live,
Till I receive from their bright influence
Light to direct me, for devotions ſake,
You are the Saint I tread theſe holy ſteps to.
And holy Saints are all relenting ſweetneſſe;
Be not inrag'd, nor be not angry with me;
The greateſt attribute of heaven is mercy;
And 'tis the crowne of juſtice, and the glory
Where it may kill with right, to ſave with pitty.
Cal. Why do you kneele, I know you come to mock me,
T' upbraid me with the benefits you have giv'n me,
Which are too many, and too mighty ſir,
For my returne; and I confeſſe 'tis juſtice,
That for my cruelty you ſhould deſpiſe me,
And I expect however you are calme now,
A foyle you ſtrive to ſet your cauſe upon,
It will breake out; Caliſte is unworthy,
Coy, proud, diſdainefull, I acknowledge all,
Colder of comfort than the frozen North is,
And more a ſtranger to Liſanders worth,
His youth and faith, then it becomes her gratitude,
I bluſh to grant it, yet take this along,
A ſoveraigne medicine to allay diſpleaſure,
May be an argument to bring me off too;
She is married, and ſhe is chaſte; how ſweet that ſounds?
How it perfumes all ayre 'tis ſpoken in?
O deare Liſander, would you breake this union?
Lif. No, I adore it: let me kiſſe your hand,
And ſeale the faire faith of a Gentleman on it.
Cal. You are truly valiant, would it not afflict you
To have the horrid name of coward touch you?
Such is the whore to me.
Lif. I nobly thanke ye;
And may I be the ſame when I diſhonour ye;
This I may do againe. (Kiſſing her hand.
Cal. Ye may, and worthily;
Such comforts maids may grant with modeſty,
And neither make her poore, nor wrong her bounty;
Noble Liſander, how fond now am I of ye?
I heard you were hurt.
Lif. You dare not heale me Lady?
I am hurt here; how ſweetly now ſhe bluſhes?
Excellent objects kill our ſight, ſhe blinds me;
The roſes in the pride of May ſhew pale to her;
O tyrant cuſtome! and O coward honour!
How ye compell me to put on mine owne chaines?
May I not kiſſe ye now in ſuperſtition?
For you appeare a thing that I would kneele to:
Let me erre that way. Kiſſes her.
Cal. Ye ſhall erre for once, I have a kind of noble pity on Among your manly ſuffer ings, make this moſt, (you,
To erre no farther in deſire, for then ſir,
Ye adde unto the gratitudes I owe you;
And after death, your deare friends ſoule ſhall bleſſe you.
Lif. I am wondrous honeſt.
Cal. I dare try. Kiſſes.
Lif. I have taſted a bleſſedneſſe too great for dull mor-
Once more and let me dye. (tality
Cal. I dare not murther,
How will maids curſe me if I kill with kiſſes?
And young men flye th' embraces of faire virgins?
Come pray ſit down, but let's talke temperately.
Lif. Is my deare friend a bed?
Cal. Yes, and aſleep;
Secure aſleep, 'tis midnight too Liſander,
Speake not ſo loud.
Lif. You ſee I am a Statue,
I could not ſtand elſe as I had eaten Ice,
Or tooke into my bloud a drowzie poyſon,
And natures nobleſt, brighteſt flame burne in me;
Midnight? and I ſtand quietly to behold ſo?
The alarme rung, and I ſleep like a coward?
I am worne away, my faith, and dull obedience
Like crutches, carry my decayed body
Down to the grave, I have no youth within me,
Yet happily you love too.
Cal. Love with honour.
Lif. Honour? what's that? 'tis but a ſpecious title
We ſhould not prize too high.
Cal. Dearer than life.
Lif. The value of it, is as time has made it,
And time and cuſtome have too far inſulted,
We are no Gods, to be alwaies tyed to ſtrictneſſe,
'Tis a preſumption to ſhew too like 'em;
March but an houre or two under loves enſignes,
We have examples of great memories ——
Cal. But foule ones too, that greatneſſe cannot cover;
That wife that by example ſins, ſins double,
And puls the curtaine open to her ſhame too;
Me thinkes to enjoy you thus ——
Lif. 'Tis no joy Lady,
A longing bride if ſhe ſtop here, would cry,
The Bridegroome too, and with juſt cauſe curſe Hymen;
But yeild a little, be one houre a woman,
(I do not ſpeake this to compell you Lady)
And give your will but motion, let it ſtirre
But in the taſte of that weake feares call evill,
Try it to underſtand it, wee'l do no thing,
You'l never come to know pure good elſe.
Cal. Fie ſir.
Lif. I have found a way, let's ſlip into this errour
As Innocents, that know not what we did;
As we were dreaming both let us embrace;
The ſin is none of ours then, but our fancies;
What have I ſaid? what blaſphemie to honour?
O my baſe thoughts I pray ye take this and ſhoot me.

My

My villaine thoughts? Noise within.
Cal. I weep your miserie, and would to heaven.--what
Lis. It comes on louder. (noise?
Kill me, and save your selfe; save your faire honour,
And lay the fault on me, let my life perish,
My base lascivious life, shoote quickely Lady,
Cal. Not for the world, retire behind the hangings,
And there stand close —my husband, close Lisander.
Clean. Deerest, are you well? Enter Cleander
Cal. O my sad heart; my head, my head. with a Taper.
Clea. Alas poore soule! what do you out of your bed?
You take cold my Caliste: how do ye?
Cal. Not so well sir to lye by ye, my brothers fright---
Clea. I had a frightfull dreame too,
A very frightfull dreame my best Caliste:
Me thought there came a Dragon to your Chamber,
A furious Dragon (wife) I yet shake at it:
Are all things well?
Lis. Shall I shoote him?
Cal. No. All well Sir.
'Twas but your care of me, your loving care,
Which alwaies watches.
Clean. And me thought he came
As if he had risen thus out of his den,
As I do from these hangings.
Lis. Dead.
Cal. Hold good Sir.
Clea. And tore'd ye in his armes thus.
Cal. 'Twas but fancie
That troubled ye, here's nothing to disturbe me,
Good sir to rest againe, and I am now drousie,
And will to bed; make no noise deare husband,
But let me sleep: before you can call any body I am a bed.
Clea. This, and sweet rest dwell with ye. Exit.
Cal. Come out againe, and as you love Lisander,
Make haste away, you see his mind is troubled:
Do you know the doore ye came at?
Lis. Well sweet Lady.
Cal. And can ye hit it readily?
Lis. I warrant ye;
And must I go? must here end all my happinesse?
Here in a dreame, as if it had no substance?
Cal. For this time friend, or here begin our ruines;
We are both miserable.
Lis. This is some comfort
In my afflictions; they are so full already,
They can find no encrease.
Cal. Deare speake no more.
Lis. You must be silent then.
Cal. Farewell Lisander, thou joy of man farewell.
Lis. Farewell bright Lady,
Honour of woman-kind, a heavenly blessing.
Cal. Be ever honest.
Lis. I will be a dog else;
The vertues of your mind I'le make my library,
In which I'le study the celestiall beauty:
Your constancie, my armour that I'le fight in:
And on my sword your chastity shall sit,
Terror to rebell bloud.
Cal. Once more farewell: Noise within.
O that my modestie cou'd hold you still sir, —he comes
Lis. Heaven keep my hand from murther, (againe.
Murther of him I love.
Cal. Away deare friend,
Down to the garden staires, that way Lisander,
We are betrai'd else. Ent. Clea.

Lis. Honour guard the Innocent. Exit. Lis.
Clean. Stil up? I fear'd your health.
Cal. 'Has miss'd him happily;
I am going now, I have done my meditations,
My heart's almost at peace.
Clea. To my warme bed then.
Cal. I will pray ye lead. A Pistoll shot within Clean. A Pistoll shot i'th' house?
At these houres? sure some theefe, some murtherer:
Rise ho, rise all, I am betraide.
Cal. O fortune!
O giddy thing! he has met some opposition,
And kil'd; I am confounded, lost for ever. Enter Dorilaus
Dor. Now, what's the matter?
Clea. Theeves, my noble father, villaines, and Rogues.
Dor. Indeed, I heard a Pistoll, let's search about.
Enter Malfort, Clarinda, and Servants.
Mal. To bed againe, they are gone sir,
I will not bid you thanke my valour for't;
Gone at the garden doore; there were a dozen,
And bravely arm'd, I saw 'em.
Clarin. I am glad, glad at the heart.
Ser. One shot at me, and miss'd me.
Mal. No, 'twas at me, the bullet flew close by me,
Close by my eare; another had a huge Sword,
Flourish'd it thus; but at the point I met him;
But the Rogue taking me to be your Lordship,
(As sure your name is terrible, and we
Not much unlike in the darke) roar'd out aloud,
'Tis the kill cow Dorilaus, and away
They ran as they had flowne: now you must love me,
Or feare me for my courage wench.
Clarin. O Rogue?
O lying Rogue, Lisander stumbled Madam,
At the staires head, and in the fall the shot went off;
Was gone before they rose.
Cal. I thanke heaven for't.
Clari. I was frighted too, it spoyl'd my game with Leon.
Cle. You must sit up; and they had come to your Chamber
What pranks would they have plaid: how came the doore
Ma. I heard 'em when they forc'd it; up I rose, (open?
Took Durindana in my hand; and like
Orlando, issu'd forth.
Clarin. I know you are valiant.
Clean. To bed again,
And be you henceforth provident, at sun-rising
We must part for a while.
Dor. When you are a bed,
Take leave of her, there 'twill be worth the taking;
Here 'tis but a cold ceremony, ere long
Wee'l find Lisander, or we have ill fortune.
Clea. Locke all the doores fast.
Mal. Though they all stood open,
My name writ on the doore, they dare not enter. Exeunt.

Enter Claran. Frier with a Letter.

Claran. Turnd Hermit?
Fri. Yes, and a devout one too: I heard him preach.
Claran. That lessens my beliefe,
For though I grant my Lidian a scholler
As far as fits a Gentleman, he hath studied
Humanity, and in that he is a Master;
Civility of manners, courtship, Armes;
But never aim'd at (as I could perceive)
The deep points of divinity.

Fri. That confirmes his
Devotion to be reall, no way tainted
With oſtentation, or hypocriſie,
The cankers of Religion; his ſermon
So full of gravity, and with ſuch ſweetneſſe
Deliver'd, that it drew the admiration
Of all the hearers on him; his own letters
To you, which witneſſe he will leave the world,
And theſe to faire Olinda, his late Miſtris,
In which he hath with all the moving language
That ever expreſſ'd Rhetorick, ſollicited
The Lady to forget him, and make you
Bleſſed in her embraces, may remove
All ſcrupulous doubts.
Claran. It ſtrikes a ſadneſſe in me,
I know not what to thinke o't.
Fri. Ere he entred
His ſollitary cell, he pen'd a ditty,
His long and laſt farewell to love, and women,
So feelingly, that I confeſſe however
It ſtands not with my order to be taken
With ſuch Poeticall raptures; I was mov'd,
And ſtrangely with it.
Claran. Have you the copy?
Fri. Yes ſir:
My Novice too can ſing it, if you pleaſe
To give him hearing.
Claran. And it will come timely,
For I am full of melancholy thoughts,
Againſt which I have heard with reaſon Muſick
To be the ſpeedieſt cure, pray you apply it.

A Song by the Novice.

Adieu fond love, farewell you wanton powers,
I am free againe;
Thou dull diſeaſe of bloud and Idle howers.
Bewitching paine,
Flie to the fooles that ſigh away their time.
My nobler love to heaven clime,
And there behold beauty ſtill young,
That time can ne're corrupt, nor death deſtroy;
Immortall ſweetneſſe by faire Angels ſung,
And honour'd by eternity and joy:
There lives my love, thether my hopes aſpire;
Fond love declines, this heavenly love growes higher.

Fri. How do ye approve it?
Claran. To its due deſert,
It is a heavenly Hymne, no ditty father,
It paſſes through my eares unto my ſoule,
And workes divinely on it; give me leave
A little to conſider; ſhall I be
Out done in all things? nor good of my ſelfe,
Nor by example? ſhall my looſe hopes ſtill,
The viands of a fond affection, feed me
As I were a ſenſuall beaſt, ſpirituall food
Refuſ'd by my ſicke pallat? 'tis reſolv'd.
How far off father, doth this new made Hermit
Make his abode?
Fri. Some two dayes journey ſon.
Claran. Having reveal'd my faire intentions to ye,
I hope your piety will not deny me
Your aides to further 'em?
Fri. That were againſt a good mans charity.
Claran. My firſt requeſt is,
You would ſome time, for reaſons I will ſhew you,
Defer delivery of Lidians Letters
To faire Olinda.
Fri. Well ſir.
Claran. For what followes,
You ſhall direct me; ſomething I will do,
A new borne zeale, and friendſhip prompts me to. Ex.

Enter Dorilaus, Cleander, Chamberlaine, Table, Tapers, and three ſtooles.

Clea. We have ſupp'd well friend; let our beds be ready,
We muſt be ſtirring early,
Cham. They are made ſir.
Dor. I cannot ſleep yet, where's the joviall hoſt
You told me of? 'tas been my cuſtome ever
To parley with mine hoſt.
Clea. He's a good fellow,
And ſuch a one I know you love to laugh with;
Go call your Maſter up.
Cham. He cannot come ſir.
Dor. Is he a bed with his wife?
Cham. No certainly.
Dor. Or with ſome other gheſts?
Cham. Neither and't like ye.
Clea. Why then he ſhall come by your leave my friend,
I'le fetch him up my ſelfe.
Cham. Indeed you'l faile ſir.
Dor. Is he i'th' houſe?
Cham. No, but he is hard by ſir;
He is faſt in's grave, he has been dead theſe three weekes.
Dor. Then o' my conſcience he will come but lamely,
And diſcourſe worſe.
Clean. Farewell mine honeſt Hoſt then,
Mine honeſt merry Hoſt, will you to bed yet?
Dor. No, not this houre, I prethee ſit and chat by me.
Clean. Give us a quart of wine then, wee'l be merry.
Dor. A match my ſon; pray let your wine be living,
Or lay it by your Maſter.
Cham. It ſhall be quick ſir. Exit.
Dor. Has not mine Hoſt a wife?
Clean. A good old woman.
Dor. Another coffine, that is not ſo handſome;
Your Hoſteſſes in Innes ſhould be blith things,
Pretty, and young to draw in paſſengers;
She'l never fill her beds well, if ſhe be not beauteous.
Clean. And curteous too. Enter Chamberlaine
Dor. I, I, and a good fellow, with wine.
That will miſtake ſometimes a Gentleman
For her good man; well done; here's to Liſander.
Clean. My full love meets it; make fire in our lodgings,
Wee'l trouble thee no farther, to your Son. Ex. Cham.
Dor. Put in Clarange too; off with't, I thanke ye;
This wine drinkes merrier ſtill, O for mine Hoſt now,
Were he alive againe, and well diſpos'd,
I would ſo claw his pate.
Clean. Y'are a hard drinker.
Dor. I love to make mine Hoſt drunke, he will lye then
The rareſt, and the roundeſt, of his friends,
His quarrels, and his gheſts, and they are the beſt bauds too
Take 'em in that tune.
Clean. You know all.
Dor. I did ſon, but time, and armes have worne me out
Clea. 'Tis late ſir, I heare none ſtirring. A lute is ſtruck.
Dor. Hark, what's that, a Lute?
'Tis at the doore I thinke.

Clea.

Clean. The doores are shut fast.
Dor. 'Tis morning sure, the Fidlers are got up
To fright mens sleepes, have we ne're a pispot ready?
Clea. Now I remember, I have heard mine Host that's dead,
Touch a lute rarely, and as rarely sing too,
A brave still meane.
Dor. I would give a brace of French Crownes
To see him rise and Fidle.

A Song.

'Tis late and cold, stirre up the fire;
Sit close, and draw the Table nigher;
Be merry, and drinke wine that's old,
A hearty medicine 'gainst a cold.
Your beds of wanton downe the best,
Where you shall tumble to your rest;
I could wish you wenches too,
But I am dead and cannot do;
Call for the best the house may ring,
Sacke, White, and Claret let them bring,
And drinke a apace while breath you have,
You'l find but cold drinke in the grave;
Plover, Patridge for your dinner,
And a Capon for the sinner,
You shall find ready when you are up,
And your horse shall have his sup:
Welcome shall flye round,
And I shall smile though under ground.

Clean. Harke, a Song, now as I live, it is his voice.
Dor. He sings well, the devill has a pleasant pipe.
Clea. The fellow lyed sure. Enter Host.
He is not dead, he's here: how pale he lookes?
Dor. Is this he?
Clean. Yes.
Host. You are welcome noble Gentlemen,
My brave old ghest most welcome.
Clean. Lying knaves,
To tell us you were dead, come sit downe by us,
We thanke ye for your Song.
Host. Would 't had been better.
Dor. Speake, are ye dead?
Host. Yes indeed am I Gentlemen,
I have been dead these three weekes.
Dor. Then here's to ye, to comfort your cold body.
Clean. What do ye meane? stand further off.
Dor. I will stand nearer to him,
Shall he come out on's coffin to beare us company,
And we not bid him welcome? come mine Host,
Mine honest Host, here's to ye.
Host. Spirits sir, drinke not?
Clea. Why do ye appeare?
Host. To waite upon ye Gentlemen,
'Twas been my duty living, now my farewell;
I feare ye are not us'd accordingly.
Dor. I could wish you warmer company mine Host,
How ever we are us'd?
Host. Next to entreate a courtesie,
And then I goe to peace.
Clea. Is't in our power?
Host. Yes and 'tis this, to see my body buried
In holy ground, for now I lye unhallowed,
By the clarkes fault; let my new grave be made
Amongst good fellowes, that have died before me,
And merry Hostes of my kind.
Clea. It shall be done.
Dor. And forty stoopes of wine dranke at thy funerall.
Clea. Do you know our travell?
Host. Yes, to seeke your friends,
That in afflictions wander now.
Clean. Alas!
Host. Seeke 'em no farther, but be confident
They shall returne in peace.
Dor. There's comfort yet.
Clea. Pray ye one word more, is't in your power mine Host,
Answer me softly, some houres before my death,
To give me warnin?
Host. I cannot tell ye truly,
But if I can, so much alive I lov'd ye,
I will appeare againe, adieu. Exit.
Dor. Adieu sir.
Clean. I am troubl'd; these strange apparitions are
For the most part farall:
Dor. This if told, will not
Find credit, the light breakes a pace, let's lye downe
And take some little rest, an houre or two,
Then do mine hostes desire, and so returne,
I do beleeve him.
Clean. So do I, to rest sir. Exeunt.

Enter Calipte, and Clarinda.

Cal. Clarinda?
Clarin. Madam.
Cal. Is the house well ordered?
The doores look'd to now in your Masters absence?
Your care, and diligence amongst the Servants?
Clarin. I am stirring Madam.
Cal. So thou art Clarinda,
More then thou ought'st I am sure, why dost thou blush?
Clarin. I do not blush.
Cal. Why dost thou hang thy head wench?
Clarin. Madam, ye are deceiv'd, I looke upright,
I understand ye not: she has spied Leon, aside.
Shame of his want of caution.
Cal. Looke on me; what, blush againe?
Clarin. 'Tis more then I know Madam;
I have no cause that I find yet.
Cal. Examine then.
Clarin. Your Ladyship is set I thinke to shame me.
Cal. Do not deserve't. who lay with you last night?
What bedfellow had ye? none of the maids came neare ye.
Clarin. Madam they did.
Cal. 'Twas one in your Cosins cloathes then,
And wore a sword; and sure I keep no Amazons.
Wench do not lye, 'twill but proclaime thee guilty;
Lyes hide our sins like nets; like perspectives,
They draw offences nearer still, and greater:
Come tell the truth.
Clarin. You are the strangest Lady
To have these doubts of me; how have I liv'd Madam?
And which of all my carefull services deserves these shames?
Cal. Leave facing? 'twill not serve ye,
This impudence becomes thee worse then lying.
I thought ye had liv'd well, and I was proud on't;
But you are pleas'd to abuse my thoughts, who am I?
Honest repentance yet will make the fault lesse.
Clarin. Do ye compell me? do you stand to't too?
Nay then have at ye; I shall rub the sore Madam,
(Since ye provoke me) will but vexe your Ladyship,
Let me alone.
Cal. I will know.
Clarin. For your own peace,
The peace of your owne conscience aske no further;

Walke in, and let me alone.
Cal. No, I will know all.
Clarin. Why, then I'le tell ye, 'twas a man I lay with,
Never admire, 'tis eafie to be done, Madam,
And uſuall too, a proper man I lay with;
Why ſhould you vexe at that? young as Liſander,
And able too; I grudge not at your pleaſure,
Why ſhould you ſtir at mine? I ſteale none from ye,
Cal. And doſt thou glory in this ſin?
Clarin. I am glad on't, to glory in't is for a mighty Lady
That may command.
Cal. Why didſt thou name Liſander?
Clarin. Does it anger ye? does it a little gall ye?
I know it does, why would ye urge me Lady?
Why would ye be ſo curious to compell me?
I nam'd Liſander as my preſident,
The rule I err'd by, you love him, I know it,
I grudg'd not at it, but am pleas'd it is ſo;
And by my care and diligence you enjoy'd him.
Shall I for keeping counſell, have no comfort?
Will you have all your ſelfe? ingroſſe all pleaſure?
Are ye ſo hard hearted? why do ye bluſh now Madam?
Cal. My anger bluſhes, not my ſhame baſe woman.
Clar. I'le make your ſhame bluſh, ſince you put me to't
Who lay with you t'other night?
Cal. With me? ye monſter.
Clarin. Whoſe ſweet embraces circled ye? not your huſ-
I wonder ye dare touch me in this point Madam? (bands;
Stir her againſt ye in whoſe hand your life lies?
More then your life your honour? what ſmug Amazon
Was that I brought you? that maid had ne're a petticoat?
Cal. She'l halfe perſwade me anon, I am a beaſt too,
And I miſtruſt my ſelfe, though I am honeſt
For giving her the Helme, thou knoweſt Clarinda,
(Ev'n in thy conſcience) I was ever vertuous;
As far from luſt in meeting with Liſander
As the pure wind in welcoming the morning;
In all the converſation I had with him,
As free, and innocent, as you'd faire heaven;
Didſt not thou perſwade me too?
Clarin. Yes, I had reaſon for't,
And now you are perſwaded I'le make uſe on't.
Cal. If I had ſin'd thus, and my youth entic'd me,
The nobleneſſe and beauty of his perſon,
Beſide the mighty benefits I am bound to,
Is this ſufficient warrant for thy weakeneſſe?
If I had been a whore, and crav'd thy counſell
In the conveyance of my fault, and faithfulneſſe,
Thy ſecrecie, and truth in hiding of it;
Is it thy juſtice to repay me thus?
To be the Maſter ſinner to compell me?
And build thy luſts ſecurity on mine honour?
Clarin. They that love this ſin, love their ſecurity;
Prevention Madam is the naile I knock'd at,
And I have hit it home, and ſo I'le hold it,
And you muſt pardon me, and be ſilent too,
And ſuffer what ye ſee, and ſuffer patiently;
I ſhall do worſe elſe.
Cal. Thou canſt not touch my credit,
Truth will not ſuffer me to be abus'd thus. (Madam,
Clarin. Do not you ſticke to truth, ſhe is ſeldome heard
A poore weake tongue ſhe has, and that is hoarſe too
With pleading at the bars, none underſtands her,
Or if you had her, what can ſhe ſay for ye?
Muſt ſhe not ſweare he came at midnight to ye,
The doore left open, and your husband cozen'd
With a feign'd ſickneſſe?
Cal. But by my ſoule I was honeſt, thou know'ſt I was Clarin. That's all one what I know, (honeſt.
What I will teſtifie is that ſhall vexe ye;
Truſt not a guilty rage with likelihoods,
And on apparent proofe, take heed of that Madam;
If you were innocent (as it may be ye are)
I do not know, I leave it to your conſcience,
It were the weakeſt and the pooreſt part of ye,
Men being ſo willing to beleeve the worſt,
So open eyed in this age to all infamie,
To put your fame in this weake barke to the venture.
Cal. What do I ſuffer? O my pretious honour,
Into what boxe of evils have I lock'd thee?
Yet rather then be thus ourbrav'd, and by
My drudg, my footſtoole, one that ſued to be ſo;
Periſh both life, and honour, devill thus
I dare thy worſt, defie thee, ſpit at thee,
And in my vertuous rage, thus trample on thee;
Awe me thy Miſtris, whore, to be thy baud?
Out of my houſe, proclame all that thou knoweſt,
Or malice can invent, fetch jealouſie
From hell, and like a furie breath it in
The boſome of my Lord; and to thy utmoſt
Blaſt my faire fame, yet thou ſhalt feele with horror
To thy fear'd conſcience, my truth is built
On ſuch a firme baſe, that if e're it can
Be forc'd, or undermin'd by thy baſe ſcandals,
Heaven keeps no guard on Innocence. Exit.
Clarin. I am loſt,
In my owne hopes forſaken, and muſt fall.
The greateſt torment to a guilty woman
Without revenge, till I can faſhion it
I muſt ſubmit, at leaſt appeare as if
I did repent, and would offend no farther.
Monſieur Beronie my Lords brother is Oblieg'd unto me for a private favour;
'Tis he muſt mediate for me; but when time
And opportunity bids me ſtrike, my wreake
Shall powre it ſelfe on her nice chaſtitie
Like to a torrent, deeds, not words ſhall ſpeake me. Exit.

Actus Quartus. Scena prima.

Enter Alcidon, and Beronie ſeverally.

Alc. YEare opportunely met. (feare.
Ber. Your countenance expreſſes haſt mixt with ſome
Alc. You'l ſhare with me in both, as ſoone as you are Acquainted with the cauſe, if you love vertue, (made
In danger, not ſecure; I have no time
For circumſtance, inſtruct me if Liſander
Be in your fathers houſe?
Ber. Upon my knowledge he is not there.
Alc. I am glad on't.
Ber. Why good ſir?
(Without offence I ſpeake it) there's no place
In which he is more honour'd, or more ſafe,
Then with his friend Cleander.
Alc. In your votes
I grant it true, but as it now ſtands with him,
I can give reaſon to make ſatisfaction
For what I ſpeake; you cannot but remember
The ancient difference between Liſander

And

And Cloridon, a man in grace at Court?
Berou. I do; and the foule plot of Cloridons kinſmen
Upon Liſanders life, for a fall given to Cloridon
'Fore the King, as they encountred at a ſolemne tilting.
Alcid. It is now reveng'd:
In briefe a challenge was brought to Liſander
By one Chryſantes; and as far as valour
Would give him leave, declin'd by bold Liſander:
But peace refus'd, and braves on braves heap'd on him,
Alone he met the oppoſites, ending the quarrell
With both their lives.
Ber. I am truely ſorry for't.
Alc. The King incenſed for his favourites death,
Hath ſet a price upon Liſanders head,
As a reward to any man that brings it
Alive, or dead; to gaine this, every where
He is purſu'd, and laid for, and the friendſhip
Between him and your noble brother knowne,
His houſe in reaſon cannot paſſe unſearcht,
And that's the principall cauſe that drew me hither,
To haſten his remove, if he had choſen
This Caſtle for his ſanctuary.
Ber. 'Twas done nobly,
And you moſt welcome; this night pray you take
A lodging with us; and at my intreaty
Conceale this from my brother, he is growne
Exceeing ſad of late; and the hard fortune
Of one he values at ſo high a rate,
Will much encreaſe his melancholy.
Alc. I am tutor'd; pray you lead the way.
Ber. To ſerve you I will ſhew it. Exeunt.

Enter Cleander with a book.

Cle. Nothing more certaine then to dye, but when
Is moſt uncertaine: if ſo, every houre
We ſhould prepare us for the journey, which
Is not to be put off. I muſt ſubmit
To the divine decree, not argue it,
And chearfully I welcome it: I have
Diſpos'd of my eſtate, confeſs'd my ſinnes,
And have remiſſion from my Ghoſtly Father,
Being at peace too here: the apparition
Proceeded not from fancy, Dorilaus
Saw it, and heard it with me, it made anſwer
To our demands, and promis'd, if 'twere not
Deny'd to him by fate, he would forewarne me
Of my approaching end. I feele no ſymptome
Of ſickneſſe, yet I know not how a dulneſſe
Invades me all over. Ha? Enter Hoſt.
Hoſt. I come ſir,
To keep my promiſe; and as farre as ſpirits
Are ſenſible of ſorrow for the living,
I grieve to be the meſſenger to tell you,
Ere many houres paſſe, you muſt reſolve
To fill a grave.
Cle. And feaſt the wormes?
Hoſt. Even ſo ſir.
Cleon. I heare it like a man.
Hoſt. It well becomes you, there's no evading it.
Cleon. Can you diſcover by whoſe means I muſt dye?
Hoſt. That is deny'd me:
But my prediction is too ſure; prepare
To make your peace with heaven. So farewell ſir, Ex.
Cle. I ſee no enemy neare; and yet I tremble
Like a pale Coward: my ſad doom pronounc'd
By this ſeriall voice, as in a glaſſe
Shewes me my death in its moſt dreadfull ſhape.
What rampire can my humane frailty raiſe
Againſt the aſſault of fate? I doe begin
To feare my ſelfe, my inward ſtrengths forſake me,
I muſt call out for helpe. Within there? haſte,
And break in to my reſcue.

Enter Dorilaus, Caliſte, Olinda, Berouns, Alcidon, Servants and Clarinda at ſeverall doores.

Dor. Reſcue? where? ſhew me your danger.
Cal. I will interpoſe
My loyall breaſt between you and all hazzard.
Ber. Your brothers ſword ſecures you.
Alc. A true friend will dye in your defence.
Cleon. I thanke yee,
To all my thanks. Encompaſs'd thus with friends
How can I feare? and yet I doe, I am wounded,
Mortally wounded: nay it is within,
I am hurt in my minde: One word—
Dor. A thouſand.
Cle. I ſhall not live to ſpeak ſo many to you.
Dor. Why? what forbids you?
Cle. But even now the ſpirit
Of my dead Hoſt appear'd, and told me, that
This night I ſhould be with him: did you not meet it?
It went out at that doore.
Dor. A vaine Chymera
Of your imagination: can you thinke
Mine Hoſt would not as well have ſpoke to me now,
As he did in the Inne? theſe waking dreames
Not alone trouble you, but ſtrike a ſtrange
Diſtraction in your family: ſee the teares
Of my poore daughter, faire Olinda's ſadneſſe,
Your brothers and your friends griefe, ſervants ſorrow.
Good ſonne beare up, you have many yeares to live
A comfort to us all: let's in to ſupper;
Ghoſts never walke till after mid-night, if
I may believe my Grannam. We will waſh
Theſe thoughts away with wine, ſpight of Hobgoblins.
Cle. You reprehend me juſtly: gentle Madam,
And all the reſt, forgive me, Ile endeavour
To be merry with you.
Dor. That's well ſaid.
Beron. I have procur'd your pardon.
Cal. Once more I receive you
Into my ſervice: but take ſpeciall care
You fall no further.
Clar. Never Madam: ſir,
When you ſhall finde fit time to call me to it,
I will make good what I have ſaid.
Ber. Till when, upon your life be ſilent.
Dor. We will have a health unto Liſander.
Cle. His name ſir
Somewhat revives me; but his ſight would cure me.
How ever let's to ſupper.
Olin. Would Clarange
And Lidian were here too, as they ſhould be,
If wiſhes cou'd prevaile.
Cal. They are fruitleſſe Madam. Ex. Enter Leon.
Leon. If that report ſpeak truth, Clarinda is Diſcharg'd her Ladies ſervice, and what burthen,
I then have drawne upon me is apparent,
The crop ſhe reapt from her attendance was
Her beſt Revenue, and my principall meanes
Clarinda's bountie, though I labour'd hard for't,
A younger brothers fortune: Muſt I now
Have ſoure ſawce after ſweet meats? and be driv'n
To leavie halfe a Crown a week, beſides

Cloths

Clouts, ſope, and candles, for my heire apparent,
If ſhe prove, as ſhe ſweares ſhe is with childe;
Such as live this way, finde like me, though wenching
Hath a faire face, there's a Dragon in the taile of't
That ſtings toth' quick. I muſt skulke here, untill
I am reſolv'd: how my heart pants between
My hopes and feares? ſhee's come; are we in the Port?
If not, let's ſink together.

Enter Clarinda.

Clar. Things goe better
Then you deſerve; you carry things ſo openly,
I muſt beare every way, I am once more
In my Ladies grace.

Leon. And I in yours.

Clar. It may be; but I have ſworne unto my Lady never
To ſinne againe.

Leon. To be ſurpriz'd——the ſinne
Is in it ſelfe excuſable; to be taken
Is a crime, as the Poet writes.

Clar. You know my weakneſſe,
And that makes you ſo confident. You have got
A faire ſword; was it not Liſanders?

Leon. Yes wench,
And I growne valiant by the wearing of it:
It hath been the death of two. With this Liſander
Slew Cloridon, and Chryſanthes. I took it up,
Broken in the handle, but that is reform'd,
And now in my poſſeſsion; the late Maſter
Dares never come to challenge it: this ſword,
And all the weapons that I have, are ever
Devoted to thy ſervice: Shall we bill?
I am very gameſome.

Clar. I muſt firſt diſpoſe of
The foole Malfort; he hath ſmoak'd you, and is not,
But by ſome new device to be kept from me:
I have it here ſhall fit him: you know where
You muſt expect me, with all poſſible ſilence
Get thither.

Leon. You will follow?

Clar. VVill I live?
She that is forfeited to luſt muſt dye,
That humour being un-fed; begone, here comes Exit Le.
My champion in Armour. Ent. Malf. in Armour.

Malf. What adventure
I am bound upon I know not, but it is
My Miſtris pleaſure that I ſhould appeare thus.
I may perhaps be terrible to others,
But as I am, I am ſure my ſhadow frights me,
The claſhing of my Armour in my eares,
Sounds like a paſſing-bell; and my Buckler, puts me
In minde of a Beere; this my broad ſword a pick-axe
To dig my grave: O love, abominable love,
What Monſters iſſue from thy diſmall den,
Clarinda's placket, which I muſt encounter,
Or never hope to enter?

Clar. Here's a Knight errant, Monſieur Malfort.

Malf. Stand, ſtand, or I'le fall for yee.

Clar. Know ye not my voice?

Malf. Yes, 'twas at that I trembl'd.
But were my falſe friend Leon here——

Clar. 'Tis he.

Malf. Where? where?

Clar. He is not come yet.

Malf. 'Tis well for him,
I am ſo full of wrath.

Clar. Or feare——This Leon,
How 'ere my kinſman, hath abus'd you groſſely,
And this night vowes to take me hence perforce,
And marry me to another: 'twas for this,
(Preſuming on your love) I did entreat you
To put your armour on, that with more ſafety
You might defend me.

Mal. And I'le doe it bravely.

Clar. You muſt ſtand here to beate him off, and ſuffer
No humane thing to paſſe you, though it appeare
In my Lords ſhape, or Ladies: be not cozen'd
With a diſguiſe.

Mal. I have been fool'd already, but now I am wiſe.

Car. You muſt ſweare not to ſtirre hence.

Malf. Upon theſe lips.

Clar. Nor move untill I call you?

Malf. Ile grow here rather.

Clar. This nights taske well ended,
I am yours to morrow. Keep ſure guard. Exit Cla.

Malf. Adiew;
My honey-combe how ſweet thou art, did not
A neſt of Hornets keep it? what impoſſibilities
Love makes me undertake? I know my ſelfe
A naturall coward, and ſhould Leon come,
Though this were Cannon proofe, I ſhould deliver
The wench before he ask'd her. I heare ſome footing:
'Tis he; where ſhall I hide my ſelfe? that is
My beſt defence.

Enter Cleander.

Cle. I cannot ſleep, ſtrange viſions
Make this poore life, I fear'd of late to loſe,
A toy that I grow weary of.

Malf. 'Tis Leon.

Clean. What's that?

Mal. If you are come ſir for Clarinda;
I am glad I have her for you; I reſigne
My intereſt; you'll finde her in her chamber,
I did ſtay up to tell you ſo.

Clean. Clarinda, and Leon!
There is ſomething more in this
Then I can ſtay to aske. Exit.

Malf. What a cold pickle,
(And that none of the ſweeteſt) doe I finde
My poore ſelfe in?

Clean. ſpeaks within. Yield villaine.

Enter Clarinda and Leon, running. Cleander following.

Clar. 'Tis my Lord,
Shift for your ſelfe.

Leon. His life
Shall firſt make anſwer } Kills Clean-
For this intruſion. } der.

Malf. I am going away,
I am gone already. Falls in a ſwoune.

Clean. Heaven take mercy on
My ſoule; too true preſaging Hoſt.

Clar. Hee's dead,
And this wretch little better:
Doe you ſtare upon your
Handy-work?

Leon. I am amaz'd.

Clar. Get o're the garden Wall, flye for your life,
But leave your ſword behinde; enquire not why:
I'le faſhion ſomething out of it, though I periſh,
Shall make way for revenge.

Leon.

Leon. Theſe are the fruits
Of luſt Clarinda.
Clar. Hence repenting Milk-ſop. Ex. Leon.
Now 'tis too late. Liſanders ſword, I that, } Puts the
That is the baſe lle build on. So. Ile raiſe } ſword in
The houſe. Help, murther, a moſt horrid } Malf. hand.
Murther. Monſieur Beronte, noble Dorilaus,
All buried in ſleep? Aye me a murther:
A moſt unheard-of murther.
Enter Dorilaus as from bed.
Dor. More lights knaves;
Beronte, Alcidon, more lights.
Enter Beronte, Alcidon, and Servants, with lights
Clar. By this I ſee too much.
Dor. My ſonne Cleander bathing
In his owne gore. The devill to tell truth ith'ſhape of An Hoſt!
Ber. My Brother?
Malf. I have been
Ith'other world, in hell I think, theſe devills
With fire-brands in their pawes ſent to torment me,
Though I never did the deed, for my lewd purpoſe
To be a whore-maſter.
Dor. Who's that?
Alc. 'Tis one in Armour. A bloudy ſword in his hand.
Dor. Sans queſtion the murtherer.
Malf. Who I? you doe me wrong,
I never had the heart to kill a Chicken;
Nor doe I know this ſword.
Alc. I doe, too well.
Ber. I have ſeen Liſander weare it.
Clar. This confirmes
What yeſter-night I whiſper'd: let it worke,
The circumſtance may make it good.
Mal. My Lord? and I his murtherer?
Ber. Drag the villaine hence,
The Rack ſhall force a free confeſſion from him.
Mal. I am ſtrook dumbe;
You need not ſtop my mouth.
Ber. Away with him. Exit with Malf.
Enter Caliſte and Olinda.
Cal. Where is my Lord?
Dor. All that
Remaines of him lies there: look on this object,
And then turne marble.
Cal. I am ſo already,
Made fit to be his monument: but wherefore
Doe you, that have both life and motion left you,
Stand ſad ſpectators of his death,
And not bring forth his murtherer?
Ber. That lies in you: you muſt, and ſhal produce him.
Dor. She Beronte?
Ber. None elſe.
Dor. Thou ly'ſt, Ile prove it on thy head,
Or write it on thy heart.
Alc. Forbeare, there is Too much bloud ſhed already,
Ber. Let not choler
Stifle your judgement: many an honeſt father
Hath got a wicked daughter. If I prove not
With evident proofes, her hand was in the bloud
Of my deare brother, (too good a husband for her)
Give your revenge the reines, and ſpur it forward.
Dor. In any circumſtance but ſhew her guilty,
Ile ſtrike the firſt ſtroak at her.
Ber. Let me aske
A queſtion calmly: doe you know this ſword?
Have you not ſeen Liſander often weare it.
Dor. The ſame with which he reſcued me.
Cal. I do, What inference from this to make me guilty?
Ber. Was he not with you in the houſe to night?
Cal. No on my ſoule.
Ber. Nor ever heretofore
In private with you, when you feign'd a ſickneſſe,
To keep your husband abſent?
Cal. Never ſir, to a diſhoneſt end.
Ber. Was not this woman
Your inſtrument? her ſilence does confeſſe it:
Here lyes Cleander dead, and here the ſword
Of falſe Liſander, too long cover'd with
A maſque of ſeeming truth.
Dor. And is this all
The proofe you can alleage? Liſander guilty,
Or my poore daughter an adultereſſe?
Suppoſe that ſhe had chang'd diſcourſe with one
To whom ſhe ow'd much more?
Cal. Thou haſt thy ends, wicked Clarinda. She falls.
Oli. Helpe, the Lady ſinks, malice hath kill'd her.
Dor. I would have her live,
Since I dare ſweare ſhee's innocent: 'tis no time
Or place to argue now: this cauſe muſt be Decided by the Judge; and though a Father,
I will deliver her into the hands
Of Juſtice. If ſhe prove true gold when try'd,
Shee's mine: if not, with curſes Ile diſclaime her:
Take up your part of ſorrow, mine ſhall be Ready to anſwer with her life the fact
That ſhe is charg'd with.
Ber. Sir, I look upon you as on a father.
Dor. With the eyes of ſorrow
I ſee you as a brother: let your witneſſes
Be readie.
Ber. 'Tis my care.
Alc. I am for Lidian.
This accident no doubt will draw him from
His Hermits life.
Clar. Things yet goe right, perſiſt ſir. Exeunt.
Enter Liſander, and Lancelot.
Liſ. Are the horſes dead?
Lanc. Out-right. If you ride at this rate,
You muſt reſolve to kill your two a day,
And that's a large proportion.
Liſ. Will you pleate
At any price, and ſpeedily, to get freſh ones.
You know my danger, and the penalty
That followes it, ſhould I be apprehended.
Your duty in obeying my commands,
Will in a better language ſpeak your ſervice,
Then your unneceſſary, and untimely care of my expence.
Lanc. I am gone ſir. Exit.
Liſan. In this thicket
I will expect you: Here yet I have leiſure
To call my ſelfe to a ſtrict account
For my paſs'd life, how vainly ſpent: I would
I ſtood no farther guilty: but I have
A heavier reckoning to make: This hand
Of late as white as innocence, and unſpotted,
Now weares a purple colour, dy'd in gore,
My ſoule of the ſame tincture; pur-blinde paſſion,
With flattering hopes, would keep me from deſpaire,
Pleading I was provok'd to it; but my reaſon
Breaking ſuch thin and weak defences, tells me

I have

I have done a double murther; and for what?
Was it in service of the King? his Edicts
Command the contrary: or for my Countrey?
Her Genius, like a mourning mother, answers
In Cleriden and Chrysanthes she hath lost
Two hopefull sonnes, that might have done their parts,
To guard her from Invasion: for what cause then?
To keep th'opinion of my valour upright,
Ith' popular breath, a sandy ground to build on;
Bought with the Kings displeasure, as the breac
Of heavens decrees, the losse of my true comforts,
In Parents, Kinsmen, friends, as the fruition
Of all that I was borne to, and that sits
Like to a hill of Lead here, in my exile,
(Never to be repeal'd, if I escape so)
I have cut off all hopes ever to look on

Enter Lidian, like a Hermite.

Divine Caliste, from her sight, and converse,
For ever banish'd.

Lid. I should know this voice,
His naming too my sister, whom Lisander
Honour'd, but in a noble way, assures me
That it can be no other: I stand bound
To comfort any man I finde distress'd:
But to ayd him that sav'd my life, Religion
And Thankfulnesse commands, and it may be
High providence for this good end hath brought him
Into my solitary walke. Lisander, noble Lisander.

Lis. Whatsoe're thou art,
That honourable attribute thou giv'st me,
I can pretend no right to: come not neare me,
I am infectious, the sanctity
Of thy profession (for thou appearest
A reverend Hermite) if thou flye not from me,
As from the plague or leprosie, cannot keep thee
From being polluted.

Lid. With good counsell sir,
And holy prayers to boot I may cure you,
Though both wayes so infected. You look wildly,
Peace to your conscience sir, and stare upon me,
As if you never saw me: hath my habit
Alter'd my face so much, that yet you know not
Your servant Lidian?

Lis. I am amaz'd!
So young, and so religious? (the world:

Lid. I purpose (heaven make me thankfull for't) to leave
I have made some triall of my strengths in this
My sollitarie life; and yet I finde not
A faintnesse to goe on.

Lis. Above beliefe: doe you inhabit here?

Lid. Mine owne free choise sir:
I live here poorely, but contentedly,
Because I finde enough to feed my fortunes;
Indeed too much: these wilde fields are my gardens,
The Chrystall Rivers they afford their waters,
And grudge not their sweet streams to quench afflictions;
The hollow rocks their beds, which though they are hard,
(The Emblemes of a doting lovers fortune)
Yet they are quiet; and the wearie slumbers
The eyes catch there, softer then beds of Down friend;
The Birds my Bell to call me to devotions;
My Book the story of my wandring life,
In which I finde more houres due to repentance
Then time hath told me yet.

Lis. Answer me truely.

Lid. I will doe that without a conjuration.

Lis. Ith' depth of meditation doe you not Sometimes think of Olinda?

Lid. I endeavour
To raze her from my memorie, as I wish
You would doe the whole Sex, for know Lisander,
The greatest curse brave man can labour under,
Is the strong witch-craft of a womans eyes;
Where I finde men I preach this doctrine to 'em:
As you are a Scholler, knowledge make your Mistris,
The hidden beauties of the heavens your studie;
There shall you finde fit wonder for your faith,
And for your eye in immitable objects:
As you are a profess'd souldier, court your honour,
Though she be sterne, she is honest, a brave Mistris;
The greater danger you oppose to win her,
She shewes the sweeter, and rewards the nobler;
Womens best loves to hers meere shadowes be,
For after death she weds your memorie.
These are my contemplations.

Lis. Heavenly ones;
And in a young man more remarkable.
But wherefore doe I envy, and not tread in
This blessed tract? here's in the heart no falshood
To a vow'd friend, no quarrells seconded
With Challenges, which answer'd in defence
Of the word Reputation, murther followes.
A man may here repent his sinnes, and though
His hand like mine be stain'd in bloud, it may be
With penitence and true contrition wash'd off;
You have prov'd it Lidian.

Lid. And you'll finde it true, if you persevere.

Lis. Here then ends my flight,
And here the furie of the King shall finde me
Prepar'd for heaven, if I am mark'd to dye;
For that I truely grieve for.

Enter Frier: and Clarange in Friers habit.

Frier. Keep your selfe conceal'd, I am instructed.

Clar. How the sight
Of my deare friend confirmes me?

Lis. What are these?

Lid. Two reverend Friers, one I know.

Fri. To you
This journey is devoted.

Lid. Welcome Father.

Fri. I know your resolution so well grounded,
And your adiew unto the world so constant,
That though I am th'unwilling messenger
Of a strange accident to trie your temper,
It cannot shake you. You had once a friend,
A noble friend, Clarange.

Lid. And have still, I hope good father.

Fri. Your false hopes deceive you,
Hee's dead.

Lis. Clarange dead?

Fri. I buried him.
Some said he dy'd of melancholy, some of love,
And of that fondnesse perish'd.

Lid. O Clarange.

Clar. Hast thou so much brave nature, noble Lidian,
So tenderly to love thy rivalls memorie?
The bold Lisander weeps too.

Fri. I expected that you would beare this better.

Lid. I am a man sir, and my great losse weigh'd duly---

Fri. His last words were
After Confession, live long deare Lidian,
Possest of all thy wishes; and of me

He

He did desire, bathing my hand with teares,
That with my best care, I should seek and finde you.
And from his dying mouth prevaile so with you,
That you a while should leave your Hermites strictnesse,
And on his monument pay a teare, or two,
To witnesse how you lov'd him. (he had not
Lid. O my heart! to witnesse how I lov'd him? would Lead me unto his grave, but sacrific'd
His sorrowes upon mine, he was my friend,
My noble friend, I will bewayle his ashes,
His fortunes and poore mine were born together,
And I will weep 'em both: I will kneele by him,
And on his hallow'd earth doe my last duties.
Ile gather all the pride of spring to deck him,
Wood-bines shall grow upon his honour'd grave;
And as they prosper claspe to shew our friendship,
And when they wither Ile die too.
Clar. Who would not
Desire to dye, to be bewaild thus nobly?
Fri. There is a Legacy he hath bequeath'd you;
But of what value I must not discover,
Untill those Rites and pious Ceremonies
Are duly tender'd.
Lid. I am too full of sorrow to be inquisitive.
Lis. To think of his
I doe forget mine owne woes.

Enter Alcidon.

Alc. Graze thy fill, now
Thou hast done thy businesse; ha? who have we here?
Lisander, Lidian? and two reverend Friers?
What a strange Scene of sorrow is expresst
In different postures, in their looks and station?
A common Painter eying these, to helpe
His dull invention, might draw to the life
The living sonnes of Priam, as they stood
On the pale walls of Troy, when Hector fell
Under Achilles Speare: I come too late,
My horse, though good and strong, mov'd like a Tortoise:
Ill newes had wings, and hath got here before me.
All Pythagoreans? not a word?
Lid. O Alcidon——
Deep rivers with soft murmures glide along
The shallow roare: Clarange!
Lis. Cloridon? Chrysanthes? spare my grief, and appre-
What I should speak. (hend
Alc. Their fates I have long since
For your sake mourn'd; Clarange's death, for so
Your silence doth confirme, till now I heard not:
Are these the bounds that are prescrib'd unto
The swelling seas of sorrow?
Lis. The bounds Alcidon?
Can all the windes of mischiefe from all quarters,
Euphrates, Ganges, Tigris, Volga, Po,
Paying at once their tribute to this Ocean,
Make it swell higher? I am a murtherer,
Banish'd, proscrib'd, is there ought else that can
Be added to it?
Lid. I have lost a friend,
Priz'd dearer then my being, and he dead
My misery's at the height contemne the worst
Of fortunes malice.
Alc. How our humane weaknesse,
Growne desperate from small disasters makes us
Imagine them a period to our sorrowes,
When the first syllable of greater woes
Is not yet written. Lid. How?
Lis. Speak it at large,
Since griefe must break my heart, I am ambitious
It should be exquisite.
Alc. It must be told,
Yet e're you heare it, with all care put on
The surest Armour anvil'd in the shop
Of passive fortitude; the good Cleander
Your friend is murther'd.
Lis. 'Tis a terrible pang.
And yet it will not doe. I live yet, set not
The tottrets part; if that there be a blow
Beyond this, give it, and at once dispatch me.
Alc. Your sword dyed in his heart-bloud was found
Your private conference at mid-night urg'd (mean him
With faire Calliste; which by her whole pure truth
Would never learne to tell a lie, being granted,
She by inrag'd Beronte is accus'd
Of murther and adulterie, and you
(However I dare sweare it false) concluded
Her principall agent.
Lid. Wave upon wave rowles o're me.
My sister? my deare sister?
Clar. Hold great heart.
Fri. Teare open his Doublet.
Lis. Is this wound too narrow
For my life to get out at? Bring me to
A Cannon loaded, and some pitying friend
Give fire unto it, while I nayle my breast
Unto his thundring mouth, that in the instant,
I may be peece-meale torne, and blowne so far,
As not one joynt of my dismember'd limbes
May ever be by search of man found out.
Cleander! Yet why name I him? however
His fall deserv'd an earth-quake, if compar'd
With what true honour in Calliste suffers,
Is of no moment; my good Angel keep me
From blasphemy, and strike me dumb before
In th' agony of my spirit, I doe accuse
The powers above, for their unjust permission
Of vertue, innocent vertue, to be branded
With the least vitious marke.
Clar. I never saw a man so far transported.
Alc. Give it way, 'tis now no time to stop it.
Lanc. Sir, I have bought Enter Lancelot.
Fresh horses; and as you respect your life
Speedily back 'em; the Archers of the Kings guard,
Are every where in quest of you.
Lis. My life?
Perish all such with thee that wish it longer; Strikes
Let it but cleare Calliste's innocence, Lancelot.
And Nestors age to mine was youth, Ile flye
To meet the rage of my incensed King,
And wish his favourites ghost appear'd in flames,
To urge him to revenge, let all the tortures
That tyranny ever found our Circle me,
Provided justice set Calliste free. Ex. Lisander, Al-
Alc. Ile follow him. cidon & Lancelot.
Lid. I am rooted here (dangers,
Fri. Remember your dear friends last request, your sisters
With the aides that you may lend her.
Lid. Pray you support me,
My legs deny their office.
Clar. I grow still
Farther engag'd unto his matchlesse vertues,
And I am dead indeed, untill I pay
The debt I owe him in a noble way. Exeunt

Actus Quintus. Scena Prima.

Enter Dorilaus and Servant.

Dor. THou hast him safe?

Serv. As fast as locks can make him:
He must break through three doores, and cut the throats
Of ten tall fellowes, if that hee escape us:
Besides, as far as I can apprehend,
He hath no such invention, for his looks
Are full of penitence.

Dor. Trust not a knaves looks,
They are like a whores oathes;
How does my poore daughter
Brook her restraint?

Serv. With such a resolution
As well becomes your Lordships childe. Knock within.

Dor. Who's that?

Serv. Monsieur Lemure. Enter Lemur.

Dor. This is a speciall favour,
And may stand an example in the court
For courtesie: It is the Clyants duty
To wait upon his patron; you prevent me,
That am your humble suter.

Lemure. My neare place
About the King, though it swell others, cannot Make me forget your worth and age, which may Challenge much more respect; and I am sorry
That my endeavours for you have not met with
The good successe I wish'd; I mov'd the King
With my best advantage both of time and place,
Ith' favour of your daughter.

Dor. How doe you finde his Majesty affected?

Lem. Not to be
Sway'd from the rigour of the Law: yet so far
The rarity of the cause hath won upon him,
That he resolves to have in his owne person
The hearing of it; her tryall will be noble,
And to my utmost strength, where I may serve her,
My aydes shall not be wanting.

Dor. I am your servant.

Lem. One word more: if you love Lisanders life,
Advise him as he tenders it to keep
Out of the way: if he be apprehended,
This City cannot ransome him; so good morrow. Ex.

Dor. All happinesse attend you: goe thy wayes,
Thou hast a cleare and noble soule: for thy sake
Ile hold that man mine enemy, who dares mutter,
The court is not the sphere where vertue moves
Humanity and nobleness waiting on her Enter Serv.

Serv. Two gentlemen (but what they are I know not,
Their faces are so mus'd) presse to see you,
And will not be deny'd.

Dor. What ere they are, I am too old to feare.

Serv. They need no usher, they make their own way.

Enter Lisander, Alcidon.

Dor. Take you yours. Lisander! Exit. Serv.
My Joy to see you, and my sorrow for
The danger you are in, contend so here,
Though different passions, nay oppos'd in nature,
I know not which to entertaine.

Lis. Your hate should win the victorie from both, with
You may look on me as a Homicide,
A man whose life is forfeited to the Law,
But if (how ere I stand accus'd) in thought
I sinn'd against Clearidas life, or live
Guilty of the dishonour of your daughter,
May all the miseries that can fall on man
Here, or hereafter circle me.

Dor. To me this protestation's needlesse, I embrace you,
As the preserver of my life, the man
To whom my sonne owes his, with life, his honour,
And howsoever your affection
To my unhappy daughter, though it were
(For I have lifted her) in a noble way,
Hath printed some taint on her fame, and brought
Her life in question, yet I would not purchase
The wish'd recoverie of her reputation,
With strong assurance of her innocence
Before the King her Judge, with certaine losse
Of my Lisander, for whose life, if found,
There's no redemption; my excesse of love,
(Though to enjoy you one short day would lengthen
My life a dozen yeares) boldly commands me,
Upon my knees, which yet were never bent,
But to the King and heaven, to entreat you
To flye hence with all possible speed, and leave
Caliste to her fortune.

Lis. O blessed Saints, forsake her in affliction? can you
Be so unnaturall to your owne bloud,
To one so well deserving, as to value
My safety before hers? shall innocence
In her be branded, and my guilt escape
Unpunish'd? doe's she suffer so much for me,
For me unworthy, and shall I decline
(Eating the bitter bread of banishment)
The course of justice to draw out a life?
(A life? I stile it false, a living death)
Which being uncompell'd laid downe will cleare her,
And write her name a-new in the faire legend
Of the best women? seek not to diswade me.
I will not, like a careless Poet, spoyle
The last act of my Play, till now applauded,
By giving the world just cause to say I fear'd
Death more then losse of honour.

Dor. But suppose heaven hath design'd some
Other saving meanes for her deliverance?

Lis. Other meanes? that is
A mischiefe above all I have groan'd under:
Shall any other pay my debt, while I
Write my selfe bankrupt? or Caliste owe
The least beholdingnesse for that which she
On all the bonds of gratitude I have seal'd to,
May challenge from me to be freely tender'd?
Avert it mercy! I will goe to my grave,
Without the curses of my creditors;
Ile vindicate her faire name, and so cancell
My obligation to her, to the King,
To whom I stand accomptable for the losse
Of two of his lov'd subjects lives, Ile offer
Mine owne in satisfaction, to heaven
Ile pay my true repentance, to the times
Present, and future, Ile be registred
A memorable president to admonish
Others, however valiant, not to trust
To their abilities to dare, and doe,
And much lesse for the aerie words of honour,
And false stamp'd reputation to shake off

The chains of their religion, and allegeance,
The principall means appointed to prefer
Societies and Kingdomes. Exit.
Dor. Let's not leave him; his mind's much troubled.
Alc. Were your daughter free,
Since from her dangers his distraction rises
His cause is not so desperate for the slaughter
Of Cloridon and Chrysanthes, but it may
Find passage to the mercy of the King,
The motives urg'd in his defence, that forc'd him
To act that bloudy Scæne.
Dor. Heaven can send ayds,
When they are least expected, let us walke,
The houre of tryall drawes neare.
Alc. May it end well. Exeunt.

Enter Olinda and Lidian.

Ol. That for my love you should turne Hermit Lidian,
As much amazes me, as your report Clarange's dead.
Lid. He is so, and all comforts
My youth can hope for, Madam, with him buried;
Nor had I ever left my cell, but that
He did injoine me at his death to shed
Some teares of friendship on his Monument,
And those last Rites perform'd, he did bequeath you
As the best legacie a friend could give,
Or I indeed could wish to my embraces.
Ol. 'Tis still more strange, is there no foule play in it?
I must confesse I am not sorry sir
For your faire fortune; yet 'tis fit I grieve
The most untimely death of such a Gentleman,
He was my worthy servant.
Lid. And for this acknowledgment, if I could prize you
A higher rate I should, he was my friend: (at
My dearest friend.
Ol. But how should I be assur'd sir
(For slow beleefe is the best friend of truth)
Of this Gentlemans death? if I should credit it,
And afterward it fall out contrary,
How am I sham'd? how is your vertue tainted?
Lid. There is a Frier that came along with me.
His businesse to deliver you a Letter
From dead Clarange: You shall heare his testimonie.
Father, my reverend Father, looke upon him,
Such holy men are Authors of no Fables.

Enter Clarange (with a Letter writ out) and Frier.

Ol. They should not be, their lives and their opinions,
Like brightest purest flames should still burne upwards,
To me sir? (delivers the Letter.
Clar. If you are the faire Olinda——
Frier. I doe not like these crosse points.
Clar. Give me leave, I am nearest to my selfe. What I
Shal be pursu'd: you must not over-rule me. (have ploted
Ol. Doe you put the first hand to your own undoing?
Play to betray your game? Mark but this letter.
Lady I am come to claime your noble promise, Reads.
If you be Mistris of your word, ye are mine,
I am last return'd; your riddle is dissolv'd,
And I attend your faith. Your humble servant Clarange.
Is this the Frier that saw him dead?
Lid. 'Tis he.
Clarange on my life: I am defeated:
Such reverend habits juggle? my true sorrow
For a false friend not worth a teare derided?
Fri. You have abus'd my trust.
Ol. It is not well, nor like a gentleman.
Clar. All stratagems
In love, and that the sharpest war, are lawfull,
By your example I did change my habit,
Caught you in your owne toyle, and trimph in it,
And what by policy's got, I will maintaine (off.
With valour; no Lisander shall come in again to fetch you
Lid. His honor'd name
Pronounc'd by such a treacherous tongue is tainted.
Maintaine thy treason with thy sword? With what Contempt I heare it; in a Wildernesse
I durst encounter it, and would, but that
In my retired houres, not counterfeited
As thy religious shape was, I have learn'd
When Justice may determine such a cause,
And of such weight as this faire Lady is,
Must not be put to fortune, I appeale
Unto the King, and he whose wisedome knowes
To doe his subjects right in their estates,
As graciously with judgement will determine
In points of honour.
Olin. I'le steere the same course with you.
Claran. I'le stand the tryall.
Fri. What have you done? or what intend you?
Claran. Aske not; I'le come off with honour. Exeunt.

Enter Beronte, Clarinda, Malfort, a barr set forth, Officers.

Ber. Be constant in your proofes: should you shrinke
Your life must answer it, nor am I safe, (backe now,
My honour being engag'd to make that good
Which you affirme.
Clarin. I am confident, so dearely
I honour'd my dead Lord, that no respect,
Or of my Ladies bounties (which were great ones
I must confesse) nor of her former life,
For while that she was chast, indeed I lov'd her,
Shall hinder me from lending my assistance
Unto your just revenge——mine owne I meane, aside.
If Leon keepe far off enough, all's secure:
Lisander dares not come in, modest blushes
Parted with me long since, and impudence
Arm'd with my hate, unto her innocence shall be
The weapon I will fight with now
Ber. The racke
Being presented to you, you'l roare out
What you conceale yet.
Mal. Conceale? I know nothing
But that I shall be hang'd, and that I looke for,
It is my destiny, I ever had
A hanging looke; and a wise woman told me,
Though I had not the heart to do a deed
Worthy the halter, in my youth or age,
I should take a turne with a wry mouth and now
'Tis come about: I have penn'd mine owne ballad
Before my condemnation, in feare
Some rimer should prevent me: here's my Lady?
Would I were in heaven, or a thousand miles hence,
That I might not blush to looke on her.

Enter Dorilaus, Calisto, Olinda.

Dor. You behold this preparation, and the enemies
Who are to fight against your life, yet if
You bring no witnesse here, that may convince ye
Of breach of faith to your Lords bed, and hold up
Unspotted hands before the King, this tryall
You are to undergo, will but refine,
And not consume your honour.

Cal. How confirm'd
I am here, whatsoever Fate falls on me,
You shall have ample testimony; till the death
Of my deare Lord, to whose sad memory
I pay a mourning widdowes teares, I liv'd
Too happy in my holy-day trim of glorie,
And courted with felicitie, that drew on me,
With other helpes of nature, as of fortune,
The envie, not the love of most that knew me,
This made me to presume too much, perhaps
Too proud; but I am humbled; and if now
I doe make it apparent, I can beare
Adversity with such a constant patience
As will set off my innocence, I hope sir,
In your declining age, when I should live
A comfort to you, you shall have no cause,
How e're I stand accus'd, to hold your honour
Ship-wrack'd in such a daughter.

Ol. O best friend, my honour's at the stake too, for——

Dor. Be silent; the King.

Enter King, Lemure, and Attendants.

Lem. Sir, if you please to look upon
The Prisoner, and the many services
Her Father hath done for you----

King. We must look on
The cause, and not the persons. Yet beholding
With an impartiall eye, th' excelling beauties
Of this faire Lady, which we did beleeve
Upon report, but till now never saw 'em,
It moves a strange kind of compassion in me;
Let us survey you nearer, shee's a book
To be with care perus'd; and tis my wonder,
If such mishapen ghests, as lust and murther,
At any price should ever finde a lodging
In such a beauteous Inne! mistake us not,
Though we admire the outward structure, if
The roomes be foule within, expect no favour.
I were no man, if I could look on beautie
Distress'd, without some pitty; but no King,
If any superficiall glosse of feature
Could worke me to decline the course of Justice.
But to the cause, Cleander's death, what proofes
Can you produce against her?

Ber. Royall sir, touching that point my brothers death,
We build on suppositions.

King. Suppositions? how? Is such a Lady sir to bee
On suppositions? (condemn'd

Ber. They are well grounded sir:
And if we make it evident she is guilty
Of the first crime we charge her with, Adulterie,
That being the parent, it may finde beliefe,
That murther was the issue.

King. We allow
It may be so; but that it may be, must not
Inferre a necessary consequence
To cast away a Ladies life. What witnesses
To make this good?

Ber. The principall, this woman,
For many yeares her servant; she hath taken
Her oath in Court. Come forward.

King. By my Crowne a lying face.

Clar. I swore sir for the King:
And if you are the partie, as I doe
Believe you are, for you have a good face,
How ever mine appeares, swearing for you sir,
I ought to have my oath passe.

King. Impudent too? well, what have you sworne?

Clar. That this Lady was
A goodly tempting Lady, as she is:
How thinks your Majestie? and I her servant,
Her officer as one would say, and trusted
With her closest Chamber-service; that Lisander
VVas a fine timber'd gentleman, and active,
That he cou'd doe fine gambolls
To make a Lady merrie; that this paire,
A very loving couple, mutually
Affected one another: so much for them sir.
That I, a simple waiting-woman, having taken
My bodily oath, the first night of admittance
Into her Ladiships service, on her slippers,
(That was the book) to serve her will in all things,
And to know no Religion but her pleasure,
'Tis not yet out of fashion with some Ladies;
That I, as the premisses shew, being commanded
To doe my function, in conveyance of Lisander to her chamber, (my Lord absent,
On a pretended sickneſse) did the feat,
(It cannot be deny'd) and at dead mid-night
Left 'em together: what they did, some here
Can easily imagine? I have said, sir.

Dor. The devills Oratrix.

King. Then you confesse you were her Bawd?

Clar. That's course, her agent sir.

King. So goodie agent? and you think there is
No punishment due for your agentship?

Clar. Let her suffer first,
Being my better, for adulterie,
And I'le endure the Mulct impos'd on Bawdes,
Call it by the worst name.

Cal. Live I to heare this?

King. Take her aside. Your answer to this Lady?

Cal. Heav'n grant me patience: to be thus confronted,
(O pardon Royall sir a womans passion)
By one, and this the worst of my mis-fortunes,
That was my slave, but never to such ends sir,
VVould give a statue motion into furie:
Let my pass'd life, my actions, nay intentions,
Be by my grand accuser justly censur'd,
(For her I scorne to answer) and if they
Yeeld any probability of truth
In that she urges, and I will confesse
A guilty cause; the peoples voyce, which is
The voyce of truth, my husbands tenderneſse
In his affection to me, that no dotage
But a reward of humbleneſse, the friendship
Eccho'd through France between him and Lisander,
All make against her; for him, in his absence,
(VVhat ever imputation it draw on me)
I must take leave to speak: 'tis true, he lov'd me,
But not in such a wanton way, his reason
Master'd his passions: I grant I had
At mid-night conference with him; but if he Ever receiv'd a farther favour from me,
Then what a sister might give to a brother,
May I sinke quick: and thus much, did he know
The shame I suffer for him, with the losse
Of his life for appearing, on my soule
He would maintaine. Enter Lisander, and Alcidon.

Lis. And will, thou cleare example of womens pure- (neſse.

King. Though we hold her such,
Thou hast expresse'd thy selfe a desperat foole,
To thrust thy head into the Lions jawes,

The

The justice of thy King.
Lef. I came prepar'd for't,
And offer up a guilty life to cleare
Hir innocence; the oath she tooke, I sweare to;
And for Cleanders death, to purge my selfe
From any colour malice can paint on me,
Or that she had a hand in't, I can prove
That fatall night when he in his own house fell,
And many daies before, I was distant from it
A long daies journey.
Clarin. I am caught.
Ber. If so,
How came your Sword into this fiewards hands? stand
Mal. I have heard nothing that you spake; (forth.
I know I must dye, and what kind of death
Pray you resolve me, I shall go away else
In a qualme; I am very faint.
Enter Leon, Servants, and Guard
King Carry him off, his feare will kil him. Ex. with Mal.
Dor. Sir, 'twas my ambition,
My Daughters reputation being wounded
I'th' generall opinion, to have it
Cur'd by a publike triall; I had else
Forborne your Majesties trouble: I'le bring forth
Cleanders murtherer, in a wood I heard him
As I rod sadly by, unto himselfe
With some compunction, though this devill had none,
Lament what he had done, cursing her lust,
That drew him to that bloudy fact.
Leon. To lessen
The foulenesse of it, for which I know justly
I am to suffer, and with my last breath
To free these Innocents, I do confesse all;
This wicked woman only guilty with me.
Clari. Is't come to this? thou puling Rogue, dye thou
With prayers in thy mouth; I'le curse the lawes
By which I suffer, all I grieve for is,
That I dye unreveng'd.
Leon. But one word more sir,
And I have done; I was by accident where
Lisander met with Cloridon, and Cryfanthes,
Was an eare witnesse when he fought for peace,
Nay, begg'd it upon colder tearmes then can
Almost find credit, his past deeds considered,
But they deafe to his reasons, severally
Assaulted him, but such was his good fortune,
That both fell under it; upon my death
I take it uncompel'd, that they were guilty
Of their owne violent ends; and he against
His will, the Instrument.
Alc. This I will sweare too, for I was not far off.
Dor. They have alleadg'd
As much to wake your sleeping mercy sir,
As all the Advocates of France can plead
In his defence.
King. The criminall judge shall sentence
These to their merits——with mine owne hand Lady
I take you from the bar, and do my selfe
Pronounce you innocent. Ex. with Leon, and Clarin.
All. Long live the King.
King And to confirme you stand high in our favour,
And as some recompence for what you have
With too much rigour in your triall suffered;
Aske what you please, becoming me to grant,
And be possest on't.
Cal. Sir, I dare not doubt
Your royall promise, in a King it is
A strong assurance, that emboldens me
Upon my humble knees to make my boone
Lisanders pardon.
Dor. My good Genius did prompt her to it.
Leon. At your feet thus prostrate, I second her petition.
Alc. Never King
Powr'd forth his mercie on a worthyer subject.
Ber. To witnesse my repentance for the wrong
In my unjust suspition I did both;
I joyne in the same suit.
Lif. The life you give,
Still ready to lay down for your service,
Shall be against your enemies imploy'd,
Not hazzarded in brawles.
All. Mercie dread sir.
King So many pressing me, and with such reasons
Moving compassion, I hope it will not
Be censur'd levity in me though I borrow
In this from justice to relieve my mercie;
I grant his pardon at your intercession,
But still on this condition; you Lisander,
In expiation of your guilt, shall build
A monument for my Cloridan, and Cryfanthes:
And never henceforth draw a Sword, but when
By us you are commanded, in defence of
The Flower de Luce, and after one yeares sorrow
For your deare frend, Cleanders wretched fate,
Marry Calisto. Ent. Lidian.
Lif. On your sacred hand, I vow to do it seriously.
Lid. Great sir stay,
Leave not your seat of justice, till you have Given sentence in a cause as much important
As this you have determined.
King. Lidian? Enter Clarange, and Frier
Lid. He sir, your humblest subject, I accuse Clarange
Of falshood in true friendship at the height;
We both were suiters to this Lady, both
Injoyn'd one pennance.
Clara. Trouble not the King
With an unnecessarie repetition
Of what the Court's familiar with already.
King. Clarange?
Dor. With a shaven crowne?
Olin. Most strange,
Claran. Looke on thy rivall, your late servant Madam,
But now devoted to a better Mistris,
The Church, whole orders I have tooke upon me:
I here deliver up my interest to her;
And what was got with cunning as you thought,
I simply thus surrender: heretofore,
You did outstrip me in the race of friendship,
I am your equall now.
Dor. A suite soone ended.
Claran. And joyning thus your hands, I know both
I may do in the Church my Friers Office (willing,
In marrying you.
Lid. The victory is yours sir.
King. It is a glorious one, and well fer's of
Our Scene of mercy; to the dead we render
Our sorrow, to the living ample wishes
Of future happines: 'tis a Kings duty
To prove himselfe a father to his Subjects:
And I shall hold it if this well succeed,
A meritorious, and praise worthy deed. Exeunt.

Prol.

Prologue.

A Story, and a known one, long since writ,
Truth must take place, and by an able wit,
Foule mouth'd detraction daring not deny
To give so much to Fletchers memory;
If so, some may object, why then do you
Present an old piece to us for a new?
Or wherefore will your profest writer be
(Not tax'd of theft before) a Plagary?
To this he answers in his just defence,
And to maintaine to all our Innocence,
Thus much, though he hath travel'd the same way,
Demanding, and receiving too the pay
For a new Poem, you may find it due,
He having neither cheated us, nor you;
He vowes, and deeply, that he did not spare
The utmost of his strengths, and his best care
In the reviving it, and though his powers
Could not as he desired, in three short howers
Contract the Subject, and much lesse expresse
The changes, and the various passages
That will be look'd for, you may heare this day
Some Scænes that will confirme it is a play,
He being ambitious that it should be known
What's good was Fletchers, and what ill his owne.

Epilogue.

STill doubtfull, and perplex'd too, whether he
Hath done Fletcher right in this Historie,
The Poet sits within, since he must know it,
He with respect, desires that you would shew it
By some accustomed signe, if from our action,
Or his indeavours you meet satisfaction,
With ours he hath his ends, we hope the best,
To make that certainty in you doth rest.

FINIS.

THE ISLAND PRINCESSE.

Actus primus. Scæna prima

A Bell Rings.

Enter Pymero, Christophero, and Pedro.

Pymero.

Open the Ports and see the watch reliev'd,
And let the guards be careful of their busines
Their vigilant eyes fixt on these Islanders,
They are false and desperate people,
when they find
The least occasion open to encouragement,
Cruell, and crafty soules, believe me Gentlemen,
Their late attempt, which is too fresh amongst us,
In which against all armes, and honesty,
The Governour of Ternata made surprize
Of our confederate, the King of Tidore,
As for his recreation he was rowing
Betweene both Lands, bids us be wise and circumspect.

Chr. It was a mischiefe suddenly imagin'd;
And as soone done; that Governour's a feirce knave,
Unfaithfull as he is feirce too, there's no trusting;
But I wonder much how such poore and base pleasures,
As tugging at an oare, or skill in steerage,
Should become Princes.

Py. Base breeding love base pleasure;
They take as much delight in a Baratto,
A little scurvy boate to row her tithly,
And have the art to turne and wind her nimbly,
Thinke it as noble too, though it be slavish,
And a dull labour that declines a Gentleman:
As we Portugalls, or the Spaniards do in riding,
In managing a great horse which is princely:
The French in Courtship, or the dancing English,
In carrying a faire presence.

Ped. He was strangely taken;
But where no faith is, there's no trust; he has paid for't
His sister yet the faire and great Quisara,
Has shewd a noble mind, and much love in't
To her afflicted brother, and the nobler still it appeares,
And seasons of more tendernes, because his ruine stiles her
And his imprisonment adds to her profit. (absolute
Feeling all this, which makes all men admire her,
The warme beames of this fortune that fall on her,
Yet has she made diverse and noble treaties,
And propositions for her brothers freedome,
If wealth or honour——

Py. Peace, peace, you are fool'd sir;
Things of these natures have strange outsides Pedro,
And cunning shadowes, set 'em far from us,
Draw 'em but neare, they are grosse, and they abuse us;
They that observe her close, shall find her nature,
Which I doubt mainly will not prove so excellent;
She is a Princesse, and she must be faire,
That's the prerogative of being royall.
Let her want eyes and nose, she must be beautious,
And she must know it too, and the use of it,
And people must believe it, they are dam'd else;
Why, all the neighbour Princes, are mad for her.

Chr. Is she not faire then?

Py. But her hopes are fairer,
And there's a haughty Master, the King of Bohan,
That lofty sir, that speakes far more, and loudet
In his own commendations then a Cannon:
He is strucken dumbe with her.

Ped. Beshrew me she is a sweet one.

Py. And there's that hopefull man of Syam,
That spritely fellow, he that's wise and temperate,
He is a lover too.

Chr. Wou'd I were worth her looking
For; by my life I hold her a compleate one,
The very Sun I thinke, affects her sweetnesse,
And dares not as he does to all else, dye it
Into his tanny Livery.

Py. She dares not see him,
But keepes her selfe at distance from his kisses,
And weares her complexion in a case; let him but like it
A week or two, or three, she would looke like a Lion;
But the maine sport on't is, or rather wonder
The Governour of Ternata her mortall enemie,
He that has catcht her brother King is strooke too,
And is arriv'd under safe conduct also,
And hostages of worth delivered for him;
And he brought a letter from his prisoner,
Whether compel'd, or willingly delivered
From the poore King, or what else dare be in't.

Chr. So it be honourable, any thing, 'tis all one,
For I dare thinke she'l do the best.

Py. 'Tis certaine
He has admittance, and sollicites hourely,
Now if he have the tricke——

Ped. What trick?

Py. The true one,
To take her too, if he be but skil'd in bat-fowling,
And lime his bush right.

Chr. He be hang'd when that hits,
For 'tis not a compel'd, or forc'd affection,
That must take her, I guesse her stout and vertuous,
But where's your unckle sir, our valiant Captaine,
The brave Roy Dias all this while?

Py. I marry,
He is amongst 'em too.

Ped. A Lover.

Py. Nay,
I know not that, but sure he stands in favour,
Or wou'd stand stiffly, he is no Portugall else.

Chr. The voyce lyes in good favour, in the list too

Of the privy woers, how cunningly of late
I have [illegible] him, and how privately,
He has ſtolne at all houres from us, and how readily
He has feign'd a buſineſſe to bid the Fort farewell
For five or ſixe daies, or a month together,
Sure there is ſomething ——
Py. Yes, yes, there is a thing in't,
A thing would make the beſt on's all dance after it;
A dainty thing, Lord how this uncle of mine
Has read to me, and rated me for wenching,
And told me in what deſperate caſe 'twould leave me,
And how 'twould ſtew my bones.
Ped. You car'd not for it.
Py. Ifaith, not much, I ventur'd on ſtill eaſily,
And tooke my chance, danger is a Souldiers honour;
But that this man, this herbe of Grace Ruy Dias,
This father of our faculties ſhould ſlip thus,
For ſure he is a ferriting, that he
That would drinke nothing to depreſſe the ſpirit,
But milke and water, eate nothing but thin ayre
To make his bloud obedient, that his youth
In ſpight of all his temperance, ſhould tickle,
And have a love mange on him.
Chr. 'Tis in him ſir
But honourable courtſhip, and becomes his ranke too.
Py. In me 'twere abominable Lecherie, or would be,
For when our thoughts are on't, and miſſe their levell,
We muſt hit ſomething.
Ped. Well, 'is a noble Gentleman,
And if he be a ſuitor, may he ſpeed in't.
Py. Let him alone, our family ne're fail'd yet.
Chr. Our mad Lieutenant ſtill merry Pyniero,
Thus wou'd he do if the Surgeon were ſearching of him.
Ped. Eſpecially if a warme wench had ſhot him.
Py. But harke Chriſtophero; come hether Pedro;
When ſaw you our brave countryman Armuſia?
He that's arriv'd here lately, and his gallants?
A goodly fellow, and a brave companion
Me thinkes he is, and no doubt truly valiant,
For he that dares come hether, dares fight any where.
Chr. I ſaw him not of late, a ſober Gentleman
I am ſure he is, and no doubt bravely ſprung,
And promiſes much nobleneſſe.
Py. I love him,
And by my troath wou'd faine be inward with him;
Pray lets go ſeeke him.
Ped. Wee'l attend you ſir.
Py. By that time we ſhalheare the burſt of buſineſſe. Ex.

Enter Ruy Dias, Quiſara, Quiſana, and Panura.

Quiſar. Aunt I much thanke you for your curteſie,
And the faire liberty you ſtill allow me,
Both of your houſe and ſervice, though I be
A Princeſſe, and by that Prerogative ſtand free
From the poore malice of opinion,
And no waies bound to render up my actions,
Becauſe no power above me can examine me;
Yet my deare brother being ſtill a priſoner,
And many wandring eyes upon my waies,
Being left alone a Sea-marke, it behoves me
To uſe a little caution, and be circumſpect.
Quiſan. You'r wiſe and noble Lady.
Quiſar. Often Aunt
I reſort hether, and privately to ſee you,
It may be to converſe with ſome I favour;
I wou'd not have it knowne as oft, nor conſtru'd,
It ſtands not with my care.
Quiſ'n. You ſpeake moſt fairely,
For even our pure devotions are examin'd.
Quiſar. So mad are mens minds now.
Ruy. Or rather monſtrous; (neſſe.
They are thick dreams, bread in fogges that know no fair-
Quiſan. Madam the houſe is yours, I am yours, pray uſe
And at your ſervice all I have lyes proſtrate; (me,
My care ſhall ever be to yeild ye honour,
And when your fame fals here, 'tis my fault Lady;
A poore and ſimple banquet I have provided,
Which if you pleaſe to honour with your preſence ——
Quiſar. I thanke ye Aunt, I ſhall be with you inſtantly,
A few words with this Gentleman.
Quiſan. I'le leave ye, Exeunt. Quiſ,
And when you pleaſe retire, I'le wait upon you. & Pan.
Quiſar. Why, how now Captaine, what afraid to ſpeak
A man of armes, and danted with a Lady? (to me?
Commanders have the power to parle with Princes.
Ruy. Madam, the favours you have ſtill ſhown'd on me,
Which are ſo high above my meanes of merit,
So infinite, that nought can value 'em
But their owne goodneſſe, no eyes looke up to 'em
But thoſe that are of equall light, and luſtre;
Strike me thus mute, you are my royall Miſtris,
And all my ſervices that aime at honour,
Take life from you, the Saint of my devotions;
Pardon my wiſh, it is a faire ambition,
And well becomes the man that honours you;
I wou'd I were of worth, of ſomething neare you,
Of ſuch a royall peece, a King I wou'd be,
A mighty King that might command affection,
And bring a youth upon me might bewitch ye,
And you a ſweet ſould Chriſtian.
Quiſar. Now you talke ſir;
You Portugals, though you be rugged Souldiers,
Yet when you liſt to flatter, you are plaine courtiers;
And could you wiſh me Chriſtian brave Ruy Dias?
Ruy. At all the danger of my life great Lady,
At all my hopes, at all ——
Quiſar. Pray ye ſtay a little,
To what end runs your wiſh?
Ruy. O glorious Lady,
That I might —— but I dare not ſpeake.
Quiſar, I dare then,
That you might hope to marry me; nay bluſh not,
An honourable end needs no excuſe;
And would you love me then?
Ruy. My ſoule not dearer.
Quiſar. Do ſome brave thing that may entice me that
Some thing of ſuch a meritorious goodneſſe, (way,
Of ſuch an unmatcht nobleneſſe, that I may know
You have a power beyond ours that preſerves you,
'Tis not the perſon, nor the royall title,
Nor wealth, nor glory that I looke upon,
That inward man I love that's lin'd with vertue,
That well deſerving ſoule workes out a favour;
I have many Princes ſuiters, many great ones,
Yet above theſe I love you, you are valiant,
An active man, able to build a fortune;
I do not ſay I dote, nor meane to marry,
Only the hope is ſomething may be done,
That may compell my faith, and aske my freedom,
And leave opinion faire.
Ruy. Command deare Lady,

And

And let the danger be as deep as hell,
As direfull to attempt ——
Quiſar. Y'are too ſudden,
I muſt be rul'd by you, find out a fortune
Wiſely and handſomely, examine time,
And court occaſion that ſhe may be ready;
A thouſand uſes for your forward ſpirit
Ye may find daily, be ſure ye take a good one,
A brave and worthy one that may advance ye,
Forced ſmiles reward poore dangers; you are a Souldier,
I won'd not talke ſo elſe, and I love a Souldier,
And that that ſpeakes him true, and great, his vallour;
Yet for all theſe which are but womens follies,
You may do what you pleaſe, I ſhall ſtill know ye,
And though ye weare no ſword.
Ru. Excellent Lady,
When I grow ſo cold, and diſgrace my nation,
That from their hardy nurſes ſucke adventures,
'Twere fit I wore a Tombſtone; you have read to me
The ſtory of your favour, if I miſtake it,
Or grow a tenant in the ſtudy of it,
A great correction Lady——
Quiſar. Let's toth' banquet,
And have ſome merrier talke, and then to Court,
Where I give audience to my generall Suiters;
Pray heaven my womans wit hold; there brave Captain,
You may perchance meet ſomething that may ſtartle ye;
I'le ſay no more, come be not ſad——
I love ye. Exeunt

Enter Pyniero, Armuſia Soza, Chriſtophero, and Emanuel.

Py. You are welcome gentlemen, moſt worthy welcome,
And know there's nothing in our power may ſerve ye,
But you may freely challenge.
Arm. Sir we thanke ye,
And reſt your ſervants too.
Py. Ye are worthy Portugals,
You ſhew the bravery of your minds and ſpirits;
The nature of our country too, that brings forth
Stirring, unwearied ſoules to ſeeke adventures;
Minds never ſatisfied with ſearch of honour
Where time is, & the ſunne gives light, brave countrimen,
Our names are known, new worlds diſcloſe their riches,
Their beauties, and their prides to our embraces;
And we the firſt of nations find theſe wonders.
Arm. Theſe noble thoughts ſir, have inticd us forward,
And minds unapt for eaſe to ſee theſe miracles,
In which we find report a poore relater;
We are arriv'd among the bleſſed Iſlands,
Where every wind that riſes blowes perfumes,
And every breath of aire is like an Incence:
The treaſure of the Sun dwels here, each tree
As if it envied the old Paradice,
Strives to bring forth immortall fruit; the ſpices
Renewing nature, though not deifying,
And when that fals by time, ſcorning the earth,
The fallen earth ſhould taint or ſucke their beauties,
But as we dreamt, for ever ſo preſerve us:
Nothing we ſee, but breeds an admiration;
The very rivers as we floate along,
Throw up their pearles, and curle their heads to court us;
The bowels of the earth ſwell with the births
Of thouſand unknowne gems, and thouſand riches;
Nothing that beares a life, but brings a treaſure;
The people they ſhew brave too, civill manner'd,
Proportioned like the Maſtres of great minds,
The women which I wonder at——
Py. Ye ſpeake well.
Ar. Of delicate aſpects, faire, clearly beauteous,
And to that admiration, ſweet and courteous.
Py. And is not that a good thing? brave Armuſia
You never ſaw the Court before?
Ar. No certaine,
But that I ſee a wonder too, all excellent,
The Government exact.
Chr. Ye ſhall ſee anon,
That that will make ye ſtart indeed, ſuch beauties,
Such riches, and ſuch formes.

Enter Bakam, Syana, Governour.

Soz. We are fire already;
The wealthy Magazine of nature ſure
Inhabits here.
Arm. Theſe ſure are all Ilanders.
Py. Yes, and great Princes too, and luſty lovers.
Ar. They are goodly perſons, what might he be ſigneor
That beares ſo proud a ſtate?
Py. King of Bakam,
A fellow that farts terrour,
Em. He lookes highly,
Sure he was begot o'th' top of a ſteeple.
Chr. It may well be,
For you ſhall heare him ring anon.
Py. That is Syana,
And a brave temper'd fellow, and more valiant.
Soz. What rugged face is that?
Py. That's the great Governour,
The man ſurpriz'd our friend, I told ye of him.
Ar. 'Has dangerous eyes.
Py. A perilous theefe, and ſubtle.
Chr. And to that ſubtlety a heart of Iron.
Py. Yet the young Lady makes it melt.
Ar. They ſtart all,
And thunder in the eyes.
Ba. Away ye poore ones,
Am I in competition with ſuch bubbles?
My vertue, and my name rank'd with ſuch trifles?
Sy. Ye ſpeake loud.
Ba. Young-man, I will ſpeake louder;
Can any man but I, deſerve her favour,
You petty Princes? Princes flie at one another.
Py. He will put 'em all in's pocket.
Sy. Thou proud mad thing be not ſo full of glory,
So full of vanity.
Ba. How? I contemne thee,
And that fort-keeping fellow,
Py. How the dog lookes,
The bandog Governour?
Gov. Ha, why?
Ba. Away thing,
And keepe your ranke with thoſe that fit your toyalty;
Call out the Princeſſe.
Gov. Doſt thou know me bladder,
Thou inſolent impoſtume?
Ba. I deſpiſe thee;

Gov. Art thou acquainted with my nature baby?
Let my revenge for injuries? darſt thou hold me
So far behind thy file, I cannot reach thee?
What canſt thou merit?
Ba. Merit? I am above it;
I am equall with all honours, all atchievements,
And what is great and worthy; the beſt doer
I keepe at my command, fortune's my ſervant,
'Tis in my power now to deſpiſe ſuch wretches,
To looke upon ye ſlightly, and neglect ye,
And but ſhe daines at ſome houres to remember ye,
And people have beſtowed ſome titles one ye,
I ſhould forget your names——
Sy. Mercy of me;
What a blowne foole has ſelfe affection
Made of this fellow? did not the Queene your mother,
Long for bellows, and bagpipes when ſhe was great with ye,
She brought forth ſuch a windy birth?
Gov. 'Tis ten to one
She eate a Drum, and was deliver'd of alarum,
Or elſe he was ſwadled in an old ſaile when he was yong.
Sy. He ſwels too mainly with his meditations;
Faith talke a little hanſomer, ride ſoftly
That we may be able to hold way with ye, we are Prin-
But thoſe are but poore things to you; talke wiſer, ces,
'Twill well become your mightineſſe; talke leſſe,
That men may thinke ye can do more.
Gov. Talke truth,
That men may thinke ye are honeſt, and beleeve ye,
Or talke your ſelfe aſleep, for I am weary of you.
Ba. Why? I can talke and do
Gov. That wou'd do excellent.
Ba. And tell you, only I deſerve the Princeſſe,
And make good only I, if you dare, you ſir,
Or your Syanan Prince.
Py. Heres a ſtorme toward,
Me thinkes it ſings already, to him Governour.
Gov. Here lies my proofe. Draw.
Sy. And mine.
Gov. I'le be ſhort with ye,
For theſe long arguments I was never good at.
Py. How white the boaſter lookes?

Enter Ruy Dias, Quiſara, Quiſana, Pamura.

Ar. I ſee he lackes faith.
Ru. For ſhame forbeare great Princes, rule your angers,
You violate the freedome of this place,
The ſtate and royalty——
Gov. He's well contented
It ſeemes, and ſo I have done.
Ar. Is this ſhe ſignior?
Py. This is the Princeſſe ſir.
Ar. She is ſweet and goodly,
An admirable forme, they have cauſe to juſtle.
Quiſar. Ye wrong me and my court, ye forward Princes;
Comes your love wrapt in violence to ſeeke us?
Is't fit though you be great, my preſence ſhould be
Staind, and polluted with your bloudy rages?
My privacies affrighted with your ſwords?
He that loves me, loves my command; be temper'd,
Or be no more what ye profeſſe, my Servants.
Omnes We are calme as peace.
Ar. What command ſhe carries?
And what a ſparkling Majeſty flyes from her?
Quiſar. Is it ye love to do? ye ſhall find danger,
And danger that ſhall ſtart your reſolutions,
But not this way; 'tis not contention,
Who loves me to my face beſt, or who can flatter moſt
Can carry me, he that deſerves my favour,
And will enjoy what I bring, love and Majeſty,
Muſt win me with his worth, muſt travell for me;
Muſt put his haſty rage off, and put on
A well confirm'd, temperate, and true vallour.
Omnes But ſhew the way.
Quiſar. And will, and then ſhew you
A will to tread the way, I'le ſay ye are worthy.
Py. What taske now
Will ſhe turne 'em to? theſe hot youths,
I feare will find a coolling card, I read in her eyes
Something that has ſome ſwinge muſt flye amongſt 'em;
By this hand I love her a little now.
Quiſar. 'Tis not unknown to you
I had a royall brother, now miſerable,
And Priſoner to that man; if I were ambitious,
Gap'd for that glory was ne're borne with me,
There they ſhould lye as miſeries upon him.
If I were covetous, and my heart ſet
On riches, and thoſe baſe effects that follow
On pleaſures uncontroul'd, or ſafe revenges,
There he ſhould dye, his death would give me all theſe;
For then ſtood I up abſolute to do all;
Yet all theſe flattering ſhews of dignity,
Theſe golden dreames of greatneſſe cannot force
To forget nature and my faire affection.
Therefore that man that would be known my lover,
Muſt be known his redeemer, and muſt bring him
Either alive or dead to my embraces,
For even his bones I ſcorne ſhall feele ſuch ſlavery,
Or ſeeke another Miſtris, 'twill be hard
To do this, wondrous hard, a great adventure,
Fit for a ſpirit of an equall greatneſſe;
But being done, the reward is worthy of it.
Chr. How they ſtand gaping all?
Quiſar. Ruy Dias cold?
Not flye like fire into it? may be you doubt me,
He that ſhall do this is my husband Prince;
By the bright heavens he is, by whoſe juſtice
I openly proclame it; if I lye,
Or ſeeke to ſet you on with ſubtilty,
Let that meet with me, and reward my falſhood.
No ſtirring yet, no ſtart into a bravery?
Ruy. Madam, it may be, but being a maine danger,
Your Grace muſt give me leave to looke about me,
And take a little time, the cauſe will aske it,
Great acts require great counſells.
Quiſar. Take your pleaſure,
I feare the Portugall.
Ba. I'le raiſe an Army
That ſhall bring backe his Iſland fort and all,
And fixe it here.
Gov. How long will this be doing?
You ſhould have begun in your Grandfathers dayes.
Sy. What may be,
And what my power can promiſe nobleſt Lady,
My will I am ſure ſtands faire.
Quiſar. Faire be your fortune,
Few promiſes are beſt, and faire performance.
Gov. Theſe cannot doe,
Their power and arts are weake ones.

'Tis

'Tis in my will. I have this King your brother,
He is my priſoner, I accept your priſoner,
And bleſſe the faire occaſion that atchiev'd him:
I love ye, and I honor ye, but ſpeake
Whether alive or dead he ſhall be rendred,
And ſee how readily, how in an inſtant,
Quicke as your wiſhes Lady——

Quiſar. No, I ſcorne ye,
You and your courteſie; I hate your love ſir;
And ere I would ſo baſely win his liberty,
I would ſtudy to forget he was my brother;
By force he was taken; he that ſhall enjoy me,
Shall fetch him backe by force, or never know me.

Py. As I live, a rare wench.

Ar. She has a noble ſpirit.

Gov. By force?

Quiſar. Yes ſir by force, and make you glad too
To let him goe.

Gov. How? you may looke nobler on me,
And thinke me no ſuch boy; by force he muſt not,
For your love much may be.

Quiſar. Put up your paſſion,
And pack ye home, I ſay, by force, and ſuddenly.
He lies there till he rots elſe, although I love him
Moſt tenderly and dearly, as a brother,
And out of theſe reſpects would joy to ſee him;
Yet to receive him as thy courteſie,
With all the honour thou couldſt adde unto him
From his hands that moſt hate him, I had rather
Though no condition were propounded for him,
See him ſar ſunke i'th earth, and there forget him.

Py. Your hopes are gelt good Governour.

Arm. A rare woman.

Gov. Lady,
I'le pull this pride, I'le quench this bravery,
And turne your glorious ſcorne to teares and howlings;
I will proud Princeſſe, this neglect of me
Shall make thy brother King moſt miſerable;
Shall turne him into curſes 'gainſt thy crueltie:
For where before I us'd him like a King,
And did thoſe Royall Offices unto him,
Now he ſhall lie a ſad lump in a dungeon,
Loden with chaines and fetters, colds and hunger,
Darkneſſe and lingring death for his companions;
And let me ſee who dare attempt his reſcue,
What deſperate foole looke toward it, farwell,
And when thou know'ſt him thus, lament thy follies,
Nay I will make thee kneele to take my offer:
Once more farwell, and put thy truſt in puppits. Exit.

Quiſar. If none dare undertake it, I'le live a mourner.

Ba. You cannot want.

Sy. You muſt not.

Ru. 'Tis moſt dangerous,
And wiſe men wou'd proceed with care & counſell,
Yet ſome way would I know——
Walke with me Gentlemen—— Exeunt.

Ar. How doe you like her ſpirit? } Manent Arm.
Soz. 'Tis a cleare one, } & his Comp.
Clad with no dirty ſtuffe, ſhe is all pure honor.

Em. The braveſt wench I ever look'd upon,
And of the ſtrongeſt parts, ſhe is moſt faire,
Yet her mind ſuch a mirrour——

Arm. What an action
Wou'd this be, to put forward one, what a glory,
And what an everlaſting wealth to end it?
Methinkes my ſoule is ſtrangely rais'd.

Soz. To ſtep into it,
Juſt while they thinke, and ere they have determin'd
To bring the King off.

Ar. Things have been done as dangerous.

Em. And proſper'd beſt when they were leaſt conſiderd.

Ar. Bleſſe me my hopes,
And you my friends aſſiſt me.
None but our companions.

Soz. You deale wiſely,
And if we ſhrinke the name of ſlaves dye with us.

Em. Stay not for ſecond thoughts.

Ar. I am determin'd;
And though I loſe, it ſhall be ſung, I was valiant,
And my brave offer ſhall be turn'd to ſtory,
Worthy the Princeſſe tongue. A boat that's all
That's unprovided, and habits like to merchants,
The reſt wee'l councell as we goe.

Soz. Away then,
Fortune lookes faire on theſe, make haſte to win her.
Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Keeper, and 2 or 3 Moores.

Kee. I Have kept many a man, and many a great one,
Yet I confeſſe, I nere ſaw before
A man of ſuch a ſufferance; he lies now
Where I would not lay my dog, for ſure 'twou'd kill him.
Where neither light or comfort can come neare him;
Nor aire, nor earth that's wholſome; it grieves me
To ſee a mighty King with all his glory,
Sunke o'th' ſudden to the bottome of a dungeon.
Whether ſhould we deſcend that are poore Raſcals
If we had our deſerts?

1 Mo. 'Tis a ſtrange wonder,
Load him with Irons, oppreſſe him with contempts,
Which are the Governors commands, give him nothing,
Or ſo little, to ſuſtaine life, 'tis next nothing;
They ſtir not him, he ſmiles upon his miſeries,
And beates 'em with ſuch ſtrength as if his nature
Had been nurs'd up, and foſter'd with calamities.

2. He gives no ill words, curſes, nor repines not,
Blames nothing, hopes in nothing we can heare of;
And in the midſt of all theſe frights, feares nothing.

Kee. I'le be'ſ worne
He feares not, for even when I ſhake for him,
As many times my pitty will compell me,
When other ſoules that beare not halfe his burthen,
Shrinke in their powers, and burſt with their oppreſſions;
Then will he ſing, woo his afflictions,
And court 'em in ſad aires, as if he won'd wed 'em.

1. That's more then we have heard yet, we are only
Appointed for his guard, but not ſo neare him,
If we could heare that wonder——

Kee. Many times
I feare the Governour ſhould come to know it;
For his voice ſo affects me, ſo delights me,
That when I find his houre, I have Muſicke ready,
And it ſtirs me infinitely, be but ſtill and private,
And you may chance to heare.
King appeares loden with chaines, his head, armes only above

2. We will not ſtir ſir;
This is a ſuddaine change, but who darres blame it.
Kee. Now harke and melt, for I am ſure I ſhall;
Stand ſilent, what ſtubbourne weight of chaines——
1 Yet he lookes temperately.
2. His eyes not ſunke, and his complexion firme ſtill,
No wildneſſe, no diſtemper'd touch upon him.
How conſtantly he ſmiles, and how undanted?
With what a Majeſty he heaves his head up? Muſick.
Ke. Now marke, I know he wil ſing; do not diſturb him.
Your allowance from the Governor, wou'd it were more
Or in my power to make it hanſomer. (ſir,
Kin. Do not transgreſſe thy charge, I take his bounty,
And fortune, whileſt I beare a mind contented,
Not leavend with the glory I am falne from,
Nor hang upon vaine hopes, that may corrupt me.
Enter Governor.
Gov. Thou art my ſlave, and I appeare above thee.
Kee. The Governor himſelfe.
Gov. What, at your banquet?
And in ſuch ſtate, and with ſuch change of ſervice?
Kin. Nature's no glutton ſir, a little ſerves her.
Gov. This diet's holſome then.
Kin. I beg no better.
Gov. A calme contented mind, give him leſſe next;
Theſe full meales will oppreſſe his health, his Grace
Is of a tender, and pure conſtitution,
And ſuch repletions——
Kin. Mocke, mock, it moves not me ſir,
Thy mirthes, as do thy miſchiefes flie behind me.
Gov. Ye carry it handſomely, but tell me patience,
Do not you curſe the brave and royall Lady
Your gratious ſiſter? do not you damn her pitty,
Damn twenty times a day, and dam it ſeriouſly?
Do not you ſweare aloud too, cry and kick?
The very ſoule ſweat in thee with the agony
Of her contempt of me? couldſt not thou eate her
For being ſo injurious to thy fortune,
Thy faire and happy fortune? couldſt not thou wiſh her
A Baſtard, or a whore, fame might proclame her
Black ugly fame, or that thou hadſt had no ſiſter?
Spitting the generall name out, and the nature;
Blaſpheming heaven for making ſuch a miſchiefe;
For giving power to pride, and will to woman?
Kin. No Tyrant, no, I bleſſe and love her for it;
And though her ſcorne of thee, had laid up for me
As many plagues as the corrupted aire breeds,
As many miſchiefes as the houres have minutes,
As many formes of death, as doubt can figure;
Yet I ſhould love her more ſtill, and more honour her;
All thou canſt lay upon me, cannot bend me,
No not the ſtroke of death, that I deſpiſe too.
For if feare could poſſeſſe me, thou hadſt won me;
As little from this houre I prize thy flatteries,
And leſſe then thoſe thy prayers, though thou wouldſt
And if ſhe be not Miſtris of this nature, (kneele to me;
She is none of mine, no kin, and I contemne her.
Gov. Are you ſo valiant ſir?
Kin. Yes, and ſo fortunate;
For he that holds my conſtancy ſtill conquers;
Hadſt thou preſerv'd me as a noble enemy,
And as at firſt, made my reſtraint ſeeme to me
But only as the ſhadow of captivity,
I had ſtill ſpoke thee noble, ſtill declar'd thee
A valiant, great, and worthy man, ſtill lov'd thee,
And ſtill prefer'd thy faire love to my ſiſter;
But to compell this from me with a miſery,
A moſt inhumane, and unhanſome ſlavery——
Gov. You will relent for all this talke I feare not,
And put your wits a worke agen.
Kin. You are cozen'd;
Or if I were ſo weake to be wrought to it,
So fearefull to give way to ſo much poverty,
How I ſhould curſe her heart if ſhe conſented.
Gov. You ſhall write and entreat, or——
Kin. Do thy utmoſt,
And e'ne in all thy tortures I'le laugh at thee,
I'le thinke thee no more valiant, but a villaine;
Nothing thou haſt done brave, but like a theefe,
Atchiev'd by craft, and kept by cruelty;
Nothing thou canſt deſerve, thou art unhoneſt;
Nor no way live to build a name, thou art barbarous.
Gov. Down with him low enough, there let him mur-
And ſee his dyet be ſo light and little, (mur,
He grow not thus high hearted on't, I will coole ye,
And make ye cry for mercy, and be ready
To worke my ends, and willingly; and your ſiſter taken
Your ſcornefull, cruell ſiſter ſhall repent too, (downe,
And ſue to me for grace.
Give him no liberty,
But let his bands be doubled, his eaſe leſſened;
Nothing his heart deſires, but vexe and torture him:
Let him not ſleepe, nothing that's deare to nature
Let him enjoy; yet take heed that he dye not;
Keepe him as neere death, and as willing to embrace it,
But ſee he arrive not at it; I will humble him,
And her ſtout heart that ſtands on ſuch defiance;
And let me ſee her champions that dare venture
Her high and mighty wooers, keepe your guards cloſe,
And as you love your lives be diligent,
And what I charge, obſerve.
Omnes We ſhall be dutifull. (Exit. Gov.
Gov. I'le pull your courage King and all your bravery.
1. Moſt certaine he is reſolved nothing can ſtir him;
For if he had but any part about him
Gave way to feare or hope, he durſt not talke thus,
And do thus ſtoutly too, as willingly,
And quietly he ſunke downe to his ſorrows,
As ſome men to their ſleepes.
Kee. Yes, and ſleepes with 'em;
So litle he regards them, ther's the wonder,
And often ſoundly ſleepes, wou'd I durſt pitty him,
Or wou'd it were in my will, but we are ſervants,
And tyed unto command.
2. I wiſh him better,
But much I feare has found his tombe already,
We muſt obſerve our guards.
1. He cannot laſt long,
And when he is dead, he is free.
Kee. That's the moſt cruelty,
That we muſt keepe him living.
2. That's as he pleaſe;
For that man that reſolves, needs no Phiſitian. Exeunt.

Enter Armuſia, Soza, Emanuel like merchants, Arm'd underneath.

Arm. Our proſperous paſſage was an omen to us,
A lucky and a faire omen——
Omnes We beleeve it.
Ar. The ſea and wind ſtrove who ſhould moſt befriend
And as they favourd our deſigne and lov'd us, (us,
So lead us forth---where lies the boat that brought us?
Soz.

Soz. Safe lodg'd within the Reeds, cloſe by the Caſtle,
That no eye can ſuſpect, nor thought come neare it.
Em. But where have you been, brave ſir?
Ar. I have broke the Ice boyes:
I have begun the game, faire fortune guide it,
Suſpectleſſe have I travell'd all the towne through,
And in this Merchants ſhape won much acquaintance,
Survey'd each ſtrength and place that may befriend us,
View'd all his Magazines, got perfect knowledge
Of where the priſon is, and what power guards it.
Soz. Theſe will be ſtrong attempts.
Ar. Courage is ſtrong:
What we began with policy, my deare friends,
Let's end with manly force; there's no retiring,
Unleſſe it be with ſhame.
Em. Shame hit that hopes it
Ar. Better a few, and clearer fame will follow us,
However, loſe or win, and ſpeak our memories,
Then if we led our Armies, things done thus,
And of this noble waight, will ſtile us worthyes.
Soz. Direct, and we have done, bring us to execute,
And if we flinch, or faile——
Ar. I am ſure ye dare not.
Then further know, and let no eare be neare us
That may be falſe.
Em. Speak boldly on, we are honeſt;
Our lives and fortunes yours.
Ar. Hard by the place then
Where all his treaſure lies, his armes, his women,
Cloſe by the priſon too where he keeps the King,
I have hir'd a lodging, as a trading merchant,
A Celler to that too, to ſtow my wares in,
The very wall of which, joynes to his ſtore-houſe.
Soz. What of all this?
Ar. Ye are dull, if ye apprehend not:
Into that Celler, elected friends, I have conveyd
And unſuſpected too that will doe it;
That that will make all ſhake, and ſmoak too.
Em. Ha?
Ar. My thoughts have not been idle, nor my practice:
The fire I brought here with me ſhall doe ſomething,
Shall burſt into materiall flames, and bright ones,
That all the Iſland ſhall ſtand wondring at it,
As if they had been ſtricken with a Comet:
Powder is ready, and enough to worke it,
The match is left a-fire, all, all huſht, and lockt cloſe,
No man ſuſpecting what I am but Merchant:
An houre hence, my brave friends, look for the fury,
The fire to light us to our honour'd purpoſe,
For by that time 'twill take.
Soz. What are our duties?
Ar. When all are full of feare and fright, the Govor
Out of his wits, the to ſee flames ſo impetious, (nour
Ready to turne to aſhes all he worſhips,
And all the people there to ſtop theſe ruines,
No man regarding any private office,
Then flie we to the priſon ſuddenly,
Here's one has found the way, and dares direct us.
Em. Then to our ſwords and good hearts,
I long for it.
Ar. Certaine we ſhall not find much oppoſition,
But what is muſt be forced.
Soz. 'Tis bravely caſt ſir,
And ſurely too I hope.
Ar. If the fire faile not,
And powder hold his nature, ſome muſt preſently
Upon the firſt cry of the amazed people,
(For nothing will be markt then, but the miſerie)
Be ready with the boat upon an inſtant,
And then all's right and faire.
Em. Bleſſe us deare fortune.
Ar. Let us be worthie of it in our courage,
And fortune muſt befriend us, come all ſever,
But keep ſtill within ſight, when the flame riſes
Let's meet, and either doe, or dye.
Soz. So be it. Exeunt.

Enter Governour and Captaine.

Gov. No Captaine, for theſe troops we need 'em not,
The Towne is ſtrong enough to ſtand their furies;
I wou'd ſee 'em come and offer to doe ſomething.
They are high in words.
Cap. 'Tis ſafer ſo then doing.
Gov. Doſt thinke they dare attempt.
Cap. May be by treaty
But ſure by force they wil not prove ſo forward.
Gov. No faith, I warrant thee, they know me wel enough,
And know they have no child in hand to play with:
They know my nature too, I have bit ſome of 'em,
And to the bones, they have reaſon to remember me,
It makes me laugh to think how glorious
The fooles are in their promiſes, and how pregnant
Their wits and powers are to bring things to paſſe;
Am I not growne leane with loſſe of ſleep and care
To prevent theſe threatnings, Captaine?
Cap. You look well ſir:
Upon my conſcience you are not like to ſicken
Upon any ſuch conceit.
Gov. I hope I ſhall not:
Well wou'd I had this wench, for I muſt have her,
She muſt be mine; and there's another charge Captaine;
What betwixt love and brawling I got nothing,
All goes in maintenance——
Heark what was that, The Train takes.
That noyſe there? it went with a violence.
Cap. Some old wall belike ſir,
That had no neighbour helpe to hold it up,
Is fallen ſuddenly.
Gov. I muſt diſcard theſe Raſcals,
That are not able to maintaine their buildings,
They blur the beauty of the Town.
Within, Fire, fire.
Gov. I heare another tune, good Captaine,
It comes on freſher ſtill, 'tis loud and fearefull,
Look up into the Towne, how bright the ayre ſhewes;
Upon my life ſome ſuddaine fire. Ex. Cap.
The bell too? Bell Rings.
I heare the noyſe more cleare

Enter Citizen.

Cit. Fire, fire.
Gov. Where? where?
Cit. Suddenly taken in a Merchans houſe ſir,
Fearefull and high it blazes; helpe good people.
Gov. Pox o' their paper-houſes, how they ſmother,
They light like candles, how the rore ſtill riſes?

Enter Captaine.

Cap. Your Magazines a fire ſir, help, help ſuddenly,
The Caſtle too is in danger, in much danger,
All will be loſt, get the people preſently,
And all that are your guard, and all helpe, all hands ſir,
Your wealth, your ſtrength, is burnt elſe, the town periſht;

The

The Caſtle now begins to flame.
Gov. My ſoule ſhakes. (him,
Cap. A Merchants houſe next joyning? ſhame light on
That ever ſuch a neighbour, ſuch a villaine———
Gov. Raiſe all the garriſon, and bring 'em up.
Enter other Citizens.
And beat the people forward---Oh I have loſt all
In one houſe, all my hopes: good worthy Citizens
Follow me all, and all your powers give to me,
I will reward you all. Oh curſed fortune----
The flame's more violent: ariſe ſtill, help, helpe Citizens,
Freedome & wealth to him that helps: follow, oh follow.
Fling wine, or any thing, Ile ſee't recompenc'd.
Buckets, more Buckets; fire, fire, fire. Ex. omnes.

Enter Armuſia, and his company.

Arm. Let it flame on, a comely light it gives up
To our diſcovery.
Soz. Hearke, what a merry crye
Theſe hounds make? forward fairely,
We are not ſeen in the miſt, we are Not noted. Away,
Away. Now if we loſe our fortune———Exit.
Enter Captaine and Citizens.
Cap. Up ſouldiers, up, and deale like men.
Cit. More water, more water, all is conſum'd elſe.
Cap. All's gone, unleſſe you undertake it ſtraight, your Wealth too, that muſt preſerve, & pay your labor bravely.
Up, up, away. Ex. Cap. and Cit. Then,
Enter Armuſia and his company breaking open a doore.
Ar. So, thou art open, keep the way cleare
Behinde ſtill. Now for the place.
Sold. 'Tis here ſir.
Ar. Sure this is it.
Force ope the doore---A miſerable creature!
Yet by his manly face———The King diſcover'd.
Kin. Why ſtare ye on me?
You cannot put on faces to affright me:
In death I am a King ſtill, and contemne ye:
Where is that Governour? me thinks his man-hood
Should be well pleas'd to ſee my Tragedy,
And come to bath his ſterne eyes in my ſorrowes;
I dare him to the fight, bring his ſcornes with him,
And all his rugged threats: here's a throat, ſouldiers;
Come, ſee who can ſtrike deepeſt.
Em. Break the Chain there.
Kin. What does this mean?
Ar. Come, talke of no more Governours,
He has other buſineſſe ſir, put your legs forward,
And gather up your courage like a man,
Wee'll carrie off your head elſe: we are friends,
And come to give your ſorrowes eaſe.
Soz. On bravely;
Delayes may loſe agen,
Enter Guard.
Ar. The Guard,
Soz. Upon 'em.
Ar. Make ſpeedy, and ſure work.
Em. They flye. (ſpeedy,
Ar. Up with him, and to the Boat; ſtand faſt, now be
When this heat's paſt, wee'll ſing our Hiſtory.
Away, like thoughts, ſudden as deſires, friends;
Now ſacred chance be ours.
Soz. Pray when we have done ſir.
Exeunt.

Enter 3 or 4 Citizens ſeverally.

1. What is the fire allaid?
2. 'Tis out, tis out,
Or paſt the worſt, I never did ſo ſtoutly
I'le aſſure you neighbours ſince I was a man:
I have been burnt at both ends like a ſquib:
I liv'd two hovres in the fire, 'twas a hideous matter;
But when men of underſtanding come about it,
Men that judge of things, my wife gave me over,
And tooke her leave a hundred times, I bore up ſtill,
And toſt the Buckets boyes.
3. We are all meere Martins.
1. I heard a voice at latter end o'th hurry,
Or elſe I dreamt I heard it, that ſaid treaſon.
2. 'Tis like enough, it might cry murder to, for there was
Many without a joint, but whats that to us: Lets home
And fright our wives. for we looke like Devils.
Enter 3 Women.
3. Here come ſome of 'em to fright us.
1 W. Mine's alive neighbor—oh ſweet hony husband
2. Thou lieſt I thinke abominably, and thou hadſt bin
In my place, thou wouldſt have ſtunke at both ends.
Get me ſome drinke, give me whole tuns of drinke,
Whole ciſternes, for I have foure dozen of fine firebrands
In my belly, I have more ſmoke in my mouth, then would Blote a hundred herrings.
2 Wo. Art thou come ſafe agen?
3 Wo. I pray you what became of my man, is he in a wel?
2. At hearts eaſe in a Well, is very well neighbour;
We left him drinking of a new dozen of Buckets;
Thy husbands happy, he was through roaſted,
And now hee's baſting of himſelfe at all points:
The Clarke and he are cooling their pericraniums;
Body O me neighbors there's fire in my codpiece.
1 Wo. Bleſſe my husband.
2. Blow it out wife——blow, blow, the gable end a'th'
Women. Some water, water, water. (ſtore-houſe.
3. Peace, tis but a ſparkle;
Raiſe not the Towne again, 'twill be a great hinderance,
I'm glad tis out, and't had tane in my hayloft?
What frights are theſe, marry heaven bleſſe thy modicum.
3 Wo. But is a drown'd outright, pray put me out of Feare neighbor.
2. Thou wouldſt have it ſo, but after a hundred fires
More, hee'l live to ſee thee burnt for brewing muſty
Liquor.
1. Come lets goe neighbor.
2 For I would very faine turne downe this liquor;
Come, come, I fry like a burnt marry-bone:
Women get you afore, and draw upon us;
Run wenches run, and let your taps run with ye;
Run as the fire were in your tailes, cry ale, ale.
Wom. Away lets nourriſh the poore wretches.
2. Wee'l Rallie up the reſt of the burnt Regiment.

Enter Governor, Captaine, Souldier, and Guard.

Gov. The fire's quencht Captain, but the miſchief hangs
The Kings redeem'd, & gon too, a trick, a dam'd one. (ſtill;
Oh I am overtaken poorely, tamely. (ſon?
Cap. Where were the guard that waited upon the pri-
Sol. Moſt of 'em ſlaine, yet ſome ſcap'd ſir, and they de-
They ſaw a little boat ready to receive him, (liver,
And thoſe redeem'd him, making ſuch haſte and fighting;
Fighting

Fighting beyond the force of men.
Gov. I am loſt Captaine,
And all the world will laugh at this, and ſcorne me:
Count me a heavy ſleepy foole, a coward,
A coward paſt recovery, a confirm'd coward,
One without carriage, or common ſenſe.
Sol. Hee's gone ſir,
And put to ſea amaine, paſt our recovery,
Not a Boat ready to purſue; if there were any,
The people ſtand amazed to oat their valour,
And the ſudden fright of fire, none knowes to execute.
Gov. Oh, I could tear my limbs, & knock my boys brains
'Gainſt every poſt I meet; fool'd with a fire?
Cap. It was a crafty trick.
Gov. No, I was lazy,
Confident ſluggiſh lazie, had I but met 'em,
And chang'd a dozen blowes, I had forgiv'n 'em,
By both theſe hands held up, and by that brightneſſe
That gildes the world with light, by all our worſhips,
The hidden ebbes and flowes of the blew Ocean,
I will not reſt; no mirth ſhall dwell upon me,
Wine touch my mouth, nor any thing refreſh me,
Till I be wholy quit of this diſhonour:
Make ready my Barrato's inſtantly,
And what I ſhall intend---
Cap. We are your ſervants. Exeunt.

Enter Quiſara, Ruy Dyas.

Quiſar. Never tell me, you never car'd to win me,
Never for my ſake to attempt a deed,
Might draw me to a thought you fought my favour:
If not for love of me, for love of armes ſir,
For that cauſe you profeſſe, for love of honour,
Of which you ſtile your ſelfe the mighty Maſter,
You might have ſtept out nobly, and made an offer,
As if you had intended ſomething excellent,
Put on a forward face.
Ru. Deare Lady hold me---
Quiſar, I hold ye, as I finde yee, a faint ſervant.
Ru. By---I dare doe——
Quiſar. In a Ladies chamber
I dare beleeve ye, there's no mortall danger:
Give me the man that dares doe, to deſerve that:
I thought you Portugalls had been rare wonders,
Men of thoſe haughty courages and credits,
That all things were confin'd within your promiſes,
The Lords of fate and fortune I beleev'd yee,
But well I ſee I am deceiv'd Ruy Dias,
And blame too late my much beliefe.
Ru. I am aſham'd, Lady,
I was ſo dull, ſo ſtupid to your offer:
Now you have once more ſchool'd me, I am right,
And ſomething ſhall be thought on ſuddenly,
And put in act as ſoone, ſome preparation---
Quiſar. And give it out?
Ru. Yes, Lady, and ſo great too;
In which, the noyſe of all my Countrey-men--- (ones,
Quiſar. Thoſe will doe well, for they are all approv'd
And though he be reſtor'd alive.
Ru. I have ye.
Quiſar. For then we are both ſervants.
Ru. I conceive ye,
Good Madam give me leave to turne my fancies.
Quiſ. Do, & make all things fit, & then Ile viſit you. Ex.
Ru. My ſelfe, the cozen, and the Garriſon,
The neighbours of the out-Iſles of our nation,
Syana's ſtrength, for I can humour him:
And proud Bekamun, I ſhall deceive his glory. A ſhout.
What ringing ſound of joy is this? whence comes it?
May be the Princes are in ſport.

Enter Pyniero, Chriſtoph.

Py. Where are ye?
Ru. Now Pyniero, what's the haſte you ſeek me?
Py. Doe you know this ſigne ſir?
Ru. Ha!
Py. Doe you know this embleme?
Your noſe is boar'd.
Ru. Boar'd? what's that?
Py. Y'are topt ſir:
The Kings come home againe, the King.
Ru. The devill?
Py. Nay ſure he came a gods name home:
Hee's return'd ſir.
Chriſt. And all this joy yee heare---
Ru. Who durſt attempt him?
The Princes are all here.
Chry. They are worthy Princes,
They are ſpeciall Princes, all they love by ounces.
Believe it ſir, 'tis done, and done moſt bravely and eaſily.
What fortune have ye loſt ſir?
What juſtice have ye now unto this Lady?
Py. How ſtands your claime?
That ever man ſhould be fool'd ſo,
When he ſhould doe and proſper, ſtand proteſting,
Kiſſing the hand, and farting for a favour,
When he ſhould be about his buſineſſe ſweating;
She bid you goe, and pickt you out a purpoſe, (one,
To make your ſelfe a fortune by, a Lady, a Lady, and a luſty
A lovely, that now you may goe look, ſhe poynted ye,
Knowing you were a man of worth and merit,
And bid you fly, you have made a faire flight on't,
You have caught a gooſe.
Ru. How dare you thus moleſt me? A ſhout.
It cannot bee.
Chr. Heark how the generall joy rings!
Py. Have you your hearing left? is not that drunk too?
For if you had been ſober, you had been wiſe ſure.
Ru. Done? who dares doe?
Py. It ſeems an honeſt fellow,
That has ended his Market before you be up.
Chr. The ſhame on't 's a ſtranger too.
Py. 'Tis no ſhame,
He took her at her word, and tyed the bargaine,
Dealt like a man indeed, ſtood not demurring,
But clapt cloſe to the cauſe, as he will doe to the Lady:
'Is a fellow of that ſpeed and handſomneſſe,
He will get her with childe too, ere you ſhall come to
Is it not brave, a gentleman ſcarce landed, (know him,
Scarce eating of the aire here, not acquainted,
No circumſtance of love depending on him,
Nor no command to ſhew him, muſt ſtart forth,
At the firſt ſight to-----
Ru. I am undone,
Py. Like an Oyſter:
She neither taking view, nor value of him,
Unto ſuch deeds as theſe ---Pox o' theſe,
Theſe wiſe delayings——
They make men cowards.
You are undone as a man would undoe an egge,
A hundred ſhames about ye.

Enter Quiſara, Panura, and Traine.

Quiſara.

Quiſar. Can it be poſſible,
A ſtanger that I have not knowne, not ſeen yet,
A man I never grac'd; O Captaine, Captaine,
What ſhall I doe? I am betray'd by fortune,
It cannot be, it muſt not be.
Py. It is Lady,
And by my faith a hanſome Gentleman;
'Tis his poore Schollers prize.
Quiſar. Muſt I be given
Unto a man I never ſaw, ne're ſpoke with,
I know not of what Nation?
Py. Is a Portugall,
And of as good a pitch he will be given to you Lady,
For hee's given much to hanſome fleſh.
Quiſar. Oh Ruy Dias,
This was your ſloth, your ſloth, your ſloth Ruy Dias.
Py. Your love ſloth, Uncle doe you find it now?
You ſhonld have done at firſt, and faithfully: A ſhout.
And then the tother had lyed ready for ye;
Madam, the generall joy comes.
Quiſar. We muſt meet it——but with what comfort?

Enter Citizens carrying boughes, boyes ſinging after 'em; Than King, Armuſia, Soza, Emanuell; The Princes and traine following.

Quiſar. Oh my deare brother what a joy runs through (me,
To ſee you ſafe again, your ſelfe, and mighty,
What a bleſt day is this?
Kin. Riſe up faire ſiſter,
I am not welcome till you have embraced me.
Ru. A generall gladnes ſir flies through the City,
And mirth poſſeſſes all to ſee your Grace arrive,
Thus happily arrived againe, and fairely;
'Twas a brave venture who ſo e're put for it,
A high and noble one, worthy much honor;
And had it failed, we had not failed great ſir,
And in ſhort time too to have forc'd the Governor,
In ſpight of all his threats.
Kin. I thanke ye Gentleman.
Ru. And all his ſubtilties to ſet you free,
With all his heart and will too.
Kin. I know ye love me.
Py. This had bin good with ſomething done before it,
Somthing ſet off to beautifie it, now it ſounds emptie like
A Barbers baſon, pox there's no mettall in't, no noble mar- (row.
Ba. I have an army ſir, but that the Governor,
The fooliſh fellow was a little provident,
And wiſe in letting ſlip no time, became him too,
That would have ſcoured him elſe, and all his confines;
That would have rung him ſuch a peale——
Py. Yes backward,
To make doggs houle, I know thee to a farthing,
Thy armye's good for hawkes, there's
Nothing but ſheeps hearts in it.
Sy. I have done nothing ſir, therefore
I thinke it convenient I ſay little what I purpoſed,
And what my love intended.
Kin. I like your modeſtie,
And thanke ye royall friends, I know it griev'd ye
To know my miſerie; but this man Princes,
I muſt thanke heartily indeed and truly,
For this man ſaw me in't, and redeemed me:
He lookt upon me ſinking, and then caught me.
This ſiſter this, this all man, this all valour,
This pious man.
Ku. My countenance, it ſhames me,
One ſcarce arrived, not harden'd yet, not
Read in dangers and great deeds, ſea-ſick, not ſeaſon'd——
Oh I have boy'd my ſelfe.
Kin. This noble bulwarke,
This launce and honor of our age and Kingdome,
This that I never can reward, nor hope
To be once worthy of the name of friend to,
This, this man from the bowels of my ſorrowes
Has new begot my name, and once more made me:
Oh ſiſter, if there may be thanks for this,
Or any thing neere recompence invented.
Ar. You are too noble ſir there is reward
Above my action too by millions:
A recompence ſo rich and glorious,
I durſt not dreame it mine, but that 'twas promiſed;
But that it was propounded, ſworne and ſealed
Before the face of heaven, I durſt not hope it,
For nothing in the life of man, or merit,
It is ſo truly great, can elſe embrace it.
Kin. O ſpeake it, ſpeake it, bleſſe mine eares to heare it,
Make me a happy man, to know it may be,
For ſtill methinkes I am a priſoner,
And feele no libertie before I find it.
Ar. Then know it is your ſiſter, ſhe is mine ſir,
I claime her by her owne word, and her honour;
It was her open promiſe to that man
That durſt redeeme ye; Beauty ſet me on,
And fortune crownes me faire, if ſhe receive me.
Kin. Receive ye ſir——why ſiſter——ha——ſo backward,
Stand as you knew me not, nor what he has ventured
My deareſt ſiſter.
Ar. Good ſir pardon me,
There is a bluſhing modeſtie becomes her,
That holds her back; women are nice to wooe ſir;
I would not have her forced, give her faire libertie;
For things compell'd and frighted of ſoft natures,
Turne into feares, and flye from their owne wiſhes.
Kin. Looke on my Quiſara ſuch another,
Oh all ye powers, ſo excellent in nature,
In honour ſo abundant.
Quiſar. I confeſſe ſir,
Confeſſe my word is paſt too, he has purchaſed;
Yet good ſir give me leave to thinke, but time
To be acquainted with his worth and perſon;
To make me fit to know it; we are both ſtrangers,
And how we ſhould beleeve ſo ſuddenly,
Or come to faſten our affections——
Alas, love has his complements.
Kin. Be ſudden
And certaine in your way, no womans doubles,
Nor coy delayes, you are his, and ſo aſſure it,
Or caſt from me and my remembrance ever;
Reſpect your word, I know you will, come ſiſter,
Lets ſee what welcome you can give a priſoner,
And what faire lookes a friend——Oh my moſt noble
Princes, no diſcontents, but all be luſtie,
He that frownes this day is an open enemie:
Thus in my armes my deare.
Ar. You make me bluſh ſir.
Kin. And now lead on——
Our whole Court crowned with pleaſure.
Ru. Madam, deſpaire not, ſomething ſhall be done yet,
And ſuddenly and wiſely.
Quiſar. O Ruy Dias. Ex.
Py. Well he's a brave fellow, & he has deſerv'd her richly,
And you have had your hands full I dare ſwear Gentleme.

Soz.

Soz. We have done ſomething ſir, if it hit right.
Ch. The woman has no eyes elſe, nor no honeſty,
So much I think.
Py. Come, let's goe bounce amongſt 'em,
To the Kings health, and my brave country-mans.
My uncle looks as though he were ſick oth'
Worms friends. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter Pyniero.

Mine uncle haunts me up & down, looks melancholy,
Wondrous proof melancholy, ſometimes ſweares,
Then whiſtles, ſtarts, cries, & groans, as if he had the Bots.
As to ſay truth, I think h'as little better,
And wo'd fain ſpeak; bids me good morrow at midnight,
And good night when 'tis noon, has ſomething hovers
About his braines, that would faine finde an iſſue,
But cannot out, or dares not: ſtil he follows; { Enter
How he looks ſtill, and how he beats about, { Ruy Dyas.
Like an old Dog at a dead ſent? I marry,
There was a ſigh wou'd a ſet a ſhip a ſayling:
Theſe winds of love and honour blow at all ends.
Now ſpeak and't be thy will: good morrow Uncle.
Ru. Good morrow ſir.
Py. This is a new ſalute:
Sure h'as forgot me: this is pur-blinde Cupid.
Ru. My Nephew?
Py. Yes ſir, if I be not chang'd.
Ru. I wou'd faine ſpeak with you.
Py. I wou'd faine have ye ſir,
For to that end I ſtay.
Ru. You know I love yee,
And I have lov'd you long, my deare Pyniero,
Bred and ſupply'd you.
Py. Whither walks this Preamble?
Ru. You may remember, though I am but your Uncle,
I ſure had a fathers care, a fathers tenderneſſe.
Py. Sure he would wrap me into ſomething now ſud-
He doubts my nature in, for mine is honeſt, (denly,
He windes about me ſo.
Ru. A fathers deligence.
My privat benefits, I have forgot ſir,
But thoſe you might lay claime to as my follower;
Yet ſome men wou'd remember——
Pyn. I doe daily. (one,
Ru. The place which I have put ye in, which is no weak
Next to my ſelfe you ſtand in all employments,
Your counſells, cares, aſſignements with me equall,
So is my ſtudy ſtill to plant your perſon;
Theſe are ſmall teſtimonies I have not forgot ye,
Nor wou'd not be forgotten.
Pyn. Sure you cannot.
Ru. O Pyniero——
Pyn. Sir, what hangs upon you,
What heavy weight oppreſſes ye, ye have loſt,
(I muſt confeſſe, in thoſe that underſtand ye)
Some little of your credit, but time will cure that;
The beſt may ſlip ſometimes.
Pn. Oh my beſt Nephew——
Pyn. It may be yee feare her too, that diſturbs ye,
That ſhe may fall her ſelfe, or be fore'd from ye.
Ru. She is ever true, but I undone for ever.
Oh that Armuſia, that new thing, that ſtranger,
That flag ſtuck up to rob me of mine honor;
That murdring chaine ſhot at me from my Country;
That goodly plague that I muſt court to kill me.
Pyn. Now it comes flowing from him, I feared this,
Knew, he that durſt be idle, durſt be ill too,
Has he not done a brave thing?
Ru. I muſt confeſſe it nephew, muſt allow it,
But that brave thing has undone me, has ſunke me,
Has trod me like a name in ſand to nothing,
Hangs betwixt hope and me, and threatens my ruine:
And if he riſe and blaze, farewell my fortune;
And when thats ſet, where's thy advancement Cozen?
That were a friend, that were a noble kinſman,
That would conſider theſe; that man were gratefull;
And he that durſt doe ſomething here durſt love me.
Pyn. You ſay true, 'tis worth conſideration,
Your reaſons are of weight, and marke me Uncle,
For I'le be ſudden, and to'th' purpoſe with you.
Say this Armuſia then were taken off,
As it may be eaſily done.
How ſtands the woman?
Ru. She is mine for ever;
For ſhe contemnes his deed and him.
Pyn. Pox on him,
Or if the ſingle pox be not ſufficient,
The hogs, the dogs, and devils pox poſſeſſe him:
'Faith this Armuſia ſtumbles me, 'is a brave fellow,
And if he could be ſpared Uncle——
Ru. I muſt periſh:
Had he ſet up at any reſt but this,
Done any thing but what concern'd my credit,
The everlaſting loſing of my worth.——
Pyn. I underſtand you now, who ſet you on too;
I had a reaſonable good opinion of the devill
Till this houre; and I ſee he is a knave indeed,
An arrant ſtinking knave, for now I ſmell him;
I'le ſee what may be done then, you ſhall know
You have a kinſman, but no villaine Uncle,
Nor no betrayer of faire fame, I ſcorne it;
I love and honour vertue; I muſt have
Acceſſe unto the Lady to know her mind too,
A good word from her mouth you know may ſtir me;
A Ladies looke at ſetting on——
Ru. You ſay well;
Here Cozen, here's a Letter readie for you,
And you ſhall ſee how nobly ſhee'l receive you,
And with what care direct.
Pyn. Farewell then Uncle,
After I have talked with her, I am your ſervant,
To make you honeſt if I can——elſe hate you.
Pray ye no more complements, my head is buſie, heaven
What a malicious ſoule does this man carry? (bleſſe me;
And to what ſcurvy things this love converts us?
What ſtinking things, and how ſweetly they become us?
Murther's a morall vertue with theſe Lovers,
A ſpeciall peece of Divinitie I take it;
I may be mad, or violentlie drunke,
Which is a whelp of that litter; or I may be covetous,
And learne to murther mens eſtates, thats baſe too;
Or proud, but thats a Paradiſe to this;
Or envious, and ſit eating of my ſelfe
At others fortunes; I may lye, and damnably,
Beyond the patience of an honeſt hearer;
Couzen, Cut purſes, ſit i'th' ſtocks for apples.

But when I am a lover, Lord have mercy,
Theſe are poore pelting ſins, or rather plagues,
Love and Ambition draw the devills Coach.
Enter Quiſana, and Panura.
How now! who are theſe? Oh my great Ladies followers,
Her riddle-founders, and her fortune-tellers,
Her readers of her love-lectures, her inflamers:
Theſe doors I muſt paſſe through. I hope they are wide.
Good day to your beauties, how they take it to 'em?
As if they were faire indeed.
Quiſ. Good morrow to you ſir.
Pin. That's the old Hen, the brood-bird? how ſhe buſtles?
How like an Inventory of Lecherie ſhe looks?
Many a good peece of iniquity
Has paſt her hands, I warrant her——I beſeech you,
Is the faire Princeſſe ſtirring?
Pan. Yes marry is ſhe ſir,
But ſomewhat private: have you a buſineſſe with her?
Pin. Yes forſooth have I, and a ſerious buſineſſe.
Pan. May not we know?
Pin. Yes, when you can keep counſell.
Pan. How prettily he looks? he's a ſouldier ſure,
His rudeneſſe ſits ſo handſomly upon him.
Quiſ. A good blunt gentleman.
Pin. Yes marry am I:
Yet for a puſh or two at ſharp, an't pleaſe you——
Pan. My honeſt friend, you know not who you ſpeak to:
This is the Princeſſe Aunt.
Pin. I like her th' better
And ſhe were her Mother, (Lady) or her grandmother,
I am not ſo baſhfull but I can buckle with her.
Pan. Of what ſize is your buſineſſe?
Pin. Of the long ſixteens,
And will make way I warrant yee.
Pan. How fine he talks?
Pin. Nay in troth I talke but courſely, Lady,
But I hold it comfortable for the underſtanding:
How faine they would draw me into ribaldry?
Theſe wenches that live eaſily, live high,
And love theſe broad diſcourſes, as they love poſſets;
Theſe dry delights ſerve for preparatives.
Pan. Why doe you look ſo on me?
Pin. I am gheſſing
By the caſt of your face, what the property of your place
For I preſume you turne a key ſweet beauty, (ſhould be,
And you another gravity, under the Princeſſe,
And by my——I warrant ye good places,
Comely commodious feates.
Quiſan. Prethee let him talke ſtill,
For me thinkes he talkes handſomely.
Py. And truly
As neare as my underſtanding ſhall enable me
You look as if you kept my Ladies ſecrets:
Nay doe not laugh, for I meane honeſtly, (end?
How theſe young things tattle, when they get a toy by th'
And how their hearts goe pit a pat and look for it?
Wou'd it not dance too, if it had a Fiddle?
Your gravity I gheſſe, to take the Petitions,
And heare the lingring ſuits in love diſpos'd,
Their ſighes and ſorrowes in their proper place,
You keep the ayme office.
Qui. Prethee ſuffer him,
For as I live hee's a pretty fellow.
I love to here ſometimes what men think of us:
And thus deliver'd freely, 'tis no malice:
Proceed good honeſt man.
Pin. I will, good Madam.
According to mens ſtates and dignities,
Moneyes and moveables, you rate their dreames,
And caſt the Nativity of their deſires,
If he reward well, all he thinks is proſperous:
And if he promiſe place, his dreams are Oracles;
Your ancient practique Art too in theſe diſcoveries,
Who loves at ſuch a length, who a ſpan farther,
And who drawes home, yeeld you no little profit,
For theſe yee milk by circumſtance.
Qui. Yee are cunning.
Pin. And as they Oyle ye, and advance your ſpindle,
So you draw out the lines of love, your doores too,
The doores of deſtiny, that men muſt paſſe through;
Theſe are faire places.
Pan. He knowes all.
Pin. Your trap doores,
To pop fooles in it, that have no providence,
Your little wickets, to work wiſe men, like wires through it,
And draw their ſtates and bodies into Cobwebs,
Your Poſterne doores, to catch thoſe that are cautelous,
And would not have the worlds eye finde their knaveries:
Your doores of danger, ſome men hate a pleaſure,
Unleſſe that may be full of feares; your hope doores,
And thoſe are fine commodities, where fooles pay
For every new encouragement, a new cuſtome;
You have your doores of honour, and of pleaſure;
But thoſe are for great Princes, glorious vanities,
That travell to be famous through diſeaſes;
There be the doores of povertie and death too:
But theſe you doe the beſt you can to damme up,
For then your gaine goes out.
Qui. This is a rare lecture.
Pin. Read to them that underſtand.
Pan. Beſhrew me,
I dare not venture on ye, yee cut too keen ſir.
Qui. We thank you ſir for your good mirth } Enter
You are a good Companion. } Quiſara
Here comes the Princeſſe now, attend your buſineſſe.
Quiſar. Is there no remedy? no hopes can help me?
No wit to ſet me free? whoſe there hoe?
Quiſan. Troubled? her looks are almoſt wilde:
What ailes the Princeſſe?
I know nothing ſhe wants.
Quiſar. Who's that there with you?
Oh Signeur Piniero? you are moſt welcome:
How does your noble uncle?
Pin. Sad as you are Madam:
But he commends his ſervice, and this Letter.
Quiſar. Goe off, attend within——Faire ſir, I thank ye,
Pray be no ſtranger, for indeed you are welcome;
For your owne vertues welcome.
Quiſ. We are miſtaken,
This is ſome brave fellow ſure.
Pan. I'me ſure hee's a bold fellow:
But if ſhe hold him ſo, we muſt beleeve it. Ex.
Quiſar. Doe you know of this faire ſir?
Pin. I gheſſe it Madam,
And whither it intends; I had not brought it elſe.
Quiſ. It is a buſineſſe of no common reckoning.
Pin. The handſomer for him that goes about it;
Slight actions are rewarded with ſlight thanks:
Give me a matter of ſome waight to wade in.
Quiſ. And can you love your Uncle ſo directly,
So ſeriouſly, and ſo full, to undertake this?
Can there be ſuch a faith?

Pin.

Pyn. Dare you ſay I to it,
And ſet me on? 'tis no matter for my Uncle,
Or what I owe to him, dare you but wiſh it.
Quiſar. I wou'd faine——
Pyn. Have it done; ſay but ſo Lady.
Quiſan. Conceive it ſo.
Pyn. I will, 'tis that I am bound too:
Your will that muſt command me, and your pleaſure,
The faire aſpects of thoſe eyes, that muſt direct me:
I am no Uncles agent, I am mine owne, Lady;
I ſcorne my able youth ſhould plough for others,
Or my ambition ſerve for pay; I ayme,
Although I never hit, as high as any man,
And the reward I reach at ſhall be equall,
And what love ſpurs me on to, this deſire,
Makes me forget an honeſt man, a brave man,
A valiant, and a vertuous man, my country-man, Armuſia,
The delight of all the Minions, (your excellence;
Is love of you, doting upon your beauty, the admiration of
Make me but ſervant to the pooreſt ſmile,
Or the leaſt grace you have beſtow'd on others,
And ſee how ſuddenly Ile worke your ſafety,
And ſet your thoughts at peace; I am no flatterer,
To promiſe infinitely, and out-dream dangers;
To lye a bed, and ſweare men into Feavers,
Like ſome of your trim ſuters; when I promiſe,
The light is not more conſtant to the world,
Then I am to my word —— She turnes for millions.
Quiſar. I have not ſeen a braver confirm'd courage.
Pyn. For a tun of Crownes ſhe turns: ſhe is a woman,
And much I feare a worſe then I expected.
You are the object Lady, you are the eye
In which all excellence appears, all wonder,
From which all hearts take fire, all hands their valour:
And when he ſtands diſputing, when you bid him,
Or but thinks of his eſtate, Father, Mother,
Friends, Wife, and Children,
'Is a foole, and I ſcorne him,
And be but to make cleane his ſword: coward
Men have forgot their fealty to beauty.
Had I the place in your affections,
My moſt unworthy uncle is fit to fall from,
Liv'd in thoſe bleſſed eyes, and read the ſtories
Of everlaſting pleaſures figur'd there,
I wou'd finde out your commands before you thought 'em,
And bring 'em to you done, ere you dream't of 'em.
Quiſ. I admire his boldneſſe.
Pyn. This, or any thing;
Your brothers death, mine uncles, any mans,
No ſtate that ſtands ſecure, if you frowne on it.
Look on my youth, I bring no blaſtings to you,
The firſt flower of my ſtrength, my faith.
Quiſ. No more ſir;
I am too willing to believe, reſt ſatisfi'd;
If you dare doe for me, I ſhall be thankfull:
You are a handſome gentleman, a faire one,
My ſervant if you pleaſe; I ſeale it thus ſir.
No more, till you deſerve more. Exit.
Pyn. I am rewarded:
This woman's cunning, but ſhe's bloudy too;
Although ſhe pulls her Tallons in, ſhe's miſchievous;
Form'd like the face of heaven, cleare and tranſparent;
I muſt pretend ſtill, beare 'em both in hopes,
For feare ſome bloudy ſlave thruſt in indeed,
Faſhion'd and fleſh'd to what they wiſh: well uncle,
What will become of this, and what diſhonour
Follow this fatall ſhaft, if ſhot, let time tell,
I can but only feare, and croſſe to croſſe it. Exit.

Enter Armuſia, Emanuel, Soza.

Em. Why are you thus ſad? what can grieve or vex you
That have the pleaſures of the world, the profits,
The honour, and the loves at your diſpoſes?
Why ſhould a man that wants nothing, want his quiet?
Ar. I want what beggars are above me in, content:
I want the grace I have merited,
The favour, the due reſpect.
Soz. Does not the King allow it?
Ar. Yes and all honors elſe, all I can aske,
That he has power to give; but from his ſiſter,
The ſcornfull crueltie, forgive me beauty,
That I tranſgreſſe from her that ſhould looke on me,
That ſhould a little ſmile upon my ſervice,
And foſter my deſerts for her owne faiths ſake;
That ſhould at leaſt acknowledge me, ſpeake to me.
Soz. And you goe whining up and downe for this ſir,
Lamenting and diſputing of your grievances;
Sighing and ſobbing like a ſullen Schoole-boy,
And curſing good-wife fortune for this favor.
Ar. What would you have me doe?
Soz. Doe what you ſhould doe,
What a man would doe in this caſe, a wiſe man,
An underſtanding man that knowes a woman;
Knowes her and all her tricks, her ſcorns & all her trifles:
Goe to her and take her in your armes and ſhake her,
Take her and toſſe her like a barre.
Em. But be ſure you pitch her upon a feather-bed,
Shake her between a paire of ſheets ſir,
There ſhake theſe ſullen fits out of her, ſpare her not there,
There you may breake her will, and bruiſe no bone ſir.
Soz. Goe to her.
Em. Thats the way.
Soz. And tell her and boldly,
And doe not mince the matter, nor mocke your ſelfe,
With being too indulgent to her pride:
Let her heare roundly from ye, what ye are,
And what ye haue deſerved, and what ſhe muſt be.
Em. And be not put off like a common fellow,
With the Princeſſe would be private,
Or that ſhe has taken phiſicke, and admits none,
I would talke to her any where.
Ar. It makes me ſmile.
Em. Now you looke handſomely:
Had I a wench to win, I would ſo flutter her,
They love a man that cruſhes 'em to verjuice;
A woman held at hard meat is your ſpanniel.
Soz. Pray take our counſell ſir.
Ar. I ſhall doe ſomething,
But not your way, it ſhewes too boiſterous,
For my affections are as faire and gentle,
As her they ſerve. Enter King.
Soz. The King.
Kin. Why, how now friend?
Why doe you rob me of the compan'ie
I love ſo dearly ſir, I have bin ſeeking you;
For when I want you, I want all my pleaſure:
Why ſad? thus ſad ſtill man; I will not have it;
I muſt not ſee the face I love thus ſhadowed. (him,
Em. And't pleaſe your Grace, methinks it ill becomes
A ſouldier ſhould be joviall, high and luſtie.
Kin. He ſhall be ſo, come, come, I know your reaſon,

It ſhall be none to croſſe you, ye ſhall have her,
Take my word, ('tis a Kings word) ye ſhall have her,
She ſhall be yours or nothing, pray be merry.
Arm. Your grace has given me cauſe, I ſhall be ſir,
And ever your poore ſervant.
King. Me my ſelfe ſir,
My better ſelfe, I ſhall finde time, and ſuddenly,
To gratifie your loves too gentlemen,
And make you know how much I ſtand bound to you:
Nay 'tis not worth your thanks, no further complement;
Will you goe with me friend?
Arm. I beſeech your grace,
Spare me an houre or two, I ſhall wait on you,
Some little private buſineſſe with my ſelfe ſir,
For ſuch a time.
King. Ile hinder no devotion,
For I know you are regular, Ile take you gentlemen,
Becauſe hee ſhall have nothing to diſturbe him,
I ſhall look for your friend. Exeunt. Manet Armuſia.
Arm. I dare not faile ſir: } Enter
What ſhal I doe to make her know my miſery, } Panura.
To make her ſenſible? This is her woman,
I have a toy come to me ſuddenly,
It may worke for the beſt, ſhe can but ſcorne me,
And lower then I am I cannot tumble,
Ile trye what ere my fate be---- Good even faire one,
Pan. 'Tis the brave ſtranger- -A good night to you ſir.
Now by my Ladies hand a goodly gentleman!
How happy ſhall ſhe be in ſuch a husband?
Wou'd I were ſo provided too.
Arm. Good pretty one,
Shall I keep you company for an houre or two?
I want employment for this evening.
I am an honeſt man.
Pan. I dare beleeve yee:
Or if yee were not ſir, that's no great matter,
We take mens promiſes, wou'd ye ſtay with me ſir?
Arm. So it pleaſe you; pray let's be better acquainted,
I know you are the Princeſſe gentlewoman,
And wait upon her neere.
Pan. 'Tis like I doe ſo.
Arm. And may befriend a man, do him faire courteſies,
If he have buſineſſe your way.
Pan. I underſtand yee.
Arm. So kinde an office, that you may bind a gentleman
Hereafter to be yours, and your way too,
And ye may bleſſe the houre you did this benefit,
Sweet handſome faces ſhould have courteous mindes,
And ready faculties.
Pan. Tell me your buſineſſe,
Yet if I thinke it be to her, your ſelfe ſir,
For I know what you are, and what we hold ye,
And in what grace ye ſtand, without a ſecond
For that but darkens, you wou'd doe it better,
The Princeſſe muſt be pleas'd with your acceſſes,
I'me ſure I ſhould.
Arm. I want a Courtiers boldneſſe,
And am yet but a ſtranger, I wou'd faine ſpeak with her:
Pan. 'Tis very late, and upon her houre of ſleep ſir.
Ar. Pray ye weare this, and believe my meaning civil,
My buſineſſe of that faire reſpect and carriage:
This for our more acquaintance. Jewell.
Pan. How cloſe he kiſſes?
And how ſenſible the paſſings of his lips are?
I muſt do't, and I were to be hang'd now, and I will do it,
He may doe as much for me, that's all I ayme at,
And come what will on't, life or death, I'le do it,
For ten ſuch kiſſes more, and 'twere high treaſon.
Arm. I wou'd be private with her.
Pan. So you ſhall,
'Tis not worth thankes elſe, you muſt diſpatch quick.
Arm. Suddenly.
Pan. And I muſt leave you in my chamber ſir,
Where you muſt locke your ſelfe that none may ſee you,
'Tis cloſe to her, you cannot miſſe the entrance,
When ſhe comes downe to bed.
Arm. I underſtand ye, and once more thanke ye Lady.
Pan. Thanke me but thus.
Arm. If I faile thee——
Come cloſe then. Ex.

Enter Quiſara, and Quiſava.

Quiſar. 'Tis late good Aunt, to bed, I am ene unready,
My woman will not be long away.
Quiſav. I wou'd have you a little merrier firſt,
Let me ſit by ye, and read or diſcourſe
Something that ye fancy, or take my inſtrument.
Quiſar. No, no I thanke you,
I ſhall ſleep without theſe, I wrong your age Aunt
To make ye waite thus, pray let me entreat ye,
To morrow I'le ſee ye, I know y'are ſleepy,
And reſt will be a welcome gueſt, you ſhall not, Enter
Indeed you ſhall not ſtay; oh here's my woman, Panura.
Good night, good night, and good reſt Aunt attend you.
Qui. Sleep dwell upon your eyes, & faire dreams court ye.
Quiſar. Come, where have you been wench? make me (unready;
I ſlept but ill laſt night.
Pan. You'l ſleep the better
I hope too night Madam.
Quiſar. A little reſt contents me,
Thou loveſt thy bed Panura.
Pan. I am not in love Lady,
Nor ſeldome dreame of devils, I ſleep ſoundly.
Quiſar. I'le ſweare thou doſt, thy husband wou'd not take
If thou wert married wench. (it ſo well
Pan. Let him take Madam
The way to waken me, I am no dormouſe.
Husbands have larum bels, if they but
Ring once.
Quiſar. Thou art a merry wench.
Pan. I ſhall live the longer.
Quiſar. Prethee fetch my booke.
Pan. I am glad of that.
Quiſar. I'le read a while before I ſleep.
Pan. I will Madam.
Quiſar. And if Ruy Diaz meet you and be importunate,
He may come in.
Pan. I have a better fare for you,
Now leaſt in ſight play I. Exit.
Enter Armuſia, locks the doore.
Quiſar. Why ſhould I love him?
Why ſhould I doat upon a man deſerves not,
Nor has no will to worke it? who's there wench?
What are you? or whence come you?
Arm. Ye may know me,
I bring not ſuch amazement noble Lady.
Quiſar. Who let you in?
Arm. My reſtles love that ſerves ye.
Quiſar. This is an impudence I have not heard of,
A rudeneſſe that becomes a theefe or ruffin;
Nor ſhall my brothers love protect this boldneſſe,

You

You buil'd ſo ſtrongly on, my roomes are ſanctuaries,
And with that reverence they that ſeeke my favours,
And humble feares, ſhall render their approches.
Arm. Mine are no leſſe.
Quiſar. I am Miſtris of my ſelfe ſir.
And will be ſo, I will not be thus viſited;
Theſe feares and dangers thruſt into my privacy,
Stand further off, I le cry out elſe.
Arm. Oh deare Lady!
Quiſar. I ſee diſhonour in your eyes.
Arm. There is none;
By all that beauty they are innocent;
Pray ye tremble not, you have no cauſe.
Quiſar. I'le dye firſt;
Before you have your will, be torne in peeces;
The little ſtrength I have left me to reſiſt you,
The gods will give me more, before I am forc'd
To that I hate, or ſuffer----
Arm. You wrong my duty.
Quiſar. So baſe a violation of my liberty?
I know you are bent unnobly; I'le take to me
The ſpirit of a man, borrow his boldneſſe,
And force my womans feares into a madneſſe,
And ere you arrive at what you aime at——
Arm. Lady,
If there be in you any womans pitty?
And if your feares have not proclam'd me monſtrous?
Looke on me and beleeve me; is this violence?
Is it to fall thus proſtrate to your beauty
A ruffins boldneſſe? is humility a rudeneſſe?
The griefes and ſorrowes that grow here an impudence?
Theſe forcings, and theſe feares I bring along with me,
Theſe impudent abuſes offered ye;
And thus high has your brothers favour blowne me:
Alas deare Lady of my life, I came not
With any purpoſe rough, or deſperate,
With any thought that was not ſmooth and gentle
As your faire hand, with any doubt or danger,
Far be it from my heart to fright your quiet;
A heavy curſe light on it when I intend it.
Quiſar. Now I dare heare you.
Arm. If I had been miſchievous,
As then I muſt be mad; or were a monſter,
If any ſuch baſe thought had harbour'd here,
Or violence that became not man,
You have a thouſand bulwarkes to aſſure you,
The holy powers beare ſhields to defend chaſtity;
Your honour and your vertues are ſuch armours;
Your cleare thoughts ſuch defences; if you misdoubt ſtill,
And yet retaine a feare I am not honeſt,
Come with impure thoughts to this place,
Take this, and ſheath it heare; be your own ſafety;
Be wiſe, and rid your feares, and let me periſh;
How willing ſhall I ſleepe to ſatisfie you.
Quiſar. No, I beleeve now, you ſpeake worthily;
What came you then for?
Arm. To complaine, me beauty,
But modeſtly.
Quiſar. Of what?
Arm. Of your feirce cruelty,
For though I dye, I will not blame the doer:
Humbly to tell your grace, ye had forgot me:
A little to have toucht at, not accuſed,
For that I dare not do, your ſcornes, pray pardon me
And be not angry, that I uſe the liberty
To urge that word, a little to have ſhew'd you
What I have been, and what done to deſerve ye,
If any thing that love commands may reach ye,
To have remembred ye, but I am unworthy,
And to that miſery fals all my fortunes,
To have told ye, and by my life ye may beleeve me,
That I am honeſt, and will only marry
You, or your memory; pray be not angry.
Quiſar. I thanke you ſir, and let me tell you ſeriouſly,
Ye have taken now the right way to befriend ye,
And to beget a faire and cleare opinion,
Yet to try your obedience----
Arm. I ſtand ready Lady,
Without preſuming to aske any thing.
Quiſar. Or at this time to hope for further favour;
Or to remember ſervices, or ſmiles;
Dangers you have paſt through, and rewards due to 'em;
Loves or diſpaires, but leaving all to me:
Quit this place preſently.
Arm. I ſhall obey ye.
Enter Ruy Dias.
Ru. Ha?
Arm. Who's this?
What art thou?
Ru. A Gentleman.
Arm. Thou art no more I'm ſure: oh 'tis Ruy Dias;
How high he lookes, and harſh?
Ru. Is there not doore enough,
You take ſuch elbow roome?
Arm. If I take it, I'le carry it.
Ru. Does this become you Princeſſe?
Arm. The Captain's jealous,
Jealous of that he never durſt deſerve yet;
Go freely, go I'le give thee leave.
Ru. Your leave ſir?
Arm. Yes my leave ſir, I'le not be troubled neither,
Nor ſhall my heart ake, or my head be jealous,
Nor ſtrange ſuſpitious thoughts reigne in my memory;
Go on, and do thy worſt, I'le ſmile at thee;
I kiſſe your faire hand firſt, then farewell Captaine. Ex.
Quiſar. What a pure ſoule inherits here? what innocence?
Sure I was blind when I firſt lov'd this fellow,
And long to live in that fogg ful: how he bluſters!
Ru. Am I your property? or thoſe your flatteries,
The banquets that ye bid me to, the truſt
I build my goodly hopes on?
Quiſar. Be more temperate.
Ru. Are theſe the ſhewes of your reſpect and favour?
What did he here? what language had he with ye?
Did ye invite? could ye ſtay no longer?
Is he ſo gratious in your eye?
Quiſar. You are too forward.
Ru. Why at theſe private houres?
Quiſar. You are too ſaucy,
Too impudent to taske me with thoſe errours:
Do ye know what I am ſir, and my prerogative?
Though you be a thing I have cal'd bith' name of friend,
I never taught you to diſpoſe my liberty;
How durſt you touch mine honour? blot my meanings?
And name an action, and of mine but noble?
Thou poore unworthy thing, how have I grac'd thee?
How have I nouriſht thee, and raiſed thee hourely?
Are theſe the gratitudes you bring Ruy Dias?
The thankes? the ſervices? I am fairely paid;
Was't not enough I ſaw thou wert a Coward,
And ſhaddowed thee? no noble ſparkle in thee?
Dayly provok'd thee, and ſtill found thee coward?

Rais'd

Rais'd noble cauſes for thee, ſtrangers ſtarted at;
Yet ſtill, ſtill, ſtill a Coward, ever Coward;
And with thoſe taints, doſt thou upbraid my vertues?
Ruy. I was too blame
Lady.
Quiſar. So blindly bold to touch at my behaviour?
Durſt thou but looke amiſſe at my allowance?
If thou hadſt been a brave fellow, thou hadſt had ſome li- (cence,
Some liberty I might have then allowed thee
For thy good face, ſome ſcope to have argued with me;
But being nothing but a ſound, a ſhape,
The meere ſigne of a Souldier —— of a Lover,
The dregs and drafty part, diſgrace and jealouſie,
I ſcorne thee, and contemne thee.
Ru. Deareſt Lady,
If I have been too free ——
Quiſar. Thou haſt been too fooliſh,
And goe on ſtill, I'le ſtudy to forget thee,
I would I could, and yet I pitty thee. Exit.
Ru. I am not worth it, if I were, that's miſery,
The next doore is but death, I muſt aime at it. Exit.

Actus Quartus. Scæna prima.

Enter King, and Governor like a Moore Prieſt.

Kin. SOe far and truly you have diſcovered to me
The former currents of my life and fortune,
That I am bound to acknowledge ye moſt holy,
And certainly to credit your predictions
Of what are yet to come.
Gov. I am no lyer,
'Tis ſtrange I ſhould, and live ſo neare a neighbour;
But theſe are not my ends.
Kin. Pray ye ſit good father,
Certaine a reverend man, and moſt religious.
Gov. I, that beliefe's well now, and let me worke then,
I'le make ye curſe religion ere I leave ye;
I have liv'd a long time ſon, a mewd up man,
Sequeſter'd by the ſpeciall hand of heaven
From the worlds vanities, bid farewell to follies,
And ſhooke hands with all heats of youth and pleaſures,
As in a dreame theſe twenty yeares I have ſlumber'd,
Many a cold moone have I in meditation,
And ſearching out the hidden wils of heaven,
Laine ſhaking under, many a burning Sun
Has ſear'd my body, and boyl'd up my blood,
Feebl'd my knees, and ſtampt a Meagerneſſe
Upon my figure, all to find out knowledge,
Which I have now attained too, thankes to heaven,
All for my countries good too, and many a viſion,
Many a miſticke viſion have I ſeen ſon,
And many a ſight from heaven which has been terrible,
Wherein the goods and evils of theſe Iſlands
Were lively ſhadowed; many a charge I have had too,
Still as the time grew ripe to reveale theſe,
To travell and diſcover, now I am come ſon,
The houre is now appointed,
My tongue is touch'd, and now I ſpeake.
Kin. Do holy man, I'le heare ye.
Gov. Beware theſe Portugals, I ſay beware 'em,
Theſe ſmooth fac'd ſtrangers, have an eye upon 'em.
The cauſe is now the God's, heare, and beleeve King.
King. I do heare, but before I give raſh credit,
Or hang too light on beliefe, which is a ſin father;
Know I have found 'em gentle, faithfull, valiant,
And am in my particular, bound to 'em,
I meane to ſome for my moſt ſtrange deliverance.
Gov. O Son, the future aimes of men, obſerve me,
Above their preſent actions, and their glory,
Are to be look'd at: the ſtars ſhew many turnings,
If you could ſee, marke but with my eyes pupill,
Theſe men came hether as my viſion tels me,
Poore, weatherbeaten, almoſt loſt, ſtarv'd, feebled,
Their veſſels like themſelves, moſt miſerable;
Made a long ſute for traffique, and for comfort,
To vent their childrens toyes, cure their diſeaſes:
They had their ſute, they landed, and too th' rate
Grew rich and powerfull, ſuckt the fat, and freedome
Of this moſt bleſſed Iſle, taught her to tremble,
Witneſſe the Caſtle here, the Cittadell,
They have clapt upon the necke of your Tidore,
This happy town, till that ſhe knew theſe ſtrangers,
To check her when ſhee's jolly.
Kin. They have ſo indeed father.
Gov. Take heed, take heed, I find your faire delivery,
Though you be pleas'd to glorifie that fortune,
And thinke theſe ſtrangers Gods, take heed I ſay,
I find it but a hanſome preparation,
A faire fac'd Prologue to a further miſchiefe:
Marke but the end good King, the pin he ſhootes at
That was the man deliver'd ye; the mirrour,
Your Siſter is his due; what's ſhe, your heire ſir?
And what's he a-kin then to the Kingdome?
But heires are not ambitious, who then ſuffers?
What reverence ſhall the Gods have? and what juſtice
The miſerable people? what ſhall they doe?
Kin. He points at truth directly.
Gov. Thinke of theſe ſon:
The perſon, nor the manner I miſlike not
Of your preſerver, nor the whole man together,
Were he but ſeaſon'd in the faith we are,
Ne, our devotions learn'd.
King. You ſay right father.
Gov. To change our worſhips now, and our Religion?
To be traytor to our God?
King. You have well adviſed me,
And I will ſeriouſly conſider father,
In the meane time you ſhall have your faire acceſſe
Unto my ſiſter, adviſe her to your purpoſe,
And let me ſtill know how the Gods determine.
Gov. I will, but my maine end is to adviſe
The deſtruction of you all, a generall ruine,
And then I am reveng'd, let the Gods whiſtle. Exeunt

Enter Ruy Dias, and Pyniero.

Ruy. *I*ndeed, I am right glad ye were not greedie,
And ſuddaine in performing what I wild you,
Upon the perſon of Armuſia,
I was affraid, for I well knew your valour,
And love to me.
Py. 'Twas not a faire thing unckle,
It ſhewd not hanſome, carried no man in it.
Ruy. I muſt confeſſe 'twas ill, and I abhor it,
Only this good has riſen from this evill;
I have tried your honeſtie, and find proofe,
A conſtancie that will not be corrupted,
And I much honour it.
Py. This Bell ſounds better.

Ruy.

Ruy. My anger now, and that diſgrace I have ſuffer'd,
Shall be more manly vented, and wip'd off,
And my ſicke honour cur'd the right and ſtraight way;
My Swords in my hand now nephew, my cauſe upon it,
And man to man, one vallour to another,
My hope to his.
Py. Why? this like Ruy Dias?
This carries ſomething of ſome ſubſtance in it;
Some mettle and ſome man, this ſounds a gentleman;
And now methinkes ye utter what becomes ye;
To kill men ſcurvily, 'tis ſuch a dog tricke,
Such a ratcatchers occupation —
Ru. It is no better,
But Pyniero now——
Py. Now I do bravely.
Ru. The difference of our ſtates flung by forgotten,
The full opinion I have won in ſervice,
And ſuch reſpects that may not ſhew us equall,
Laid handſomely aſide, only our fortunes,
And ſingle manhoods——
Py. In a ſervice ſir,
Of this moſt noble nature, all I am,
If I had ten lives more, thoſe and my fortunes
Are ready for ye, I had thought ye had forſworn fighting,
Or baniſh'd thoſe brave thoughts were wont to waite up-
I am glad to ſee 'em cal'd home agen. (on you
Ruy. They are nephew, Shews a
And thou ſhall ſee what fire they carry in them, Challenge
Here, you gueſſe what this meanes.
Py. Yes, very well ſir;
A portion of Scripture that puzzels many an interpreter.
Ruy. As ſoone as you can find him——
Py. That will not be long uncle,
And o' my conſcience beele be ready as quickly.
Ruy. I make no doubt good Nephew, carry it ſo
If you can poſſible that we may fight.
Py. Nay, you ſhall fight aſſure your ſelfe.
Ru. Pray ye heare me
In ſome ſuch place where it may be poſſible
The Princeſſe may behold us.
Py. I conceive ye,
Upon the ſand behind the Caſtle ſir,
A place remote enough, and there be windows
Out of her lodgings too, or I am miſtaken.
Ruy. Y'are i'th' right, if ye can worke that handſomly ——
Py. Let me alone, and pray be you prepar'd
Some three houres hence.
Ruy. I will not faile.
Py. Get you home,
And if you have any things to diſpoſe of,
Or a few light prayers
That may befriend you, run 'em over quickely,
I warrant, I'le bring him on.
Ruy. Farewell Nephew,
And when we meet againe ——
Py. I, I, fight handſomely;
Take a good draught or two of wine to ſettle ye,
'Tis an excellent armour for an ill conſcience Uncle;
I am glad to ſee this mans converſion,
I was affraid faire honour had been bedrid,
Or beaten out o'th' Iſland, ſouldiers and good ones,
Intended ſuch baſe courſes? he will fight now;
And I beleeve too bravely; I have ſeene him
Curry a fellowes carkaſſe handſomely;
And in the head of a troope ſtand as if he had been rooted Dealing large doles of death; what a raſcall was I (there,
I did not ſee his will drawn?
What does ſhe here? Enter Quiſara.
If there be any miſchief toward, a woman makes one ſtil;
Now what new buſineſſe is for me?
Quiſar. I was ſending for ye,
But ſince we have met ſo faire,
You have ſav'd that labour; I muſt entreat you ſir——
Py. Any thing Madam,
Your wils are my commands.
Quiſar. Y'are nobly courteous;
Upon my better thoughts Signeor Pyniero,
And my more peaceable conſiderations,
Which now I find the richer ornaments;
I wou'd deſire you to attempt no farther
Againſt the perſon of the noble ſtranger,
In truth I am aſhamd of my ſhare in't;
Nor be incited further by your uncle,
I ſee it will ſit ill upon your perſon;
I have conſidered, and it will ſhew ugly
Carried at beſt, a moſt unheard of cruelty;
Goood ſir deſiſt——
Py. You ſpeake now like a woman,
And wondrons well this tenderneſſe becomes ye;
But this you muſt remember——your command
Was laid on with a kiſſe, and ſeriouſly
It muſt be taken off the ſame way Madam,
Or I ſtand bound ſtill.
Quiſar. That ſhall not endanger ye,
Looke ye faire ſir, thus I take off that duty.
Py. Byth' maſſe 'twas ſoft and ſweet,
Some blouds would bound now,
And run a tilt; do not you thinke bright beauty,
You have done me in this kiſſe a mighty favour,
And that I ſtand bound by vertue of this honour,
To do what ever you command me?
Quiſar. I thinke ſir,
From me theſe are unuſuall curteſies,
And ought to be reſpected ſo; there are ſome,
And men of no mean ranke, would hold themſelves
Not poorely bleſt to taſte of ſuch a bounty.
Py. I know there are that wou'd do many unjuſt things
For ſuch a kiſſe, and yet I hold this modeſt;
All villanies body and ſoule diſpence with,
For ſuch a provocation, kill their kindred,
Demoliſh the faire credits of their Parents; (dam
Thoſe kiſſes I am not acquainted with, moſt certaine Ma-
The appurtenance of this kiſſe wou'd not provoke me
To do a miſchief, 'tis the devils owne dance,
To be kiſſ'd into cruelty.
Quiſar. I am glad you make that uſe ſir.
Py. I am gladder
That you made me beleeve you were cruell,
For by this hand I know I am ſo honeſt,
However I deceiv'd ye, 'twas high time too,
Some common ſlave might have been ſet upon it elſe,
That willingly I wou'd not kill a dog
That could but feteh and carry for a woman,
She muſt be a good woman made me kick him,
And that will be hard to find, to kill a man,
If you will give me leave to get another,
Or any ſhe that plaid the beſt game as it,
And fore a womans anger prefer her fancy.
Quiſar. I take it in you well.
Py. I thanke ye Lady,
And I ſhall ſtudy to confirme it.
Quiſar. Do ſir,

For

For this time, and this preſent cauſe I 'low it,
Moſt holy ſir.

Enter Governour, Quiſana, and Panura.

Gov. Bleſſe ye my royall daughter,
And in you, bleſſe this Iſland heaven.
Quiſar. Good Aunt,
What thinke ye of this man?
Quiſan. Sure 'is a wiſe man,
And a religious, he tels us things have hapned
So many yeares agoe almoſt forgotten,
As readily, as if they were done this houre.
Quiſar. Does he not meet with your ſharpe tongue?
Pan. He tels me Madam,
Marriage, and mouldy cheeſe will make me tamer.
Gov. A ſtubborne keeper, and worſe fare,
An open ſtable, and cold care,
Will tame a Jade, may be your ſhare.
Pan. Bir Lady, a ſharp prophet, when this proves good
I'le bequeath you a skin to make ye a hood.
Gov. Lady I would talke with you.
Quiſar. Do reverend ſir.
Gov. And for you good, for that that muſt concerne ye,
And give eare wiſely to me.
Quiſar. I ſhall father.
Gov. You are a Princeſſe of that excellence,
Sweetneſſe, and grace, that Angell-like faire feature,
Nay, do not bluſh, I doe not flatter you,
Nor do I dote in telling this, I am amazed Lady,
And as I thinke the gods beſtow'd theſe on ye,
The gods that love ye.
Quiſar. I confeſſe their bounty.
Gov. Apply it then to their uſe, to their honour,
To them, and to their ſervice give this ſweetneſſe;
They have an inſtant great uſe of your goodneſſe;
You are a Saint eſteem'd here for your beauty,
And may a longing heart ———
Quiſar. I ſeeke no fealty,
Nor will I blemiſh that heaven has ſeal'd on me,
I know my worth, indeed the Portugals
I have at thoſe commands, and their laſt ſervices,
Nay, even their lives, ſo much I thinke my hanſomneſſe,
That what I ſhall enjoyne———
Gov. Uſe it diſcreetly,
For I perceive ye underſtand me rightly,
For here the gods regard your helpe, and ſuddenly;
The Portugals like ſharpe thornes (marke me Lady)
Sticke in our ſides, like razors, wound religion,
Draw deep, they wound, till the life bloud followes,
Our gods they ſpurne at, and their worſhips ſcorne,
A mighty hand they beare upon our government,
Theſe are the men your miracle muſt worke on,
Your heavenly forme, either to roote them out,
Which as you may endeavour will be eaſie,
Remember whoſe great cauſe you have to execute,
To nip their memory, that may not ſpring more,
Or fairely bring 'em home to our devotions,
Which will be bleſſed, and for which, you ſainted,
But cannot be, and they go; let me buzzle.
Quiſar. Go up with me,
Where wee'l converſe more privately;
I'le ſhew ye ſhortly how I hold their temper;
And in what chaine their ſoules.
Gov. Keep faſt that hold ſtill,
And either bring that chaine, and thoſe bound in it,
And linke it to our gods, and their faire worſhips,
Or daughter pinch their hearts a peeces with it,
I'le waite upon your grace.
Quiſar. Come reverend father.
Waite you below. Ex. Quiſar. and G.v.
Pan. If this prophet were a young thing,
I ſhould ſuſpect him now, he cleaves ſo cloſe to her;
Theſe holy coats are long, and hide in iniquities.
Quiſan. Away, away foole, a poore wretch.
Pan. Theſe poore ones
Warme but their ſtomakes once ---
Quiſan. Come in, thou art fooliſh. Ex. Quiſan, and Pan.

Enter Armuſia, Emanuel, Pyniero.

Arm. I am ſorry ſir my fortune is ſo ſtubborne,
To court my ſword againſt my countriman,
I love my nation well, and where I find
A Portugall of noble name and vertue,
I am his humble ſervant. Signeor Pyniro,
Your perſon, nor your unckles am I angry with,
You are both faire Gentlemen in my opinion,
And I proteſt, I had rather uſe my ſword
In your defences, then againſt your ſafeties;
'Tis me thinkes, a ſtrange dearth of enemies,
When we ſeeke foes among our ſelves.
Em. You are injured,
And you muſt make the beſt on't now, and readieſt—
Arm. You ſee I am ready in the place, and arm'd
To his deſire that cald me.
Py. Ye ſpeake honeſtly,
And I could wiſh ye had met on tearmes more friendly,
But it cannot now be ſo. Enter Ruy Dias.
Em. Turne ſir, and ſee.
Py. I have kept my word with ye unckle,
The Gentleman is ready. } Enter Governour, and
Arm. Ye are welcome. } Quiſara above.
Ru. Bid thoſe fooles welcome that affect your curteſie,
I come not to uſe complement, ye have wrongd me,
And ye ſhall feele proud man ere I part from ye,
The effects of that, if fortune do not foole me;
Thy life is mine, and no hope ſhall redeeme thee.
Arm. That's a proud word,
More then your faith can juſtifie.
Quiſar. Sure they will fight.
Ruy. She's there, I am happy.
Gov. Let 'em alone, let 'em kill one another,
Theſe are the maine poſtes, if they fall, the buildings
Will tumple quickely.
Quiſar. How temperate Armuſia?
No more, be quiet yet.
Arm. I am not bloudy,
Nor do not feele ſuch mortall malice in me,
But ſince we cannot both enjoy the Princeſſe,
I am reſolv'd to fight.
Ruy. Fight home Armuſia,
For if thou faint'ſt, or fall'ſt———
Arm. Do ye make all vantages?
Ruy. Alwaies; unto thy life I will not ſpare thee,
Nor looke not for thy mercy.
Arm. I am arm'd then.
Ruy. Stand ſtill I charge ye nephew, as ye honour me.
Arm. And good Emanuel——not———
Py. Ye ſpeake fitly,
For we had not ſtood idle elſe.
Gov. I am ſorry for't.
Em. But ſince you will have it ſo ---
Ruy. Come ſir.

Arm.

Arm. I waight ye.
Py. I marry this looks hanſomely,
This is warme worke.
Gov. Both fall an't be thy will. Ray falls.
Py. My Unckle dead?
Em. Stand ſtill, or my ſwords in---
Ar. Now brave Ray Dias,
Now where's your confidence, your prayers? quickly
Your owne ſpite has condemn'd ye.
Quiſar. Hold Armuſia.
Ar. Moſt happy Lady.
Quiſar. Hold and let him riſe,
Spare him for me.
Ar. A long life may he enjoy Lady.
Gov. What ha' you done? 'tis better they had all periſht,
Quiſar. Peace father, I worke for the beſt; Armuſia,
Be in the garden an houre hence. Ex. Qu. and Gov.
Ar. I ſhall Madam.
Py. Now as I live, a Gentleman at all inches,
So brave a mingled temper ſaw I never.
Ar. Why are ye ſad ſir? how would this have griev'd you,
If ye had falne under a profeſt enemie?
Under one had taken vantage of your ſhame too?
Pray ye be at peace, I am ſo far from wronging ye,
Or glorying in the pride of ſuch a victorie,
That I deſire to ſerve ye, pray look cheerfully. (Gentleman
Py. Doe you heare this ſir? this love ſir? do you ſee this
How he courts ye? why doe you hold your head downe?
'Tis no high treaſon I take it, to be equal'd,
To have a ſlip i'th' field, no ſinne that's mortall;
Come, come, thanke fortune and your friend.
Ar. It may be
You thinke my tongue may prove your enemie;
And though reſtrain'd ſometimes, out of a braverie
May take a licenſe to diſable ye:
Beleeve me ſir, ſo much I hate that liberty,
That in a ſtrangers tongue 'twill prove an injurie,
And I ſhall right you in't.
Py. Can you have more Unckle?
Ru. Sir you have beate me both ways, yet ſo nobly,
That I ſhall ever love the hand that did it:
Fortune may make me worthie of ſome title
That may be neere your friend.
Ar. Sir I muſt leave ye,
But with ſo hearty love, and pray be confident, Ex. Arm.
I carry nothing from this place ſhall wrong ye. & Em.
Py. Come, come, you are right agen, ſir love your honor,
And love your friend, take heed of bloudy purpoſes,
And unjuſt ends, good heaven is angry with 'm;
Make your fatie vertues, and your fame your miſtres,
And let theſe trinkets goe.
Ru. You teach well nephew,
Now to be honorable even with this Gentleman,
Shall be my buſineſſe, and my ends his.

Enter Governour and King.

Gov. Sit, ſir, you muſt doe ſomething ſuddenly,
To ſtop his pride ſo great and high, he is ſhot up,
Upon his perſon too, your ſtate is ſunke elſe:
You muſt not ſtand now upon termes of gratitude,
And let a ſimple tendernеſſe befor ye:
I'le bring ye ſuddenly where you ſhall ſee him,
Attempting your brave ſiſter privately;
Marke but his high behaviour then.
Kin. I will Father.

Gov. And with ſcorne, I feare contempt too.
Kin. I hope not.
Gov. I will not name a luſt;
It may be that alſo;
A little force muſt be applyed upon him,
Now now applyed, a little force to humble him.
Theſe ſweet intreaties doe but make him wanton.
Kin. Take heed ye wrong him not.
Gov. Take heed to your ſafety,
I but forewarne ye King; if you miſtruſt me,
Or thinke I come unſent---
Kin. No I'le goe with you. Exeunt.

Enter Armuſia, Quiſara.

Arm. Madam, you ſee there's nothing I can reach at,
Either in my obedience, or my ſervice,
That May deſerve your love, or win a liking,
But a poore thought, but I purſue it ſeriouſly,
Take pleaſure in your wils, even in your anger,
Which other men would grudge at, and grow ſtormy;
I ſtudy new humility to pleaſe ye,
And take a kind of joy in my afflictions,
Becauſe they come from ye, I love my ſorrowes:
Pray Madam but conſider---
Quiſar. Yes, I do ſir,
And to that honeſt end I drew ye hether;
I know ye have deſerv'd as much as man can,
And know it is a juſtice to requite you:
I know ye love.
Arm. If ever love was mortall,
And dwelt in man, and for that love command me,
So ſtrong I find it, and ſo true, here Lady,
Something of ſuch a greatneſſe to allow me,
Thoſe things I have done already, may ſeem foyles too:
'Tis equity that man aſpires to heaven,
Should win it by his worth, and not ſleepe to it.

Enter Governour, and King.

Gov. Now ſtand cloſe King and heare, and as you find him,
Beleeve me right, or let religion ſuffer.
Quiſar. I dare beleeve your worth without additions;
But ſince you are ſo liberall of your love ſir,
And wou'd be farther tried, I do intend it,
Becauſe you ſhall not, or you wou'd not win me
At ſuch an eaſie rate.
Arm. I am prepared ſtill,
And if I ſhrinke---
Quiſar. I know ye are no coward,
This is the utmoſt triall of your conſtancy,
And if you ſtand faſt now, I am yours, your wife ſir;
You hold there's nothing deare that may atchieve me,
Doubted or dangerous.
Arm. There's nothing, nothing:
Let me but know, that I may ſtraight flie to it.
Quiſar. I'le tell you then, change your religion,
And be of one beleefe with me.
Arm. How?
Quiſar. Marke,
Worſhip our Gods, renounce that faith you are bred in;
'Tis eaſily done, I'le teach ye ſuddenly;
And humbly on your knees---
Arm. Ha? I'le be hang'd firſt.
Quiſar. Offer as we do.
Arm. To the Devill Lady?
Offer to him I hate? I know the devill,
To dogs and cats? you make offer to them;

To every bird that flies, and every worme.
How terribly I ſhake? Is this the venture?
The tryall that you talkt off? where have I bin?
And how forgot my ſelfe? how loſt my memorie?
When did I pray or looke up ſtedfaſtly?
Had any goodnes in my heart to guide me?
That I ſhould give this vantage to mine enemie;
The enemie to my peace, forſake my faith.
Quiſar. Come, come, I know ye love me.
Ar. Love ye this way?
This moſt deſtroying way? ſure you but jeſt Lady.
Quiſ. My love and life are one way.
Ar. Love alone then, and mine another way,
I'le love diſeaſes firſt,
Doate on a villaine that would cut my throat,
Woo all afflictions of all ſorts, kiſſe crueltie;
Have mercy heaven, how have I been wandring?
Wandring the way of loſt, and left my maker?
How have I ſlept like Corke upon a water,
And had no feeling of the ſtorme that toſt me?
Trod the blinde paths of death? forſooke aſſurance,
Eternitie of bleſſedneſſe for a woman?
For a young handſome face hazard my being?
Quiſ. Are not our powers eternall ſo their comforts?
As great and full of hopes as yours?
Ar. They are puppits.
Gov. Now marke him ſir, and but obſerve him nearly,
Ar. Their comforts like themſelves, cold ſenſeles outſides;
You make 'em ſicke, as we are, peeviſh, mad,
Subject to age; and how can they cure us,
That are not able to refine themſelves?
Quiſ. The Sun & Moon we worſhip, thoſe are heavenly,
And their bright influences we beleeve.
Ar. Away foole,
I adore the Maker of that Sun and Moone,
That gives thoſe bodies light and influence,
That pointed out their paths, and taught their motions;
They are not ſo great as we, they are our ſervants,
Plac'd there to teach us time, to give us knowledge
Of when and how the ſwellings of the maine aire,
And their returnes agen; they are but our ſtewards,
To make the earth fat with their influence,
That ſhe may bring forth her increaſe and feed us.
Shall I fall from this faith to pleaſe a woman?
For her embraces bring my ſoule to ruine?
I lookd you ſhould have ſaid, make me a Chriſtian,
Worke that great cure, for 'tis a great one woman;
That labour truly doe performe, that venture
The crowne of all great triall, and the faireſt;
I lookd ye ſhould have wept and kneel'd to beg it,
Waſht off your miſt of ignorance, with waters
Pure and repentant, from thoſe eyes; I lookt
You ſhould have brought me your chief god ye worſhip,
He that you offer humane bloud and life to,
And made a ſacrifice of him to memorie,
Beat downe his Altars, ruin'd his falſe Temples.
Gov. Now you may ſee.
Quiſ. Take heed, you goe too far ſir,
And yet I love to heare him; I muſt have ye,
And to that end I let you ſtorme a little;
I know there muſt be ſome ſtrife in your boſome
To coole and quiet ye, ere you can come backe:
I know old friends cannot part ſuddenly,
There will be ſome let ſtill, yet I muſt have ye,
Have ye of my faith too, and ſo injoy ye.
Arm. Now I contemne ye, and I hate my ſelfe
For looking on that face laſciviouſly,
And it lookes ugly now methinkes.
Quiſar. How Portugall?
Ar. It lookes like death it ſelfe, to which 'twou'd lead
Your eyes reſemble pale diſpaire, they fright me; (me;
And in their rounds a thouſand horrid ruines,
Methinkes I ſee, and in your tongue beare fearefully
The hideous murmurs of weake ſoules have ſuffer'd;
Get from me, I deſpiſe ye, and know woman,
That for all this trap you have laid to catch my life in,
To catch my immortall life, I hate and curſe ye.
Contemne your deities, ſpurne at their powers,
And where I meet your maumet Gods, I'le ſwing 'em
Thus o're my head, and kick 'em into puddles,
Nay I will out of vengeance ſearch your Temples,
And with thoſe hearts that ſerve my God, demoliſh
Your ſhambles of wild worſhips.
Gov. Now, now you heare ſir.
Arm. I will have my faith ſince you are ſo crafty,
The glorious croſſe, although I love your brother;
Let him frowne too, I will have my devotion,
And let your whole ſtate ſtorme.
Kin. Enter and take him,
I am ſorry friend that I am forc'd to do this.
Gov. Be ſure you bind him faſt.
Quiſar. But uſe him nobly.
King. Had it to me been done, I had forgiven it,
And ſtill preſerv'd you faire, but to our Gods ſir ——
Quiſar. Methinkes I hate 'em now,
Kin. To our Religion,
To theſe to be thus ſtubborne, thus rebellious
To threaten them.
Arm. Uſe all your violence,
I aske no mercy, nor repent my words;
I ſpit at your beſt powers; I ſerve one,
Will give me ſtrength to ſcourge your gods.
Gov. Away with him.
Arm. To grind 'em into baſe duſt, and diſperſe 'em,
That never more their bloudy memories ——
Gov. Clap him cloſe up.
Kin. Good friend be cooler.
Arm. Never;
Your painted ſiſter I deſpiſe too.
King. Softly.
Arm. And all her devilliſt arts laugh and ſcorne at,
Mocke her blind purpoſes.
King. You muſt be temperate;
Offer him no violence I command you ſtrictly.
Gov. Now thou art up I ſhall have time to ſpeake too.
Quiſ. Oh how I love this man, how truly honour him.
Exeunt.

Actus Quintus. Scæna prima.

Enter Chriſtophero, and Pedro (at one doore) Emanuel. and Soza. (at another.)

Chr. DDo you know the newes Gentlemen?
Em. Wou'd we knew as well ſir
How to prevent it.
Soz. Is this the love they beare us,
For our late benefit? taken ſo maliciouſly,
And clapt up cloſe? is that the thankes they render?

Chr.

Ch. It must not be put up thus, mother'd sleightly,
'Tis such a base unnatural wrong.
Ped. I know,
They may thinke to doe wonders, aime at all,
And to blow us with a vengeance out o'th' Islands:
But if we be our selves honest and resolute,
And continue but Masters of our ancient courages,
Sticke close and give no vantage to their villanies ——
Soz. Nay if we faint or fall a peeces now,
We are fooles and worthy to be mark't for miserie,
Begin to strike at him they are all bound to
To cancell his deserts: what must we looke for
If they can carry this?
Em. I'le carry coales then,
I have but one life, and one fortune Gentlemen,
But I'le so husband it to vexe these rascalls,
These barbarous slaves.
Ch. Shall we goe charge 'em presently?
Soz. No that will be too weake, and too foole-hardy,
We must have grounds that promise safety friends,
And sure offence, we loose our angers else,
And worse then that, venture our lives too lightly.

Enter Pyniro.

Py. Did you see mine Uncle? plague 'a these Barbarians,
How the rogues sticke in my teeth, I know ye are angry,
So I am too, monstrous angry Gentlemen,
I am angry that I choke agen.
You heare Armusina up, honest Arma:
Clapt up in prison friends, the brave Arma too
Here are fine boyes.
Em. We hope he shall not stay there.
Py. Stay? no he must not stay, no talke of staying,
These are no times to stay; are not these Rascals?
Speake, I beseech ye speake, are they not Rogues?
Thinke some abominable names —— are they not Devils?
But the devil's a great deale too good for 'em —— fusty villaines.
Ch. They are a kind of hounds.
Py. Hounds were their fathers,
Old blear-eyed bob-tail'd hounds —— Lord where's my Uncle?
Soz. But what shall be done sir?
Py. Done?
Soz. Yes to relieve him,
If it be not sudden they may take his life too.
Py. They dare as soone take fire and swallow it,
Take stakes and thrust into their tailes for glisters:
His life, why 'tis a thing worth all the Islands,
And they know will be rated at that value,
His very imprisonment will make the Town stinch,
And shake and stinke, I have phisick in my hand for 'em
Shall give the goblins such a purge ——

Enter Ruy Dias.

Ped. Your Uncle.
Ru. I heare strange newes, and have bin seeking ye,
They say Armusia's prisoner.
Py. 'Tis most certaine.
Ru. Upon what cause?
Py. He has deserv'd too much sir,
The old heathen policie has light upon him,
And paid him home.
Ru. A most unnoble dealing.
Py. You are the next if you can carry it tamely,
He has deserved of all.
Ru. I must confesse it,
Of me so nobly too.
Py. I am glad to heare it,
You have a time now to make good your confession,
Your faith will shew but cold else, and for fashion,
Now to redeeme all, now to thanke his courtesie,
Now to make those beleeve that held you backward,
And an ill instrament, you are a Gentleman,
An honest man, and you dare love your Nation,
Dare sticke to vertue though she be oppress't,
And for her owne faire sake step to her Rescue:
If you live ages sir, and lose this houre,
Not now redeeme, and vindicate your honour,
Your life will be a murmure, and no man in't.
Ru. I thanke ye nephew, come along with me Gentlemen,
Wee'l make 'em dancing sport immediately:
We are Masters of the Fort yet, we shall see
What that can doe.
Py. Let it but spit fire finely,
And play their turrets, and their painted Palaces,
A frisking round or two, that they may trip it,
And caper in the aire.
Ru. Come, wee'l doe something
Shall make 'em looke about, wee'l send 'em plumbes
If they be not too hard for their teeth.
Py. And fine Potatoes
Roasted in gunpowder, such a banquet sir
Will prepare their unmannerly stomacks.
Ru. They shall see
There is no safe retreat in villanie:
Come be high hearted all.
Omnes. We are all on fire sir. Exeunt.

Enter King and Governor.

Kin. I am ungratefull, and a wretch, perswade me not,
Forgetfull of the mercy he show'd me,
The timely noble pitty —— why should I
See him fall bound and fetter'd, whose true curtesie,
Whose manhood, and whose mighty hand set me free?
Why should it come from me? why I command this?
Shall not all tongues and truths call me unthankfull?
Gov. Had the offence bin thrown on you, 'tis certaine
It had been in your power, and your discretion
To have turn'd it into mercy, and forgiven it,
And then it had show'd a vertuous point of gratitude,
Timely and nobly taken; but since the cause
Concernes the honour of our gods, and their title,
And so transcends your power, and your compassion,
A little your owne safety if you saw it too,
If your too fond indulgence did not dazle you,
It cannot now admit a private pitty,
'Tis in their wils, their mercies, or revenges,
And these revolts in you shew meere rebellious.
Kin. They are milde and pittifull.
Gov. To these repent.
Kin. Their nature's soft and tender.
Gov. To true hearts
That feele compunction for their trespasses:
This man defies 'em still, threatens destruction
And demolition of their armes and worship,
Spits at their powers; take heed ye be not found sir,
And markt a favourer of their dishonour;
They use no common justice.
Kin. What shall I doe
To deserve of this man ——
Gov. If ye more bemoane him,
Or mitigate your power to preserve him,
I'le curse ye from the gods, call up their vengeance,

Enter Quiſara with her hands bound, Quiſara, Panura.

And fling it on your Land and you, I have charge for't;
I hope to wracke you all.
King. What ailes my ſiſter?
Why is ſhe bound? why looks ſhe ſo diſtractedly?
Who does doe this?
Quiſan. We did it, pardon ſir,
And for her preſervation ——— She is growne wilde,
And raving on the ſtrangers love and honour,
Sometimes crying out, help, help, they will torture him,
They will take his life, they will murder him, preſently,
If we had not prevented, violently
Have laid hands on her owne life.
Go. Theſe are tokens
The gods diſpleaſure is gone out, be quicke,
And ere it fall doe ſomething to appeaſe 'em,
You know the ſacrifice ——— I am glad it works thus.
Quiſar. How low and baſe thou look'ſt now that wert
No figure of a King methinks ſhowes on you, (noble?
No face of Majeſtie, foule ſwarth ingratitude
Has taken off thy ſweetneſſe, baſe forgetfulneſſe
Of mighty benefits, has turned thee Devill:
Thou haſt perſecuted goodnes, innocence,
And laid a hard and violent hand on vertue,
On that faire vertue that ſhould teach and guide us,
Thou haſt wrong'd thine owne preſerver, whoſe leaſt me-
Pois'd with thy maine eſtate, thou canſt not ſatisfie, (rit
Nay put thy life in too, 'twill be too light ſtill:
What haſt thou done?
Gov. Goe for him preſently,
And once more wee'l try if we can win him fairely:
If not, let nothing ſhe ſayes hinder ye, or ſtir ye,
She ſpeaks diſtractedly — Do that the gods command ye:
Doe you know what ye ſay Lady?
Quiſar. I could curſe thee too,
Religion and ſeveritie has ſteel'd thee,
Has turnd thy heart to ſtone; thou haſt made the gods hard
Againſt their ſweet and patient natures, cruell: (too,
None of ye feele what braverie ye tread on?
What innocence? what beauty?
Kin. Pray be patient.
Quiſar. What honorable things ye caſt behind ye?
What monuments of man?

Enter Armuſia and Guard.

Kin. Once more Armuſia,
Becauſe I love ye tenderly and dearly,
And would be glad to win ye mine, I wiſh ye,
Even from my heart I wiſh and wooe ye ———
Ar. What ſir,
Take heed how ye perſwade me falſely, then ye hate me;
Take heed how ye intrap me.
Kin. I adviſe ye,
And tenderly and truly I adviſe ye,
Both for your ſoules health and your ſafetie.
Ar. Stay,
And name my ſoule no more, ſhe is too precious,
Too glorious for your flatteries, too ſecure too.
Go. Conſider the reward ſir, and the honor
That is prepared, the glory you ſhall grow to.
Ar. They are not to be conſider'd in theſe caſes,
Not to be nam'd when ſoules are queſtioned;
They are vaine and flying vapors ——— touch my life,
'Tis ready for ye, put it to what teſt
It ſhall pleaſe ye, I am patient; but for the reſt
You may remove rocks with your little fingers,
Or blow a mountaine out o'th' way, with bellowes,
As ſoon as ſtir my faith; uſe no more arguments.
Gov. We muſt uſe tortures then.
Arm. Your worſt and painefull'ſt
I am joyfull to accept.
Gov. You muſt the ſharpeſt,
For ſuch has been your hate againſt our deities
Delivered openly, your threats and ſcornings,
And either your repentance muſt be mighty,
Which is your free converſion to our cuſtomes,
Or equall puniſhment, which is your life ſir.
Arm. I am glad I have it for ye, take it Prieſt,
And all the miſeries that ſhall attend it:
Let the Gods glut themſelves with Chriſtian bloud,
It will be ask'd againe, and ſo far followed,
So far reveng'd, and with ſuch holy juſtice,
Your Gods of gold ſhall melt and ſinke before it;
Your Altars, and your Temples ſhake to nothing;
And you falſe worſhippers, blind fooles of ceremony,
Shall ſeeke for holes to hide your heads, and feares in,
For ſeas to ſwallow you from this deſtruction,
Darkeneſſe to dwell about ye, and conceale ye,
Your mothers wombes again ———
Gov. Make the fires ready,
And bring the ſeverall tortures out.
Quiſar. Stand faſt ſir,
And feare 'em not, you that have ſtept ſo nobly
Into this pious triall ſtart not now,
Keepe on your way, a virgin will aſſiſt ye,
A virgin won by your faire conſtancy,
And glorying that ſhe is won ſo, will dye by ye;
I have touch'd ye every way, tried ye moſt honeſt,
Perfect, and good, chaſte, bluſhing chaſte, and temperate,
Valiant, without vaine glory, modeſt, ſtayed,
No rage, or light affection ruling in you:
Indeed, the perfect ſchoole of worth I find ye,
The temple of true honour.
Arm. Whether will ſhe?
What do you infer by this faire argument Lady?
Quiſar. Your faith, and your religion muſt be like ye,
They that can ſhew you theſe, muſt be pure mirrours,
When the ſtreames flow cleare and faire, what are the (fountaines?
I do embrace your faith ſir, and your fortune;
Go one, I will aſſiſt ye, I feele a ſparkle here,
A lively ſparke that kindles my affection,
And tels me it will riſe to flames of glory:
Let 'em put on their angers, ſuffer nobly,
Shew me the way, and when I faint inſtruct me;
And if I follow not ———
Arm. O bleſſed Lady,
Since thou art won, let me begin my triumph,
Come clap your terrors on.
Quiſar. All your fell tortures.
For there is nothing he ſhall ſuffer brother,
I ſweare by new faith which is moſt ſacred,
And I will keepe it ſo, but I will follow in,
And follow to a ſcruple of affliction,
In ſpight of all your Gods without prevention.
Gov. Death ſhe amazes me.
King. What ſhall be done now?
Go. They muſt dye both,
And ſuddenly, they will corrupt all elſe;
This woman makes me weary of my miſchiefe,
She ſhakes me, and ſhe ſtaggers me, go in ſir,
I'le ſee the execution.

King

King. Not ſo ſuddaine:
If they goe all my friends and ſiſters periſh.
Gov. Wou'd I were ſafe at home agen.

Enter Meſſenger.

Meſ Arme, arme ſir,
Seek for defence the Cattle playes and thunders,
The Towne Rocks, and the houſes flye ith' aire,
The people dye for feare---Captaine Ruy Diaz,
Has made an Oath he will not leave a ſtone here;
No not the memory, here has ſtood a City,
Unleſſe Armuſia be deliver'd fairely.
Kin. I have my feares: what can our gods do now for us?
Gov. Be patient, But keep him ſtill: he is a curſe ſir
Againſt his rage and Cannon: goe and fortifie,
Call in the Princeſſe, make the Pallace ſure,
And let 'em know you are a King: look nobly;
And take your courage to ye; keep cloſe the priſoner,
And under command, we are betray'd elſe.
Ar. How ioyfully I goe?
Quiſar. Take my heart with thee.
Gov. I hold a Wolfe by the ears now:
Fortune free me. Exeunt.

Enter foure Towne-men.

1. Heaven bleſſe us,
What a thundring's here? what fire-ſpitting?
We cannot drinke, but our Cans are mald amongſt us.
2. I wou'd they would mall our ſkores too:
Shame o'their Guns, I thought they had been bird-pots,
Or great Candlecaſes, how deviliſhly they bounce,
And how the Bullets borrow a piece of a houſe here,
There another, and mend thoſe up agen
With another pariſh; here flyes a poudring-tub,
The meat ready roaſted, & there a barrel pilling vinegar,
And they two over-taking the top of a high Steeple,
Newly ſlic'd off for a ſallet.
3. A vengeance fire 'em.
2. Nay they fire faſt enough;
You need not help 'em.
4. Are theſe the Portugall Bulls------
How loud they bellow? (lases
1. Their horns are plaguie ſtrong, they puſh down Pal-
They toſſe our little habitations like whelps,
Like grindle-tailes, with their heeles upward;
All the windowes ith' town dance a new trench-more,
'Tis like to prove a bleſſed age for Glaſiers,
I met a hand, and a Letter in't in great haſte,
And by and by a ſingle leg running after it,
As if the Arme had forgot part of his arrant,
Heads flie like foot-balls every where.
1. What ſhall we doe?
2. I care not, my ſhop's cancell'd,
And all the Pots and earthen pans in't vaniſh't:
There was a ſingle Bullet and they together by the eares;
You would have thought Tom Tumbler had been there,
And all his troop of devills.
3. Let's to the King,
And get this gentleman deliver'd handſomely;
By this hand there's no walking above ground elſe.
2. By this leg---Let me ſweare nimbly by it,
For I know not how long I ſhall owe it,
If I were out oth' Towne once, if I came in agen to Fetch my breakfaſt, I will give 'em leave to cram me
With a Portugall pudding: Come, let's doe any thing
To appeaſe this thunder, Exeunt.

Enter Pyniero, and Pantra.

Pyn. Art ſure it was that blinde prieſt?
Pan. Yes moſt certaine,
He has provok't all this, the King is mercifull,
And wondrous loving; but he fires him on ſtill,
And when he cooles enrages him, I know it,
Threatens new vengeance, and the gods fierce juſtice
When he but looks with faire eyes on Armuſia,
Will lend him no time to relent; my royall Miſtris,
She has entertain'd a Chriſtian hope.
Py. Speake truely.
Pan. Nay 'tis moſt true, but Lord, how he lies at her,
And threatens her, and flatters her, and dams her,
And I feare, if not ſpeedily prevented,
If ſhe continue ſtout, both ſhall be executed.
Py. Ile kiſſe thee for this newes: nay more Pantra,
If thou wilt give me leave, Ile get thee with Chriſtian,
The beſt way to convert thee.
Pan. Make me believe ſo.
Py. I will y'faith. But which way cam'ſt thou hither?
The Pallace is cloſe guarded, and barricado'd.
Pan. I came through a private vault, which few there
It riſes in a Temple not farre hence, (know of;
Cloſe by the Caſtle here.
Py. How---To what end?
Pan A good one:
To give ye knowledge of my new-borne Miſtris,
And in what doubt Armuſia ſtands,
Thinke any preſent meanes, or hope to ſtop 'em
From their fell ends: the Princes are come in too,
And they are hardn'd alſo.
Py. The damn'd Prieſt------
Pa. Sure he's a cruell man, methinks Religion
Should teach more temperate leſſons.
Py. He the fire-brand?
He dare to touch at ſuch faire lives as theirs are?
Well Prophet, I ſhall propheſie, I ſhall catch ye,
When all your Propheçies will not redeem yee?
Wilt thou doe one thing bravely?
Pa. Any good I am able. (vertuous,
Py. And by thine owne white hand Ile ſweare thou art
And a brave wench, durſt thou but guide me preſently
Through the ſame vault thou cam'ſt into the Pallace,
And thoſe I ſhall appoynt, ſuch as I thinke fit.
Pa. Yes, I will doe it, and ſuddenly, and truely.
Py. I wou'd faine behold this Prophet.
Pa. Now I have yee;
And ſhall bring yee where ye ſhall behold him,
Alone too, and unfurniſh'd of defences:
That ſhall be my care; but you muſt not betray me.
Py. Doſt thou think we are ſo baſe? ſuch ſlaves, rogues?
Pa. I doe not:
And you ſhall ſee how fairely Ile worke for ye.
Py. I muſt needs ſteale that Prieſt,
Steale him, and hang him.
Pa. Do any thing to remove his miſchife, ſtrangle him---
Py. Come prethee love.
Pa. You'l offer me no foule play?
The Vault is darke.
Py. 'Twas well remember'd.
Pa. And ye may ---
But I hold ye honeſt.
Py. Honeſt enough, I warrant thee. (the place.
Pa. I am but a poore weak wench; and what with

And

And your perſwaſions Sir --- but I hope you will not;
You know we are often cozn'd.
Py. If thou doſt feare me,
Why doſt thou put me in minde?
Pa. To let you know ſir,
Though it be in your power, and things fitting to it,
Yet a true gent ——
Py. I know what hee'll doe:
Come and remember me, and Ile anſwer thee,
Ile anſwer thee to the full; wee'll call at th'Caſtle,
And then my good guide do thy will; ſha't finde me
A very tractable man.
Pa. I hope I ſhall ſir. Exeunt.

Enter Bakam, Syana, and Souldiers,

Bak. Let my men guard the gates.
Syan. And mine the Temple,
For feare the honour of our gods ſhould ſuffer,
And on your lives be watchfull.
Ba. And be valiant;
And let's ſee, if theſe Portugalls dare enter;
What their high hearts dare doe: Let's ſee how readily,
The great Ruy Dias will redeem his Countrey-men;
He ſpeaks proud words, and threatens.
Sy. He is approv'd ſir,
And will put faire for what he promiſes;
I could wiſh friendlier termes,
Yet for our Liberties, and for our gods,
We are bound in our beſt ſervice
Even in the hazard of our lives.

Enter the King above.

Kin. Come up Princes,
And give your counſells, and your helpes, the Fort ſtill
Playes fearfully upon us, beats our buildings,
And turnes our people wild with feares.
Ba. Send for the priſoner,
And give us leave to argue. Exit Ba. and Sy. Then,

Enter Ruy Dyas, Emanuel, Chriſtoph. Pedro, with Sould.

Ru. Come on nobly,
And let the Fort play ſtill, we are
Strong enough to look upon 'em,
And returne at pleaſure; it may
Be on our view they will returne him.
Chr. We will returne 'em ſuch thanks elſe,
Shall make 'im ſcratch where it itches not.
Em. How the people ſtare,
And ſome cry, ſome pray, and ſome curſe heartily;
But it is the King ——

Enter Syana, Bakam, Quiſara, Armuſia, with Souldiers above.

Ruy. I cannot blame their wiſedomes,
They are all above, Armuſia chain'd and bound too?
O theſe are thankfull Squiers.
Ba. Heare us Ruy Dias,
Be wiſe and heare us, and give ſpeedy anſwer,
Command thy Cannon preſently to ceaſe,
No more to trouble the afflicted People,
Or ſuddenly Armuſias head goes off,
As ſuddenly as ſeeaid.
Em. Stay Sir, be moderate.
Arm. Doe nothing that's diſhonourable Ruy Dyas,
Let not the feare of me maſter thy valour;
Purſue 'em ſtill, they are baſe malitious people.
Kin. Friend be not deſperate.
Ar. I ſcorne your courteſies;
Strike when you dare, a faire arme guide the Gunner,
And may he let flye ſtill with fortune: friend,
Doe me the honour of a ſouldiers funeralls,
The laſt faire Chriſtian right, ſee me ith' ground,
And let the pallace burne firſt, then the Temples,
And on their ſcorn'd gods erect my monument:
Touch not the Princeſſe, as you are a ſouldier.
Quiſar. Which way you go, ſir,
I muſt follow neceſſary.
One life, and one death.
Kin. Will you take a truce yet?

Enter Pyniero, Soza, and Souldiers with the Governour.

Py. No, no, goe on:
Look here your god, your Prophet.
King. How came he taken?
Py. I Conjur'd for him King.
I am ſure Curre at an old blinde Prophet.
Ile haunt ye ſuch a falſe knave admirably,
A terrier I; I earth him, and then ſnapt him;
Soz. Saving the reverence of your grace, we ſtole him
E'ne out of the next chamber to yee.
Py. Come, come, begin King,
Begin this bloudy matter when you dare;
And yet I ſcorne my ſword ſhould touch the raſcall,
Ile teare him thus before ye. Ha!
What art thou? Pulls his Beard and haire off.
King. How's this!
Art thou a Prophet?
Ru. Come downe Princes.
Kin. VVe are abus'd ——
Oh my moſt deare Armuſia ——
Off which his chaines. And now my noble ſiſter,
Rejoyce with me, I know yee are pleas'd as I am.
Py. This is a pretious Prophet. Why Don Governour,
What make you here? how long have you taken orders?
Ruy. VVhy what a wretch
Art thou to work this miſchiefe?
To aſſume this holy ſhape to ruine honour,
Honour and chaſtity?

Enter King, and all from above.

Gov. I had paid you all,
But fortune plaid the ſlut. Come,
Give me my doome.
King. I cannot ſpeak for wonder.
Gov. Nay, 'tis I ſir,
And here I ſtay your ſentence.
King. Take her friend,
You have halfe perſwaded me to be a Chriſtian,
And with her all the joyes, and all the bleſſings.
VVhy what dreame have we dwelt in?
Ru. All peace to yee,
And all the happineſſe of heart dwell with ye,
Children as ſweet and noble as their Parents.
Py. And Kings at leaſt.
Ar. Good Sir forget my raſhneſſe.
And noble Princeſſe, for I was once angrie,
And out of that might utter ſome diſtemper,
Think not 'tis my nature.
Sya. Your joy is ours ſir,
And nothing we finde in ye, But moſt noble.
King. To priſon with this dog, there let him houle,
And if he can repent, ſigh out his villanies:
His Iſland we ſhall ſeize into our hands,

His

His father and himſelfe have both uſurp'd it,
And kept it by oppreſſion; the Towne and Caſtle,
In which I lay my ſelfe moſt miſerable,
Till my moſt honourable friend redeem'd me,
Signeur Pyniero I beſtow on you,
The reſt of next command upon theſe gentlemen,
Upon ye all my love.
Arm. O brave Ruy Dias,
You have ſtarted now beyond me. I muſt thank ye,
And thank ye for my life, my wife and honour.
Ruy. I am glad I had her for you ſir.
King. Come Princes,
Come friends and lovers all, come noble gentlemen,
No more guns now, nor hates, but joyes and triumphes,
An univerſall gladneſſe flye about us:
And know however ſubtill men dare caſt,
And promiſe wrack, the gods give peace at laſt.
Exeunt.

FINIS.

The Humorous Lieutenant.

Actus primus, Scæna prima

Enter 2. Ushers, and Groomes with perfumes.

1. Usher.

Round, round, perfume it round, quick, loook ye
Diligently the ſtate be right. are theſe the richeſt
Cuſhions? Fie, fie, who waits i'th' wardrobe?

2 Ush. But pray tell me, do you thinke for certaine
Theſe Ambaſſadours ſhall have this morning audience?

1 Ush. They ſhall have it: Lord that you live at Court
And underſtand not? I tell you they muſt have it.

2 Ush. Upon what neceſſity?

1 Ush. Still you are of the tricke of Court, ſell your place

Enter Ladies and Gentlemen.

And ſow your grounds, you are not for this tillage.
Madams, the beſt way is the upper lodgings,
There you may ſee at eaſe.

Ladies. We thanke you ſir. Ex. Ladies, Gent.

1 Ush. Would you have al theſe ſlighted? who ſhould report
The Embaſſadors were handſome men? his beard (then
A neat one? the fire of his eyes quicker then lightning,
And when it breaks, as blaſting his legs, though litle ones,
Yet movers of a maſſe of underſtanding?
Who ſhall commend their cloaths: who ſhall take notice
Of the moſt wiſe behaviour of their feathers?
Ye live a raw man here.

2 Ush. I thinke I doe ſo.

Enter 2. Citizens, and Wives.

1 Ush. Why, whether would you all preſſe?

1 Cit. Good Maſter Uſher. (there.

2 Cit. My wife, and ſome few of my honeſt neighbours,

1 Ush. Prethee begon thou and thy honeſt neighbours,
Thou lookſt like an aſſe, why, whether would you fiſh face

2 Cit. If I might have
But the honour to ſee you at my poore houſe ſir,
A Capon bridled, and ſadled I'le aſſure your worſhip,
A ſhoulder of mutton, and a pottle of wine ſir;
I know your brother, he was as like ye,
And ſhot the beſt at buts ——

1 Ush. A----upon thee.

2 Cit. Some muſick I'le aſſure you too,
My toy ſir, can play o'th' virginals.

1 Ush. Prethee good toy,
Take away thy ſhoulder of mutton, it is flie blowne,
And ſhoulder take thy flap along, here's no place for ye;
Nay then you had beſt be knock'd. Ex. Cit.

Enter Celia.

Cel. I wou'd faine ſee him
The glory of this place, makes me remember,
But dye thoſe thoughts, dye all but my deſires,
Even thoſe to death are ſicke too; he's not here,
Nor how my eyes may guide me----

1 Ush. What's your buſineſſe?
Who keeps the outward doote there? here's fine ſhuffling,
You waſtcoater you muſt go backe.

Cel. There is not,
There cannot be, ſixe dayes and never ſee me?
There muſt not be deſire; ſir do you thinke
That if you had a Miſtris——

1 Ush. Death, ſhe is mad.

Cel. And were your ſelfe an honeſt man? it cannot——

1 Ush. What a devill haſt thou to do with me or my ho- (neſty?
Will you be jogging, good nimble tongue,
My fellow doore keeper.

2 Ush. Prethee let her alone.

1 Ush. The King is comming,
And ſhall we have an agent from the ſuburbs
Come to crave audience too?

Cel. Before I thought ye
To have a little breeding, ſome tang of Gentry;
But now I take ye plainly
Without the helpe of any perſpective,
For that ye cannot alter.

1 Ush. What's that?

Cel. An aſſe ſir, you bray as like one,
And by my troth, me thinkes as ye ſtand now,
Conſidering who to kick next, you appeare to me
Juſt with that kind of gravity, and wiſdome;
Your place may beare the name of Gentleman,
But if ever any of that butter ſtick to your bread——.

2 Ush. You muſt be modeſter.

Cel. Let him uſe me nobler,
And weare good cloaths to do good offices;
They hang upon a fellow of his vertue,
As though they hung on Gibbets.

2 Ush. A perilous wench.

1 Ush. Thruſt her into a corner, I'le no more on her.

2 Ush. You have enough, goe pretty maid, ſtand cloſe,
And uſe that little tongue, with a little more temper.

Cel. I thanke ye ſir.

2 Ush. When the ſhews are paſt,
I'le have ye into the cellar, there wee'l dine
A very pretty wench, a witty rogue,
And there wee'l be as merry, can ye be merry?

Cel. O very merry.

2 Ush. Only our ſelves; this churliſh fellow ſhall not know.

Cel. By no meanes.

2 Ush. And can you love a little?

Cel. Love exceedingly:
I have cauſe to love you deare ſir.

2 Ush. Then I'le carry ye,
And ſhew you all the pictures, and the hangings,
The lodgings, garderis, and the walkes: and then (ſweet)
You ſhall tell me where you lye.

Cel. Yes marry will I.

2. Ush. And't shall go hard but I'le send ye a venison pa-
And bring a bottle of wine along. (stie,
1. Ush. Make roome there.
2. Ush. Room there afore, stand close, the train is coming

Enter King, Antigonous, Tymon, Cherinthus, Menippus.

Cel. Have I yet left a beauty to Catch fooles?
Yet, yet, I see him not, O what a miserie
Is love, expected long, deluded longer!
Ant. Conduct in the Embassadors.
1. Ush. Make roome there.
Ant. They shall not wait long answer —— Flourish
Cel. Yet he comes not. Ent. 3 Embassadors.
Why are eyes set on these, and multitudes
Follow to make these wonders? O good gods!
What would these looke like if my love were here?
But I am fond, forgetfull.
Ant. Now your grievance,
Speake short, and have as short dispatch.
1. Em. Then thus sir:
In all our Royall Masters names, We tell you
Ye have done injustice, broke the bonds of concord,
And from their equall shares, from Alexander
Parted, and so possess'd, not like a brother,
But as an open Enemie, Ye have hedged in
Whole Provinces, man'd and maintain'd these injuries;
And daily with your sword (though they still honor ye)
Make bloudy roades, take Townes, and ruine Castles,
And still their sufferance feeles the waight. (ship
2. Em. Think of that love great sir, that honor'd friend-
Your selfe hold with our Masters, thinke of that strength
When you were all one body, all one minde;
When all your swords strook one way, when your angers,
Like so many brother billowes rose together,
And curling up your foaming crests, dehed
Even mighty Kings, and in their fals, entomb'd 'em;
O thinke of these; and you that have been Conquerours,
That ever led your fortunes open ey'd,
Chain'd fast by confidence; you that fame courted,
Now ye want enemies and men to match ye;
Let not your owne swords seeke your ends to shame ye.

Enter Demetrius with a Javelin, and Gentlemen.

3 Emb. Choose which you will, or peace or war,
We come prepar'd for either.
1 Ush. Roome for the Prince there.
Cel. was it the Prince they said? how my heart trem-
'Tis he indeed; what a sweet noble fiercenesse (bl'd!
Dwels in his eyes? young Meleager like,
When he returnd from slaughter of the Boare,
Crown'd with the loves and honours of the people,
With all the gallant youth of Greece, he lookes now,
Who could deny him love?
Dem. Haile Royall Father.
Ant. Ye are welcome from your sport sir, do you see this,
You that bring thunders in your mouthes, and earthquakes
To shake and totter my designes? can you imagine (gent.
(You men of poore and common apprehensions)
Whilst I admit this man, my son, this nature
That in one looke carries more fire, and fiercenesse,
Then all your masters in their lives: dare I admit him,
Admit him thus, even to my side, My bosome,
When he is fit to rule, when all men cry him,
And all hopes hang about his head; thus place him,
His weapon hatcht in bloud, all these attending
When he shall make their fortunes, all as sadden
In any expedition he shall point 'em,
As arrowes from a Tartars bow, and speeding,
Dare I do this, and feare an enemy?
Feare your great Master? yours? or yours?
Dem. O Hercules,
Who saies you do sit? Is there any thing
In these mens faces, or their Masters actions,
Able to worke such wonders?
Cel. Now 'a speakes:
O I could dwell upon that tongue for ever.
Dem. You call 'em Kings, they never wore those roialties
Nor in the progresse of their lives ariv'd yet
At any thought of King: emperiall dignities,
And powerfull god-like actions, fit for Princes
They can no more put on, and make 'em fit right,
Then I can with this mortall hand hold heaven:
Poore petty men, nor have I yet forgot
The chiefest honours time, and merit gave 'em:
Lysimachus your Master, at his best,
His highest, and his hopefull'st dignities
Was but grand-master of the Elephants;
Selencus of the Treasure; and for Ptolomy,
A thing not thought on then, scarce heard of yet,
Some master of amunition: and must these men——
Cel. What a brave confidence flowes from his spirit?
O sweet young man!
Dem. Must these hold pace with us,
And on the same field hang their memories?
Must these examine what the wils of Kings are?
Prescribe to their designes, and chaine their actions
To their restraints? be freinds, and foes when they please?
Send out their thunders, and their menaces,
As if the fate of mortall thinge were theirs?
Go home good men, and tell your masters from us,
We do 'em too much honour to force from 'em
Their barren countries, ruine their vast Cities,
And tell 'em out of love, we meane to leave 'em
(Since they will needs be Kings,) no more to tread on,
Then they have able wits, and powers to manage,
And so we shall befriend 'em: ha? what does she there?
Emb. This is your answer King.
Ant. 'Tis like to prove so.
Dem. Fie sweet, what make you here?
Cel. Pray ye do not chide me.
Dem. You do your selfe much wrong, and me.
Cel. Pray you pardon me,
I feele my fault, which only was committed
Through my deare love to you: I have not seen ye,
And how can I live then? I have not spoke to ye——
Dem. I know this weeke ye have not, I will redeem all.
You are so tender now: thinke where you are, sweet.
Cel. What other light have I left?
Dem. Prethee Celia,
Indeed, I'le see ye presently.
Cel. I have done sir:
You will not misse?
Dem. By this, and this, I will not.
Cel. 'Tis in your will: and I must be obedient.
Dem. No more of these assemblies.
Cel. I am commanded.
1 Ush. Roome for the Lady there: Madam, my service——
1 Gent. My Coach and't please you Lady.
2 Ush. Roome before there.
2 Gent. The honour Madam, but to waite upon you——
Cel. My servants, and my state:
Lord, how they flocke now?

Before

Before I was affraid they would have beat me;
How these flies play i'th Sunshine? pray ye no services,
Or if ye needs must play the hobby horses,
Seek out some beautie that affects 'em: farewell,
Nay pray ye spare: Gentlemen I am old enough
To go alone at these yeares, without crutches. Exit.

2 Msh. Wel, I could curse now: but that will not help me,
I made as sure account of this wench now, immediately,
Do but consider how the devill has crost me,
Meate for my Master she cries, well ——

3 Em. Once more sir,
We aske your resolutions: peace or war yet?

Dem. War, war, my noble father.

1 Em. Thus I fling it:
And faire ey'd peace, farewell.

Ant. You have your answer;
Conduct out the Embassadours, and give 'em convoies.

Dem. Tell your high hearted Masters, they shall not seek us,
Nor coole i'th' field in expectation of us,
Wee'l ease your men those marches: In their strengths,
And full abilities of mind and courage,
Wee'l find 'em out, and at their best trim buckle with 'em

3 Em. You will find so hot a Souldiers welcome sir,
Your favor shall not freeze,

2 Em. A forward Gentleman,
Pitty the wars should bruise such hopes——

Ant. Conduct 'em — Ex. Em.
Now, For this preparation: where's Leontius?
Call him in presently: for I meane in person Gentlemen
My selfe, with my old fortune——

Dem. Royall sir:
Thus low I beg this honour: fame already
Hath every where rais'd trophies to your glory,
And conquest now grown old, and weake with following
The weary marches, and the bloudy shockes
You daily set her in: 'tis now scarce honour
To you that never knew to fight, but conquer,
To sparkle such poore people: the roiall Eagle
When she hath tri'd her young ones gainst the Sun,
And found 'em right; next teacheth 'em to prey,
How to command on wing, and check below her
Even birds of noble plume; I am your owne sir,
You have found my spirit, trie it now, and teach it,
To stoop whole kingdomes: leave a little for me;
Let not your glory be so greedy sir,
To eate up all my hopes; you gave me life,
If to that life you adde not what's more lasting,
A noble name, for man you have made a shadow:
Blesse me this day: bid me go on, and lead,
Bid me go on, no lesse fear'd, then Antigonus,
And to my maiden sword, tye fast your fortune;
I know 'twill fight it selfe then: deare sir honour me:
Never faire virgin long'd so.

Ant. Rise, and command then,
And be as fortunate as I expect ye:
I love that noble will; your young companions
Bred up and foster'd with ye, I hope Demetrius, Enter
You will make souldiers too: they must not leave ye. Leon.

2 Gent. Never till life leave us sir.

Ant. O Leontius,
Here's worke for you in hand.

Leon. I am ev'n right glad sir.
For by my troath, I am now grown old with idlenesse;
I heare we shall abroad sir.

Ant. Yes, and presently,
But who thinkes you commands now?

Leon. Who commands sir?
Methinkes mine eye should guide me: can there be (If you your selfe will spare him so much honour)
Any found out to lead before your armies,
So full of faith, and fire as brave Demetrius?
King Philips Son, at his yeares was an old Souldier,
'Tis time his fortune be a wing, high time sir,
So many idle houres, as here he loyters,
So many ever-living names he loses,
I hope 'tis he.

Ant. 'Tis he indeed, and nobly
He shall set forward: draw you all those Garrisons
Upon the frontiers as you passe: to those
Joyne these in pay at home, our ancient souldiers,
And as you go presse all the Provinces.

Leo. We shall not need;
Beleeve this hopefull Gentleman,
Can want no swords, nor honest hearts to follow him,
We shall be full, no feare sir.

Ant. You Leontius,
Because you are an old, and faithfull servant,
And know the wars, with all his vantages,
Be neare to his instructions, least his youth
Lose valours best companion, staid discretion,
Shew where to lead, to lodge, to charge with safetie;
In execution not to breake, nor scatter,
But with a provident anger, follow nobly:
Not covetous of bloud, and death, but honour,
Be ever neare his watches; cheere his labours,
And where his hope stands faire, provoke his valour;
Love him, and thinke it no dishonour (my Demetrius)
To weare this Jewell neare thee; he is a tri'd one,
And one that even in spight of time, that sunke him,
And frosted up his strength, will yet stand by thee.
And with the proudest of thine enemies
Exchange for bloud, and bravely: take his counsell.

Leo. Your grace hath made me young again, and wanton.

Ant. She must be known and suddenly; when you have Come in and take your leave sir, and some few (done
Prayers along.

Ant. Do ye know her?

Gent. Char. No, beleeve sir.

Ant. Did you observe her Tymon?

Tym. I look'd on her,
But what she is ——

Ant. I must have that found.

Tym. Well sir.

Dem. I know my duty, Exit. Ant.
You shall be halfe my father.

Leo. All your Servant:
Come Gentlemen, you are resolv'd I am sure
To see these wars.

1 Gent. We dare not leave his fortunes,
Though most assured death hung round about us.

Leo. That bargaines yet to make;
Be not too hasty, when ye face the Enemie,
Nor too ambitious to get honour instantly,
But charge within your bounds, and keepe close bodies,
And you shall see what sport wee'l make these mad-caps;
You shall have game enough, I warrant ye,
Every mans Cock shall fight.

Dem. I must go see sir:
Brave sir, as soone as I have taken leave,
I'le meet you in the Parck;
Draw the men thether,
Waite you upon Leontius.

Gent. Wee'l attend ſir.
Lie. But I beſeech your Grace, with ſpeed; the ſooner
We are i'th' field.
Dem. You could not pleaſe me better. Exit.
Leo. You never ſaw the wars yet?
Gent. Not yet Collonell.
Leo. Theſe fooliſh Miſtriſſes do ſo hang about ye,
So whimper, and ſo hug, I know it Gentlemen,
And ſo intice ye, now ye are i'th' bud;
And that ſweet tilting war, with eies and kiſſes,
Th' allarums of ſoft vowes, and ſighes, and fiddle faddles,
Spoiles all our trade: You muſt forget theſe knick knacks,
A woman at ſome time of yeare, I grant ye
She is neceſſarie; but make no buſines of her;
How now Lieutenant?

Ent. Lieutenant.

Lieu. Oh ſir, as ill as ever;
We ſhall have wars they ſay; they are muſtring yonder:
Would we were at it once: fie, how it plagues me.
Le. Here's one has ſerved now under Captaine Cupid,
And crackt a Pike in's youth: you ſee whats come on't.
Lieu. No, my diſeaſe will never prove ſo honourable.
Le. Why ſure, thou haſt the beſt pox.
Lieu. If I have 'em,
I am ſure I got 'em in the beſt companie;
They are pox of thirty Coates.
Le. Thou haſt me wed 'em finely;
Here's a ſtrange fellow now, and a brave fellow,
If we may ſay ſo of a pockie fellow,
(Which I beleeve we may) this poore Lieutenant;
Whether he have the ſcratches, or the ſcabs,
Or what a devill it be, I'le ſay this for him,
There fights no braver ſouldier under Sun, gentlemen;
Show him an Enemie, his paine's forgot ſtraight;
And where other men, by beds and bathes have eaſe,
And eaſie rules of phiſick, ſet him in a danger,
A danger, thats a fearfull one indeed,
Ye rock him, and he will ſo play about ye,
Let it be ten to one, he ne're comes off againe;
Ye have his heart: and then he works it bravely,
And throughly bravely: not a pang remembred:
I have ſeen him do ſuch things, beliefe would ſhrinke at.
Gent. 'Tis ſtrange he ſhould do all this, and diſeas'd ſo.
Leo. I am ſure 'tis true: Lieutenant, canſt thou drink wel?
Lieu. Would I were drunk, dog-drunk, I might not feele this.
Gent. I would take Phiſicke.
Lieu. But I would know my diſeaſe firſt.
Leon. Why? it may be the Collique: canſt thou blow backward?
Lieu. There's never a bag-pipe in the kingdom better.
Gent. Is't not a pluriſie?
Lieu. 'Tis any thing
That has the devill, and death in't: will ye march Gentlemen?
The Prince has taken leave.
Leo. How know ye that?
Lie. I ſaw him leave the Court, diſpatch his followers,
And met him after in a bye ſtreet: I thinke
He has ſome wench, or ſuch a toy, to lick over
Before he goe: would I had ſuch another
To draw this fooliſh paine downe.
Leo. Let's away Gentlemen,
For ſure the Prince will ſtay on us.
Gent. Wee'l attend ſir. Exeunt.

Scene 2. Enter Demetrius, and Celia.

Cel. Muſt ye needs go?
Dem. Or ſtay with all diſhonour.
Cel. Are there not men enough to fight?
Dem. Fie Celia,
This ill becomes the noble love you beare me;
Would you have your love a coward?
Cel. No; beleeve ſir,
I would have him fight, but not ſo far off from me.
Dem. Wouldſt have it thus? or thus?
Cel. If that be fighting
Dem. Ye wanton foole: when I come home againe
I'le fight with thee, at thine weapon Celia,
And conquer thee too.
Cel. That you have done already,
You need no other Armes to me, but theſe ſir;
But will you fight your ſelfe ſir?
Dem. Thus deep in bloud wench,
And through the thickeſt rankes of Pikes.
Cel. Spur bravely,
Your firie Courſer, beat the troopes before ye,
And crambe the mouth of death with executions.
Dem. I would do more then theſe: But prethee tell me,
Tell me my faire, where got'ſt thou this male ſpirit?
I wonder at thy mind.
Cel. Were I man then,
You would wonder more.
Dem. Sure thou wouldſt prove a Souldier,
And ſome great Leader.
Cel. Sure I ſhould do ſomewhat;
And the firſt thing I did, I ſhould grow envious,
Extreamely envious of your youth, and honour.
Dem. And fight againſt me?
Cel. Ten to one, I ſhould do it.
Dem. Thou wouldſt not hurt me?
Cel. In this mind I am in,
I thinke I ſhould be hardly brought to ſtrike ye,
Unleſſe 'twere thus; but in my mans mind
Dem. What?
Cel. I ſhould be friends with ye too,
Now I thinke better.
Dem. Ye are a tall Souldier:
Here, take theſe, and theſe;
This gold to furniſh ye, and keepe this bracelet;
Why do you weep now?
You a maſculine ſpirit?
Cel. No, I confeſſe, I am a foole, a woman:
And ever when I part with you
Dem. You ſhall not,
Theſe teares are like prodigious ſignes, my ſweet one,
I ſhall come backe, loden with fame, to honour thee.
Cel. I hope you ſhall:
But then my deare Demetrius,
When you ſtand Conquerour, and at your mercy
All people bow, and all things waite your ſentence;
Say then your eye (ſurveying all your conqueſt)
Finds out a beautie, even in ſorrow excellent,
A conſtant face, that in the midſt of ruine
With a forc'd ſmile, both ſcornes at fate, and fortune:
Say you find ſuch a one, ſo nobly fortified,
And in her figure, all the ſweets of nature?
Dem. Prethee,
No more of this, I cannot find her.
Cel. That ſhews as far beyond my wither'd beauty;
And will run mad, to love ye too.
Dem. Do you feare me,
And do you thinke, beſides this face, this beauty,
This heart, where all my hopes are lock'd

Cel

Cel. I dare not:
No lure, I think ye honeſt; wondrous honeſt.
Pray doe not frowne, Ile ſwear ye are.
Dem. Ye may chooſe.
Cel. But how long will ye be away?
Dem. I know not.
Cel. I know you are angry now: pray look upon me:
Ile aske no more ſuch queſtions.
Dem. The Drums beat,
I can no longer ſtay.
Cel. They doe but call yet:
How faine you would leave my company.
Dem. I wou'd not,
Unleſſe a greater power then love commanded,
Commands my life, mine honour.
Cel. But a little.
Dem. Prethee farewell, and be not doubtfull of me.
Cel. I would not have ye hurt: and ye are ſo ventrous——
But good ſweet Prince preſerve your ſelfe, fight nobly,
But do not thruſt this body; 'tis not yours now,
'Tis mine, 'tis onely mine: doe not ſeek wounds, Sir,
For every drop of bloud you bleed——
Dem. I will Celia,
I will be carefull.
Cel. My heart, that loves ye deerely.
Dem. Prethee no more, we muſt part: { Drums a }
Harke, they march now. { March. }
Cel. Pox on theſe bawling Drums: I am ſure you'l
But one kiſſe? what a parting's this? (kiſſe me,
Dem. Here take me,
And doe what thou wilt with me, ſmother me;
But ſtill remember, if your fooling with me,
Make me forget the truſt——
Cel. I have done: farewell ſir,
Never look back, you ſhall not ſtay, not a minute.
Dem. I muſt have one farewell more.
Cel. No, the Drums beat;
I dare not ſlack your honour; not a hand more,
Onely this look; the gods preſerve, and ſave ye.

Actus Secundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Antigonus, Carimbus, Tymon.

Ant. What have ye found her out?
Car. We have hearkned after her.
Ant. What's that to my deſire?
Car. Your grace muſt give us time,
And a little meanes.
Ty. She is ſure a ſtranger,
If ſhe were bred or knowne here——
Ant. Your dull endeavours Enter Menippus.
Should never be employ'd. Welcome Menippus.
Men. I have found her ſir,
I meane the place ſhe is lodg'd in; her name is Celia,
And much a doe I had to purchaſe that too.
Ant. Doſt think Demetrius loves her?
Men. Much I feare it,
But nothing that way yet can win for certaine.
Ile tell your grace within this houre.
Ant. A ſtranger?
Men. Without all doubt.
Ant. But how ſhould he come to her?
Men. There lies the marrow of the matter hid yet.
Ant. Has't thou been with thy wife?
Men. No ſir, I am going to her.
Ant. Goe and diſpatch, and meet me in the garden,
And get all out ye can. Exit.
Men. Ile doe my beſt ſir. Exit.
Tym. Bleſt be thy wife, thou wert an arrant aſſe elſe.
Car. I, ſhe is a ſtirring woman indeed:
There's a braine, brother.
Tym. There's not a handſome wench of any mettle
Within an hundred miles, but her intelligence
Reaches her, and out-reaches her, and brings her
As confidently to Court, as to a ſanctuary:
What had his mouldy braines ever arriv'd at,
Had not ſhe beaten it out oth' Flint to faſten him?
They ſay ſhe keeps an office of Concealements;
There is no young wench, let her be a Saint,
Unleſſe ſhe live ith' Center, but ſhe findes her,
And every way prepares addreſſes to her:
If my wife would have followed her courſe Carimbus,
Her lucky courſe, I had the day before him:
O what might I have been by this time, Brother?
But ſhe (forſooth) when I put theſe things to her,
Theſe things of honeſt thrift, groans, o my conſcience,
The load upon my conſcience, when to make us cuckolds,
They have no more burthen then a brood-gooſe, brother;
But let's doe what we can, though this wench faile us,
Another of a new way will be look'd at:
Come, let's abroad, and beat our braines, time may
For all his wiſedome, yet give us a day. Ex.

Scæne. 2. Drum within. Allarme. Enter Demetrius and Leontius.

Dem. I will not ſee 'em fall thus, give me way ſir,
I ſhall forget you love me elſe.
Leo. Will ye loſe all?
For me to be forgotten, to be hated,
Nay never to have been a man, is nothing,
So you, and thoſe we have preſerv'd from ſlaughter
Come ſafely off.
Dem. I have loſt my ſelfe.
Leo. You are cozn'd,
Dem. And am moſt miſerable.
Leo. There's no man ſo, but he that makes himſelf ſo.
Dem. I will goe on.
Leo. You muſt not: I ſhall tell you then,
And tell you true, that man's unfit to governe,
That cannot guide himſelfe: you lead an Army?
That have not ſo much manly ſuff'rance left yee,
To beare a loſſe?
Dem. Charge but once more Leontius,
My friends and my companions are engag'd all.
Leo. Nay give 'em loſt, I ſaw 'em off their horſes,
And the enemy maſter of their Armes; nor could then,
The policie, nor ſtrength of man redeem 'em.
Dem. And ſhall I know this, and ſtand tooling?
Leo. By my dead fathers ſoule you ſtir not, ſir,
Or if you doe, you make your way through me firſt.
Dem. Thou art a Coward.
Leo. To prevent a Madman.
None but your fathers Son, durſt call me ſo,
'Death if he did——Muſt I be ſcandall'd by ye,
That hedg'd in all the helps I had to ſave ye?
That, where there was a valiant weapon ſtirring,
Both ſearch'd it out, and ſingl'd it, unedg'd it,

For

For feare it ſhould bite you, am I a coward?
Goe, get ye up, and tell 'em ye are the Kings Sonne;
Hang all your Ladies favours on your Creſt,
And let them fight their ſhares; ſpurre to deſtruction,
You cannot miſſe the way: be bravely deſperate,
And your young friends before ye, that loſt this battell,
Your honourable friends, that knew no order,
Cry out, Antigonus, the old Antigonus,
The wiſe and fortunate Antigonus,
The great, the valiant, and the fear'd Antigonus,
Has ſent a deſperate ſonne, without diſcretion
To bury in an houre his age of honor.
Dem. I am aſhamed.
Leo. 'Tis ten to one, I die with ye:
The coward will not long be after ye;
I ſcorne to ſay I ſaw you fall, ſigh for ye,
And tell a whining tale, ſome ten yeares after
To boyes and girles in an old chimney corner,
Of what a Prince we had, how bravely ſpirited;
How young and faire he fell: wee'l all goe with ye,
And ye ſhall ſee us all, like ſacrifices
In our beſt trim, fill up the mouth of ruine,
Will this faith ſatisfie your folly? can this ſhow ye,
Tis not to die we feare, but to die poorely,
To fall, forgotten, in a multitude?
If you will needs tempt fortune now ſhe has held ye,
Held ye from ſinking up.
Dem. Pray doe not kill me,
Theſe words pierce deeper then the wounds I ſuffer,
The ſmarting wounds of loſſe.
Leo. Ye are too tender;
Fortune has houres of loſſe, and houres of honor,
And the moſt valiant feele them both: take comfort,
The next is ours, I have a ſoule deſcries it:
The angry bull never goes backe for breath,
But when he meanes to arme his fury double.
Let this day ſet but not the memorie,
And we ſhall find a time: How now Lieutenant?

Enter Lieutenant.

Lieu. I know not: I am mall'd: we are bravely beaten,
All our young gallants loſt.
Leo. Thou art hurt.
Lieu. I am pepper'd,
I was i'th' midſt of all: and bang'd of all hands:
They made an anvile of my head, it rings yet;
Never ſo threſh'd: do you call this fame? I have fam'd it;
I have got immortall fame, but I'le no more on't;
I'le no ſuch ſcratching Saint to ſerve hereafter;
O my conſcience I was kill'd above twenty times,
And yet I know not what a Devil's in't,
I crawled away, and lived againe ſtill; I am hurt plaguily,
But now I have nothing neere ſo much paine Colonell,
They have ſliced me for that maladie.
Dem. All the young men loſt?
Lie. I am glad you are here: but they are all i'th' pound ſir,
They'l never ride o're other mens corne againe, I take it,
Such friſking, and ſuch flaunting with their feathers,
And ſuch careering with their miſtres favours;
And here muſt he be pricking out for honor,
And there got he a knocke, and downe goes pilgarlike,
Commends his ſoule to his ſhe-ſaint, and exit.
Another ſpurres in there, cryes make roome villaines,
I am a Lord, ſcarce ſpoken, but with reverence
A ratcall takes him o're the face, and fels him;
There lyes the Lord, the Lord be with him.
Leo. Now ſir,
Doe you find this truth?
Leo. I would not.
Lieu. Pox upon it,
They have ſuch tender bodies too; ſuch Culliſſes,
That one good hanſome blow breaks 'em a pieces.
Leo. How ſtands the Enemie?
Lieu. Even coole enough too:
For to ſay truth, he has bin ſhrewdly heated,
The gentleman no doubt will fall to his jewlips.
Leo. He marches not i'th' taile on's.
Lieu. No, plague take him,
Hee'l kiſſe our tailes as ſoone, he lookes upon us,
As if he would ſay, if ye will turne againe, friends,
We will belabor you a little better,
And beat a little more care into your coxcombs.
Now ſhall we have damnable Ballads out againſt us,
Moſt wicked madrigals: and ten to one Colonell,
Sung to ſuch lowſie, lamentable tunes.
Leo. Thou art merrie,
How e're the game goes: good ſir be not troubled,
A better day will draw this backe againe.
Pray goe, and cheere thoſe left, and lead 'em off,
They are hot, and wearie.
Dem. I'le doe any thing.
Leo. Lieutenant, ſend one preſentlie away
To th' King, and let him know our ſtate: and harke ye,
Be ſure the meſſenger adviſe his Majeſtie
To comfort up the Prince: hee's full of ſadnes.
Lieu. When ſhall I get a Surgeon? this hot weather,
Unleſſe I be well pepper'd, I ſhall ſtinke Colonel.
Leo. Goe, I'le prepare thee one.
Lieu. If ye catch me then,
Fighting againe, I'le eat hay with a horſe. Ex.

Scene 3. Enter Lencippe (reading) and two Maids at a Table, writing.

Leu. Have ye written to Merione?
1. Ma. Yes, Madam.
Leu. And let her underſtand the hopes ſhe has;
If ſhe come ſpeedilie ———
1. Ma. All theſe are ſpecified,
Leu. And of the chaine is ſent her,
And the rich ſtuffe to make her ſhew more hanſome here?
1 Maid. All this is done, Madam.
Leu. What have you diſpatcht there?
2 Mai. A letter to the Countrey maid, and't pleaſe ye.
Leu. A pretty girle, but peeviſh, plaguy peeviſh:
Have ye bought the embroydered gloves, and that purſe (for her,
And the new Curle?
2. Maid. They are ready packt up Madam.
Leu. Her maiden-head will yeeld me; let me ſee now,
She is not fifteen they ſay: for her complexion ———
Cloe, Cloe, Cloe, here, I have her,
Cloe, the Daughter of a Countrey gentleman;
Her age upon fifteen: now her complexion,
A lovely browne; here 'tis; eyes black and rolling,
The body neatly built: ſhe ſtrikes a Lute well,
Sings moſt inticingly: theſe helpes conſider'd,
Her maiden-head will amount to ſome three hundred,
Or three hundred & fifty crowns, 'twil bear it handſomly.
Her father's poore, ſome little ſhare deducted,
To buy him a hunting Nag; I, 'twill be pretty:
VVho takes care of the Merchants wife?
1 Mai. I have wrought her.
Leu. You know for whom ſhe is;

1 Maid.

1. Maid. Very well, Madam,
Though very much a doe, I had to make her
Apprehend that happineſſe.
Leu. Theſe kinde are ſubtile:
Did ſhe not cry and blubber when ye urg'd her? (peliſh.
1. Maid. O moſt extremly, & ſwore ſhe would rather
Leu. Good ſignes, very good ſignes,
Symptomes of eaſie nature.
Had ſhe the plate?
1. Maid. She looke upon't, and left it,
And turn'd againe, and view'd it.
Leu. Very well ſtill.
1 Maid. At length ſhe was content to let it lye there,
Till I call'd for't, or ſo.
Leu. She will come?
1. Maid. Doe you take me
For ſuch a foole, I would part without that promiſe?
Leu. The Chambers next the park.
2. Maid. The Widdow Madam,
You bad me look upon.
Leu. Hang her, ſhe is muſtie:
She is no mans meat; beſide, ſhe is poore and ſluttiſh:
Where lies old Thisbe now, you are ſo ſo long now.---
2. Ma. Thisbe, Thisbe, This. agent Thisbe, O I have her,
She lyes now in Nicopolis.
Leu. Diſpatch a packet,
And tell her, her ſuperiour here commands her,
The next Mon'th not to faile, but ſee deliver'd
Here to our uſe, ſome twenty young and handſome,
As alſo able maids, for the Court ſervice,
As ſhe will anſwer it: we are out of beautie,
Utterly out, and rub the time away here,
With ſuch blown ſtuff, I am aſham'd to ſend it. Knock.
Who's that? look out, to your buſineſſe maid, within.
There's nothing got by idleneſſe: There is a Lady,
Which if I can but buckle with, Altea,
A, A, A, A, Altea, young, and married,
And a great lover of her husband, well,
Not to be brought to Court: ſay ye ſo? I am ſorry, (is't?
The Court ſhall be brought to you then: how now, who
1. Maid. An ancient woman, with a maid attending,
A pretty girle, but out of cloathes; for a little money,
It ſeemes ſhe would put her to your bringing up, Madam,
Enter Woman, and Phebe.
Leu. Let her come in. Would ye ought with us, good
I pray be ſhort, we are full of buſineſſe. (woman?
Wo. I have a tender girle here, and't pleaſe your honour.
Leu. Very well.
VVom. That hath a great deſire to ſerve your worſhip.
Leu. It may be ſo; I am full of Maids.
VVom. She is young, forſooth---
And for her truth; and as they ſay her bearing. (pulſe,
Leu. Ye ſay well: come ye hither maid, let me feel your
'Tis ſomewhat weak, but nature will grow ſtronger,
Let me ſee your leg, ſhe treads but low ith' paſternes.
VVom. A cork heele Madam.
Leu. We know what will doe it, (at?
Without your aime good woman: what do you pitch her
Shee's but a ſlight toy---cannot hold out long.
VVom. Even what you think is meet.
Leu. Give her ten Crowns, we are full of buſineſſe,
Shee is a poore woman, let her take a Cheeſe home:
Enter the wench ith' office. Ex. VVom. & 1. Maid.
2. Maid. What's your name, ſiſter?
Phe. Phebe forſooth.
Leu. A pretty name; 'twill doe well:
Goe in, and let the other maid inſtruct ye Phebe; Ex. Phe.
Let my old velvet skirt be made fit for her,
I'le put her into action for a waſcoate,
And when I have trigg'd her up once, this ſmall Phoenice
Shall ſaile for gold, and good ſtore too: who's there? Knock.
Lord, ſhall we never have any eaſe in this world? within.
Still troubled? ſtill moleſted? what would you have? Ent.
I cannot furniſh ye faſter then I am able. Menippe.
And ye were my husband a thouſand times, I cannot do it;
At leaſt a dozen poſts are gone this morning
For ſeverall parts of the Kingdome: I can do no more
But pay 'em, and inſtruct 'em.
Men. Prethee, good ſweet heart,
I come not to diſturbe thee, nor diſcourage thee,
I know thou labour'ſt truly: harke in thine eare.
Leu. Ha?
What do you make ſo dainty on't? looke there,
I am an Aſſe, I can do nothing.
Men. Colin?
I, this is ſhe; a ſtranger borne.
Leu. What would you give for more now?
Men. Prethee, my beſt Leucippe, ther's much hangs on't
Lodg'd at the end of Maze's ſtreet? thats true too;
At the ſacke of ſuch a Towne, by ſuch a Souldier
Preſerv'd a priſoner: and by Prince Demetrius
Bought from that man againe, maintain'd, and favour'd:
How came you by this knowledge?
Leu. Poore weake man,
I have a thouſand eyes, when thou art ſleeping,
Abroad, and full of buſineſſe.
Men. You never tri'd her?
Leu. No, ſhe is beyond my levell, ſo hedg'd in
By the Princes infinite love, and favour to her---
Men. She is a handſome wench.
Leu. A delicate, and knowes it;
And out of that proofe armes her ſelfe.
Men. Come in then,
I have a great deſigne from the King to you,
And you muſt worke like waxe now.
Leu. On this Lady?
Men. On this, and all your wits call home.
Leu. I have done.
Toyes in my time of ſome note; old as I am,
I thinke my braines will worke without barme,
Take up the Bookes.
Men. As we goe in, I'le tell ye. Exeunt.

Scene 4. Enter Antigonus, Tymon, Lords, and a Souldier.

Ant. No face of ſorrow for this loſſe? 'twill choake him,
Nor no man miſſe a friend, I know his nature
So deep impreſt with griefe, for what he has ſuffer'd,
That the leaſt adding to it, adds to his ruine;
His loſſe is not ſo infinite, I hope Souldier.
Soul. Faith neither great, nor out of diſcretion,
The young men out of heate.
Enter Demetrius, Leontius, and Lieutenant.
Ant. I gheſſe the manner.
Lord Men. The Prince and'like your Grace---
Ant. You are welcome home ſir;
Come, no more ſorrow, I have heard your fortune,
And I my ſelf haue tride the like: cleare up man,
I will not have ye take it thus; if I doubted
Your feare had loſt; and that you had turn'd your backe to Baſely beſought their mercies---('em,
Leo.

Leo. No, no, by this hand sir,
We fought like honest and tall men.
Antig. I know't Leontius; or if I thought
Neglect of rule, having his councell with ye,
Or too vaine-glorious appetite of fame,
Your men forgot, and scatter'd.
Leo. None of these sir,
He shew'd himselfe a noble gentleman,
Every way apt to rule.
Ant. These being granted;
Why should you think you have done an act so hainous,
That nought but discontent dwells round about ye?
I have lost a Battaile.
Leo. I, and fought it hard too.
Ant. With as mnchmeanes as man—
Leo. Or devill could urge it.
Ant. Twenty to one of our side now.
Leo. Turne Tables,
Beaten like dogs againe, like Owles, you take it
To hart for flying but a mile before 'em,
And to say truth, 'twas no flight neither sir,
'Twas but a walke, a handsome walke,
I have tumbl'd with this old body, beaten like a stock-fish,
And stuck with arrowes, like an arming Quiver,
Blouded and bang'd, almost a day before 'em,
And glad I have got off then. Here's a mad shaver,
He fights his share I am sure, when ere he comes to't;
Yet I have seen him trip it tithely too,
And cry the devill take the hindmost ever.
Lieu. I learn'd it of my betters.
Leo. Boudge at this?
Ant. Has fortune but one face?
Lieu. In her best vizard,
Me thinks she looks but lowrily.
Ant. Chance, though she faint now,
And sink below our expectations;
Is there no hope left strong enough to boy her?
Dem. 'Tis not this day, I fled before the enemie,
And lost my people, left mine honour murder'd,
My mayden honour, never to be ransom'd,
(Which to a noble soule is too too sencible)
Afflicts me with this sadnesse; most of these,
Time may turne straight againe, experience perfect,
And new swords, cut new wayes to nobler fortunes.
O I have lost ——
Ant. As you are mine forget it:
I doe not think it losse.
Demet. O sir, forgive me,
I have lost my friends, those worthy soules bred with me,
I have lost my selfe, they were the pieces of me;
I have lost all Arts, my Schooles are taken from me,
Honour and Armes, no emulation left me:
I liv'd to see these men lost, look'd upon it;
These men that twin'd their loves to mine, their vertues,
O shame of shames, I saw, and could not save 'em,
This carries sulphure in't, this burnes and boyles me,
And like a fatall Tombe bestrides my memorie.
Antig. This was hard fortune, but if alive, and taken,
They shall be ransom'd; let it be at Millions.
Dem. They are dead, they are dead.
Lieu. When would he weep for me thus?
I may be dead, and powder'd.
Leo. Good Prince, grieve not:
We are not certaine of their deaths: the enemy,
Though he be hot, and keene,
Yet holds good Quarter.
What noyse is this?
Great Shouts within, Enter Gentlemen.
Lieu. He doe's not follow us?
Give me a steeple top.
Leo. They live, they live sir.
Ant. Hold up your manly face;
They live, they are here, Son.
Dem. These are the men.
1 Gent. They are, and live to honour ye.
Dem. How scapt ye noble friends? me thought I saw ye
Even in the jawes of death.
2. Gent. Thanks to our folly,
That spurr'd us on; we were indeed hedg'd round in't,
And ev'n beyond the hand of succour beaten,
Unhors'd, disarm'd: and what we lookt for then sir,
Let such poore weary soules that heare the Bell knoll,
And see the grave a digging, tell.
Dem. For heaven sake
Delude mine eyes no longer: how came ye off?
1. Gent. Against all expectation: the brave Seleucus,
I thinke this day enamour'd on your vertue,
When, through the Troops, he saw ye shoot like light-
And at your manly courage all tooke fire, (ning;
And after that, the miserie we fell too,
The never-certaine fate of war considering,
As we stood all before him, fortunes ruines,
Nothing but death expecting, a short time
He made a stand upon our youths and fortunes,
Then with an eye of mercy inform'd his judgement,
How yet unripe we were, unblowne, unhardend,
Unfitted for such fatall ends; he cryed out to us,
Goe Gentlemen, commend me to your Master,
To the most high, and hopefull prince Demetrius,
Tell him the valour that he showed against me
This day, the virgin valour, and true fire
Deserves, even from an Enemie, this courtesie;
Your lives and Armes freely I'le give 'em: thanke him,
And thus we are return'd Sir.
Leo. Faith 'twas well done;
'Twas bravely done; was't not a noble part Sir?
Lieu. Had I been there up had I gone, I am sure on't;
These noble tricks, I never durst truft 'em yet.
Leo. Let me not live, and't were not a famed honestie,
It takes me such a tickling way: now would I wish hea-
But ee'n the happines, ee'n that poore blessing (ven,
For all the sharp afflictions thou hast sent me,
But ee'n i'th' head o'th' field to take Seleucus.
I should doe something memorable: fie, sad still.
1. Gent. Doe you grieve we are come off?
Dem. Unransom'd, was it?
2. Gent. It was sir.
Dem. And with such a fame to me?
Said ye not so?
Leo. Ye have heard it.
Dem. O Leontius,
Better I had lost 'em all: my selfe had perished,
And all my fathers hopes,
Leo. Mercy upon ye,
What ayle ye Sir? death, doe not make fooles on's,
Neither goe to Church, nor tarry at home,
That's a fine Home-pipe?
Ant. What's now your griefe Demetrius?
Dem. Did he not beat us twice?
Leo. He beate a pudding;
Beate us but once.
Dem. Has beate me twice, and beat me to a coward,

Lieu.

Beat me to nothing.
Lieu. Is not the devill in him?
Leo. I pray it be no worse.
Dem. Twice conquer'd me.
Leo. Bear witnesse all the world, I am a dunce here.
Dem. With valour first he strook me, then with honour;
That stroak Leontius, that strook, do'st thou not feele it?
Leo. Where abouts was it? for I remember nothing yet.
Dem. All these gentlemen
That were his prisoners——
Leo. Yes, he set 'em free sir,
With Armes and honour.
Dem. There, there, now thou hast it;
At mine owne weapon, Courtesie, h'as beaten me,
At that I was held a Master in, he has cow'd me.
Hotter then all the dint o'th' fight he has charg'd me:
Am I not now a wretched fellow? think on't;
And when thou hast examin'd all wayes honourable,
And find'st no doore left open to requite this,
Conclude I am a wretch, and was twice beaten.
Ant. I have obsery'd your way, and understand it,
And equall love it as Demetrius.
My noble childe thou shalt not fall in vertue,
I and my power will sink first: you Leontius,
Wait for a new Commission, ye shall out againe,
And instantly: you shall not lodge this night here,
Not see a friend, nor take a blessing with ye,
Before ye be ith' field: the enemy is up still,
And still in ful dnsigne: Charge him againe, Son,
And either bring home that againe thou hast lost there,
Or leave thy body by him.
Dem. Ye raise me,
And now I dare look up againe, Leontius.
Leo. I, I, sir, I am thinking who we shall take of 'em,
To make all straight; and who we shall give toth' devill.
What saist thou now Lieutenant?
Lieu. I say nothing.
Lord what aile I, that I have no minde to fight now?
I finde my constitution mightily alter'd
Since I came home: I hate all noises too,
Especially the noise of Drums; I am now as well
As any living man; why not as valiant?
To fight now, is a kinde of vomit to me;
It goes against my stomack.
Dem. Good sir, presently;
You cannot doe your Son, so faire a favour.
Ant. 'Tis my intent: Ile see ye march away too;
Come, get your men together presently, Leontius,
And presse where please you, as you march.
Leo. We goe sir.
Ant. Wait you on me, Ile bring ye to your command,
And then to fortune give you up.
Dem. Ye love me. Ext.
Leo. Goe, get the drums, beat round, Lieutenant.
Lieu. Harke ye, sir,
I have a foolish businesse they call marriage.
Leo. After the wars are done.
Lieu. The partie staies sir,
I have giv'n the Priest his money too: all my friends sir,
My father, and my mother.
Leo. Will you goe forward?
Lieu. She brings a pretty matter with her.
Leo. Halfe a dozen Bastards.
Lieu. Some fortie sir.
Leo. A goodly competency.
Lieu. I meane sir, pounds a year; Ile dispatch the matter,
'Tis but a night or two; Ile overtake ye sir.
Leo. The 2 old legions, yes: where lies the horse-quarter?
Lieu. And if it be a boy, Ile even make bold sir.
Leo. Away with your whore,
A plague o' your whore, you damn'd rogue,
Now ye are cur'd and well; must ye be clicketing?
Lieu. I have broke my minde to my Ancient, in my absence,
Hee's a sufficient gentleman.
Leo. Get forward.
Lieu. Onely receive her portion.
Leo. Get ye forward;
Else Ile bang ye forward.
Lieu. Strange sir,
A Gentleman and an officer cannot have the libertie
To doe the office of a man.
Leo. Shame light on thee,
How came this whore into thy head?
Lieu. This whore sir?
'Tis strange, a poore whore.
Leo. Doe not answer me:
Troop, Troop away; doe not name this whore againe,
Or think there is a whore.
Lieu. That's very hard sir.
Leo. For if thou dost, look to't, Ile have thee gueldod,
Ile walk ye out before me; not a word more. Ex.

Scæne 5. Enter Leucippe, and Governesse.

Leu. Ye are the Mistris of the house ye say,
Where this young Ladie lies.
Gov. For want of a better.
Leu. You may be good enough for such a purpose:
When was the Prince with her? answer me directly.
Gover. Not since he went a warring.
Leuc. Very well then;
What carnall copulation are you privie too
Between these two? be not afraid, we are women,
And may talke thus amongst our selves, no harme in't.
Gover. No sure, there's no harme in't, I conceive that;
But truely, that I ever knew the gentlewoman
Otherwise given, then a hopefull gentlewoman——
Leuc. You'll grant me the Prince loves her?
Gov. There I am with ye.
And the gods blesse her, promises her mightily.
Leu. Stay there a while. And gives her gifts?
Gov. Extreamly;
And truely makes a very Saint of her.
Leu. I should think now,
(Good woman let me have your judgement with me,
I see 'tis none of the worst: Come sit down by me)
That these two cannot love so tenderly.
Gov. Being so young as they are too.
Leu. You say well——
But that methinks some further promises——
Gov. Yes, yes,
I have heard the Prince sweare he would marry her.
Leuc. Verie well still: they doe not use to fall out?
Gov. The tenderest Chickens to one another,
They cannot live an houre assunder.
Leu. I have done then;
And be you gone; you know your charge, and doe it.
You know whose will it is; if you transgresse it——
That is, if any have accesse, or see her,
Before the Kings will be fulfill'd——
Gov. Not the Prince, Madam?
Leu. You'll be hang'd if you it, that Ile assure ye.

Gov. But ne're the leſſe, Ile make bold to obey ye.
Leuc. Away, and to your buſineſſe then.
Gov. 'Tis done, Madam. Exeunt.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter Antigonus and Menippus.

Ant. THou haſt taken wondrous pains; but yet Menippus,
You underſtand not of what bloud, & countrey.
Men. I labour'd that, but cannot come to know it.
A Greek, I am ſure ſhe is, ſhe ſpeaks this language.
Ant. Is ſhe ſo excellent handſome?
Men. Moſt inticing.
Ant. Sold for a priſoner?
Men. Yes ſir,
Some poore creature.
Ant. And he loves tenderly?
Men. They ſay extreamly.
Ant. 'Tis well prevented then; yes, I perceiv'd it:
When he took leave now, he made a hundred ſtops.
Deſir'd an houre, but halfe an houre, a minute,
Which I with anger croſs'd; I knew his buſineſſe,
I knew 'twas ſhe he hunted on; this journey, man,
I beat out ſuddenly for her cauſe intended,
And would not give him time to breath. When comes ſhe?
Men. This morning ſir.
Ant. Lodge her to all delight then:
For I would have her try'd toth' teſt: I know,
She muſt be ſome crackt coyne, not fit his traffique,
Which when we have found, the ſhame will make him leave her,
Or we ſhal work a nearer way: Ile bury him,
And with him all the hopes I have calt upon him,
Ere he ſhall dig his owne grave in that woman;
You know which way to bring her: Ile ſtand cloſe there,
To view her as ſhe paſſes: and doe you hear Menippus,
Obſerve her with all ſweetneſſe: humour her,
'Twill make her lie more careleſſe to our purpoſes.
Away, and take what helpes you pleaſe.
Men. I am gone ſir. Exeunt.

Scæne 2. Enter Celia, and Governeſſe.

Cel. Governeſſe, from whom was this Gown ſent me?
Prethee be ſerious true; I will not wear't elſe:
'Tis a handſome one.
Gov. As though you know not?
Cel. No faith:
But I believe, for certaine too, yet I wonder,
Becauſe it was his caution, this poore way,
Still to preſerve me from the curious ſearchings
Of greedy eyes.
Gov. You have it: does it pleaſe you?
Cel. 'Tis very rich, methinks too, prethee tell me?
Gov. From one that likes you wel, never look coy, Lady;
Theſe are no gifts, to be put off with poutings.
Cel. Powtings, and gifts? is it from any ſtranger?
Gov. You are ſo curious, that there is no talk to ye.
What if it be I pray ye?
Cel. Unpin good Governeſſe,
Quick, quick.
Gov. Why, what's the matter?
Cel. Quick, good Governeſſe:
Fie on't, how beaſtly it becomes me? poorely?
A trick put in upon me? well ſaid Governeſſe:
I vow I would not weare it—out, it ſmells muſty.
Are theſe your tricks? now I begin to ſmell it
Abominable muſty; will ye help me?
The Prince will come againe——
Gov. You are not mad ſure?
Cel. As I live ile cut it off: a pox upon it; (ries?
For ſure it was made for that uſe; do you bring me Livo-
Stales to catch Kites? doſt thou laugh too, thou baſe wo- (man?
Gov. I cannot chuſe, if I ſhould be hang'd.
Cel. Abuſe me,
And then laugh at me too?
Gover. I doe not abuſe ye:
Is it abuſe, to give him drink that's thirſty?
You want cloathes; is it ſuch a hainous ſin I beſeech ye,
To ſee you ſtor'd?
Cel. There is no greater wickedneſſe
Then this way.
Gov. What way?
Cel. I ſhall curſe thee fearefully,
If thou provok'ſt me further: and take heed, woman;
My curſes never miſſe.
Gov. Curſe him that ſent it.
Cel. Tell but his name——
Gov. You dare not curſe him.
Cel. Dare not?
By this faire light——
Gov. You are ſo full of paſſion——
Cel. Dare not be good? be honeſt? dare not curſe him?
Gov. I think you dare not: I beleeve ſo.
Cel. Speak him.
Gov. Up with your valour then, up with it bravely,
And take your full charge.
Cel. If I doe not, hang me;
Tell but his name.
Gov. 'Twas Prince Demetrius ſent it:
Now, now, give fire, kill him ith' eye now Lady.
Cel. Is he come home?
Gov. It ſeems ſo; but your curſe now.
Cel. You doe not lie, I hope.
Gov. You dare not curſe him.
Cel. Prethee do not abuſe me: is he come home indeed?
For I would now with all my heart beleeve thee.
Gov. Nay, you may chuſe: alas, I deale for ſtrangers,
That ſend ye ſcurvie muſty Gownes, ſtale Livories:
I have my tricks.
Cel. 'Tis a good gowne, a handſome one;
I did but jeſt; where is he?
Gov. He that ſent it——
Cel. How? he that ſent it? is't come to that againe?
Thou canſt not be ſo fooliſh: prethee ſpeak out,
I may miſtake thee.
Gov. I ſaid he that ſent it.
Cel. Curſe o' my life: why doſt thou vex me thus?
I know thou meanſt Demetrius, doſt thou not?
I charge thee ſpeak truth: if it be any other,
Thou knowſt the charge he gave thee, and the juſtice
His anger will inflict, if 'ere he know this,
As know he ſhall, he ſhall, thou ſpightfull woman,
Thou beaſtly woman; and thou ſhalt know too late too,
And feele too ſenſible, I am no ward,
No ſale ſtuffe for your money Merchants that ſent it?
Who dare ſend me, or how durſt thou, thou——
Gov. What you pleaſe:
For this is ever the reward of ſervice.

The

The Prince ſhall bring the next himſelfe.
Cel. 'Tis ſtrange
That you ſhould deale ſo peeviſhly: beſhrew ye,
You have put me in a heat.
Gov. I am ſure ye have kild me:
I ne're receiv'd ſuch language: I can but wait upon ye,
And be your drudge; keep a poore life to ſerve ye.
Cel. You know my nature is too eaſie, Governeſſe,
And you know now, I am ſorry too: how does he?
Gov. O God, my head.
Cel. Prethee be wel, and tell me,
Did he ſpeak of me, ſince he came? nay, ſee now,
If thou wilt leave this tyranny? good ſweet governeſſe.
Did he but name his Celia? look upon me,
Upon my faith I meant no harme: here, take this,
And buy thy ſelfe ſome trifles: did'a good wench?
Gov. He loves yee but too dearely.
Cel. That's my good Governeſſe.
Gov. There's more cloathes making for yee.
Cel. More cloathes?
Gov. More:
Richer and braver; I can tell yee that newes;
And twenty glorious things.
Cel. To what uſe ſirrah? (wretches
Gov. Ye are too good for our houſe now: we poore
Shall loſe the comfort of ye.
Cel. No, I hope not.
Gov. For ever loſe ye Lady.
Cel. Loſe me? wherefore?
I heare of no ſuch thing.
Gov. 'Tis ſure it muſt be ſo:
You muſt ſhine now at Court: ſuch preparation,
Such hurrie, and ſuch hanging roomes——
Cel. Toth' Court wench?
Was it toth' Court thou ſaidſt?
Gov. You'll finde it ſo.
Cel. Staie, ſtay, this cannot be.
Gov. I ſay it muſt be:
I hope to finde ye ſtill the ſame good Lady. (wench,
Cel. Toth' Court? this ſtumbles me: art ſure for me,
This preparation is?
Gov. She is peilous crafty:
I feare too honeſt for us all too. Am I ſure I live?
Cel. Toth' Court? this cannot down: what ſhould I do
Why ſhould he on a ſuddain change his mind thus, (there?
And not make me acquainted? ſure he loves me;
His vow was made againſt it, and mine with him:
At leaſt while this King liv'd: he will come hither,
And ſee me ere I goe?
Gov. Wou'd ſome wiſe woman
Had her in working: that I think he will not,
Becauſe he means with all joy there to meet ye.
Ye ſhall heare more within this houre?
Cel. A Courtier?
What may that meaning be? ſure he will ſee me
If he be come, he muſt: Hark ye good Governeſſe,
What age is the King of?
Gov. Hee's an old man, and full of buſineſſe.
Cel. I feare too full indeed: what Ladies are there?
I would be loath to want good company.
Gov. Delicate young Ladies, as you would deſire;
And when you are acquainted, the beſt company.
Cel. 'Tis very well: prethee goe in, let's talk more.
For though I feare a trick, Ile bravely try it.
Gov. I ſee he muſt be cunning,
Knoks this Doe downe. Exeunt.

Scene 3. Enter Lieutenant, & Leontius. Drum within.

Leo. You ſhal not have your wil, ſirrah, are ye running?
Have ye gotten a toy in your heeles? Is this a ſeaſon,
When honour pricks ye on, to prick your eares up,
After your whore, your Hobby-horſe?
Lieu. Why look ye now:
What a ſtrange man are you? would you have a man fight
At all houres all alike.
Leo. Doe but fight ſomething:
But halfe a blow, and put thy ſtomack to't:
Turne but thy face, and do but make mouthes at 'em.
Lieu. And have my teeth knockt out; I thank ye heartily,
Ye are my deare friend.
Leo. What a devill ailes thee?
Doſt long to be hang'd?
Lieu. Faith Sir, I make no ſuit for't:
But rather then I would live thus out of charity,
Continually in brawling——
Leo. Art thou not he?
I may be cozn'd——
Lieu. I ſhall be diſcover'd.
Leo. That in the midſt of thy moſt helliſh pains,
When thou wert crawling ſick, didſt aime at wonders,
When thou wert mad with paine?
Lieu. Ye have found the cauſe out;
I had ne're been mad to fight elſe: I confeſſe ſir,
The dayly torture of my ſide that vext me,
Made me as dayly careleſſe what became of me,
Till a kinde ſword there wounded me, and eas'd me;
'Twas nothing in my valour fought; I am well now,
And take ſome pleaſure in my life, methinks now,
It ſhewes as mad a thing to me to ſee you ſcuffle,
And kill one another fooliſhly for honour,
As 'twas to you, to ſee me play the cox-combe.
Leo. And wilt thou ne're fight more?
Lieu. Ith' minde I am in,
Leo. Nor never be ſick againe?
Lieu. I hope I ſhall not.
Leo. Prethee be ſick againe; prethee, I beſeech thee,
Be juſt ſo ſick againe.
Lieu. Ile juſt be hang'd firſt.
Leo. If all the Arts that are can make a Chollique,
Therefore look to't: or if impoſthumes, marke me,
As big as foot-bals——
Lieu. Deliver me.
Leo. Or ſtones of ten pound weight ith' kidneyes,
Through eaſe and ugly dyets may be gather'd;
Ile feed ye up my ſelfe ſir, Ile prepare ye,
You cannot fight, unleſſe the devill teare ye,
You ſhall not want provocations, Ile ſcratch ye,
Ile have thee have the tooth-ach, and the head-ach.
Lieu. Good Colonell, Ile doe any thing.
Leo. No, no, nothing—— (lowes,
Then will I have thee blowne with a paire of Smiths bel-
Becauſe ye ſhall be ſure to have a round gale with ye,
Fil'd full of oyle, & devill, and Aqua fortis,
And let theſe worke, theſe may provoke.
Lieu. Good Colonell.
Leo. A coward in ful bloud; prethee be plain with me,
Will roaſting doe thee any good?
Lieu. Nor baſting neither, ſir.
Leo. Marry that goes hard. Enter 1. Gent.
1 Gent. Where are you Colonell?
The Prince expects ye ſir; has hedg'd the enemy

Within a straight, where all the hopes and valours
Of all men living cannot force a passage,
He has 'em now.
Leu. I knew all this before sir,
I chalk'd him out his way: but do you see that thing there?
Lieu. Nay good sweet Colonell, Ile fight a little.
Leo. That thing?
1. Gent. What thing? I see the brave Lieutenant.
Leo. Rogue, what a name hast thou lost?
Lieu. You may helpe it?
Yet you may help't: Ile doe ye any courtesie;
I know you love a wench well. Enter 2 Gent.
Leo. Look upon him;
Does you look too?
2. Gent. What should I look on?
I come to tell yee, the Prince stayes your direction,
We have 'em now ith Coop, sir.
Leo. Let 'em rest there,
And chew upon their miseries: but look first——
Lieu. I cannot fight for all this.
Leo. Look on this fellow.
2 Gent. I know him; 'tis the valiant brave Lieutenant.
Leo. Canst thou heare this, and play the rogue? steal off
Behinde me quickly, neatly doe it, (quickly,
And rush into the thickest of the enemy,
And if thou kill'st but two.
Lieu. You may excuse me,
'Tis not my fault: I dare not fight.
Leo. Be rul'd yet.
Ile beat thee on; goe wink and fight: a plague upon your
2 Gent. What's all this matter? (sheeps heart.
1 Gent. Nay I cannot shew yee.
Leo. Here's twenty pound, goe but smell to 'em.
Lieu. Alas sir,
I have taken such a cold I can smell nothing.
Leo. I can smell a rascall, a ranke rascall:
Fye, how he stinks, stinkes like a tyred Jade.
2 Gent. What sir?
Leo. Why, that sir, doe not you smell him?
2. Gent. Smell him?
Lieu. I must endure.
Leo. Stinks like a dead dog, Carrion——
There's no such damnable smell under heaven,
As the faint sweat of a Coward: will ye fight yet?
Lie. Nay, now I defie ye, ye have spoke the worst ye can
Of me, and if every man should take what you say
To the heart.——
Leo. God a mercy,
God a mercy with all my heart; here I forgive thee;
And fight, or fight not, doe but goe along with us,
And keep my dog.
Lieu. I love a good dog naturally.
1 Gent. What's all this stir, Lieutenant?
Lieut. Nothing Sir,
But a slight matter of argument.
Leo. Pox take thee.
Sure I shall love this rogue, he's so pretty a Coward,
Come gentlemen, let's up now, and if fortune
Dare play the slut againe, Ile never more Saint her,
Come play fellow, come, prethee come up; come chicken,
I have a way shall fit yet: A tame knave.
Come, look upon us.
Lieu. Ile tell ye who does best boyes. Exeunt.

Scæne 4. Enter Antigonus and Menippus above.

Men. I saw her comming out,
Ant. Who waits upon her?
Men. Tymon, Charinthus, and some other gentlemen,
By me appointed.
Ant. Where's your wife?
Men. Shee's ready
To entertaine her here sir; and some Ladies
Fit for her lodgings.
Ant. How shews she in her trim now?
Men. Oh most divinely sweet!
Ant. Prethee speak softly.
How does she take her comming?
Men. She beares it bravely;
But what she thinks——For heaven sake sir preserve me——
If the Prince chance to finde this.
Ant. Peace ye old foole;
She thinks to meet him here.
Men. That's all the Project.
Ant. Was she hard to bring?
Men. No, she believ'd it quickly,
And quickly made her selfe fit, the Gowne a little,
And those new things she has not been acquainted with,
At least in this place, where she liv'd a prisoner,
Troubled and stirr'd her minde, But believe me sir,
She has worne as good, they sit so apted to her;
And she is so great a Mistris of disposure:
Here they come now: but take a full view of her.
Enter Celia, Tymon, Charinthus, and Gent.
How cheerefully she looks? how she salutes all?
And how she viewes the place? she is very yong sure:
That was an admirable smile, a catching one,
The very twang of Cupids bow sung to it:
She has two-edg'd eyes, they kill o' both sides.
Men. She makes a stand, as though she would speak.
Ant. Be still then.
Cel. Good Gentlemen, trouble your selves no further,
I had thought sure to have met a noble friend here.
Tym. Yee may meet many Lady.
Cel. Such as you are
I covet few or none, sir.
Char. Will you walk this way,
And take the sweets o'th' garden? coole and close, Lady.
Cel. Methinks this open aire's farre better, tend ye that way.
Pray where's the woman came along?
Char. What woman?
Cel. The woman of the house I lay at.
Tym. Woman?
Here was none came along sure.
Cel. Sure I am catcht then:
Pray where's the Prince?
Char. He will not be long from yee,
We are his humble servants.
Cel. I could laugh now,
To see how finely I am cozn'd: yet I feare not,
For sure I know a way to scape all dangers.
Tym. Madam, your lodgings lye this way.
Cel. My Lodgings?
For heaven sake sir, what office doe I beare here?
Ty. The great cõmander of all hearts { Enter Leucippe,
Cel. You have hit it. { and Ladies.
I thank your sweet-heart for it. Who are these now?
Char. Ladies that come to serve yee.
Cel. Well consider'd,
Are you my servants?
Lady. Servants to your pleasures.
Cel. I dare believe ye, but I dare not trust ye:
Catch'd with a trick? well, I must beare it patiently:

Methinks

Methinkes this Court's a neat place: all the people
Of ſuch refin'd a ſize——
Tym. This is no poore rogue.
Leu. Were it a Paradice to pleaſe your fancy,
And entertaine the ſweetneſſe you bring with ye;
Cel. Take breath;
You are fat, and many words may melt ye,
This is three Bawdes beaten into one; bleſſe me heaven,
What ſhall become of me? I am i'th' pitfall:
O' my conſcience, this is the old viper, and all theſe little ſones
Creep every night into her belly; do you heare plumpe ſer-vant
And you my little ſucking Ladies, you muſt teach me,
For I know you are excellent at carriage,
How to behave my ſelfe, for I am rude yet:
But you ſay the Prince will come?
Lady. Wil'fite to ſee you.
Cel. For look you if a great man, ſay the King now
Should come and viſit me?
Men. She names ye.
Ant. Peace foole.
Cel. And offer me a kindneſſe, ſuch a kindneſſe.
Leu. I, ſuch a kindneſſe.
Cel. True Lady ſuch a kindneſſe.
What ſhall that kindneſſe be now?
Leu. A witty Lady,
Learne little ones, learne.
Cel. Say it be all his favour.
Leu. And a ſweet ſaying 'tis.
Cel. And I grow peeviſh?
Leu. You muſt not be neglectfull.
Cel. There's the matter,
There's the maine doctrine now, and I may miſſe it.
Or a kind hanſome Gentleman?
Leu. You ſay well.
Cel. They'l count us baſely bred.
Leu. Not freely nartur'd.
Cel. I'le take thy counſell.
Leu. 'Tis an excellent woman.
Cel. I find a notable volume here, a learnd one;
Which way? for I would faine be in my chamber;
In truth ſweet Ladies, I grow weary; fie,
How hot the aire beats on me?
Lady. This way Madam?
Cel. Now by mine honour, I grow wondrous faint too.
Leu. Your fans ſweet Gentlewomen, your fans.
Cel. Since I am foold,
I'le make my ſelf ſome ſport, though I pay deare for't. Ex.
Men. You ſee now what a manner of woman ſhe is ſir.
Ant. Thou art an aſſe.
Men. Is this a fit love for the Prince?
Ant. A coxcombe:
Now by my crowne a deintie wench, a ſharpe wench,
And a matchleſſe ſpirit: how ſhe Jeer'd 'em?
How careleſſy ſhe ſcoff'd 'em? uſe her nobly;
I would I had not ſeen her: waite anon,
And then you ſhall have more to trade upon. Exeunt.

Scene 5. Enter Leontius, and the 2 Gentlemen.

Leo. We muſt keep a round, and a ſtrong watch to night,
The Prince will not charge the Enemy till the morning:
But for the trick I told ye for this raſcall,
This rogue, that health and ſtrong heart makes a coward.
1 Gent. I, if it take.
Leo. Ne're feare it, the Prince has it,
And if he let it fall, I muſt not know it;
He will ſuſpect me preſently: but you two
May helpe the plough.
2 Gent. That he is ſicke again.
Leo. Extreamely ſicke: his diſeaſe growne incurable,
Never yet found, nor touch'd at. Ent. Lieutenant.
2 Gent. Well, we have it
And here he comes.
Leo. The Prince has been upon him,
What a flatten face he has now? it takes beleeve it;
How like an aſſe he lookes?
Lieu. I feele no great paine,
At leaſt, I thinke I do not; yet I feele ſenſibly
I grow extreamely faint: how cold I ſweat now?
Leo. So, ſo, ſo.
Lieu. And now 'tis ev'n too true, I feele a pricking,
A pricking, a ſtrange pricking: how it tingles?
And as it were a ſtitch too: the Prince told me,
And every one cri'd out I was a dead man;
I had thought I had been as well——
Leo. Upon him now boyes,
And do it moſt demurely.
1 Gent. How now Lieutenant?
Lieu. I thanke ye Gentlemen.
1 Gent 'Life, how lookes this man?
How doſt thou good Lieutenant?
2 Gent. I ever told ye
This man was never cur'd, I ſee it too plaine now;
How do you feele your ſelfe? you looke not perfect,
How dull his eye hangs?
1 Gent. That may be diſcontent.
2 Gent. Beleeve me friend, I would not ſuffer now
The tith of thoſe paines this man feeles; marke his fore-head
What a cloud of cold dew hangs upon't?
Lieu. I have it,
Againe I have it; how it growes upon me?
A miſerable man I am.
Leo. Ha, ha, ha,
A miſerable man thou ſhalt be,
This is the tameſt trout I ever tick ell'd.
1 Phi. This way he went. Enter 2 Phi.
2 Phi. Pray heaven we find him living,
He's a brave fellow, 'tis pitty he ſhould periſh thus.
1 Phi. A ſtrong hearted man, & of a notable ſufferance.
Lieu. Oh, ioh.
1 Gent. How now? how is it man?
Lieu. Oh Gentlemen,
Never ſo full of paine.
2 Gent. Did I not tell ye?
Lieu. Never ſo full of paine Gentlemen.
1 Phi. He is here;
How do you ſir?
2 Phi. Be of good comfort Souldier,
The Prince has ſent us to you.
Lieu. Do you thinke I may live?
2 Phi. He alters hourely, ſtrangely.
1 Phi. Yes, you may live: but——
Leo. Finely butted Doctor.
1 Gent. Do not diſcourage him.
1 Phi. He muſt be told truth,
'Tis now too late to trifle. Enter Dem. and Gent.
2 Gent. Here the Prince comes.
Dem. How now Gentlemen?
2 Gent. Bewailing ſir, a Souldier,
And one I thinke, your Grace will grieve to part with,
But every living thing——
Dem. 'Tis true, muſt periſh,

Our

Our lives are but our matches to our graves,
How doſt thou now Lieutenant?
Lieu. Faith 'tis true ſir,
We are but ſpans, and candles ends.
Leo. He's finely mortified.
Dem. Thou art heart whole yet; I ſee he alters ſtrangely,
And that a pace too; I ſaw it this morning in him,
When he poore man, I dare ſweare——
Lieu. No beleev't ſir,
I never felt it.
Dem. Heres lies the paine now: how he is ſwel'd?
1 Phi. The Impoſtume
Fed with a new malignant humour now,
Will grow to ſuch a bigneſſe, 'tis incredible,
The compaſſe of a buſhell will not hold it,
And with ſuch a hell of torture it will riſe too.——
Dem. Can you endure me touch it?
Lieu. Oh, I beſeech you ſir:
I feele you ſenſibly ere you come neare me.
Dem. He's finely wrought, he muſt be cut, no cure elſe,
And ſuddenlie, you ſee how faſt he blowes out.
Lieu. Good Maſter Doctor, let me be beholding to you,
I feele I cannot laſt.
2 Phi. For what Lieutenant?
Lieu. But ev'n for halfe a dozen Cans of good wine,
That I may drinke my will out: I faint hideouſly. (men
De. Fetch him ſome wine, and ſince he muſt go gentle-
Why let him take his journey merrily. { Enter Servant
Lieu. That's ev'n the neareſt way. { with wine.
Leo. I could laugh dead now.
Dem. Here, off with that.
Lieu. Theſe two I give your Grace,
A poore remembrance of a dying man ſir,
And I beſeech you weare 'em out.
Dem. I will Souldier,
Theſe are fine legacies.
Lieu. Among the Gentlemen,
Even all I have left; I am a poore man, naked,
Yet ſomething for remembrance: foure a peece Gentle-
And ſo my body where you pleaſe. (men,
Leo. It will worke.
Lieu. I make your Grace my executor, and I beſeech ye
See my poore will fulfill'd: ſure I ſhall walke elſe.
Dem. As full as they can be fill'd, here's my hand Soul-
1 Gent. The wine will tickle him. (dier.
Lieu. I would heare a drum beat,
But to ſee how I could endure it.
Dem. Beat a drum there. Drum within.
Lieu. Oh heavenly muſick, I would heare one ſing to't,
I am very full of paine.
Dem. Sing? 'tis impoſible.
Lieu. Why, then I would drinke a drum full:
Where lies the Enemie?
2 Gent. Why, here cloſe by.
Leo. Now he begins to muſter.
Lieu. And dare ye fight?
Dare ye fight Gentlemen?
1 Phi. You muſt not cut him:
He's gone then in a moment; all the hope left, is
To worke his weakeneſſe into ſuddaine anger,
And make him raiſe his paſſion above his paine,
And ſo diſpoſe him on the enemie;
His body then, being ſtir'd with violence,
Will purge it ſelfe and breake the ſore.
Dem. 'Tis true ſir.
1 Phi. And then my life for his.
Lieu. I will not dye thus.
Dem. But he is too weake to doe ——
Lieu. Dye like a dog?
2 Phi. I, he's weake, but yet he's heart whole.
Lieu. Hem.
Dem. An excellent ſigne.
Lieu. Hem.
Dem. Stronger ſtill, and better.
Lieu. Hem, hem; ran, tan, tan, tan, tan. Exit.
1 Phi. Now he's i'th' way on't.
De. Well go thy waies, thou wilt do ſomething certain.
Leo. And ſome brave thing, or let mine eares be cut off.
He's finely wrought.
Dem. Let's after him.
Leo. I pray Sir;
But how this rogue, when this cloud's melted in him,
And all diſcover'd. ——
Dem. That's for an after mirth, away, away, away. Ex.

Scene 6. Enter Seleucus, Lyſimachus, Ptolomy, Souldiers.

Sel. Let no man feare to dye: we love to ſleep all,
And death is but the ſounder ſleep; all ages,
And all houres call us; 'tis ſo common, eaſie,
That little children tread thoſe paths before us;
We are not ſicke, nor our ſoules preſt with ſorrows,
Nor go we out like tedious tales, forgotten;
High, high we come, and hearty to our funerals,
And as the Sun that ſets, in blood let's fall.
Liſ. 'Tis true, they have us faſt, we cannot ſcape 'em,
Nor keeps the brow of fortune one ſmile for us,
Diſhonourable ends we can ſcape though,
And (worſe then thoſe, captivities) we can die,
And dying nobly, though we leave behind us
Theſe clods of fleſh, that are too maſſie burthens,
Our living ſoules flie crown'd with living conqueſts.
Ptol. They have begun, fight bravely, and fall bravely;
And may that man that ſeekes to ſave his life now
By price, or promiſe, or by feare fals from us, { Enter a
Never again be bleſt with name of Souldier. { Souldier
Sel. How now? who charged firſt? I ſeek a brave hand
To ſet me off in death.
Soul. We are not charg'd ſir,
The Prince lies ſtill.
Sel. How comes this Larum up then?
Sol. There is one deſperate fellow, with the devill in him
(He never durſt do this elſe) has broke into us,
And here he bangs ye two or three before him,
There five or ſixe; ventures upon whole companies.
Ptol. And is not ſeconded?
Soul. Not a man followes.
Sel. Nor cut a peeces?
Soul. Their wonder yet has ſtaid 'em.
Sel. Let's in, and ſee this miracle?
Ptol. I admire it. Ex.

Enter Leontius, and Gentlemen.

Leon. Fetch him off, fetch him off, I am ſure he's clouted;
Did I not tell you how 't would take?
1 Gent. 'Tis admirable.
Enter Lieutenant with colours in his hand, purſuing 3 or 4 Souldiers.
Lieu. Follow that blow, my friend, there's at your cox-
I fight to ſave me from the Surgeons miſeries. (combs,
Leo. How the knave curries 'em?

Lieu.

Lieu. You cannot rogues,
Till you have my diseases, flie my furie,
Ye bread and butter rogues, do ye run from me?
And my side would give me leave, I would so hunt ye,
Ye porredge gutted slaves, ye veale-broth boobies.
Enter Demetrius, and Phisitians, and Gentlemen.
Leo. Enough, enough Lieutenant, thou hast done bravely.
Dem. Mirrour of man.
Lieu. There's a flag for ye sir,
I tooke it out o'th' shop, and never paid for't,
I'le to 'em againe, I am not come to the text yet.
Dem. No more my souldier: bethrew my heart he is
Leo. Hang him, hee'l lick all those whole. {hurt sore.
1 Phi. Now will we take him,
And cure him in a trice.
Dem. Be carefull of him.
Lieu. Let me live but two yeares,
And doe what ye will with me;
I never had but two houres yet of happinesse;
Pray ye give me nothing to provoke my valour,
For I am ev'n as weary of this fighting——
2 Phi. Ye shall have nothing; come to the Princes Tent
And there the Surgeons presently shall search ye,
Then to your rest.
Lieu. A little handsome litter
To lay me in, and I shall sleepe.
Leo. Looke to him.
Dem. I do beleeve a horse begot this fellow,
He never knew his strength yet; they are our owne.
Leo. I thinke so, I am cozen'd else; I would but see now
A way to fetch these off, and save their honours.
Dem. Only their lives.
Leo. Pray ye take no way of peace now,
Unlesse it be with infinite advantage.
Dem. I shall be rul'd;
Let the battels now move forward, { Ent. Trumpet
Our selfe will give the signall: { and Herald.
Now Herald, what's your message?
Her. From my Masters
This honourable courtesie, a Parley
For halfe an houre, no more sir.
Dem. Let 'em come on,
They have my princely word.
Enter Seleucus, Lysimachus, Ptolomy, attendants, Souldiers,
Her. They are here to attend ye.
Dem. Now Princes, your demands?
Sel. Peace, if it may bee
Without the too much tainture of our honour:
Peace, and wee'l buy it too.
Dem. At what price?
Ly. Tribute.
Ptol. At all the charge of this war.
Leo. That will not do.
Sel. Leontius, you and I have serv'd together,
And run through many a fortune with our swords,
Brothers in wounds, and health; one meat has fed us,
One tent a thousand times from cold night cover'd us:
Our loves have been but one; and had we died then,
One monument had held our names, and actions:
Why do you set upon your friends such prizes?
And sacrifice to giddy chance such Trophies?
Have we forgot to dye? or are our vertues
Lesse in afflictions constant, than our fortunes?
Ye are deceiv'd old souldier.
Leo. I know your worths,
And thus low bow in reverence to your vertues:
Were these my wars, or lead my power in chiefe here,
I knew then how to meet your memories:
They are my Kings imployments; this man fights now,
To whom I owe all dutie, faith, and service;
This man that fled before ye; call backe that,
That bloudy day againe, call that disgrace home,
And then an easie peace, may sheath our swords up.
I am not greedy of your lives and fortunes,
Nor do I gape ungratefully to swallow ye,
Honour the spur of all illustrious natures,
That made you famous Souldiers, and next Kings,
And not ambitious envy strikes me forward,
Will ye unarme, and yeild your selves his prisoners?
Sel. We never knew what that sound meant: no gives
Shall ever bind this body, but embraces;
Nor weight of sorrow here, till earth fall on me.
Leo. Expect our charge then.
Lys. 'Tis the noblest courtesie of both,
And so we leave the hand of heaven to bless us.
Dem. Stay, have you any hope?
Cel We have none left us,
But that one comfort of our deaths together;
Give us but room to fight.
Leo. Win it, and weare it.
Ptol. Call from the hils those companies hang ore us
Like bursting clouds; and then breake in, and take us.
Dem. Find such a Souldier will forsake advantage,
And wee'l draw off, to shew I dare be noble,
And hang a light out to ye in this darkenesse,
The light of peace; give up those Cities, forts,
And all those frontire Countries to our uses.
Sel. Is this the peace? traitours to those that feed us,
Our Gods and people? give our Countries from us?
Lis. Begin the knell, it sounds a great deale sweeter.
Ptol. Let loose your servant death.
Sel. Fall fate upon us,
Our memories shall never stinke behind us.
Dem. Seleucus, great Seleucus,
Sol. The Prince cals sir.
Dem. Thou stocke of nobleness, and curtesie,
Thou father of the war ——
Leo. What meanes the Prince now?
Dem. Give me my Standard here.
Lys. His angers melted.
Dem. You Gentlemen that were his prisoners,
And felt the bounty of that noble nature,
Lay all your hands, and beare these Colours to him,
The Standard of the Kingdome; take it souldier.
Ptol. What will this meane?
Dem. Thou hast won it, beare it off,
And draw thy men home whilst we waite upon thee.
Sel. You shall have all our countries.
Lys. Ptol. All by heaven sir.
Dem. I will not have a stone, a bush, a bramble,
No, in the way of curtesie, I'le start ye;
Draw off, and make a lane through all the Armie,
That these that have subdu'd us, may march through us.
Sel. Sir, do not make me surfet with such goodnesse,
I'le beare your Srandard for ye; follow ye.
Dem. I sweare it shall be so, march through me fairely,
And thine be this daies honour, great Seleucus.
Ptol. Mirrour of noble minds.
Dem. Nay then ye hate me.
Leo. I cannot speake now: Ex with Drums, & Shouts.
Well, go thy wayes, at a sure peece of bravery
Thou art the best, these men are won by th' neckes now:

I'le

I'le send a post away.

Actus Quartus. Scæna prima.

Enter Antigonus, and Menippus.

Ant. NO aptnesse in her?
Men. Not an immodest motion,
And yet when she is as free, and when she is courted,
Makes as wild witty answers.
Ant. This more fires me,
I must not have her thus.
Men. We cannot alter her.
Ant. Have ye put the youths upon her?
Men. All that know any thing,
And have been studied how to catch a beauty,
But like so many whelps about an Elephant---
The Prince is coming home sir.
Ant. I heare that too,
But that's no matter; am I alter'd well;
Men. Not to be knowne I thinke sir.
Ant. I must see her. Ent. 2 Gent. or Lords.
1 Gent. I offered all I had, all I could thinke of,
I tri'd her through all the points o'th' compasse, I thinke.
2 Gent. She studies to undo the Court, to plant here
The enemy to our age, chastitie;
She is the first, that ere banked a close Arbour,
And the sweet contents within: She hates curl'd heads too,
And setting up of beards she sweares, is Idolatrie.
1 Gent. I never knew so faire a face so froze;
Yet she would make one thinke---
2 Gent. True by her carriage;
For she's as wanton as a kid toth' out side,
As full of mocks and taunts: I kiss'd her hand too,
Walkt with her halfe an houre.
1 Gent. She heard me sing,
And sung her selfe too; she sings admirably;
But still, when any hope was, as 'tis her trick
To minister enough of those, then presently
With some new flam or other, nothing to th' matter,
And such a frowne, as would sinke all before her,
She takes her chamber; come we shal not be the last fools.
2 Gent. Not by a hundred I hope; 'tis a strange wench.
Ant. This screwes me up still higher. Enter Celia,
Men. Here she comes sir. and Ladies behind her
Ant. Then be you gone: and take the women with ye,
And lay those Jewels in her way.
Cel. If I stay longer
I shall number as many lovers as Lais did;
How they flocke after me? upon my conscience,
I have had a dozen horses given me this morning,
I'le ev'n set up a troop, and turne she-souldier.
A good discreet wench now, that were not hidebound
Might raise a fine estate here, and suddenly:
For these warme things will give their soules--- I can go Without a world of offerings to my excellence: (no where
I am a Queene, a Goddesse, I know not what---
And no constellation in all heaven, but I outshine it;
And they have found out now I have no eyes
Of mortall lights, but certaine influences,
Strange vertuous lightnings, humane nature starts at,
And I can kill my twenty in a morning,
With as much ease now---
Ha? what are these? new projects?
Where are my honourable Ladies? are you out too?
Nay then I must buy the stocke, send me good carding:
I hope the Princes hand, be not in this sport,
I have not seen him yet, cannot heare from him,
And that, that troubles me: all these were recreations
Had I but his sweet companie to laugh with me:
What fellowes that? another apparition?
This is the lovingst age: I should know that face,
Sure I have seen't before, not long since neither.
Ant. She sees me now: O heaven, a most rare creature!
Cel. Yes, 'tis the same: I will take no notice of ye,
But if I do not fit ye, let me frie for't;
Is all this Cackling for your eg? they are faire ones,
Excellent rich no doubt to; and may stumble
A good staid mind, but I can go thus by 'em;
My honest friend; do you set off these Jewels;
Ant. Set 'em off, Lady?
Cel. I meane, sell 'em here sir?
Ant. She's very quicke; for sale they are not meant sure.
Cel. For sanctitie I thinke much lesse: good even Sir.
Ant. Nay, noble Lady stay: 'tis you must weare 'em:
Never looke strange, they are worthy your best beauty.
Cel. Did ye speake to me?
Ant. To you or to none living:
To you they are sent; to you they are sacrificed.
Cel. I'le never looke a horse i'th' mouth that's given:
I thanke ye sir: I'le send one to reward ye.
Ant. Do you never aske who sent 'em?
Cel. Never I:
Nor never care, if it be an honest end,
That end's the full reward, and thankes but slubbers it;
If it be ill, I will not urge the acquaintance.
Ant. This has a soule indeed: pray let me tell ye.
Cel. I care not if ye do, so you do it handsomly,
And not stand picking of your words,
Ant. The King sent 'em.
Cel. Away, away, thou art some foolish fellow,
And now I think thou hast stole 'em too; the king sent 'em?
Alas good man, wouldst thou make me beleeve
He has nothing to do with things of these worths,
But wantonly to fling 'em? he's an old man,
A good old man, they say too: I dare sweare
Full many a yeare ago, he left these gambols:
Here, take your trinkets.
Ant. Sure I do not lye Lady.
Cel. I know thou lyest extreamely, damnably.
Thou hast a lying face.
Ant. I was never thus ratled.
Cel. But say I should beleeve: why are these sent me?
And why art thou the Messenger? who art thou?
Ant. Lady, looke on 'em wisely, and then consider
Who can send such as these, but a King only?
And, to what beautie can they be oblations,
But only yours? For me that am the carrier,
'Tis only fit you know I am his servant,
And have fulfil'd his will.
Cel. You are short and pithy;
What must my beauty do for these?
Ant. Sweet Lady,
You cannot be so hard of understanding,
When a Kings favour shines upon ye gloriously,
And speakes his love in these,---
Cel. O then love's the matter;
Sir-reverence love: now I begin to feele ye:
And I should be the Kings whore, a brave title.
And go as glorious as the Sun, ô brave still:

The

The chiefe Commandreſſe of his Concubines,
Hurried from place to place to meet his pleaſures.
Ant. A devilliſh ſubtill wench, but a rare ſpirit.
Cel. And when the good old ſponge had ſuckt my youth
And left ſome of his royall aches in my bones: (dry,
When time ſhall tell me I have plough'd my life up,
And caſt long furrowes in my face to ſinke me.
Ant. You muſt not thinke ſo Lady.
Cel. Then can theſe ſir,
Theſe precious things, the price of youth and beauty;
This ſhop here of ſin-offerings ſet me off againe?
Can it reſtore me chaſte, young innocent?
Purge me to what I was? adde to my memorie
An honeſt and a noble fame? The Kings device;
The ſin's as univerſall as the Sun is,
And lights an everlaſting torch to ſhame me.
Ant. Doe you hold ſo ſleight account of a great Kings
That all knees bow to purchaſe? (favour,
Cel. Prethee peace:
If thou knewſt how ill-favouredly thy tale becomes thee,
And what ill root it takes----
Ant. You will be wiſer.
Cel. Could the King find no ſhape to ſhift his pander
But reverend age? and one ſo like himſelfe too? (into,
Ant. She has found me out.
Cel. Cozen the world with gravitie?
Prethee reſolve me one thing, do's the King love thee?
Ant. I thinke he doe's.
Cel. It ſeemes ſo by thy office:
He loves thy uſe, and when thats ended, hates thee:
Thou ſeemeſt to me a ſouldier.
Ant. Yes I am one.
Cel. And haſt fought for thy Country?
Ant. Many a time.
Cel. May be, commanded too?
Ant. I have done, Lady.
Cel. O wretched man, below the ſtate of pitie!
Canſt thou forget, thou wert begot in honour?
A free companion for a King? a ſouldier?
Whoſe nobleneſſe dare feele no want, but enemies?
Canſt thou forget this, and decline ſo wretchedly,
To eat the bread of bawdrie, of baſe bawdrie?
Feed on the ſcum of ſin? fling thy ſword from thee?
Diſhonour to the noble name that nurſed thee?
Goe, beg diſeaſes: let them be thy Armors,
Thy fights, the flames of luſt, and their foule iſſues.
Ant. Why then I am a King, and mine owne ſpeaker.
Cel. And I as free as you, mine owne diſpoſer;
There take your jewels; let them give them luſtres
That have darke lives and ſoules; weare 'em your ſelfe ſir,
You'l ſeeme a Devill elſe.
Ant. I command ye ſtay.
Cel. Be juſt, I am commanded.
Ant. I will not wrong ye.
Cel. Then thus low falls my duty.
Ant. Can ye love me?
Say I, and all I have.
Cel. I cannot love ye;
Without the breach of faith I cannot heare ye;
Ye hang upon my love, like froſts on Lillies:
I can dye, but I cannot love: you are anſwer'd. Exit.
Ant. I muſt find apter meanes, I love her truly. Exit.

Scæn. 2. Ent. Demetr. Leon. Lieut. Gent. Sold. & Hoſt.

Dem. Hether doe you ſay ſhe is come?
Hoſt. Yes ſir, I am ſure on't:
For whilſt I waited on ye, putting my wife in truſt,
I know not by what meanes, but the King found her,
And hether ſhe was brought: how, or to what end.
Dem. My father found her?
Hoſt. So my wife informes me.
Dem. Leontius, pray draw off the ſouldiers,
I would a while be private.
Leon. Fall off Gentlemen,
The Prince would be alone. Ex. Leo. & Sol.
Dem. Is he ſo cunning?
There is ſome tricke in this, and you muſt know it,
And be an agent too: which if it prove ſo ----
Hoſt. Pull me to pieces ſir?
Dem. My father found her?
My father brought her hither? went ſhe willingly?
Hoſt. My wife ſayes full of doubts.
Dem. I cannot blame her
No more: there's no truſt, no faith in mankinde.

Enter Antigonus, Menippus, Leontius, & Soldiers.

Ant. Keep her up cloſe, he muſt not come to ſee her:
You are welcome nobly now, welcome home gentlemen;
You have done a courteous ſervice on the Enemie;
Has tyed his faith for ever; you ſhall find it;
Ye are not now in's debt Son: ſtill your ſad looks:
Leontius, what's the matter?
Leo. Truth ſir, I know not,
We have been merry ſince we went.
Leon. I feele it.
Ant. Come, what's the matter now? do you want mo-
Sure he has heard o'th' wench. (ney?
Dem. Is that a want ſir?
I would faine ſpeake to your Grace.
Ant. You may doe freely.
Dem. And not deſerve your anger?
Ant. That ye may too. (ſooner,
Dem. There was a gentlewoman, and ſomtimes my pri-
Which I thought well of ſir: your Grace conceives me.
Ant. I doe indeed, and with much grief conceive ye;
With full as much griefe as your mother bare me:
There was ſuch a woman: would I might as well ſay,
There was no ſuch Demetrius.
Dem. She was vertuous,
And therefore not unfit my youth to love her:
She was as faire ----
Ant. Her beauty I'le proclaime too,
To be as rich as ever raigned in woman;
But how ſhe made that good, the Devill knowes.
Dem. She was ---- O heaven!
Ant. The hell to all thy glories,
Swallowed thy youth, made ſhipwrack of thine honor:
She was a devill.
Dem. Ye are my father ſir.
Ant. And ſince ye take a pride to ſhew your follies,
I'le muſter 'em, and all the world ſhall view 'em.
Leo. What heate is this? the Kings eyes ſpeak his anger?
Ant. Thou haſt abus'd thy youth, drawn to thy fellow-
In ſtead of arts and armes, a womans kiſſes, (ſhip
The ſubtilties, and ſoft beates of a harlot.
Dem. Good ſir, miſtake her not.
Ant. A Witch, a Sorcerer:
I tell thee but the truth; and heare Demetrius,
Which has ſo dealt upon thy blood with charmes,
Devilliſh and darke; ſo lockt up all thy vertues;

So pluckt thee backe from what thou ſprungſt from, glo-
In heaven, that any tongue but his durſt ſay this; (rious
That any heart durſt harbor it: Dread Father,
If for the innocent the gods allow us
To bend our knees ———
Ant. Away, thou art bewitched ſtill;
Though ſhe be dead, her power ſtill lives upon thee.
Dem. Dead? O ſacred ſir: dead did you ſay?
Ant. She is dead foole.
Dem. It is not poſſible: be not ſo angry,
Say ſhe is falne under your ſad diſpleaſure,
Or any thing but dead, ſay ſhe is baniſhed,
Invent a crime, and doe beleeve it ſir.
Ant. Dead by the Law: we found her hell, and her,
I meane her charmes and ſpels, for which ſhe periſh'd;
And ſhe confeſt ſhe drew thee to thy ruine,
And purpos'd it, purpos'd my Empires overthrow.
Dem. But is ſhe dead? was there no pity ſir?
If her youth err'd, was there no mercy ſhewne her?
Did ye looke on her face, when ye condemn'd her?
Ant. I look'd into her heart, and there ſhe was hideous.
Dem. Can ſhe be dead? can vertue fall untimely?
Ant. She is dead, deſervingly ſhe died.
Dem. I have done then.
O matchleſſe ſweetnes, whether art thou vaniſhed?
O thou faire ſoule of all thy ſex, what Paradiſe
Haſt thou inrich'd and bleſt? I am your ſonne ſir,
And to all you ſhall command ſtand moſt obedient,
Only a little time I muſt intreat you
To ſtudy to forget her; 'twill not be long ſir,
Nor I long after it: art thou dead Celia,
Dead my poor wench? my joy, pluckt green with violence:
O faire ſweet floure, farwell: Come, thou deſtroyer,
Sorrow, thou melter of the ſoule, dwell with me;
Dwell with me ſolitarie thoughts, teares, cryings,
Nothing that loves the day, love me, or ſeeke me,
Nothing that loves his owne life haunt about me:
And Love, I charge thee, never charme mine eies more,
Nor ne're betray a beauty to my curſes:
For I ſhall curſe all now, hate all, forſweare all,
And all the brood of fruitfull nature vex at,
For ſhe is gon that was all, and I nothing —— Ex. & Gen.
Ant. This opinion muſt be maintained.
Men. It ſhall be ſir.
Ant. Let him goe: I can at mine owne pleaſure
Draw him to'th' right againe: wait you inſtructions,
And ſee the ſouldier paid, Leontius:
Once more ye are welcome home all.
All. Health to your Majeſtie. — Exit Antig. &c.
Leo. Thou wentſt along the journy, how canſt thou tell?
Hoſt. I did, but I am ſure 'tis ſo: had I ſtaid behind,
I thinke this had not proved.
Leo. A wench the reaſon?
Lev. Who's that talks of a wench there?
Leo. All this diſcontent
About a wench.
Lieu. Where is this wench, good Colonell?
Leo. Prethee hold thy peace: who cals thee to counſell?
Lieu. Why, if there be a wench ——
Lev. 'Tis fit thou know her: Enter 2 Gen.
That I'le ſay for thee, and as fit thou art for her,
Let her be mewed or ſtopt: how is it Gentlemen?
1. G. Hee's wondrous diſcontent, hee'l ſpeak to no man.
2. G. Has taken his chamber cloſe, admits no entrance;
Teares in his eyes, and cryings out.
Hoſt. 'Tis ſo ſir,
And now I wiſh my ſelfe half hang'd ere I went this jour-
Leo. What is this woman? (ney,
Lieu. I.
Hoſt. I cannot tell ye,
But hanſome as heaven.
Lieu. She is not ſo high I hope ſir.
Leo. Where is ſhe?
Lieu. I, that would be knowne.
Leo. Why ſirrah.
Hoſt. I cannot ſhow ye neither;
The King has now diſpos'd of her.
Leo. There lyes the matter:
Will he admit none to come to comfort him?
1. Gen. Not any neare, nor let 'em knock their hearts out,
Will never ſpeake.
Lieu. 'Tis the beſt way if he have her;
For look you, a man would be loath to be diſturb'd in's pa- (ſtime;
'Tis every good mans caſe.
Leo. 'Tis all thy living,
We muſt not ſuffer this, we dare not ſuffer it:
For when theſe tender ſoules meet deep afflictions,
They are not ſtrong enough to ſtruggle with 'em,
But drop away as ſnow does, from a mountaine,
And in the torrent of their owne ſighs ſinke themſelves:
I will, and muſt ſpeake to him.
Lieu. So muſt I too:
He promiſed me a charge.
Leo. Of what? of children
Upon my conſcience, thou haſt a double companie,
And all of thine owne begetting alreadie.
Lieu. Thats all one,
I'le raiſe 'em to a Regiment, and there command 'em,
When they turne diſobedient, unbeget 'em:
Knock 'em o'th' head, and put in new.
Leo. A rare way;
But for all this, thou art not valiant enough
To dare to ſee the Prince now?
Lieu. Do ye thinke he's angry?
1 Gent. Extreamely vext.
2 Gen. to the endangering of any man comes neare him.
1 Gent. Yet, if thou couldſt but win him out,
VVhat ere thy ſuite were.
Beleeve it granted preſently.
Leo. Yet thou muſt thinke though,
That in the doing he may breake upon ye,
And ———
Lieu. If he do not kill me.
Leo. There's the queſtion.
Lieu. For halfe a dozen hurts?
Leo. Art thou ſo valiant?
Lieu. Not abſolutely ſo neither: no it cannot be,
I want my impoſtumes, and my things about me,
Yet I'le make danger, Collonel.
Leo. 'Twill be rare ſport,
How ere it take; give me thy hand; if thou doſt this,
I'le raiſe thee up a horſe troope, take my word for't.
Lieu. What may be done by humane man?
Leo. Lets goe then.
1. Gen. Away before the coole: he wil revenge els. Ex.

Scæne 3. Enter Antigonus, Menippus and Leucippe.

Ant. Will ſhe not yeeld?
Leu. For all we can urge to her;
I ſwore I would marry her, ſhe laugh'd extremely,
And then ſhe rail'd like thunder.

Ant.

Ant. Call in the Magitian. Enter Mag. with a bowle.
I muſt, and will obtaine her, I am aſhes elſe.
Mag. Are all the Philters in? charmes, powders, roots?
They are all in: and now I onely ſtay
The invocation of ſome helping ſpirits.
Ant. To your worke then, and diſpatch.
Mag. Sit ſtill, and feare not.
Len. I ſhall ne're indure theſe fights.
Ant. Away with the woman: goe wait without.
Len. When the Devils gone pray call me. Exit.
Ant. Be ſure you make it powerfull enough.
Mag. Pray doubt not. ——— He Conjures.

A Song.

Riſe from the ſhades below,
All you that prove
The helpes of looſe Love;
Riſe and beſtow
Upon this Cup, what ever may compell
By powerfull Charme, and un-reſiſted Spell.
A heart un-worn'd to melt in Loves deſires,
Diſtill into this Liquor all your fires;
Heats, longings, teares,
But keepe back frozen feares,
That ſhe may know, that has all power defied,
Art is a power that will not be denied.

The Anſwer.

I Obey, I obey,
And am come to view d've day
Brought along, all may compell,
All the earth has, and one hell;
Here's a little little Flower,
This will make her ſweat an houre,
Then unto ſuch flames ariſe,
A thouſand joyes will not ſuffice.
Here's the powder of the Moone
With which ſhe caught Endymion,
The powerfull teares that Venus eyed,
When the Boy Adonis dyed.
Here's Medeas Charme, with which
Jaſons heart ſhe did bewitch,
Omphale this Spell put in
When ſhe made the Libian ſpin.
This laſt rare plucke from Lethe flood,
Purges all pure thoughts, and good.
Theſe I ſtir thus, round, round, round,
Whilſt our light feet beat the ground.

Mag. Now ſir 'tis full, and whoſoever drinkes this
Shall violently doat upon your perſon,
And never ſleepe nor eate unſatisfied
So many houres 'twill worke, and worke with violence,
And thoſe expired 'tis done. You have my art ſir.

Enter Leucippe.

Ant. See him rewarded liberally. —Leucippe.
Here, take this bowle, and when ſhe calls for wine next —
Len. Be ſure you give her this, and ſee her drinke it;
Delay no time when ſhe calls next.
Len. I ſhall ſir.
Ant. Let none elſe touch it on your life.
Len. I am charged ſir.
Ant. Now if ſhe have an antidote are let her ſcape me.
Exeunt.

Enter Leontius, Lieutenant, Gent.

1 Gent. There's the door Lieutenant, if you dare do any
Leo. Here's no man waites. (thing.
1 Gent. H'as given a charge that none ſhall,
Nor none ſhall come within the hearing of him:
Dare ye goe forward?
Lieut. Let me put on my skull firſt.
My head's almoſt beaten into th'pap of an Apple.
Leo. Are there no Guns i'th' doore?
The rogue will doe it,
And yet I know he has no ſtomack to't.
Lieut. What loope-holes are there when I knock for
For thoſe may pepper me? I can perceeive none. (ſtones,
Leo. How he viewes the Fortification.
Lieut. Farewell Gentlemen,
If I be kill'd ——
Leo. Wee'le ſee thee buried bravely. (ſoftly.
Lieut. Away: how ſhould I know that then? Ile knock
Pray heaven he ſpeak in a low voice now to comfort me:
I feele I have no heart to't: —Is't well, Gentlemen.
Colonel, my Troope ———
Leo. A little louder.
Lieut. Stay, ſtay;
Here is a window, I will ſee, ſtand wide.
Leo. By ——— he's charging of a Gun:
There's no ſuch matter.
Lieut. There's no body in this roome.
O 'twas a fire-ſhovell:
Now ile knock lowder; if he ſay who's there,
As ſure he has ſo much manners, then will I anſwer him
So finely & demurely: my Troop Colonel — (knock louder,
1 Gent. Knock louder foole, he heares not.
Lieut. You foole, doe you.
Doe and ye dare now.
1 Gent. I doe not undertake it. (matters.
Lieut. Then hold your peace, & medle with your own
Leo. Now he will knock. Knocks louder.
Lieut. Sit, ſir? will't pleaſe you heare ſir?
Your Grace: Ile looke againe: what's that?
Leo. He's there now!
Lord! How he ſtares! I ne're yet ſaw him thus alter'd;
Stand now, and take the Troope.
Lieut. Would I were in't,
And a good horſe under me: I muſt knock againe.
The devil's at my fingers ends: he comes now.
Now Colonel, if I live —
Leo. The Troop's thine own Boy. Enter Dem. a piſtol.
Dem. What deſperate foole, ambitious of his ruine?
Lieut. Your father would deſire ye, ſir, to come to din-
Dem. Thou art no more, (ner.
Lieut. Now, now, now, now.
Dem. Poore coxcomb,
Why doe I aime at thee? Exit.
Leo. His feare has kill'd him. En. Leuc. with a bowl.
2 Gent. I proteſt hee's almoſt ſtiffe: bend him, and rub
Hold his nole cloſe, you, if you be a woman, (him:
Helpe us a little: here's a man neere periſh't.
Len. Alas, alas, I have nothing here about me.
Looke to my bowle: Ile run in preſently
And fetch ſome waters: bend him, and let him upwards.
Leo. A goodly man. Exit.
Here's a brave heart: he's warme againe: you ſhall not
2 Gent. Leave us i'th' lurch ſo, ſirrah.
Now he breathes too.
Leo. If we had but any drinke to rayſe his ſpirits.
What's that i'th' bowle? upon my life good Liquor,
She would not owne it elſe.

1. Gen. He ſees.
Leo. Looke up boy,
And take this cup, and drinke it off, I'le pledge thee,
Guide it to his mouth: he ſwallowes heartily.
2. Gen. Oh! feare and ſorrowes dry; 'tis off——
Leo. Stand up man.
Lieu. Am I not ſhot?
Leo. Away with him, and cheere him:
Thou haſt won thy Troop.
Lieu. I thinke I won it bravely.
Leo. Goe, I muſt ſee the Prince, he muſt not live thus;
And let me heare an houre hence from ye.
Well ſir—— Ex. Gen. and Lieu.

Enter Leucippe with water.

Leu. Here, here: where's the ſicke Gentleman?
Leo. Hee's up and gone, Lady.
Leu. Alas: that I came ſo late.
Leo. He muſt ſtill thanke ye,
Ye left that in a cup here did him comfort.
Leu. That in the bowle?
Leo. Yes truly, very much comfort,
He dranke it off, and after it ſpoke luſtily.
Leu. Did he drinke it all?
Leo. All off.
Leu. The devill choke him,
I am undone: 'has twenty devils in him,
Undone for ever: left he none?
Leo. I thinke not.
Leu. No not a drop: what ſhall become of me now?
Had he no where elſe to ſwound? a veng'ance ſwound him:
Undone, undone, undone: ſtay, I can lye yet,
And ſweare too at a pinch, thats all my comfort. Ent. De.
Look to him; I ſay look to him, & but mark what follows. Ex
Leo. What a devill ayles the woman? here comes the Prince again,
With ſuch a ſadnes on his face, as ſorrow,
Sorrow her ſelf, but poorely imitates:
Sorrow of ſorrowes on that heart that caus'd it.
De. Why might ſhe not be falſe & treacherous to me?
And found ſo by my father? ſhe was a woman,
And many a one of that ſexe, young and faire,
As full of faith as ſhe have fallen, and fouly.
Leo. It is a wench: O that I knew the circumſtance.
Dem. Why might not, to preſerve me from this ruine,
She having loſt her honor, and abuſed me,
My father change the formes o'th' coines, and execute
His anger on a faule ſhe ne're committed,
Only to keep me ſafe? why ſhould I thinke ſo?
She never was to me but all obedience,
Sweetnes, and love.
Leo. How heartily he weeps now?
I have not wept theſe thirty yeares and upward;
But now, if I ſhould be hang'd I cannot hold from't;
It grieves me to the heart.
Dem. Who's that that mocks me?
Leo. A plague of him that mocks ye: I grieve truly,
Truly and heartily to ſee you thus ſir;
And if it lay in my power, Gods are my witneſſe,
Who ere he be, that tooke your ſweet peace from ye;
I am not ſo old yet, nor want I ſpirit——
Dem. No more of that, no more Leontius,
Revenges are the gods; our part is ſufferance:
Farewell, I ſhall not ſee thee long. (in't;
Leo. Good ſir, tell me the cauſe, I know there is a woman
Doe you hold me faithfull? dare ye truſt your ſouldier?
Sweet Prince, the cauſe?
Dem. I muſt not, dare not tell it,
And as thou art an honeſt man, enquire not.
Leo. Will ye be merry then?
Dem. I am wondrous merry.
Leo. 'Tis wondrous well: you think now this becomes ye.
Shame on't, it does not ſir, it ſhewes not hanſomely;
If I were thus, you would ſweare I were an aſſe ſtraight;
A wooden aſſe; whine for a wench?
Dem. Prethee leave me.
Leo. I will not leave ye for a fit.
Dem. Leontius?
Leo. For that you may have any where for ſixepence,
And a deare penny worth too.
Dem. Nay, then you are troubleſome.
Leo. Not halfe ſo troubleſome as you are to your ſelf ſir;
Was that brave heart made to part for a placket:
And now i'th' dog-daies too, when nothing dare love?
That noble mind to melt away, and moulder
For a hay-nonny-nonny? would I had a glaſſe here,
To ſhew ye what a pretty toy ye are turn'd to.
Dem. My wretched fortune.
Leo. Will ye but let me know her?
I'le once turne bawd: go too, they are good mens offices,
And not ſo contemptible as we take 'em for:
And if ſhe be above ground, and a woman,
I aske no more; I'le bring her o' my backe ſir,
By this hand I will: and I had as lieve bring the devill,
I care not who ſhe be, nor where I have her,
And in your armes, or the next bed deliver her, (galliard.
Which you thinke fitteſt: and when you have danc'd your
Dem. Away, and foole to them are ſo affected:
O thou art gone, and all my comfort with thee;
Wilt thou do one thing for me?
Leo. All things i'th' world ſir,
Of all dangers.
Dem. Sweare.
Leo. I will.
Dem. Come neere me no more then.
Leo. How?
Dem. Come no more neere me:
Thou art a plague-ſore to me. Exit.
Leo. Give you good ev'n ſir;
If you be ſuffer'd thus, we ſhall have fine ſport.
I will be ſorry yet. Ent. 2 Gent.
1 Gent. How now, how does he?
Leo. Nay, if I tell ye hang me, or any man elſe
That hath his nineteen wits; he has the bots I thinke,
He groanes, and roares, and kicks.
2 Gent. Will he ſpeake yet?
Leo. Not willingly:
Shortly he will not ſee a man; if ever
I look'd upon a Prince ſo metamorphis'd,
So juggled into I know not what, ſhame take me;
This 'tis to be in love.
1 Gent. Is that the cauſe on't?
Leo. What is it not the cauſe of but bearebaitings?
And yet it ſtinkes much like it: out upon't,
What Giants, and what dwarffs, what owles and apes, (it,
What dogs, and cats it makes us men that are poſſeſt with
Live as if they had a legion of devils in 'em,
And every devill of a ſeverall nature,
Nothing but Hey paſſe, re-paſſe: where's the Lieutenant?
Has he gathered up the end on's wits againe?
2 Gent. He is alive: but you that talke of wonders,
Shew me but ſuch a wonder as he is now.
Leo. Why? he was ever at the worſt a wonder.
2 Gent. He is now moſt wonderfull; a blazer now ſir:

Leo.

Leo. What ailes the fooles? and what star raignes now
We have such prodigies? (gentlemen
2 Gen. 'I will poaze your heaven-hunters;
He talks now of the King no other language,
And with the King, as he imagines hourely,
Courts the King, drinks to the King, dies for the King,
Buyes all the pictures of the King, wears the Kings colors,
Leo. Does he not lye i'th' Kings street too?
1. Gen. Hee's going thither,
Makes praiers for the King in sundry languages,
Turnes all his Proclamations into meeter,
Is really in love with the King, most doatingly,
And sweares Adonis was a devill to him:
A sweet King, a most comely King, and such a King——
2. Gen. Then down on's mary-bones: O excellent King:
Thus he begins, Thou light and life of creatures,
Angell-ey'd King, vouchsafe at length thy favour;
And so proceeds to incision: what think ye of this sorrow?
1. Gen. Will as familiarly kisse the Kings horses
As they passe by him: ready to ravish his footmen.
Leo. Why this is above Ela?
But how comes this?
1. Gen. Nay thats to understand yet,
But thus it is, and this part but the poorest, (these.
'Twould make a man leap over the Moone to see him act
2. Gen. With sighes as though his heart would breake:
Cry like a breech'd boy, not eat a bit.
Leo. I must goe see him presently,
For this is such a gig: for certaine Gentlemen
The Fiend rides on a Fiddlesticke.
2. Gen. I thinke so.
Leo. Can ye guide me to him? for half an houre I am his,
To see the miracle.
1. Gen. We sure shall start him. Exeunt.

Scæne 5. Enter Antigonus and Lencippe.

Ant. Are you sure she dranke it?
Leu. Now must I lye most confidently.
Yes sir, she has drunke it off.
Ant. How works it with her?
Leu. I see no alteration yet.
Ant. There will be,
For he is the greatest Artist living made it;
Where is she now?
Leu. She is ready to walke out sir.
Ant. Starke mad, I know she will be.
Leu. So I hope sir.
Ant. She knowes not of the Prince?
Leu. Of no man living——
Ant. How do I looke? how do my clothes become me?
I am not very gray.
Leu. A very youth sir,
Upon my maiden-head as lusty as April:
Heaven blesse that sweet face, 'twill undoe a thousand,
Many a soft heart must bob yet, ere that wither,
Your Grace can give content enough. Enter Celia with a book.
Ant. I thinke so.
Leu. Here she comes sir.
Ant. How shall I keep her off me?
Go & perfume the room: make all things ready. Ex. Leu.
Cel. No hope yet of the Prince? no comfort of him?
They keep me mew'd up here, as they mew mad folkes,
No compaine but my afflictions.
This royall devill againe? strange, how he haunts me?
How like a poison'd potion his eyes fright me?
Has made himselfe handsome too.
Ant. Doe you looke now, Lady?
You will leap anon.
Cel. Curl'd and perfum'd? I smell him:
He looks on's leggs too: sure he will cut a caper,
God-a-mercie deare December.
Ant. O doe you smile now;
I knew it would worke with you: come hither pretty one.
Cel. Sir.
Ant. I like those curtesies well: come hither & kisse me.
Cel. I am reading sir of a short Treatise here,
Thats call'd the vanitie of lust: has your Grace seene it?
He sayes here, that an old mans loose desire
Is like the glow-wormes light, the Apes so wonder'd at:
Which when they gather'd sticks, and laid upon't,
And blew, and blew, turn'd taile, and went out presently:
And in another place he cals their loves,
Faint smels of dying flowers, carry no comforts;
They'r doating stinking foggs, so thick and muddy,
Reason with all his beames cannot beat through 'em.
Ant. How's this? is this the potion? you but foole still,
I know you love me.
Cel. As ye are just and honest,
I know I love and honour ye: admire ye.
Ant. This makes against me, fearfully against me.
Cel. But as your bring your power to persecute me,
Your traps to catch mine innocence, to rob me,
As you lay out your lusts to overwhelme me,
Hell never hated good, as I hate you sir;
And I dare tell it to your face: What glory
Now after all your Conquests got, your Titles,
The ever-living memories rais'd to you.
Can my defeat be? my poore wracke, what triumph?
And when you crowne your swelling cups to fortune,
What honourable tongue can sing my story?
Be as your Embleme is, a glorious Lamp
Set on the top of all, to light all perfectly:
Be as your office is, a god like Justice,
Into all shedding equally your vertues. (nes;
Ant. She has drencht me now: now I admire hir good-
So young, so nobly strong, I never tasted.
Can nothing in the power of Kings perswade ye?
Cel. No, not that power commaund me.
Ant. Say I should force ye?
I have it in my will.
Cel Your will's a poore one;
And though it be a Kings will, a deified one,
Weaker then Infants leggs, your will's in swadling clouts:
A thousand waies my will has found to checke ye;
A thousand doores to leape ye? dare die sir
As suddenly I dare die, as you can offer.
Nay say you had your will, say you had ravish'd me,
Perform'd your lust, what had you purchas'd by it?
What honor won, doe you know who dwels above sir,
And what they have prepared for men turn'd devils?
Did you never heare their thunder? start and tremble,
Death sitting on your blood, when their fires visit us?
Will nothing wring you then do you thinke it hard here?
And like a snaile curle round about your conscience
Biting and stinging: will you not roare too late then?
Then when you shake in horror of this villanie,
Then will I rise a star in heaven, and scorne ye. (nesse?
Ant. Lust, how I hate thee now? and love this sweet-
Will ye be my Queene? can that price purchase ye?
Cel. Not all the world, I am a Queene already,
Crown'd by his love, I must not lose for fortune;

I can give none away, sell none away sir,
Can lend no love, am not mine owne Exchequer;
For in anothers heart my hope and peace lyes. (nough
Ant. Your faire hands, Lady: for yet I am not pure e-
To touch these lips, in that sweet peace ye spoke of:
Live now for ever, and I to serve your vertues ---
Cel. Why now ye show a god? now I kneele to ye;
This sacrifice of Virgins joy send to ye:
Thus I hold up my hands to heaven that touch'd ye,
And pray eternall blessings dwell about ye.
Ant. Vertue commands the stars: rise more then ver-
Your present comfort shall be now my busines. (tue;
Cel. All my obedient service wait upon ye. Ex. seve-

Scæne 6. Enter Leontius, Gentlemen, Lieutenant.

Leo. Hast thou cleane forgot the wars?
Lieu. Prethee hold thy peace.
1. Gen. His mind's much elevated now.
Leo. It serves so
Sirrah.
Lieu. I am so troubled with this fellow.
Leo. He will call me rogue anon.
1. Gen. Tis ten to one else.
Lie. O King that thou knewst I loved thee, how I lov'd
And where O King I barrell up thy beauty. (thee:
Leo. He cannot leave his Sutlers trade, he wooes in't.
Lieu. O never King.
Leo. By this hand, when I consider ——
Lieu. My honest friend, you are a little sawcy.
1. Gen. I told you you would have it.
Lieu. When mine owne worth ——
Leo. Is flung into the ballance, and found nothing.
Lieu. And yet a souldier.
Leo. And yet a sawcy one.
Lieu. One that has followed thee.
Leo. Faire and far off.
Lieu. Fought for thy grace.
Leo. 'Twas for some griefe, you lye Sir.
Lieu. Hee's the son of a whore denies this: will that sa-
Leo. Yes, very well. (tisfie ye?
Lieu. Shall then that thing that honors thee?
How miserable a thing soever, yet a thing still;
And though a thing of nothing, thy thing ever.
Leo. Heere's a new thing.
2 Gen. Hee's in a deep dump now.
Le. I'le fetch him out on't. When's the Kings birth-day
Lieu. When ere it be, that day I'le dye with ringing.
And there's the resolution of a Lover. Exit.
Leo. A goodly resolution sure I take it.
He is bewitch'd, or moop'd, or his braines melted,
Could he find no body to fall in love with, but the King,
The good old King to doat upon him too?
Stay, now I remember what the fat woman warn'd me,
Bad me remember and look to him too:
Ile hang if she have not a hand in this: hee's conjured,
Goe after him. I pitty the poore rascall,
In the meane time Ile wait occasion
To worke upon the Prince.
2. Gen. Pray doe that seriously. Ex. severally.

Scæne 7. Enter Antigonus, Menippus, Lords.

Lor. Hee's very ill.
Ant. I am very sorry for't.
And much ashamed I have wronged his innocence,
Menippus, guide her to the Princes lodgings,
There leave her to his love againe.
Men. I am glad sir.
Lord. He will speake to none.
Ant. O I shall breake that silence;
Be quicke, take faire attendance.
Men. Yes sir presently. Ex.
Ant. He will find his tongue, I warrant ye; his health
I send a phisick will not faile. (too;
Lord. Faire worke it.
Ant. We heare the Princes meane to visit us
In way of truce.
Lord. Tis thought so.
Ant. Come: lets in then,
And think upon the noblest wayes to meet 'em. Ex.

Scæne 8. Enter Leontius.

Leo. There's no way now to get in: all the lights stopt
Nor can I heare a sound of him: pray heaven (too;
He use no violence: I thinke he has more soule
Stronger, and I hope nobler: would I could but see once
This beauty he groanes under, or come to know
But any circumstance. What noise is that there?
I thinke I heard him groane: here are some comming;
A woman too, Ile stand aloof, and view 'em.
Enter Menippus, Celia, Lords.
Cel. Well, some of ye have been too blame in this point,
But I forgive ye: The King might have pickt out too
Some fitter woman to have tride his valour.
Men. Twas all to the best meant, Lady.
Cel. I must thinke so,
For how to mend it now: hee's here you tell me?
Men. Hee's Madam, and the joy to see you only
Will draw him out.
Leo. I know that womans tongue,
I thinke I have seene her face too: Ile goe nearer:
If this be she, he has some cause of sorrow:
'Tis the same face; the same, most excellent woman.
Cel. This should be Lord Leontius: I remember him.
Leo. Lady, I thinke ye know me.
Cel. Speake soft, good souldier:
I do, and know ye worthy, know ye noble;
Know not me yet openly, as you love me;
But let me see ye againe, Ile satisfie ye:
I am wondrous glad to see those eyes.
Leo. You have charged me.
Cel. You shall know where I am.
Leo. I will not off yet:
She goes to knocke at's doore: This must be she
The fellow told me of: right glad I am on't,
He will bolt now for certaine.
Cel. Are ye within sir?
Ile trouble you no more: I thanke your curtesie,
Pray leave me now.
All. Me. We rest your humble servants. Ex. Men. &c.
Cel. So now my gyves are off: pray heaven he be here!
Master, my royall sir: doe you heare who cals ye?
Love my Demetrius.
Leo. These are pretty quaile-pipes,
The Corke will come anon.
Cel. Can ye be drowsie,
When I call at your window?
Leo. I heare him stirring: Enter Demetrius.
Now he comes wondring out.
Dem. Tis Celia sound sure:

The

The ſweetneſſe of that tongue drawes all hearts to it;
There ſtands the ſhape too.
Leu. How he ſtares upon her?
Dem. Ha? do mine eyes abuſe me?
'Tis ſhe, the living Celia: your hand Lady?
Cel. What ſhould this meane?
Dem. The very ſelfeſame Celia.
Cel. How do ye ſir?
Dem. Only turn'd brave.
I heard you were dead my deare on: compleat,
She is wondrous brave, a wondrous gallant Courtier.
Cel. How he ſurveies me round? here has been foule play.
Dem. How came ſhe thus?
Cel. It was a kind of death ſir,
I ſuffered in your abſence, meu'd up here,
And kept conceal'd I know not how.
Dem. 'Tis likely:
How came you hether Celia? wondrous gallant:
Did my father ſend for ye?
Cel. So they told me Sir,
And one command too.
Dem. I hope you were obedient?
Cel. I was ſo ever.
Dem. And ye were bravely us'd?
Cel. I wanted nothing:
My maiden-head to a mote i'th' Sun, he's jealous:
I muſt now play the knave with him, to dye for't,
'Tis in me nature.
Dem. Her very eyes are alter'd:
Jewels, and rich ones too, I never ſaw yet----
And what were thoſe came for ye?
Cel. Monſtrous jealous:
Have I liv'd at the rate of theſe ſcorn'd queſtions?
They ſeemed of good ſort Gentlemen.
Dem. Kind men?
Cel. They were wondrous kind:
I was much beholding to 'em;
There was one Menippus ſir.
Dem. Ha?
Cel. One Menippus,
A notable merry Lord, and a good companion.
Dem. And one Charinthus too?
Cel. Yes, there was ſuch a one.
Dem. And Timon?
Cel. 'Tis moſt true.
Dem. And thou moſt treacherous:
My fathers bawdes by----they never miſſe courſe;
And were theſe daily with ye?
Cel. Every houre ſir.
Dem. And was there not a Lady, a fat Lady?
Cel. O Yes; a notable good wench:
Dem. The devill fetch her.
Cel. 'Tis ev'n the merrieſt wench----
Dem. Did ſhe keepe with ye too?
Cel. She was all in all; my bedfellow, eate with me,
Brought me acquainted.
Dem. You are well knowne here then?
Cel. There is no living here a ſtranger I thinke.
Dem. How came ye by this brave gowne?
Cel. This is a poore one:
Alas, I have twenty richer: do you ſee theſe jewels?
Why, they are the pooreſt things, to thoſe are ſent me,
And ſent me hourely too.
Dem. Is there no modeſtie?
No faith in this faire Sexe?
Leo. What will this prove too?
For yet with all my wits, I underſtand not.
Dem. Come hether; thou art dead indeed, loſt, tainted;
All that I left thee faire, and innocent,
Sweet as thy youth, and carrying comfort in't;
All that I hoped for vertuous, is fled from thee,
Turn'd backe, and banckrupt.
Leo. By'r Lady, this cuts ſhrewdly.
Dem. Thou art dead, for ever dead; ſins ſurfet ſlew thee;
The ambition of thoſe wanton eyes betraid thee;
Go from me grave of honor; go thou foule one,
Thou glory of thy ſin; go thou diſpis'd one,
And where there is no vertue, nor no virgin;
Where Chaſtitie was never knowne, nor heard of;
Where nothing reigns but imperious luſt, and loſers faces
Goe thether, child of blood, and ſing my doating.
Cel. You do not ſpeake this ſeriouſly I hope ſir;
I did but jeſt with you.
Dem. Looke not upon me,
There is more hell in thoſe eyes, then hell harbours;
And when they flame, more torments.
Cel. Dare ye truſt me?
You durſt once even with all you had: your love ſir?
By this faire light I am honeſt.
Dem. Thou ſubtle Circes,
Caſt not upon the maiden light eclipſes:
Curſe not the day.
Cel. Come, come, you ſhall not do this:
How faine you would ſeeme angry now, to fright me;
You are not in the field among your enemies;
Come, I muſt coole this courage.
Dem. Out thou impudence,
Thou ulcer of thy Sexe; when I firſt ſaw thee,
I drew into mine eyes mine owne deſtruction,
I puld into my heart that ſudden poyſon,
That now conſumes my deare content to ſinders:
I am not now Demetrius, thou haſt chang'd me;
Thou woman with thy thouſand wiles haſt chang'd me;
Thou Serpent with thy angell-eyes haſt ſlaine me;
And where, before I touch'd on this faire ruine,
I was a man, and reaſon made, and mov'd me,
Now one great lump of griefe. I grow and wander.
Cel. And as you are noble, do you thinke I did this?
Dem. Put all the devills wings on, and flie from me.
Cel. I will go from ye, never more to ſee ye:
I will flie from ye, as a plague hangs o're me;
And through the progreſſe of my life hereafter;
Where ever I ſhall find a foole, a falſe man,
One that ne're knew the worth of poliſh'd vertue;
A baſe ſuſpecter of a virgins honour,
A child that flings away the wealth he cride for,
Him will I call Demetrius: that foole Demetrius,
That mad man a Demetrius; and that falſe man,
The Prince of broken faiths, even Prince Demetrius.
You thinke now, I ſhould cry, and kneele down to ye,
Petition for my peace; let thoſe that feele here
The weight of evill, waite for ſuch a favour,
I am above your hate, as far above it,
In all the actions of an innocent life,
As the pure Stars are from the muddy meators:
Crye when you know your folly: howle and curſe then,
Beate that unmanly breaſt, that holds a falſe heart
When ye ſhall come to know, whom ye have flung from ye.
Dem. Pray ye ſtay a little.
Cel. Not your hopes can alter me,
Then let a thouſand backe thoughts muſter in ye,
And with thoſe enter in a thouſand doatings;

Thoſe

Thoſe eyes be never ſhut, but drop to nothing:
My innocence for ever haunt and fright ye:
Thoſe armes together grow in folds; that tongue,
That bold bad tongue that barkes out theſe diſgraces.
When you ſhall come to know how nobly vertuous
I have preſerv'd my life, rot, rot within ye.
Dem. What ſhall I doe?
Cel. Live a loſt man for ever.
Goe aske your fathers conſcience what I ſuffered,
And through what ſeas of hazards I fayl'd through:
Mine honour ſtill advanced in ſpight of tempeſts,
Then take your leave of love; and confeſſe freely,
You were never worthy of this heart that ſerv'd ye,
And ſo farewell ungratefull——Exit.
Dem. Is ſhe gone?
Leo. Ile follow her, and will find out this matter.-Exit.

Enter Antigonus, and Lords.

Antig. Are ye pleas'd now? have you got your heart a-
Have I reſtor'd ye that? (gain?
Dem. Sir: even for heavens ſake,
And ſacred truth ſake, tell me how ye found her.
Antig. I will, and in few words. Before I tride her,
'Tis true, I thought her moſt unfit your fellowſhip,
And fear'd her too: which feare begot that ſtory
I told ye firſt: but ſince, like gold I toucht her.
Dem. And how deare ſir?
Antig. Heavens holy light's not purer:
The conſtancy and goodneſſe of all women
That ever liv'd, to win the names of worthy,
This noble Maid has doubled in her: honour,
All promiſes of wealth, all art to win her,
And by all tongues imploy'd, wrought as much on her
As one may doe upon the Sun at noone day
By lighting Candles up: her ſhape is heavenly,
And to that heavenly ſhape her thoughts are angells.
Dem. Why did you tell me ſir?
Antig. 'Tis true, I err'd in't:
But ſince I made a full proofe of her vertue,
I find a King too poore a ſervant for her.
Love her, and honour her; in all obſerve her.
She muſt be ſomething more then time yet tels her:
And certaine I beleeve him bleſt, enjoyes her:
I would not loſe the hope of ſuch a daughter,
To adde another Empire to my honour. ——Exit.
Dem. O wretched ſtate! to what end ſhall I turn me?
And where begins my penance? now, what ſervice
Will win her love againe? my death muſt doe it:
And if that ſacrifice can purge my follies,
Be pleas'd, O mightie Love, I dye thy ſervant---Exit.

Actus Quintus. Scæna prima.

Enter Leontius, and Celia.

Leo. I Know he do's not deſerve ye; h'as us'd ye poorely:
And to redeeme himſelfe——
Cel. Redeeme?
Leo. I know it——
There's no way left:
Cel. For heavens ſake doe not name him.
Doe not thinke on him ſir, he's ſo far from me
In all my thoughts now, methinkes I never knew him.
Leo. But yet I would ſee him againe.
Cel. No, never, never.
Leo. I doe not meane to lend him any comfort;
But to afflict him, ſo to torture him;
That even his very ſoule may ſhake within him:
To make him know, though he be great and powerfull,
'Tis not within his aime to deale diſhonourably,
And carry it off, and with a maid of your ſort.
Cel. I moſt confeſſe, I could moſt ſpightfully afflict him;
Now, now, I could whet my anger at him;
Now, arm'd with bitterneſſe, I could ſhoot through him;
I long to vex him:
Leo. And doe it home, and bravely:
Cel. Were I a man?
Leo. Ile helpe that weakeneſſe in ye:
I honour ye, and ſerve ye.
Cel. Not onely to diſclaime me,
When he had ſeal'd his vowes in heaven, ſworne to me,
And poore beleeving I became his ſervant:
But moſt maliciouſly to brand my credit,
Staine my pure name.
Leo. I would not ſuffer it;
See him I would againe, and to his teeth too:
Od's precious, I would ring him ſuch a leſſon——
Cel. I have done that already.
Leo. Nothing, nothing:
It was too poore a purge; beſides, by this time
He has found his fault, and feeles the hells that follow it.
That, and your urg'd on anger to the higheſt.
Why, 'twill be ſuch a ſtroake——
Cel. Say he repent then,
And ſeeke with teares to ſoften, I am a woman;
A woman that have lov'd him, ſir, have honour'd him:
I am no more.
Leo. Why, you may deale thereafter.
Cel. If I forgive him, I am loſt.
Leo. Hold there then,
The ſport will be to what a poore ſubmiſſion——
But keepe you ſtrong.
Cel. I would not ſee him.
Leo. Yes,
You ſhall ring his knell:
Cel. How if I kill him?
Leo. Kill him: why, let him dye.
Cel. I know 'tis fit ſo.
But why ſhould I that lov'd him once, deſtroy him?
O had he ſcap't this ſin, what a brave Gentleman---
Leo. I muſt confeſſe, had this not falne, a nobler,
A handſomer, the whole world had not ſhow'd ye:
And to his making ſuch a mind.
Cel. 'Tis certaine:
But all this I muſt now forget.
Leo. You ſhall not
If I have any art: goe up ſweet Lady,
And truſt my truth.
Cel. But good ſir bring him not.
Leo. I would not for the honour ye are born too,
But you ſhall ſee him, and neglect him too, and ſcorn him.
Cel. You will be neere me then.
Leo. I will be with ye;
Yet ther's ſome hope to ſtop this gap, ile work hard. Exe.

Scæne 2. Enter Antigonus, Menippus, two Gent. Lieutenant, and Lords.

Antig. But is it poſſible this fellow tooke it?

2 Gent. It ſeemes ſo by the violence it wrought with,
Yet now the fits ev'n off.
Men. I beſeech your Grace.
Ant. Nay, I forgive thy wife with all my heart,
And am right glad ſhe dranke it not her ſelfe,
And more glad that the vertuous maid eſcape it.
I would not for the world 'thad hit; but that this Souldier,
Lord how he lookes, that he ſhould take this vomit;
Can he make rimes too?
2 Gent. 'Has made a thouſand ſir,
And plaies the burthen to 'em on a Jewes-trump.
Ant. He lookes as though he were bepiſt: do you love
Lie. Yes ſurely even with all my heart. (meſir?
Ant. I thanke ye; I am glad I have ſo good a ſubject; but pray ye tell me,
How much did ye love me, before ye dranke this matter?
Lie. Even as much as a ſober man might; & a Souldier
That your Grace owes juſt halfe a yeares pay to.
Ant. Well remembred;
And did I ſeeme ſo young and amiable to ye?
Lieu. Methought you were the ſweeteſt youth ——
Ant. That's excellent.
Lieu. I truly ſir; and ever as I thought on ye,
I wiſh'd, and wiſh'd ——
Ant. What didſt thou wiſh I prethee?
Lieu. Ev'n, that I had been a wench of fifteene for ye,
A handſome wench ſir.
Ant. Why? God a mercy Souldier:
I ſeeme not ſo now to thee.
Lieu. Not all out:
And yet I have a grudging to your Grace ſtill.
Ant. Thou wilt never in love before?
Lieu. Not with a King,
And hope I ſhall never be again: Truly ſir,
I have had ſuch plundges, and ſuch bicknings,
And as it were ſuch runnings at ſtill within me,
For whatſoever it was provok't me toward ye.
Ant. God-a-mercy ſtill.
Lieu. I had it with a vengeance,
It plaid his prize.
Ant. I would not have been a wench then,
Though of this age.
Lieu. No ſure, I ſhould have ſpoiled ye.
Ant. Well, goe thy waies, of all the luſty lovers
That ere I ſaw —— wilt have an other potion?
Lieu. If you will be another thing, have at ye.
Ant. Ha, ha, ha: give me thy hand, from henceforth thou
Do bravely, I le love thee as much. (art my ſouldier,
Lieu. I thanke ye;
But if you were mine enemie, I would not wiſh it ye:
I beſeech your Grace, pay me my charge.
2 Gen. Thats certaine ſir;
Has bought up all that ere he found was like ye,
Or any thing you have lov'd, that he could purchaſe;
Old horſes, that your Grace has ridden blind, & founde'r'd;
Dogs, rotten hawkes, and which is more then all this,
Has worne your Graces Gauntlet in his Bonnet.
An. Bring in your Bils: mine own love ſhall be ſatisfi'd;
And ſirrah, for this potion you have taken,
I le point ye out a portion ye ſhall live on.
Men. 'Twas the beſt draught that ere ye drunk.
Lieu. I hope ſo.
Ant. Are the Princes come to'th' Court?
Men. They are all, and lodg'd ſir.
Ant. Come then, make ready for their entertainment,
Which preſently wee'l give: wait you on me ſir.
Lie. I ſhal love drinke the better whilſt I live boyes. Ex.

Scæne 3. Enter Demetrius and Leontius.

Dem. Let me but ſee her deare Leontius;
Let me but dye before her.
Leo. Would that would doe it:
If I knew where ſhe lay now, with what honeſtie,
You having ſlung ſo maine a miſchiefe on her,
And on ſo innocent and ſweet a Beautie,
Dare I preſent your viſit?
Dem. I le repent all:
And with the greateſt ſacrifice of ſorrow,
That ever Lover made!
Leo. 'Twill be too late ſir:
I know not what will become of you
Dem. You can help me.
Le. It may be to her ſight: what are you nearer;
She has ſworne ſhe will not ſpeake to ye, looke upon ye,
And to love ye againe, O ſhe cries out, and thunders,
She had rather love —— there 's no hope ——
Dem. Yes Leontius,
There is a hope, which though it draw no love to it,
At leaſt will draw her to lament my fortune,
And that hope ſhall relieve me.
Leo. Harke ye ſir, harke ye:
Say I ſhould bring ye ——
Dem. Do not trifle with me?
Leo. I will not trifle; both together bring ye,
You know the wrongs ye' done.
Dem. I do confeſſe 'em.
Leo. And if you ſhould then jump into your fury,
And have another querke in your head.
Dem. I'le dye firſt.
Leo. You muſt ſay nothing to her; for 'tis certaine,
The nature of your crime will admit no excuſe.
Dem. I will not ſpeake, mine eyes ſhall tell my penance.
Leo. You muſt looke wondrous ſad too.
Dem. I need not looke ſo,
I am truly ſadneſſe ſelfe.
Leo. That looke will do it:
Stay here, I le bring her to you inſtantly:
But take heed how you beare your ſelfe: ſit down there,
The more humble you are, the more ſhe'l take compaſſion
Women are per'lous things to deale upon. Exit.
Dem. What ſhall become of me? to curſe my fortune,
Were but to curſe my father; that's too impious;
But under whatſoever fate I ſuffer,
Bleſſe I beſeech thee heaven her harmleſſe goodneſſe.

Enter Leontius and Celia.

Leo. Now arme your ſelfe.
Cel. You have not brought him?
Leo. Yes faith,
And there he is: you ſee in what poore plight too,
Now you may doe your will, kill him, or ſave him.
Cel. I will goe back.
Leo. I will be hang'd then Lady,
Are you a coward now?
Cel. I cannot ſpeak to him.
Dem. O me.
Leo. There was a fight to blow a Church downe;
So, now their eyes are hot, the ſmall ſhot playes,
They will come toth' batterie anon.
Cel. He weeps extreamly.
Leo. Raile at him now.
Cel. I dare not.

Leo. I am glad on't.
Cel. Nor dare beleeve his teares.
Dem. You may bleſt beauty,
For thoſe thicke ſtreames that troubled my repentance,
Are crept out long agoe.
Leo. You ſee how he looks.
Cel. What have I to doe how he looks? how lookt he
When with a poiſoned truth he bit mine honour, (then,
It was your counſell too, to ſcorne and ſlight him.
Leo. I, if ye ſaw fit cauſe; and you confeſt too,
Except this ſin, he was the braveſt gentleman,
The ſweeteſt, nobleſt: I take nothing from ye,
Nor from your anger; uſe him as you pleaſe:
For to ſay truth, he has deſerved your juſtice;
But ſtill conſider what he has been to you.
Cel. Pray doe not blinde me thus.
Dem. O gentle Miſtris,
If there were any way to expiate
A ſinne ſo great as mine, by interceſſion,
By prayers, by daily teares, by dying for ye:
O what a joy would cloſe theſe eyes that love ye.
Leo. They ſay women have tender hearts, I know not,
I am ſure mine melts.
Cel. Sir, I forgive ye heartily,
And all your wrong to me I caſt behind me,
And wiſh ye a fit beauty to your vertues:
Mine is too poore, in peace I part thus from you;
I muſt look back: gods keep your Grace: he's here ſtill. Ex.
Dem. She has forgiven me.
Leo. She has directed ye:
Up, up, and follow like a man: away ſir,
She lookt behind her twice: her heart dwels here ſir,
Ye drew teares from her too: ſhe cannot freeze thus;
The doore's ſet open too, are ye a man?
Are ye alive? doe ye underſtand her meaning?
Have ye bloud and ſpirit in ye?
Dem. I dare not trouble her.
Leo. Nay, and you will be nipt i'th' head with nothing,
Walke whining up and downe; I dare not, I cannot:
Strike now or never: faint heart, you know what ſir——
Be govern'd by your feare, and quench your fire out.
A devill on't, ſtands this doore ope for nothing:
So get ye together, and be naught: now to ſecure all,
Will I go fetch out a more ſoveraigne plaiſter. Ex.

Scæne 4. Enter Antigonus, Seleucus, Lyſimachus, Ptolomey, Lieuten. Gent. Lords.

Ant. This peace is fairely made.
Seleu. Would your Grace wiſh us
To put in more: take what you pleaſe, we yeeld it;
The honour done us by your ſonne conſtraines it,
Your noble ſonne.
Ant. It is ſufficient, Princes;
And now we are one againe, one mind, one body,
And one ſword ſhall ſtrike for us.
Lyſ. Le; Prince Demetrius
But lead us on: for we are his vowed ſervants;
Againſt the ſtrength of all the world wee'l buckle.
Ptol. And even from all that ſtrength wee'l catch at vi- (ctory.
Sel. O had I now recover'd but the fortune
I loſt in Antioch, when mine Uncle periſh'd;
But that were but to ſurfeit me with bleſſings.
Lyſ. You loſt a ſweet childe there.
Sel. Name it no more ſir;
This is no time to entertaine ſuch ſorrowes;
Will your Majeſtie do us the honor, we may ſee the Prince,
And wait upon him? Enter Leon.
Ant. I wonder he ſtayes from us:
How now Leontius, where's my ſonne?
Sel. Brave Captaine.
Lyſ. Old valiant ſir.
Leo. Your Graces are welcome:
Your ſonne and't pleaſe you ſir, is new caſheered yonder,
Caſt from his Miſtris favour: and ſuch a coile there is;
Such ſending, and ſuch proving; ſhe ſtands off,
And will by no meanes yeeld to compoſition:
He offers any price; his body to her.
Sel. She is a hard Lady, denies that caution.
Leo. And now they whine, & now they rave: faith Prin- (ces,
'Twere a good point of charitie to piece 'em;
For leſſe then ſuch a power will doe juſt nothing:
And if you meane to ſee him, there it muſt be,
For there will he grow, till he be tranſplanted.
Sel. Beſeech your Grace, lets wait upon you thither,
That I may ſee that beauty dares deny him,
That ſcornfull beautie.
Ptol. I ſhould thinke it worſe now;
Ill brought up beautie.
Ant. She has too much reaſon for't;
Which with too great a grief, I ſhame to thinke of,
But wee'l goe ſee this game.
Lyſ. Rather this wonder.
Ant. Be you our guide Leontius, here's a new peace. Ex.

Scæne 5. Enter Demetrius and Celia.

Cel. Thus far you ſhall perſwade me ſtill to honour ye,
Still to live with ye ſir, or neere about ye;
For not to lye, you have my firſt and laſt love,
But ſince you have conceiv'd an evill againſt me,
An evill that ſo much concernes your honour,
That honour aim'd by all at for a patterne:
And though there be a falſe thought, and confeſt too,
And much repentance falne in ſhoures to purge it;
Yet, whilſt that great reſpect I ever bore ye,
Dwels in my bloud, and in my heart that duty;
Had it but been a dreame, I muſt not touch ye.
Dem. O you will make ſome other happy?
Cel. Never,
Upon this Hand I'le ſeale that faith.
Dem. We may kiſſe,
But not thoſe out o'th' peace too.
Cel. Thoſe I'le give ye,
So there you will be pleas'd to pitch your altera,
I will be merry with ye; ſing, diſcourſe with ye,
Be your poore Miſtris ſtill: in truth I love ye.
Enter Leontius, Antigonus, Seleucus, Lyſimachus, Ptolomy, Lieutenant, Gentleman.
Dem. Stay, who are theſe?
Lyſ. A very handſome Lady?
Leo. As ere you ſaw.
Sel. Pitty her heart's ſo cruell.
Lyſ. How does your Grace? he ſtands ſtill, will not heare us.
Ptol. We come to ſerve ye ſir, in all our fortunes.
Lyſ. He bowes a little now; he's ſtrangely alter'd.
Sel. Ha? pray ye a word Leontius, pray ye a word with Lyſimachus? you both knew mine Enambe, (ye
I loſt in Antioch, when the Towne was taken,
Mine uncle ſlaine, Antigonus had the luck on't?
Lyſ. Yes, I remember well the girle.
Sel. Methinkes now

That

That face is wondrous like her: I have her Picture,
The same, but more yeares on her; the very same.
Lyſ. A cherry to a cherry is not liker.
Sel. Looke on her eyes.
Leo. Moſt certaine ſhe is like her:
Many a time have I dandled her in theſe armes ſir,
And I hope who will more.
Ant. What's that ye looke at, Princes?
Sel. This picture, and that Lady ſir.
Ant. Ha: they are neare:
They only erre in time.
Lyſ. Did you marke that bluſh there?
That came the neareſt.
Sel. I muſt ſpeake to her.
Leo. You'l quickly be reſolved.
Sel. Your name ſweet Lady?
Cel. Enanthe, ſir: and this to beg your bleſſing.
Sel. Doe you know me?
Cel. If you be the King Seleucus,
I know you are my father.
Sel. Peace a little,
Where did I loſe ye?
Cel. At the ſack of Antioch,
Where my good Uncle di'de, and I was taken,
By a meane ſouldier taken: by this Prince,
This noble Prince, redeemed from him againe,
Where ever ſince I have remained his ſervant.
Sel. My joyes are now too full: welcome Enanthe,
Mine owne, my deareſt, and my beſt Enanthe.
Dem. And mine too deſperate.
Cel. You ſhall not thinke ſo,
This is a peace indeed.
Ant. I hope it ſhall be,
And aske it firſt.
Cel. Moſt royall ſir, ye have it.
Dem. I once more beg it thus.
Sel. You muſt not be deni'd ſir.
Cel. By me, I am ſure he muſt not: ſure he ſhall not;
Kneeling I give it too, kneeling I take it;
And from this houre, no envious ſpight ere part us.
All. The gods give happy joyes; all comforts to ye.
Dem. My new Enanthe.
Ant. Come, beat all the Drums up,
And all the noble inſtruments of war:
Let 'em fill all the Kingdome with their ſounds;
And thoſe the brazen arch of heaven breake through,
While to the Temple we conduct theſe two.
Leo. May they be ever loving, ever young,
And ever worthy of thoſe lines they ſprong;
May their faire iſſues walke with time along.
Lieu. And hang a coward now; and there's my ſong.

Exeunt.

Prologue.

WOuld ſome man would inſtruct me what to ſay:
For this ſame Prologue, uſuall to a play,
Is tied to ſuch an old forme of Petition;
Men muſt ſay nothing new beyond commiſſion:
The cloakes we weare, the leggs we make, the place
We ſtand in, muſt be one; and one the face.
Nor alter'd, nor exceeded; if it be,
A generall hiſſe, hangs on our levitie:
We have a Play, a new Play to play now,
And thus low in our Plaies behalfe we bow;
We bow to beg your ſuffrage, and kind eare;
If it were naught, or that it might appeare
A thing boy'd up by prayer, Gentlemen,
Beleeve my faith, you ſhould not ſee me then.
Let them ſpeake then have power to ſtop a ſtorme,
I never lov'd to feele a houſe ſo warme:
But for the Play, if you dare credit me,
I thinke it well: All new things you ſhall ſee,
And thoſe diſpoſ'd to all the mirth that may;
And ſhort enough we hope: and ſuch a Play
You were wont to like: ſit nobly then, and ſee:
If it miſcarrie, pray looke not for me.

Epilogue.

I Am not cur'd yet throughlie; for beleeve
I feele another paſſion that may grieve
All over me I feele it too: and now
It takes me cold, cold, cold, I know not how:
As you are good men helpe me, a Carowſe
May make me love you all, all here i'th' houſe,
And all that comes to ſee me doatingly:
Now lend your hands, and for your curteſie,
The next imployment I am ſent upon,
I'le ſweare you are Phiſitians, the wars none.

FINIS.

THE NICE VALOVR, OR, The Passionate Mad-man.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Duke, Shamount, and 4 Gentlemen.

Duke.

Shamount, welcome; we have mist thee long,
Though absent but two daies: I hope your (sports
Answer your time and wishes.
Sham. Very nobly sir:
We found game worthy your delight my Lord,
It was so royall.
Du. I've enough to heare on't,
Prethee bestow't upon me in discourse.
1 Gen. What is this Gentleman Coz? you are a Courtier,
Therefore know all their insides.
2 Gent. No farther then the Taffitie goes good Coz,
For the most part, which is indeed the best part
Of the most generall inside: marry thus far
I can with boldnesse speake this ones mans Character,
And upon honour passe it for a true one;
He has that strength of manly merit in him,
That it exceeds his Soveraignes power of gracing;
He's faithfully true to valour, that he hates
The man from Cæsars time, or farther off,
That ever tooke disgrace unreveng'd:
And if he chance to read his abject story,
He teares his memory out, and holds it vertuous,
Not to let shame have so much life amongst us;
There is not such a curious piece of courage
Amongst mans fellowship, or one so jealous
Of honours losse, or reputations glory:
There's so much perfect of his growing story.
1 Gen. 'T would make one dote on vertue as you tell it.
2 Gen. I ha' told it to much losse, beleeve it Coz.
3 Gent. How the Duke graces him? what is he brother?
4 Gen. Do you not yet know him? a vain-glorious cox- (combe,
As proud as he that fell for't:
Set but aside his valour, no vertue,
Which is indeed not fit for any Courtier;
And we his fellowes are as good as he,
Perhaps as capable of favour too,
For one thing or another, if 'twere look'd into:
Give me a man, were I a Soveraigne now,
Has a good stroake at Tennis, and a stiffe one,
Can play at Equinoctium with the Line,
As even as the thirteenth of September,
When day and night lye in a scale together:
Or may I thrive as I deserve at Billiards;
No otherwise at Chesse, or at Primero:
These are the parts requir'd, why not advanc'd?
Du. Trust me, it was no lesse then excellent pleasure,
And I'm right glad 'twas thine. How fares our kinsman?
Who can resolve us best?
1 Gent. I can my Lord.
Du. There if I had a pitty without bounds,
It might be all bestowed ——— A man so lost
In the wild waies of passion, that he's sensible
Of nought but what torments him?
1 Gent. True my Lord,
He runs through all the Passions of mankind,
And shifts 'em strangely too: one while in love,
And that so violent, that for want of busines,
Hee'l court the very Prentice of a Laundresse,
Though she have kib'd heeles: and in's melancholly age,
He will not brooke an Empresse, though thrice fairer
Then ever Maud was; or higher spirited
Then Cleopatra, or your English Countesse:
Then on a sudden he's so merry againe,
Out-laughs a waiting woman, before her first Child:
And turning of a hand, so angry ———
'Has almost beate the Northen fellow blind;
That is for that use only; if that mood hold my Lord,
'Had need of a fresh man; I'le undertake,
He shall bruise three a month.
Du. I pitty him dearely;
And let it be your charge, with his kind brother,
To see his moods observ'd; let every passion
Be fed ev'n to a surfet, which in time
May breed a loathing: let him have enough
Of every object, that his sence is rapt with;
And being once glutted, then the taste of folly
Will come into his rellish. Exit.
1 Gent. I shall see
Your charge my Lord most faithfully effected:
And how does noble Shamount?
Sha. Never ill man
Untill I heare of baseneſſe, then I sicken,
I am the heakhfull'st man i'th' Kingdome else.
1 Gent. Be arm'd then for a fit, Enter Lapet.
Here comes a fellow
Will make you sicke at heart, if baseneſſe do't.
Sha. Let me be gone: what is he?
1 Gent. Let me tell you first,
It can be but a qualme, pray stay it out sir,
Come, y'ave borne more then this.
Sha. Borne? never any thing

That

That was injurious.
Gen. Ha, I am far from that.
Sha. He lookes as like a man as I have ſeene one:
What would you ſpeake of him? ſpeake well I prethee,
Even for humanities cauſe.
1 Gent. You'd have it truth though?
Sha. What elſe ſir? I have no reaſon to wrong heav'n
To favour nature; let her beare her owne ſhame
If ſhe be faultie.
1 Gent. Monſtrous faultie there ſir.
Sha. I'm ill at eaſe already.
1 Gent. Pray beare up ſir.
Sha. I Prethee let me take him downwith ſpeed then,
Like a wild object that I would not looke upon.
1 Gent. Then thus: he's one that will endure as much
As can be lay'd upon him.
Sha. That may be noble:
I'm kept too long from his acquaintance.
1 Gent. O ſir,
Take heed of raſh repentance, y'are too forward
To find out vertue where it never ſetled:
Take the particulars firſt of what he endures;
Videlicet, Baſtinadoes by the great.
Sha. How!
1 Gent. Thumps by the dozen, and your kicks bywhole (tale.
Sha. No more of him.
1 Gent. The twinges by the noſtril he ſnuffes up,
And holds it the beſt remedy for ſneazing.
Sha. Away.
1 Gent. Has been thrice ſwitz't from ſeven a clock till (nine,
Yet with a Cart-Horſe ſtomack fell to break-faſt,
Forgetfull of his ſmart.
Sha. Nay, the diſgrace on't;
There is no ſmart but that: baſe things are felt
More by their ſhames then hurts Sir, I know you not,
But that you live an injury to nature:
I'm heartily angry with you.
Lap. Pray give your blow or kicke, and begon then:
For I ne're ſaw you before, and indeed,
Have nothing to ſay to you, for I know you not.
Sha. Why wouldſt thou take a blow?
Lap. I would not ſir,
Unleſſe 'twere offer'd me; and if from an enemy--
I'de be loth to deny it from a ſtranger.
Sha. What, a blow?
Endure a blow? and ſhall he live that gives it?
Lap. Many a faire yeare--why not ſir?
Sha. Let me wonder!
As full a man to ſee too, and as perfect---
I prethee live not long.
Lap. How?
Sha. Let me intreat it:
Thou doſt not know what wrong thou doſt mankind,
To walke ſo long here; not to dye betimes.
Let me adviſe thee, while thou haſt to live here,
Ev'n for mans honour ſake, take not a blow more.
Lap. You ſhould adviſe them not to ſtrike me then ſir,
For Ile take none I aſſure you, leſſe then are given.
Sha. How faine would I preſerve mans forme from (ſhame,
And cannot get it done? however ſir,
I charge thee live not long.
Lap. This is worſe then beating.
Sha. Of what profeſſion art thou, tell me ſir,
Beſides a Taylor? for Ile know the truth.
Lap. A Taylor? I'm as a good a Gentleman---
Can ſhew my armes and all.
Sha. How black and blew they are?
Is that your manifeſtation? upon paine
Of pounding thee to duſt, aſſume not wrong fully,
The name of Gentleman, becauſe I am one,
That muſt not let thee live.
Lap. I have done, I have done ſir,
If there be any harme, beſhrew the Herald,
I'em ſure I ha not been ſo long a gentleman,
To make this anger: I have nothing no where,
But what I dearely pay for. Exit.
Sh. Groom begone;
I never was ſo heart-ſick yet of man.

Enter Lady, the Dukes ſiſter, Lapets wife.

1. Gen. Here comes a cordiall Sir from tother ſex,
Able to make a dying face look chearfull.
Sh. The bleſſedneſſe of Ladies ——
Lady. Y'are well met ſir.
Sh. The ſight of you has put an evill from me,
Whoſe breath was able to make vertue ſicken.
Lady. I'me glad I came ſo fortunately. What was't ſir?
Sh. A thing that takes a blow, lives and eates after it,
In very good health; you ha' not ſeen the like Madam,
A monſter worth your ſixpence, lovely worth,
Speak low Sir; by all likely-hoods 'tis her husband,
That now beſtow'd a viſitation on me. Farewell ſir. Ex.
Sh. Husband? is't poſſible that he has a wife?
Would any creature have him? 'twas ſome fore'd match,
If he were not kick'd toth' Church oth' wedding day,
Ile never come at Court. Can be no otherwiſe:
Perhaps he was rich, ſpeak Miſtris Lapet, was it not ſo?
VVife. Nay, that's without all queſtion.
Sh. O ho, he would not want kickers enow then;
If you are wiſe, I much ſuſpect your honeſty;
For wiſedome never faſtens conſtantly,
But upon merit: If you incline to foole,
You are alike unfit for his ſocietie;
Nay if it were not boldneſſe in the man
That honours you, to adviſe you, troth his company
Should not be frequent with you.
VVife. 'Tis good counſell ſir.
Sh. Oh I am ſo carefull where I reverence,
So juſt to goodneſſe, and her precious purity,
I am as equallie jealous, and as fearefull,
That any undeſerved ſtaine might fall
Upon her ſanctified whiteneſſe, as of the ſin
That comes by wilfulneſſe.
VVife. Sir, I love your thoughts,
And honour you for your counſell and your care.
Sh. We are your ſervants. (have kiſt me:
VVife. Hee's but a gentleman oth' chamber, he might
Faith, where ſhall one finde leſſe courteſie, then at Court?
Say I have an undeſerver to my husband:
That's ne're the worſe for him: well ſtrange lipt men,
'Tis but a kiſſe loſt, there'll more come agen. Exit.

Enter the Paſſionate Lord, the Dukes Kinſman, makes a congie or two to nothing.

1. Gen. Look who comes here ſir, his love fit's upon him;
I know it, by that ſet ſmille, and thoſe congies.
How courteous hee's to nothing? which indeed,
Is the next kin to woman; onely ſhadow
The elder Siſter of the twaine, becauſe 'tis ſeen too.
See how it kiſſes the fore-finger ſtill;

Which

Which is the last edition, and being come
So neare the thumbe every Cobler has got it.
Sham. What a ridiculous peice, humanity
Here makes it selfe?
1 Gent. Nay good give leave a little sir,
Y'are so precise a manhood——
Sha. It afflicts me
When I behold unseemelinesse in an Image
So neare the Godhead, 'tis an injurie
To glorious Eternity.
1 Gent. Pray use patience sir.
Pas. I do confesse it freely precious Lady,
And loves suit 'is so, the longer it hangs
The worse it is; better cut off sweet Madam;
O that same drawing in your nether lip there,
Foreshewes no goodnesse Lady: make you question on't?
Shame on me but I love you.
1 Gent. Who is't sir,
You are at all this paines for? may I know her?
Pas. For thee thou fairest, yet the falsest woman,
That ever broke mans heart-strings.
1 Gent. How? how's this sir?
Pas. What, the old tricke of Ladies? mans apparrell,
Wilt nere be left amongst you? steale from Court in't?
1 Gent. I see the fit growes stronger.
Pas. Pray let's talke a little.
Sha. I can endure no more.
1 Gen. Good, let us alone a little:
You are so exact a worke-love light things somewhat sir.
Sha. Th'are all but shames.
1 Gen. What is't you'd say to me sir?
Pas. Can you be so forgetfull to enquire it Lady?
1 Gent. Yes truly sir.
Pas. The more I admire your flintinesse:
What cause have I given you, illustrious Madam,
To play this strange part with me?
1 Gent. Cause enough,
Do but looke backe sir into your memorie,
Your love to other women ô lewd man,
'Tas almost kil'd my heart, you see I'm chang'd with it,
Iha' lost the fashion of my Sexe with griefe on't,
When I have seen you courting of a Dowdie;
Compar'd with me, and kissing your fore-finger
To one o'th' black-guards Mistresses: would not this
Cracke a poore Ladies heart, that beleev'd love,
And waited for the comfort? but 'twas said sir,
A Lady of my haire cannot want pittying:
The Countries coming up, farewell to you sir.
Pas. Whither intend you sir?
1 Gent. A long journey sir:
The truth is, I'm with child, and goe to travell.
Pas. With child? I never got it.
1 Gent. I heard you were busie
At the same time sir, and was loath to trouble you.
Pas. Why, are not you a whore then, excellent Madam?
1 Gent. O by no meanes, 'twas done sir in the state
Of my beliefe in you, and that quits me,
It lies upon your falshod.
Pas. Does it so?
You shall not carry her though sir, she's my contract.
2 Gent. I prethee thou four Elements ill brued,
Torment none but thy selfe; away I say
Thou beast of passion, as the drunkard is
The beast of wine; dishonour to thy making,
Thou man in fragments.
Pas. Heare me pretious Madam.
Sham. Kneele for thy wits to heaven.
Pas. Lady, I'le father it,
Who ere begot it: 'tis the course of greatnesse.
Sha. How vertue grownes at this?
Pas. I'le raile the Court, but I'le stay your flight.
Sha. How wretched is that peice? Ex. Pas. Lord.
1 Gen. He's the Dukes kinsman sir.
Sha. That cannot take a passion away sir,
Nor cut a fit, but one poore houre shorter,
He must endure as much as the poorest begger,
That cannot charge his money; there's the equality
In our impartiall essence:
What's the newes now? Ent. a Servant.
Ser. Your worthy brother sir, has left his charge,
And come to see you. Ent. Shamonts brother a Souldier.
Sha. O the noblest welcome
That ever came from man, meet thy deservings:
Methinkes I've all joyes treasure in mine armes now,
Soul. You are so fortunate in prevention brother,
You alwaies leave the answerer barren sir,
You comprehend in few words so much worth——
Sha. 'Tis all too little for thee: come th'art welcome,
So I include all: take especiall knowledge pray,
Of this deare Gentleman, my absolute friend,
That loves a Souldier far above a Mistris,
Thou excellently faithfull to 'em both.
But love to manhood, ownes the purer troath. Exeunt.

Actus Secundus. Scæna prima.

Enter Shamonts brother a Souldier, and a Lady the Dukes sister.

Lady THere should be in this gallery—— oh th'are here,
Pray sit downe; beleeve me sir I'm weary.
Soul. It well becomes a Lady to complaine a little
Of what she never feeles: your walke was short Madam,
You can be but affraid of wearinesse;
Which well employes the softnesse of your Sexe,
As for the thing it selfe, you never came to't.
La. Y'are wonderously well read in Ladies sir,
Soul. Shall I thinke such a creature as you Madam,
Was ever borne to feele paine, but in travell?
There's your full portion,
Besides a little toothache in the breeding,
Which a kind husband too, takes from you Madam.
La. But where do Ladies sir, find such kind husbands?
Perhaps you have heard
The Rhumaticke story of some loving Chandler now,
Or some such melting fellow, that you talke
So prodigall of mens kindnesse: I confesse sir,
Many of those wives are happy, their ambition
Does reach no higher, then to love and ignorance,
Which makes an excellent husband, and a fond one:
Now sir, your great ones aime at height, and cunning,
And so are oft deceiv'd, yet they must venture it;
For 'tis a Ladies contumely sir,
To have a Lord an Ignorant; then the worlds voice
Will deeme her for a wanton ere she taste on't:
But to deceive a wise man, to whose circumspection,
The world resignes it selfe with all his envy;
'Tis lesse dishonour to us then to fall,
Because his beleev'd wisdome keepes out all.
Sould. Would I were the man Lady, that should venture

His

His wiſedome to your goodneſſe.
Lad. You might faile
In the returne, as many men have done ſir:
I dare not juſtifie what is to come of me,
Becauſe I know it not, though I hope vertuouſly;
Marry what's paſt or preſent, I durſt put
Into a good mans hand, Which if he take
Upon my word for good, it ſhall not couzen him.
Sol. No, nor hereafter?
Lad. It may happ'n too ſir:
A womans goodneſſe, when ſhe is a wife,
Lies much upon a mans deſert, believe it ſir,
If there be fault in her, Ile pawn my life on't,
'Tis firſt in him, if ſhe were ever good,
That makes one; knowing not a husband yet,
Or what he may be, I promiſe no more vertues,
Then I may well performe, for that were couſenage.
Sol. Happy were he that had you with all feares,
That's my opinion, Lady.
Enter Shamont & a ſervant liſtning.
Ser. What ſay you now ſir?
Dare you give confidence to your owne eyes?
Sha. Not yet I dare not.
Ser. No?
Sha. Scarce yet, or yet:
Although I ſee 'tis he. Why can a thing,
That's but my ſelfe divided be ſo falſe?
Ser. Nay doe but marke how the chaire plaies his part too:
How amorouſly 'tis bent.
Sha. Hell take thy bad thoughts,
For they are ſtrange ones. Never take delight
To make a torment worſe. Look on 'em heaven,
For that's a brother: ſend me a faire enemy,
And take him; for a fouler fiend there breathes not:
I will not ſin, to think there's ill in her,
But what's of his producing.
Yet goodneſſe, whoſe incloſure is but fleſh,
Holds out oft times but ſorrily. But as black ſir,
As ever kindred was: I hate mine owne bloud,
Becauſe it is ſo neare thine. Live without honeſty,
And maiſt thou dye with an unmoiſtned eye,
And no teare follow thee. Ex. Shamont, Servant.
Lad. Y'are wondrous merry ſir; I would your Brother heard you.
Sold. O my ſiſter
I would not out oth' way, let fall my words Lady,
For the preciſeſt humour.
Enter Paſſionate Lord.
Paſ. Yea, ſo cloſe.
Sol. Th'are merry, that's the worſt you can report on 'em;
Th'are neither dangerous, nor immodeſt.
Paſ. So ſir,
Shall I believe you, think you?
Sold. Who's this Lady?
Lad. O the Dukes Couſen; he came late from travel ſir.
Sold. Reſpect belongs to him.
Paſ. For as I ſaid Lady,
Th'are merry that's the worſt you can report of 'em:
Th'are neither dangerous, nor immodeſt.
Sold. How's this?
Paſ. And there I think I left.
Sold. Abuſes me.
Paſ. Now to proceed, Lady; perhaps I ſwore I lov'd you,
If you believe me not, y'are much the wiſer.
Sol. He ſpeaks ſtill in my perſon, and derides me.
Paſ. For I can cog with you.
Lad. You can all doe ſo.
We make no queſtion of mens promptneſs that way.
Paſ. And ſmile, & wave a chair with comely grace too,
Play with our Taſſle gently, and doe fine things,
That catch a Lady ſooner then a vertue.
Sol. I never us'd to let man live ſo long
That wrong'd me.
Pa. Talke of Battalions, wooe you in a skirmiſh;
Divine my mind to you Lady; and being ſharp ſet,
Can court you at halfe pike: or name your weapon,
We cannot faile you Lady. Enter 1 Gen.
Sol. Now he dies:
Were all ſucceeding hopes ſtor'd up within him.
1 Ge. O fie, i'th' Court ſir?
Sol. I moſt dearely thanke you ſir.
1 Ge. Tis rage ill ſpent upon a paſſionate mad-man.
Sol. That ſhall not priviledge him for ever ſir:
A mad-man call you him? I have found too much reaſon
Sound in his injurie to me, to beleeve him ſo.
1 Ge. If ever truth from mans lips may be held
In reputation with you, give this confidence;
And this his love-fit, which we obſerve ſtill,
By's flattering and his fineneſs: at ſome other time,
Hee'l goe as ſlovenly as heart can wiſh.
The love and pity that his Highneſſe ſhewes to him,
Makes every man the more reſpectfull of him:
Has never a paſſion, but is well provided for,
As this of Love, he is full fed in all;
His ſwinge as I may tearme it: have but patience,
And ye ſhall witneſſe ſomewhat.
Sol. Still he mocks me:
Looke you, in action, in behaviour ſir;
Hold ſtill the chaire, with a grand miſchiefe to you,
Or Ile ſet ſo much ſtrength upon your heart ſir ——
Pa. I feele ſome power has reſtrain'd me Lady:
If it be ſent from love, ſay, I obey it,
And ever keep a voice to welcome it.

Song.

THou Deitie, ſwift winged love,
Sometimes below, ſometimes above,
Little in ſhape, but great in power,
Thou that makeſt a heart thy Tower,
And thy loop-holes, Ladies eyes,
From whence thou ſtrik'ſt the fond and wiſe.
Did all the ſhafts in thy faire quiver
Stick faſt in my ambitious liver;
Yet thy power would I adore,
And call upon thee to ſhoot more.
ſhoot more, ſhoot more.

Enter one like a Cupid offring to ſhoot at him.
Paſ. I prethee hold though, ſweet Cæleſtiall boy;
I'm not requited yet with love enough,
For the firſt arrow that I have within me:
And if thou be an equall archer Cupid,
Shoot this Lady, and twenty more for me.
Lad. Me ſir?
1 Gen. Tis nothing but device, feare it not Lady;
You may be as good a maid after that ſhaft Madam,
As ere your mother was at twelve and a halfe:
Tis like the boy that drawes it, 'tas no ſting yet.
Cup. Tis like the miſerable maid that drawes it —— aſide.
That ſees no comfort yet, ſeeing him ſo paſſionate.
Paſ. Strike me the Ducheſſe of Valois in love with me,
With all the ſpeed thou canſt, and two of her women.
Cup. You

Cu. You ſhall have more. Exit.
Paſ. Tell 'em I tarry for 'em.
1 Gen. Who would be angry with that walking trouble
That hurts none but it ſelfe? (now
Soul. I am better quieted.
Paſ. Ile have all women-kind ſtrucke in time for me
After thirteene once:
I ſee this Cupid will not let me want,
And let him ſpend his forty ſhafts an houre,
They ſhall be all found from the Dukes Exchequer;
He's come already.

Enter againe the ſame Cupid, two brothers, 6 women Maſkers, Cupids bow bent all the way towards them, the firſt woman ſinging and playing, A Prieſt.

The Song.

O turne thy bow,
Thy power we feele and know,
Faire Cupid turne away thy bow:
They be thoſe golden Arrowes,
Bring Ladies all their ſorrowes,
And till there be more truth in men,
Never ſhoot at maid agen.

Paſ. What a felicity of whores are here?
And all my concubines, ſtrucke bleeding new?
A man can in his life time make but one woman,
But he may make his fifty Queanes a month.
Cu. Have you remembred a Prieſt honeſt brothers?
1 Bro. Yes ſiſter, and this is the young gentleman,
Make you no queſtion of our faithfulneſſe.
2 Bro. His growing ſhame ſiſter provokes our care.
Prieſt. He muſt be taken in this fit of love Gentlemen.
1 Bro. What elſe ſir? he ſhall do't.
2 Bro. Enough.
1 Bro. Be cheerefull wench. A dance, Cupid leading.
Paſ. Now by the ſtroake of pleaſure, a deep oath,
Nimbly hopt Ladies all; what height they beare too?
A ſtory higher then your common ſtatures;
A little man muſt go up ſtaires to kiſſe 'em:
What a great ſpace there is
Betwixt loves dyning Chamber, and his Garret?
Ile trie the utmoſt height--the Garret ſtoopes methinkes;
The roomes are made all bending, I ſee that,
And not ſo high as a man takes 'em for.
Cu. Now if you'l follow me ſir, I've that power,
To make them follow you.
Paſ. Are they all ſhot?
Cu. All, all ſir, every mothers daughter of 'em. (ſhot,
Paſ. Then there's no feare of following; if they be once
They'l follow a man to th' devill--As for you ſir--Ex. with the Lady, & the Maskers.
Soul. Me ſir? (Soul. Me ſir?
1 Gent. Nay ſweet ſir.
Soul. A noiſe, a threatning; did you not heare it ſir?
1 Gent. Without regard ſir, ſo would I heare you.
Soul. This muſt come to ſomething, never talke of that
You never ſaw it otherwiſe. (Sir,
1 Gen. Nay deare merit ——
Soul. Me above all men?
1 Gen. Troth you wrong your anger.
Soul. I will be arm'd my honourable Letcher.
1 Gent. O fie ſweet ſir.
Soul. That devoures womens honeſties by lumps;
And never chawſt thy pleaſure.
1 Gent. What do you meane ſir?
Soul. What does he meane t' ingroſſe all to himſelfe?
There's others love a whore, as well as he ſir.
1 Gen. Oh an' that be part o'th furie, we have a Citty
Is very well provided for that caſe;
Let him alone with her, ſir we have women
Are very charitable to proper men,
And to a Souldier that has all his limbes;
Marry the ſicke and lame gets not a penny:
Right womens charity, and the husbands follow't too:
Here comes his highneſſe ſir.

Enter Duke, and Lords.

Soul. Ile walke to coole my ſelfe. Exit.
Du. Who's that?
1 Gen. The brother of Shamont.
Du. He's Brother then
To all the Courts love, they that love diſcreetly,
And place their friendlineſſe upon deſert:
As for the reſt, that with a double face
Looke upon merit, much like fortunes viſage,
That lookes two waies, both to life's calmes and ſtormes,
Ile ſo provide for him, chiefly for him,
He ſhall not wiſh their loves, nor dread their envies.
And here comes my Shament. Enter Shamont.
Sha. That Ladies vertues are my only joyes,
And he to offer to lay fiedge to them?
Du. Shamont.
Sha. Her goodneſſe is my pride; in all diſcourſes,
As often as I here raſh tongued gallants,
Speake rudely of a woman, preſently
I give in but her name, and th'are all ſilent:
O who would loſe this benefit?
Du. Come hether ſir.
Sha. 'Tis like the gift of healing, but diviner;
For that but cures diſeaſes in the body,
This workes a cure on fame, on reputation:
The nobleſt piece of Surgery upon earth.
Du. Shamont; he minds me not.
Sha. A Brother do't?
Du. Shamont I ſay. Gives him a touch with his ſwitch.
Sha. Ha?
If he be mortall, by this hand he periſhes; Drawes.
Unleſſe it be a ſtroake from heaven, he dies for't.
Du. Why, how now ſir? 'twas I.
Sha. The more's my miſerie.
Du. Why, what's the matter prethee?
Sha. Can you aske it ſir?
No man elſe ſhould; ſtood forty lives before him,
By this I would have op'd my way to him;
It could not be you ſir, excuſe him not,
What ere he be, as y'are deere to honour,
That I may find my peace agen.
Du. Forbeare I ſay,
Upon my love to truth, 'twas none but I.
Sha. Still miſerable?
Du. Come, come, what ailes you ſir?
Sha. Never ſate ſhame cooling ſo long upon me,
Without a ſatisfaction in revenge,
And heaven has made it here a ſin to wiſh it.
Du. Harke you ſir?
Sha. O y'ave undone me.
Du. How?
Sha. Cruelly undone me;
I have loſt my peace, and reputation by you:
Sir pardon me, I can never love you more. Exit.
Du. What language call you this ſirs?

1 Gen. Truth my Lord, I've ſeldome heard a ſtranger.—
2 Gent. He is a man of a moſt curious valour,
Wondrous preciſe, and punctuall in that vertue.
Du. But why to me ſo punctuall? my laſt thought
Was moſt intirely fixt on his advancement:
Why, I came now to put him in poſſeſſion
Of his faire fortunes: what a miſ-conceiver 'tis?
And from a Gentleman of our Chamber meerely,
Made him Vice-Admirall; I was ſetled in't,
I love him next to health: call him Gentlemen;
Why would not you, or you ha' taken as much,
And never murmur'd? Exit. 1 Gent.
2 Gent. Troath, I thinke we ſhould my Lord,
And there's a fellow walkes about the Court,
Would take a hundred of 'em.
Du. I hate you all for't,
And rather praiſe his high pitch'd fortitude,
Though in extreames for niceneſſe: now I thinke on't,
I would I had never done't.—Now ſir, where is he?
Enter 1 Gentleman.
1 Gent. His ſute is only fit to be excuſ'd.
Du. He ſhall not be excus'd, I love him dearelier:
Say we intreat him; goe, he muſt not leave us. Ex. 2 Gen.
So vertue bleſſe me, I nere knew him parraleld;
Why, he's more pretious to me now, then ever.
Enter 2 Gent. and Shamont.
2 Gent. With much faire language, w'ave brought him?
Du. Thankes——Where is he?
2 Gent. Yonder ſir.
Du. Come forward man.
Sha. Pray pardon me, I'm aſham'd to be ſeene ſir.
Du. Was ever ſuch a touchie man heard of?
Prethee come nearer.
Sha. More into the light?
Put not ſuch cruelty into your requeſts my Lord,
Firſt to diſgrace me publikely, and then draw me
Into mens eyeſight, with the ſhame yet hot
Upon my reputation.
Du. What diſgrace ſir?
Sha. What?
Such as there can be no forgiveneſſe for,
That I can find in honour.
Du. That's moſt ſtrange ſir.
Sha. Yet I have ſearch'd my boſome to find one,
And wreſled with my inclination,
But 'twill not be: would you had kild me ſir,
With what an eaſe had I forgiven you then?
But to endure a ſtroke from any hand
Under a punniſhing Angels, which is juſtice,
Honour diſclame that man, for my part chiefly:
Had it been yet the malice of your ſword,
Though it had cleft me, 'thad been noble to me;
You ſhould have found my thankes paid in a ſmile
If I had fell unworded; but to ſhame me,
With the correction that your horſe ſhould have,
Were you ten thouſand times my royall Lord,
I cannot love you never, nor deſire to ſerve you more.
If your drum call me, I am vowed to valour,
But peace ſhall never know me yours agen,
Becauſe I've loſt mine owne, I ſpeake to dye ſir;
Would you were gratious that way to take off ſhame,
With the ſame ſwiftneſſe as you powre it on:
And ſince it is not in the power of Monarches
To make a Gentleman, which is a ſubſtance
Only begot of merit, they ſhould be carefull
Not to deſtroy the worth of one ſo rare,
Which neither they can make; nor loſt, repaire. Exit.
Du. Y'ave ſet a faire light ſir before my judgement,
Which burnes with wondrous clearnes; I acknowledge it,
And your worth with it: but then ſir, my love,
My love —— what gone agen?
1 Gen. And full of ſcorne my Lord.
Du. That language will undoe the man that keeps it,
Who knows no difference twixt contempt and manhood.
Upon your love to goodnes, gentlemen, } Enter a
Let me not loſe him long: how now? } Huntſman
Hunt. The game's at height my Lord.
Du. Confound both, thee and it thence breake it off;
He hates me brings me newes of any pleaſure:
I felt not ſuch a conflict ſince I cou'd;
Diſtinguiſh betwixt worthineſſe and bloud Ex.

Actus Tertius. Scæna prima.

Enter the two brothers, 1 Gentleman, with thoſe that were the Maskers, and the Cupid.

1 Gen. I heartily commend your project Gentlemen,
'Twas wiſe and vertuous.
1 Bro. 'Twas for the ſafety
Of pretious honour ſir, which neere bloud binds us to:
He promis'd the poore eaſie foole there marriage,
There was a good maiden-head loſt i'th' beliefe on't,
Beſhrew her haſty confidence.
1 Gen. O no more ſir,
You make her weep agen; alas poore Cupid:
Shall ſhe not ſhift her ſelfe?
1 Bro. O by no meanes ſir:
We dare not have her ſeen yet, all the while
She keepes this ſhape, 'tis but thought device,
And ſhe may follow him ſo without ſuſpition,
To ſee if ſhe can draw all his wilde paſſions,
To one point only, and that's love, the maine point:
So far his highneſſe grants, and gave at firſt,
Large approbation to the quicke conceit,
Which then was quicke indeed.
1 Gent. You make her bluſh in ſooth.
1 Bro. I feare 'tis more the flagg of ſhame, then grace
1 Gen. They both give but one kind of colour ſir: (ſir.
If it be baſhfulneſſe in that kind taken,
It is the ſame with grace; and there ſhe weepes agen.
In truth y'are too hard, much, much too bitter ſir,
Unleſſe you meane to have her weepe her eyes out,
To play a Cupid truly.
1 Bro. Come, ha' done then:
We ſhould all feare to ſin firſt; for 'tis certaine,
When 'tis once lodg'd, though entertain'd in mirth,
It muſt be wept out, if it ere come forth.
1 Gent. Now 'tis ſo well, I'le leave you.
1 Bro. Faithfully welcome ſir,
Go Cupid to your charge; hee's your owne now;
If he want love, none will be blam'd but you.
Cu. The ſtrangeſt marriage, and unfortunat'ſt Bride
That ever humane memory contain'd;
I cannot be my ſelfe for't. Exit.
Clo. Oh Gentlemen? Enter the Clowne.
1 Bro. How now ſir, what's the matter?
Clo. His melancholly paſſion is halfe ſpent already,
Then comes his angry fit at the very taile on't,
Then comes in my pain gentlemen, has beate me e'ne to a
Cullis

Cullis. I am nothing, right worſhipfull, but very pap,
And jelly: I have no bones, my body's all one buſines,
They talk of ribs, & chines moſt freely abroad i'th' world,
Why, I have no ſuch thing; who ever lives to ſee me dead
Gentlemen, ſhall find me all mummie good to fill galipots
And long dildo glaſſes: I ſhall not have a bone to throw
At a dog.

Omnes. Alas poore vaſſall, how he goes?

Clo. O Gentlemen,
I am unjoynted, do but thinke o' that:
My breaſt is beat into my mawe, that what I eate,
I am faine to take't in all at mouth with ſpoones;
A lamentable hearing; and 'tis well knowne, my belly
Is driven into my backe.
I earn'd foure Crowns a month, moſt dearely Gentlemen,
And one he muſt have when the fit's upon him,
The privy purſe allowes it, and 'tis thriftineſſe,
He would breake elſe ſome fourty pounds in caſements,
And in five hundred yeares undo the Kingdome:
I have caſt it up to a quarrell.

1 Bro. There's a fellow kickt about court, I would
He had his place brother, but for one fit of his indignation.

2 Bro. And ſuddenly I have thought upon a means for't.

1 Bro. I Prethee how?

2 Bro. 'Tis but preferring Brother
This ſtockfiſh to his ſervice, with a letter
Of commendations, the ſame way he wiſhes it,
And then you win his heart: for o' my knowledge
He has laied waite this halfe yeare for a fellow
That will be beaten; and with a ſafe conſcience
We may commend the carriage of this man in't;
Now ſervants he has kept, luſty tall feeders,
But they have beate him, and turn'd themſelves away:
Now one that would endure, is like to ſtay,
And get good wages of him; and the ſervice too
Is ten times milder Brother, I would not wiſh it elſe.
I ſee the fellow has a ſore eruſh'd body,
And the more need he has to be kickt at eaſe. (a Maſter.

Clo. I ſweet Gentlemen, a kick of eaſe, ſend me to ſuch

2 Bro. No more I ſay, we have one for thee, a ſoft footed
One that weares wooll in's toes. (Maſter,

Clo. O Gentlemen, ſoft garments may you weare,
Soft ſkins may you wed,
But as plump as pillowes, both for white and red.
And now will I reveale a ſecret to you,
Since you provide for my poore fleſh ſo tenderly,
Has hir'd meere Rogues, out of his Chamber window,
To beate the Souldier, Mounſier Shamonts Brother.

1 Bro. That nothing concernes us ſir.

Clo. For no cauſe Gentlemen,
Unleſſe it be for wearing ſhoulder points,
With longer taggs then his.

2 Bro. Is not that ſomewhat?
Birlakin ſir, the difference of long taggs,
Has coſt many a mans life, and advanc'd other ſome,
Come follow me.

Clo. See what a gull am I:
Oh every man in his profeſſion;
I know a thumpe now, as juditiouſly,
As the proudeſt he that walkes, I'le except none;
Come to a tagge, how ſhort I fall? I'm gone. Exeunt

Enter Lapet.

Lap. I have been ruminating with my ſelfe,
What honour a man loſes by a kicke:
Why, what's a kicke? the fury of a foote,
Whoſe indignation commonly is ſtampt
Upon the hinder quarter of a man;
Which is a place very unfit for honour,
The world will confeſſe ſo much:
Then what diſgrace I pray, does that part ſuffer
Where honour never comes, I'd faine know that?
This being well forc'd, and urg'd, may have the power
To move moſt Gallants to take kickes in time,
And ſpurne out the duelloes out o'th' kingdome,
For they that ſtand upon their honour moſt,
When they conceive there is no honour loſt,
As by a table that I have invented
For that purpoſe alone, ſhall appeare plainly,
Which ſhewes the vanity of all blowes at large,
And with what eaſe they may be tooke of all ſides,
Numbring but twice one the Letters Patience
From C. P. to E. I doubt not but in ſmall time
To ſee a diſſolution of all bloudſhed,
If the Reform'd Kick do but once get up:
For what a lamentable folly 'tis,
If we obſerv't, for every little juſtle,
Which is but the ninth part of a ſound thump,
In our meeke computation, we muſt fight forſooth, yes,
If kill, I'm hang'; if I be kil'd my ſelfe,
I dye for't alſo: is not this trim wiſdome?
Now for the Con, a man may be well beaten,
Yet paſſe away his foureſcore yeares ſmooth after:
I had a father did it, and to my power
I will not be behind him. Enter Shamont.

Sha. O well met.

Lap. Now a fine punch or two, I looke for't duly.

Sha. I've been to ſeeke you.

Lap. Let me know your lodging ſir,
I'le come to you once a day, and uſe your pleaſure ſir.

Sha. I'm made the fitteſt man for thy Society:
I'le live and dye with thee: come ſhew me a Chamber;
There is no houſe but thine, but only thine,
That's fit to cover me: I've tooke a blow ſirrah.

Lap. I would you had indeed: why, you may ſee ſir;
You'l all come to't in time, when my booke's out.

Sha. Since I did ſee thee laſt, I've tooke a blow.

Lap. Pha ſir that's nothing; I ha' tooke fourty ſince.

Sha. What? and I charg'd thee thou ſhouldſt not?

Lap. I ſir, you might charge your pleaſure,
But they would giv't me, whether I would or no.

Sha. Oh I walke without my peace, I've no companion.
Prethee reſolve me, for I cannot aske (now;
A man more beaten to experience,
Then thou art in this kind, what manner of blow
*I*s held the moſt diſgracefull, or diſtaſtefull?
For thou doſt only cenſure 'em by the hurt,
Not by the ſhame they do thee; yet having felt
Abuſes of all kindes, thou mayſt deliver,
Though't be by chance, the moſt injurious one.

Lap. You put me to't ſir; but to tell you truth,
Th'are all as one with me, little exception.

Sha. That little may do much, let's have it from you.

Lap. With all the ſpeed I may; firſt then, and formoſt,
I hold ſo reverently of the Baſtinado ſir,
That if it were the deareſt friend i'th' world,
I'd put it into his hand.

Sha. Go too, I'le paſſe that then.

Lap. Y'are the more happy ſir,
Would I were paſt it too:
But being accuſtom'd to't, *I*t is the better carried.

Sha. Will you forward? (dowſt,

Lap. Then there's your ſowce, your wherrit, and your

Tuggs on the haire, your bob o'th' lips, a whelpe on't,
I nere could find much difference: Now your thumpe,
A thing deriv'd first from your Hemp-beaters,
Takes a mans Wind away, most spitefully:
There's nothing that destroyes a Collicke like it,
For't leaves no wind i'th' body.
Sha. On sir, on.
Lap. Pray give me leave, I'm out of breath with thinking
Sha. This is far off yet. (ont.
Lap. For the twinge byth' nose,
'Tis certainly unsightly, so my tables saies,
But helpes against the head-ache, woundrous strangely.
Sha. Is't possible?
Lap. O your crush'd nostrils slakes your opilation
And makes your pent powers flush to wholsome sneezes.
Sha. I never thought there had been halfe that vertue
In a wrung nose before.
Lap. O plenitude sir:
Now come we lower, to our moderne kick,
Which has been mightily in use of late,
Since our young men dranke Coltsfoot: and I grant you,
'Tis a most scornefull wrong, cause the foot plaies it;
But marke agen, how we that take't, requite it
With the like scorne, for we receive it backeward;
And can there be a worse disgrace retorted?
Sha. And is this all?
Lap. All but a lugg byth' eare,
Or such a trifle.
Sha. Happy sufferer,
All this is nothing to the wrong I beare:
I see the worst disgrace, thou never felt'st yet;
It is so far from thee, thou canst not thinke on't;
Nor dare I let thee know, it is so abject.
Lap. I would you would though, that I might prepare
For I shall ha't at one time or another: (for't,
If't be a thwacke, I make account of that;
There's no new fashion'd swappe that ere came up yet,
But I've the first on 'em, I thanke 'em for't.

Enter the Lady, and Servants.

Lad. Hast thou enquir'd?
1 Ser. But Can heare nothing Madam.
Sha. If there be but so much substance in thee
To make a shelter for a man disgrac'd,
Hide my departure from that glorious woman
That comes with all perfection about her:
So noble, that I dare not be seene of her,
Since shame tooke hold of me: upon thy life
No mention of me.
Lap. I'le cut out my tongue first,
Before I'le loose my life, there's more belongs to't.
Lad. See there's a Gentleman, enquire of him.
2 Ser. For Mounsier Shamont Madam?
Lad. For whom else sir?
1 Ser. Why, this fellow dares not see him.
Lad. How?
1 Ser. Shamont Madam?
His very name's worse then a feavour to him,
And when he cries, there's nothing stils him sooner;
Madam, your Page of thirteene is to hard for him,
'Twas tri'd i'th' wood-yard.
Lad. Alas poore grieved Merit!
What is become of him? if he once faile,
Vertue shall find small friendship: farewell then
To Ladies worths, for any hope in men,
He lov'd for goodnesse, not for Wealth, or luft,
After the worlds foule dotage, he nere courted
The body but the beauty of the mind,
A thing which common courtship never thinkes on:
All his affections were so sweet and faire,
There is no hope for fame if he dispaire. Ex. Lad. and Ser.

Enter the Clowne. He kicks Lapet.

Lap. Good morrow to you agen most heartily sir,
Crie you mercy I heard you not, I was somewhat busie.
Clo. He takes it as familiarly, as an Ave,
Or pretious salutation: I was sicke till I had one,
Because I am so us'd to't.
Lap. How ever you deserve, your friends & mine, here
Give you large commendations i' this Letter,
They say you will endure well.
Clo. I'd be loath
To prove 'em liers: I've endur'd as much
As mortall pen and Inke can set me downe for.
Lap. Say you me so?
Clo. I know and feele it so sir,
I have it under black and white already;
I need no pen to paint me out.
Lap. He fits me,
And hits my wishes pat, pat: I was nere
In possibility to be better man'd,
For he's halfe lam'd already, I see't plaine,
But take no notice on't, for feare I make
The Rascall proud, and deare, to advance his wages;
First let me grow into particulars with you;
What have you indur'd of worth? let me heare.
Clo. Marry sir, I'm almost beaten blind.
Lap. That's pretty well for a begining,
But many a milhorse has endur'd as much.
Clo. Shame o' the millers heart for his unkindnesse then.
Lap. Well sir, what then?
Clo. I've been twise throwne down staires, just before (supper.
Lap. Puh, so have I, that's nothing.
Clo. I but sir,
Was yours pray before supper?
Lap. There thou poleft me.
Clo. I marry, that's it, 't'ad been lesse griefe to me,
Had I but fil'd my bellie, and then tumbled,
But to be flung downe fasting, there's the dolour.
Lap. It would have griev'd me, that indeed: proceed sir.
Clo. I have been pluck'd & tugg'd bith' haire o'th' head
About a gallerie, halfe an Acre long.
Lap. Yes, that's a good one, I must needs confesse,
A principall good one that, an absolute good one,
I have bin trod upon, and spurn'd about,
But never tugg'd byth' haire, I thanke my fates.
Clo. O 'tis a spitefull paine.
Lap. Peace, never speake on't,
For putting men in mind on't.
Clo. To conclude,
I'm burften sir: my belly will hold no meat.
Lap. No? that makes amends for all.
Clo. Unlesse't be puddings,
Or such fast food, any loose thing beguiles me, I'm nere the Lap. Sheepheads will stay with thee? (better for't.
Clo. Yes sir, or Chaldrons.
Lap. Very well sir:
Any your burften fellowes must take heed of surfets:
Strange things it seemes, you have endur'd;
Clo. Too true sir.
Lap. But now the question is, what you will endure
Hereafter in my service?
Clo. Any thing
That shall be reason sir, for I'm but froath;

Much

Much like a thing new calv'd, or come more nearer sir,
Y'ave seen a Clutter of Frog-spawns in April,
E'ne such a starche am I, as weak and tender
As a green woman yet.
Lap. Now I know this,
I will be very gently angry with thee,
And kick thee carefully.
Clow. O I sweet sir.
Lap. Peace, when thou art offer'd well, lest I begin now.
Your friends and mine have writ here for your truth,
They'll passe their words themselves, and I must meet 'em.
Clow. Then have you all: Exit.
As for my honesty there is no feare of that,
For I have ne're a whole bone about me. Exit.

Musick. Enter the passionate Cousen, rudely, and carelesly Apparell'd, unbrac'd, and unmust: The Cupid following.

Cup. Think upon love, which makes all creatures hand-some,
Seemly for ey-sight; goe no so diffusedly,
There are great Ladies purpose sir to visit you.
Pas. Grand plagues, shut in my casements, that the breaths
Of their Coach-mares reek not into my Nostrills;
Those beasts are but a kinde of Bawdy fore-runners.
Cup. It is not well with you,
When you speak ill of faire Ladies.
Pas. Faire mischiefs, give me a nest of Owles, and take 'em;
Happy is he say I, whose window opens
To a browne Bakers chimney, he shall be sure there
To heare the Bird sometimes after twi-light:
What a fine thing 'tis me thinks to have our garments
Sit loose upon us thus, thus carelessely,
It is more manly, and more mortifying;
For w'are so much the readier for our shrouds:
For how ridiculous wer't, to have death come,
And take a fellow pinn'd up like a Mistris?
About his neck a Ruffe, like a pinch't Lanthorne,
Which Schoole-boyes make in winter; and his dublet
So close and pent, as if he fear'd one prison
Would not be strong enough, to keep his soule in;
But's Tailor makes another:
And trust me, for I know't when I lov'd Cupid,
He does endure much paine, for the poore praise
Of a neat sitting suit.
Cup. One may be handsome sir,
And yet not pain'd, not proud.
Pas. There you lie Cupid,
As bad as Mercurie: there is no handsomeneſſe,
But has a wash of Pride and Luxury,
And you goe there too Cupid. Away dissembler,
Thou takst the deeds part which befooles us all;
Thy Arrow heads shoot out sinners: hence away,
And after thee Ile send a powerfull charme,
Shall banish thee for ever.
Cup. Never, never,
I am too sure thine owne. Exit.

Pas. Sings.

HEnce all you vaine Delights,
As short as are the nights,
Wherein you spend your folly,
There's nought in this life sweet,
If man were wise to see't,
But only Melancholy,
O sweetest melancholy.
Welcome folded Armes, and fixed eyes,
A sigh that piercing mortifies,
A look that's fastned to the ground,
A tongue chain'd up without a sound.

Fountaine heads, and pathlesse Groves,
Places which pale passion loves:
Moon-light walkes, when all the fowles
Are warmly hous'd, save Bats and Owles;
A mid-night Bell, a parting groane,
These are the sounds we feed upon;
Then stretch our bones in a still gloomy valley,
Nothing's so dainty sweet as lovely melancholy.
Exit.

Enter at another doore Lapet, The Cupids Brothers watching his comming.

1 Br. So, so, the Wood-cock's gin'd;
Keep this doore fast brother.
2 Bro. Ile warrant this.
1 Bro. Ile goe incense him instantly;
I know the way to't.
2 Bro. Wilt not be too soon think you,
And make two fits break into one?
1 Bro. Pah, no, no; The taile of his melancho
Is always the head of his anger, and followes as close,
As the Report followes the powder.
Lap. This is the appoynted place, and the houre struck,
If I can get security for's truth,
Ile never minde his honesty: poore worme,
I durst lay him by my wife, which is a benefit
Which many masters ha 'not: I shall ha' no maid
Now got with childe, but what I get my selfe,
And that's no small felicity: In most places
Th'are got by th' men, and put upon the Masters:
Nor shall I be resisted when I strike,
For he can hardly stand; these are great blessings.
Pas. I want my food, deliver me a varlet. within.
Lap. How now: from whence comes that?
Pas. I am allow'd a Carcaise to insult on;
Where's the villaine?
Lap. He meanes not me I hope.
Pas. My maintenance rascals; my Bulk, my exhibition.
Lap. Blesse us all,
What name's are these? would I were gone agen.

The passionate man enters in furie, with a Truncheon,

He Sings:

A Curse upon thee for a slave,
Art thou here, and hear'st me rave?
Fly not sparkles from mine eye,
To shew my indignation nye?
Am I not all foame, and fire?
With voice as hoarse, as a Towne-criers?
How my back opes and shuts together,
With furie, as old mens with weather?
Could'st thou not heare my teeth knash hither?

Lap. No truely sir, I thought 't had been a Squirrell,
Shaving a Hazle-nut.
Pas. Death, hell, fiends, and darkeneſſe,
I will thrash thy mangy carcaise.
Lap. O sweet sir.

Pas.

Paſ. There cannot be too many Tortures,
Spent upon thoſe louzie Quarters.
Lap. Hold, oh. Falls down for dead.
Paſ. Thy bones ſhall rue, thy bones ſhall rue,
Thou naſty, ſcurvie, mongrill Toad, Sings again.
Miſchief on thee;
Light upon thee,
All the plagues
That can confound thee
Or did ever raigne abroad:
Better a thouſand lives it coſt,
Then have brave Anger ſpilt or loſt. Exit.

Lap. May I open mine eyes yet, and ſafely peep?
Ile trie a groane firſt--oh--Nay then hee's gone.
There was no other policy but to dye,
He would ha' made me elſe. Ribs are you ſore?
I was ne're beaten to a tune before.
Enter the two Brothers.
1 Bro. Lapet.
Lap. Agen? Falls againe.
1 Bro. Look, look, hee's flat agen,
And ſtretched out like a Coarſe a handfull longer
Then he walks truſt me brother. Why Lapet.
I hold my life we ſhall not get him ſpeak now.
Monſieur Lapet; it muſt be a privie token,
If any thing fetch him, hee's ſo far gone.
We come to paſſe our words for your mans truth.
Lap. O gentlemen y'are welcom: I have been thraſht (i'faith.
2 Bro. How? thraſht ſir?
Lap. Never was Shrove-tueſday Bird
So cudgel'd gentlemen.
1 Bro. Pray how? by whom ſir?
Lap. Nay that I know not.
1 Bro. Not who did this wrong?
Lap. Only a thing came like a walking ſong.
1 Bro. What beaten with a Song?
Lap. Never more tightly, gentlemen:
Such crotchets happen now and then, methinks,
He that endures well, of all waters drinks. Exeunt.

Actus Quartus. Scena prima.

Enter Shamonts Brother, the Souldier, and 1. Gent.

Sold. YEs, yes, this was a Madman, ſir, with you,
A paſſionate Madman.
1. Gent. Who would ha' lookt for this ſir?
Sold. And muſt be priviledg'd? a pox priviledge him:
I was never ſo dry beaten ſince I was borne,
And by a litter of rogues, meer rogues, the whole twenty
Had not above nine elbowes amongſt 'em all too:
And the moſt part of thoſe left-handed raſcalls,
The very vomit, Sir, of hoſpitalls,
Bridewells, and Spittle-houſes; ſuch naſty ſmellers,
That if they'd been unfurniſh'd of Club-Trunchions,
They might have cudgel'd me with their very ſtinks,
It was ſo ſtrong, and ſturdy: and ſhall this,
This filthy injurie, be ſet off with madneſſe?
1 Gen. Nay take your owne bloods counſel ſir, hereafter,
Ile deale no further in't: if you remember,
It was not come to blowes, when I adviſ'd you.
Sold. No, but I ever ſaid, 'twould come to ſomething,
And 'tis upon me, thank him: were he kin
To all the mighty Emperours upon earth,
He has not now in life three houres to reckon;
I watch but a free time.
Enter Shamont.
1 Gen. Your noble brother, ſir, Ile leave you now. Ex.
Sha. Souldier I would I could perſwade my thoughts
From thinking thee a brother, as I can
My tongue from naming on't: thou haſt no friend here,
But fortune and thy owne ſtrength, truſt to them.
Sold. How? what's the incitement, ſir?
Sha. Treacherie to vertue;
Thy treacherie, thy faithleſſe circumvention:
Has Honour ſo few daughters, never fewer,
And muſt thou aime thy treacherie at the beſt?
The very front of vertue? that bleſt Lady? the Dukes ſiſter?
Created more for admirations cauſe,
Then for loves ends; whoſe excellency ſparkles
More in divinity, then mortall beauty;
And as much difference 'twixt her minde and bodie,
As 'twixt this earths poore center and the Sun:
And couldſt thou be ſo injurious to faire goodneſſe,
Once to attempt to court her down to frailty?
Or put her but in minde that there is weakneſſe,
Sin, and deſire, which ſhe ſhould never heare of?
Wretch, thou'ſt committed worſe then Sacrilege,
In the attempting on't, and oughtſt to dye for't.
Sold. I rather ought to doe my beſt, to live, ſir;
Provoke me not; for I've a wrong ſits on me,
That makes me apt for miſchiefe; I ſhall loſe
All reſpects ſuddainly of friendſhip, Brother-hood,
Or any ſound that way.
Sham. But 'ware me moſt;
For I come with a two-edg'd injurie;
Both my diſgrace, and thy apparent falſhood,
Which muſt be dangerous.
Sold. I courted her, ſir:
Love ſtarve me with delayes when I confeſſe it not.
Sham. There's nothing then but death
Can be a pennance fit for that confeſſion.
Sold. But farre from any vitious taint.
Sham. O ſir,
Vice is a mighty ſtranger growne to courtſhip.
Sold. Nay then the fury of my wrong light on thee.
Enter 1. Gentleman, and others.
1 Gen. Forbeare, the Duke's at hand.
Here, hard at hand, upon my reputation.
Sold. I muſt doe ſomething now. Ex. Sold.
Sham. Ile follow you cloſe ſir.
1 Gen. We muſt entreat you muſt not; for the Duke
Deſires ſome conference with you.
Sh. Let me goe,
As y'are gentlemen.
2 Gent. Faith we dare not ſir.
Sham. Dare ye be falſe to honour, and yet dare not Doe a man juſtice? give me leave——
1 Gent. Good ſweet ſir.
H'as ſent twice for you.
Sham. Is this brave, or manly?
1 Gent. I prethee be conform'd.
Sham. 'Death—— Enter Duke.
2 Gent. Peace, hee's come introth.
Sham. Oh have you betraid me to my ſhame afreſh?
How am I bound to loath you?
Duk. Shamont, welcome,
I ſent twice.
2 Gent. But my Lord, he never heard on't.

Sham.

Sham. Pray pardon him, for his falsenesse, I did Sir,
Both times; I'de rather be found rude then faithlesse.
Du I love that bluntnesse dearely: ha's no vice,
But is more manly then some others vertue,
That lets it out onely for shew or profit.
Sham. Wil't please you quit me sir, I've urgent busines?
Du. Come, you'r so hasty now: I sent for you
To a better end.
Sham. And if it be an end,
Better or worse, I thank your goodnesse for't.
Du. I've ever kept that bounty in condition,
And thankfulnesse in bloud, which well becomes
Both Prince and Subject, that where any wrong
Beares my impression, or the hasty figure
Of my repented anger, I'me a Law
Ev'n to my selfe, and doome my selfe most strictly
To Justice, and a noble satisfaction:
So that, what you in tendernesse of honour,
Conceive to be losse to you, which is nothing
But curious opinion, Ile restore agen,
Although I give you the best part of Genoa,
And take to boot but thanks for your amends.
Sham. O miserable satisfaction,
Ten times more wretched then the wrong it selfe;
Never was ill better made good with worse:
Shall it be said that my posterity
Shall live the sole heires of their fathers shame?
And raise their wealth and glorie from my stripes?
You have provided nobly bounteous sir,
For my disgrace, to make it live for ever,
Out-lasting Brasse or Marble:
This is my feares construction, and a deep one,
Which neither argument nor time can alter:
Yet I durst sweare, I wrong your goodnesse in't sir,
And the most faire intent on't, which I reverence
With admiration, that in you a Prince,
Should be so sweet and temperate a condition,
To offer to restore where you may ruine,
And do't with justice, and in me a servant,
So harsh a disposition, that I cannot
Forgive where I should honor, and am bound to't.
But I have ever had that curiosity
In bloud, and tenderness of reputation,
Such an antipathy against a blow,
I cannot speak the rest: Good sir discharge me,
It is not fit that I should serve you more,
Nor come so neare you; I'me made now for privacy,
And a retir'd condition, that's my suit,
To part from Court for ever, my last suit.
And as you professe bounty, grant me that, Sir.
Du. I would deny thee nothing.
Sham. Health reward you, sir. Exit.
Du. He's gone agen already, and takes hold
Of any opportunity, not riches
Can purchase him, nor honours, peaceably, (him,
And force were brutish: what a great worth's gone with
And but a gentleman? well, for his sake,
Ile nere offend more those I cannot make:
They were his words, and shall be deare to memorie.
Say I desire to see him once agen,
Yet stay, hee's so well forward of his peace,
'Twere pitty to disturbe him: he would groane
Like a soule fetch'd agen; and that were injurie,
And I've wrong'd his degree too much already.
Call forth the gentlemen of our chamber instantly.
1 Serv. I shall my Lord. Within
Du. I may forgive agen,
And therefore will prevent: The strain of this
Troubles me so, one would not hazard more.
Enter 1. Gent. and divers other.
Gent. Your will my Lord?
Du. Yes; I discharge you all.
2 Gent. My Lord
Du. Your places shall be other wise dispos'd of.
4 Gent. Why sir?
Du. Reply not, I dismisse you all:
Y'are gentlemen, your worths will find you fortunes;
Nor shall your farewell taxe me of ingratitude,
Ile give you all noble remembrances,
As testimonies 'gainst reproach and malice,
That you departed lov'd.
3 Gen. This is most strange, sir.
1 Gen. But how is your grace furnish'd, there dismis'd?
Du. Seek me out Grooms,
Men more insensible of reputation,
Lesse curious and precise in termes of honour,
That if my anger chance let fall a stroak,
As we are all subject to impetuous passions,
Yet it may passe unmurmur'd, undisputed,
And not with braver fury prosecuted. Exit.
1 Gen. It shal be done, my Lord.
3 Gen. Know you the cause sir?
1 Gen. Not I kinde gentlemen, but by conjectures,
And so much shall be yours, when you please.
4 Thanks sir.
3 Gen. We shal in' mean time think our selves guilty
Of some foule fault, through ignorance committed.
1 Gen. No, 'tis not that, nor that way,
4 Gen. For my part,
I shall be dis-inherited, I know so much.
1 Gen. Why sir, for what?
4 Gen. My sire's of a strange humour,
Hee'l forme faults for me, and then sweare 'em mine,
And commonly the first begins with leachery,
He knowes his owne youthes treipasse.
1 Gen. Before you goe,
Ile come and take my leave, and tell you all sirs.
3 Gen. Thou wer't ever just and kinde. Exit.
1 Gen. That's my poore vertue sir,
And parcell valiant; but it's hard to be perfect:
The chusing of these fellowes now will puzzle me,
Horribly puzzle me; and there's no judgement
Goes true upon mans out-side, there's the nicke sure;
He must be touch'd, and try'd, for gold or drosse,
There is no other way for't, and that's dangerous too;
But since I'me put in trust, I will attempt it:
The Duke shal keep one daring man about him; Enter a
Sofr, who comes here? a proper bravery this: Gallant
Every one goes so like a gentleman,
'Tis hard to finde a difference, but by th' touch,
Ile trie your mettall sure.
Gal. Why what doe you meane sir?
1 Gen. Nay, and you understand it not, I doe not.
Gal. Yes, would you should well know,
I understand it for a box o'th' eare Sir.
1 Gent. And o' my troth, that's all I gave it for.
Gal. 'Twere best it be so.
1 Gen. This is a brave Coward,
A jolly threatning Coward; he shall be Captaine:
Sir, let me meet you an houre hence i'th' Lobby.
Gal. Meet you? the world might laugh at me then i'faith.
1 Ge. Lay by your scorn & pride, they're scurvy qualities,
And

And meet me, or Ile box you while I have you,
And carrie you gambril'd thither like a Mutton.
Gal. Nay, and you be in earnest, here's my hand
I will not faile you.
1 Gen. 'Tis for your owne good.
Gal. Away.
1 Gent. Too much for your own good, sir, a pox on you.
Gal. I prethee curle me all day long so.
1 Gen. Hang you.
Gal. Ile make him mad; hee's loth to curse too much to me;
Indeed I never yet took box oth' eare,
But it redounded, I must needs say so——
1 Gent. Will you be gone?
Gal. Curse, curse, and then I goe.
Look how he grins, I've anger'd him toth' kidnyes. Ex.
1 Gen. Was ever such a prigging coxcombe seen?
One might have beat him dumbe now in this humour,
And hee'd ha' grind it out still: Enter a plain fellow.
O here's one made to my hand,
Methinks looks like a Craven;
Lesse paines will serve his triall: some slight justle.
Pl. f. How? take you that sir:
And if that content you not——
1 Gen. Yes very well, sir, I desire no more.
Pl. f. I think you need not;
For you have not lost by't. Exit. (a gentleman?
1 Gen. Who would ha' thought this would have prov'd
Ile never trust long chins and little legs agen,
Ile know 'em sure for gentlemen hereafter:
A griffle but in shew, but gave his cuffe
With such a fetch, and reach of gentrie,
As if h'had had his armes before the floud;
I have took a villanous hard taske upon me;
Now I begin to have a feeling on't.
Enter Lapet, and Clowne his servant, and so habited.
O here comes a tri'd piece, now, the reformed kick.
The millions of punches, spurnes, and nips
That he has endur'd? his Buttock's all black Lead,
He 's halfe a Negro back-ward; he was past a Spaniard
In eighty eight, and more Egyptian-like;
His Table and his Book come both out shortly,
And all the Cowards in the Towne expect it;
So, if I faile of my full number now,
I shall be sure to finde 'em at Church corners,
Where Dives, and the luff'ring Ballads hang.
Lap. Well, since thou art of so milde a temper,
Of so meek a spirit, thou maiit live with me,
Till better times doe smile on thy deserts.
I am glad I am got home againe.
Clow. I am happy in your service, sir,
You'll keep me from the Hospitall.
Lap. So, bring me the last proofe, this is corrected.
Clow. I, y'are too full of your correction, sir.
Lap Look I have perfect Books within this half houre.
Clow. Yes sir.
Lap. Bid him put all the Thumps in Pica Roman,
And with great Tees, (you vermin) as Thumps should be.
Clow. Then in what Letter will you have your Kicks?
Lap. All in Italica, your Backward blowes
All in Italica, you Hermophrodite:
When shall I teach you wit?
Clow. O let it alone,
Till you have some your selfe sir.
Lap. You mumble?
Clow. The Victualls are lockt up;
I'me kept from mumbling. Exit.

Lap. He prints my Blows upon pot-paper too, the rogue,
Which had been proper for some drunken Pamphlet.
1 Gen. Monsieur Lapet? how the world rings of you sir?
Your name sounds far and neare.
Lap. A good report it beares, for an enduring name.
1 Gen. What luck have you sir?
Lap. Why, what's the matter?
1 Gent. I'me but thinking on't.
I've heard you wish this five yeare for a place.
Now there's one fall'n, and freely without money too;
And empty yet, and yet you cannot hav't.
Lap. No? what's the reason? Ile give money for't,
Rather then goe without sir.
1 Gen. That's not it, sir;
The troth is, there's no gentleman must have it
Either for love or money: 'tis decreed so;
I was heartily sorrie when I thought upon you,
Had you not been a gentleman I had fitted you.
Lap. Who I a gentleman? a pox I'me none, sir.
1 Gen. How?
Lap. How? why did you ever think I was?
1 Gen. What? not a gentleman?
Lap. I would thou'dst put it upon me i'faith.
Did not my Grand-father cry Coney-skins?
My father Aquavitæ? a hot gentleman:
All this I speak on i'your time and memorie too;
Onely a rich Unckle dy'd and left me chattells,
You know all this so well too——
1 Gen. Pray excuse me sir, ha' not you Armes?
Lap. Yes, a poore couple here.
That serve to thrust in wild-fowle.
1 Gen. Heralds Armes,
Symbols of gentrie, sir: you know my meaning;
They've been shewn and seen.
Lap. They have.
1 Gen. I fex have they.
Lap. Why I confesse, at my wives instigation once,
(As women love these Heralds kicksha wes naturally)
I bought 'em: but what are they think you? puffs.
1 Gen. Why, that's proper to your name being Lapet,
Which is Un fort, after the english letter.
Lap. The Herald, sir, had much a doe to finde it.
1 Gen. And can you blame him?
Why 'tis the onely thing that puzzles the devill.
Lap. At last he lookt upon my name agen,
And having well compar'd it, this he gave me,
The two Cholliques playing upon a winde instrument.
1 Gen. An excellent proper one: but I pray tell me,
How does he expresse the Cholliques?
They are hard things.
Lap. The Cholliques? with hot trenchers at their bellies,
There's nothing better, Sir, to blaze a Chollique.
1 Gen. And are not you a gentleman by this sir?
Lap. No, I disclaime't: no belly-ake upon earth
Shall make me one: he shall not think
To put his gripes upon me,
And wring out gentrie so, and ten pound first.
If the winde instrument will make my wife one,
Let her enjoy't, for she was a Harpers Grand-childe:
But sir, for my particular, I renounce it.
1 Gen. Or to be call'd so?
Lap. I sir, or imagin'd.
1 Gen. None fitter for the place: give me thy hand.
Lap. A hundred thousand thanks, beside a Bribe sir.
1 Gen. You must take heed
Of thinking toward a gentleman, now.

Lap.

Lap. Pish, I am not mad, I warrant you: nay more sir,
If one should twit me i'th' teeth that I me a gentleman,
Twit me their worst, I am but one since Lammas,
That I can prove, if they would see my heart out.
1 Gen. Marry in any case keep me that evidence.
Enter Clowne.
Lap. Here comes my servant, Sir, Galoshio,
Has not his name for nought, he will be trod upon:
What sayes my Printer now?
Clow. Heres your last proof Sir.
You shal have perfect Books now in a twinkling.
Lap. These marks are ugly.
Clow. He sayes, sir, they're proper:
Blows should have marks, or else they are nothing worth.
La. But why a Peel-crow here?
Clow. I told 'em so sir:
A Scar-crow had been better.
Lap. How Slave? looke you Sir,
Did not I say, this Whirrit, and this Bob,
Should be both Pica Roman.
Clow. So said I Sir, both Picked Romans,
And he has made 'em Welch Bills,
Indeed I know not what to make on 'em.
Lap. Hay-day; a Souse, Italica?
Clow. Yes, that may hold Sir,
Souse is a bonaroba, so is Flops too.
Lap. But why stands Bastinado so farre off here?
Clo. Alas you must allow him room to lay about him, sir.
La. Why lyes this Spurne lower then that Spurn, sir?
Clow. Marry this signifies one kickt downe staires, sir,
The other in a Gallerie: I ask'd him all these questions.
1 Gen. Your Books name?
Prethee Lapet minde me, you never told me yet.
La. Marrie but shall sir: 'tis call'd The up-rising of the kick,
And the downfall of the Duello.
1 Gen. Bring that to passe you'l prove a happy member,
And doe your Countrey service: your young bloods
Will thank you then, when they see foure-score.
Lap. I hope
To save my hundred Gentlemen a month by't,
Which will be very good for the private house.
Clow. Look you, your Table's finish'd sir already.
Lap. Why then behold my Master-piece: see, see, sir,
Here's all your Blowes, and Blow-men whatsoever,
Set in their lively colours, givers, and takers.
1 Gen. Troth wondrous fine, sir.
Lap. Nay, but mark the postures,
The standing of the takers I admire more then the givers,
They stand scornfully, most contumeliously, I like not the,
Oh here's one cast into a comely figure. (headlong.
Clow. My Master meanes him there that's cast downe
Lap. How sweetly does this fellow take his Dowst?
Stoops like a Cammell, that Heroick beast,
At a great load of Nut-megs; and how meekly
This other fellow here receives his Whirrit?
Clow. Oh Master here's a fellow stands most gallantly,
Taking his kick in private behinde the hangings,
And raising up his hips to't. But oh, sir,
How daintily this man lies trampled on?
Would I were in thy place, what e're thou art:
How lovely he endures it? (think you?
1 Gen. But will not these things, sir, be hard to practise,
Lap. Oh, easie, sir: Ile teach 'em in a Dance.
1 Gent. How? in a dance?
Lap. Ile lose my new place else,
What ere it be; I know not what 'tis yet.
1 Gen. And now you put me in minde, I could employ
For your grace, specially: For the Dukes cozen (it well,
Is by this time in's violent fit of mirth,
And a devise must be sought out for suddainly,
To over-cloy the passion.
Lap. Say no more, sir,
Ile fit you with my Schollers, new practitioners,
Endurers of the time.
Clow. Whereof I am one sir.
1 Gen. You carry it away smooth, give me thy hand, sir.
Exeunt.

Actus Quintus. Scæna prima.

Enter the 2. Brothers.

Pas. Ha, ha, ha. Within.
2 Bro. Hark, hark, how lowd his fit's growne.
Pas. Ha, ha, ha.
1. Bro. Now let our sister lose no time, but ply it
With all the power she has.
2 Bro. Her shame growes big, brother;
The Cupids shape will hardly hold it longer,
'Twould take up half an Ell of China Damask more,
And all too little: it struts per'lously:
There is no tamp'ring with these Cupids longer,
The meere conceit with woman-kinde works strong.
Pas. Ha, ha, ha.
2 Bro. The laugh comes nearer now,
'Twere good we were not seen yet. Ex. Broth.
Enter Passion. and Base his Jester.
Pas. Ha, ha, ha.
And was he bastinado'd to the life? ha, ha, ha.
I prethee say, Lord Generall, how did the Rascals
Entrench themselves?
Base Most deeply, politickly, all in ditches.
Pas. Ha, ha, ha.
Bas. 'Tis thought he'l ne're beare armes ith' field agen,
Has much adoe, to lift 'em to his head, sir.
Pas. I would he had.
Base On either side round Truncheons plaid so thick,
That Shoulders, Chines, nay Flanks were paid toth' quick.
Pas. Well said Lord Generall: ha, ha, ha. (you?
Bas. But pray how grew the difference first betwixt
Pas. There was never any sir; there lies the jest man;
Onely because he was taller then his brother;
There's all my quarrell to him; and me thought
He should be beaten for't, my minde so gave me, sir,
I could not sleep for't; Ha, ha, ha, ha.
Another good jest quickly, while 'tis hot now;
Let me not laugh in vaine: ply me, O ply me,
As you will answer't to my Cozen Duke.
Bas. Alas, who has a good jest?
Pas. I fall, I dwindle in't.
Bas. Ten Crowns for a good jest: ha' you a good jest, sir?
Enter Servant.
Serv. A pretty morall one.
Bas. Let's ha't, what ere it be.
Ser. There comes a Cupid
Drawne by six fooles.
Bas. That's nothing.
Pas. Help it, help it then.
Bas. I ha' known six hundred fooles drawn by a Cupid.
Pas. I that, that, that's the smutter Morall: ha, ha, ha.

Now I begin to be Song-ripe methinks.
Baſ. Ile ſing you a pleaſant aire, ſir, before you ebb.

Song.

Paſ. Oh how my Lungs doe tickle? ha, ha, ha.
Baſ. Oh how my Lungs doe tickle? oh, oh, ho, ho.

Paſ. Sings.

Set a ſharp Jeſt
Againſt my breaſt,
Then how my Lungs doe tickle?
As Nightingales,
And things in Cambrick railes,
Sing beſt againſt a prickle.
Ha, ha, ha, ha.

Baſ. Ho, ho, ho, ho, ha.
Paſ. Laugh. Baſ. Laugh. Paſ. Laugh. Baſ. Laugh.
Paſ. Wide. Baſ. Loud. Paſ. And vary.
Baſ. A ſmile is for a ſimpering Novice.
Paſ. One that ne're taſted Caveare,
Baſ. Nor knowes the ſmack of deare Anchovis.
Paſ. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.
Baſ. Ho, ho, ho, ho, ho.
Paſ. A gigling waiting wench for me,
That ſhewes her teeth how white they be.
Baſ. A thing not fit for graviſte,
For theirs are foule and hardly three.
Paſ. Ha, ha, ha.
Baſ. Ho, ho, ho.
Paſ. Democritus, thou ancient Fleerer,
Now I miſſe thy laugh, and ha' ſince.
Baſ. There you nam'd the famous Geerer,
That ever geer'd in Rome, or Athens.
Paſ. Ha, ha, ha.
Baſ. Ho, ho, ho.
Paſ. How brave lives he that keeps a foole,
Although the rate be deeper?
Paſ. But he that is his owne foole ſir,
Does live a great deale cheaper.
Paſ. Sure I ſhal burſt, burſt, quite break thou art ſo witty.
Baſ. 'Tis rare to break at Court for that belongs toth' City.
Paſ. Ha, ha, my ſpleen is almoſt worne to the laſt laugher.
Baſ. O keep a corner for a friend, a jeſt may come hereafter.

Enter Lapet and Clowne, and foure other like fooles, dancing, the Cupid leading, and bearing his Table, and holding it up to Lapet at every ſtrain, and acting the poſtures.

Lap. Twinge all now, twinge, I ſay.

Enter Soldier, Shamonts Brother, his ſword drawne.
Sol. Not angry Law, nor doores of Braſſe ſhal keep me
From my wrongs expiation, to thy Bowels,
I returne my diſgrace; and after turne
My face to any death that can be ſentenc'd.
Baſe Murder, O murder, ſtop the murderer there——
Lap. I am glad hee's gone; h'as almoſt trod my guts out;
Follow him who liſt for me, Ile ha' no hand in't.
Clo. Oh 'twas your luck and mine to be ſqueich'd Mr.
Has ſtamp'd my very Puddings into Pancakes.
Cup. O Brothers, oh, I fear 'tis mortall: help, O helpe,
I'me made the wretcheſt woman, by this accident,
That ever love beguil'd. Enter 2. Brothers.
2 Bro. We are undone Brother,
Our ſhames are too apparent: Away receptacle
Of Luxury, and diſhonour, moſt unfortunate,
To make thy ſelfe but lackie to thy ſpoile,
After thy Sexes manner: lift him up Brother;
He breathes not to our comfort, hee's too waſted
Ever to cheere us more: A Chirurgeon ſpeedily;
Hence; the unhappieſt that ere ſtept aſide,
Shee'l be a Mother before ſhee's known a Bride.
Cup. Thou hadſt a moſt unfortunate conception,
What ere thou prov'ſt to be; in midd'ſt of mirth
Comes ruine, for a welcome, to thy birth. Exeunt.

Scæne 2. Enter Shamont.

Sham. This is a beautifull life now; privacie
The ſweetneſſe and the benefit of eſſence:
I ſee there is no man, but may make his paradice;
And it is nothing, but his love, and dotage
Upon the worlds fowle joyes, that keeps him out on't:
For he that lives retir'd in minde, and ſpirit,
Is ſtill in paradice, and has his innocence,
Partly allow'd for his companion too,
As much as ſtands with juſtice: here no eyes
Shoot their ſharp pointed ſcornes upon my ſhame;
They know no termes of reputation here,
No punctuall limits, or preciſe dimenſions;
Plaine downe-right honeſtie is all the beauty
And elegancy of life found amongſt ſhepheards;
For knowing nothing nicely, or deſiring it,
Quits many a vexation from the minde,
With which our quainter knowledge does abuſe us;
The name of envy is a ſtranger here,
That dries mens bloods abroad, robs health and reſt,
Why here's no ſuch fury thought on: no, nor falſehood,
That brotherly diſeaſe, fellow-like devill,
That plaies within our boſome, and betrayes us.

Enter 1 Gent.

1 Gen. Oh are you here?
Sham. La Nove, 'tis ſtrange to ſee thee.
1 Gen. I ha' rid one horſe to death,
To finde you out, ſir.
Sham. I am not to be found of any man
That ſaw my ſhame, nor ſeen long.
1 Gen. Good, your attention:
You ought to be ſeen now, and found out ſir,
If ever you deſire before your ending
To performe one good office, nay a deare one,
Mans time can hardly match it.
Sham. Bee't as pretious
As reputation; if it come from Court
I will not heare on't.
1 Gen. You muſt heare of this, Sir.
Sham. Muſt?
1 Gen. You ſhall heare it.
Sham. I love thee, that thoul't dye.
1 Gen. 'Twere nobler in me,
Then in you living: you will live a murderer,
If you deny this office.
Sha. Ev'n to death ſir.

1 Gen.

1 Gen. Why then you'l kill your brother.
Sham, How?
1 Gent. Your Brother sir:
Beare witnesse heaven, this man destroyes his brother
When he may save him, his least breath may save him:
Can there be wilfuller destruction?
He was forc'd to take a most unmanly wrong,
Above the suffring vertue of a Soldier,
Has kill'd his Injurer, a work of honour;
For which, unlesse you save him, he dyes speedily
My conscience is discharg'd, I'me but a friend,
A Brother should goe forward where I end. Exit.
Sham. Dyes?
Say he be naught, that's nothing to my goodnesse,
Which ought to shine through use, or else it loses
The glorious name 'tis knowne by: hee's my brother;
Yet peace is above bloud: Let him goe; I,
But where's the nobleness of affection then?
That must be car'd for too, or I'me imperfect,
The same bloud that stood up in wrath against him,
Now in his miserie runs all to pity;
I'de rather dye than speak one syllable
To save my selfe: but living as I am,
There's no avoiding on't, the worlds humanity
Expects it hourely from me: curse of fortune,
I took my leave so well too: Let him dye,
'Tis but a brother lost; so pleasingly,
And swiftly I came off, 'twere more then ticksomnesse,
To tread that path agen; and I shall never
Depart so handsomly: But then where's posterity?
The consummation of our house and name?
I'me torne in pieces betwixt love and shame. Exit.

Scene 3. Enter Lapet, Clown, Poultrot, Moulbazon, and others, the new Court Officers.

Lap. Good morrow fellow Poltrot, and Moulbazon,
Good morrow fellowes all.
Pol. Mounsieur Lapet? (you.
Lap. Look, I've remembred you, here's books a piece for Moul. O sir, we dearely thank you.
Lap. So you may;
There's two impressions gone already sirs.
Pol. What no? in so short a time?
Lap. 'Tis as I tell you sir,
My Kick sells gallantly, I thank my stars.
Clo. So does your Table; you may thank the Moon too.
Lap. 'Tis the Book sells the Table.
Clow. But 'tis the Book-seller
That has the money for 'em, I'me sure o' that.
Lap. 'Twill much enrich the Company of Stationers,
'Tis thought 't will prove a lasting benefit,
Like the Wise Masters, and the Almanacks,
The hundred Novells, and the Book of Cookerie,
For they begin already to engrosse it,
And make it a stock-book, thinking indeed
'Twill prove too great a benefit, and help,
For one that's new set up: they know their way,
And make him Warden, ere his beard be gray.
Moul. Is't possible such vertue should lye hid,
And in so little paper?
Lap. How? Why there was the Carpenter,
An unknowne thing, an odoriferous Pamphlet,
Yet no more Paper, by all computation,
Then Ajax Telamon would use at once,
Your Herring prov'd the like, able to buy
Another Fishers Folly, and your Pasquil
Went not below the mad-caps of that time,
And shall my elaborate Kick come behinde think you?
Clow. Yes, it must come behinde, 'tis in Italica too,
According to your humour.
Lap. Not in sale, varlet.
Clow. In sale, sir? it shall saile beyond 'em all I troe.
Lap. What have you there now? oh, Page, 21.
Clow. That Page is come to his yeares, he should be a
La. Mark how I snap up the Duello there: (serving-man.
One would not use a dog so,
I must needs say; but 's for the common good.
Clow. Nay sir, your Commons seldome fight at sharp,
But buffet in a ware-house.
Lap. This will save
Many a gentleman of good bloud from bleeding sirs,
I have a curse from many a Barber Surgeon;
They'd give but too much money to call't in;
Turne to Page 45. see what you finde there.
Clow. O out upon him,
Page 45. that's an old theefe indeed.
Enter Duke, the Lady his sister, 1 Gent.
Lap. The Duke, clap down your Books; away Galoshio.
Clow. Indeed I am too foule to be ith' presence,
They use to shake me off at the chamber door still. Ex.
Lady. Good my Lord, grant my suit; let me not rise
Without the comfort on't: I have not often
Been tedious in this kinde.
Du. Sister, you wrong your selfe,
And those great vertues that your fame is made of,
To waste so much breath for a Murderers life.
Lad. You cannot hate th' offence more then I doe, sir,
Nor the offender, the respect I owe
Unto his absent brother, makes me a suitor,
A most importunate sister; make me worthy
But of this one request.
Duk. I am deafe
To any importunacy, and sorry
For your forgetfulnesse; you never injur'd
Your worth so much, you ought to be rebuk'd for't:
Pursue good wayes, end as you did begin,
'Tis halfe the guilt to speak for such a sin.
Lad. This is loves beggerie right, that now is ours,
When Ladies love, and cannot shew their powers. Ex.
Du. La Nova?
1 Gen. My Lord.
Du. Are these our new attendants?
Lap. We are my Lord, and will endure as much
As better men, my Lord, and more I trust.
Du. What's hee?
1 Gen. My Lord, a decay'd Gentleman,
That will doe any service.
Du. A decay'd one?
1 Gent. A renounc'd one indeed, for this place only.
Du. We renounce him then, go, discharge him instantly.
He that disclaimes his gentry for meere gaines,
That man's too base to make a vassaile on.
Lap. What saies the Duke?
1 Gen. Faith little to your comfort sir,
You must be a gentleman agen.
Lap. How?
1 Gent. There's no remedy.
Lap. Marry, the fates forfend: ne're while I breath sir.
1 Gen. The Duke will have it so, there's no resisting.
He spide it i' your fore-head.
Lap. My wife's doing.

She thought she should be put below her betters now,
And su'd to ha' me a gentleman agen.
1 Gent. And very likely sir:
Marry Ile give you this comfort when all's done,
You'll never passe but for a scurvey one,
That's all the helpe you have: come shew your pace.
Lap. The heaviest gentleman that e're lost place;
Beare witnesse I am forc't to't. Exit.
Duke. Though you have a courser title yet upon you,
Then those that left your places, without blame,
Tis in your power to make your selves the same:
I cannot make you gentlemen, that's a work
Rais'd from your owne deservings; merit, manners,
And in-borne vertue doe's it. Let your own goodnesse
Make you so great, my power shall make you greater;
And more t'encourage you, this I adde agen,
There's many Grooms now exact Gentlemen.
Enter Shamont.
Sham. Me thinks 'tis strange to me to enter here:
Is there in nature such an awfull power,
To force me to this place? and make me doe this?
Is mans affections stronger then his will?
His resolution? was I not resolv'd
Never to see this place more? Doe I beare
Within my breast one bloud that confounds th'other?
The bloud of love, and will, and the last weakest?
Had I ten Millions, I would give it all now,
I were but past it, or 'twould never come;
For I shall never do't, or not do't well,
But spoyle it utterly betwixt two passions.
Yonder's the Duke himselfe, I will not do't now,
Had twenty lives their severall sufferings in him. Exit.
Duke Who's that went out now?
Pol. I saw none, my Lord.
Du. Nor you?
Moul. I saw the glimpse of one my Lord.
Du. What ere it was, methought it pleas'd me strangly,
And suddenly my joy was ready for't.
Did you not marke it better?
Pol, & Moul. Troth my Lord,
We gave no great heed to't.
Enter Shamont.
Sham. 'Twill not be answer'd,
It brings me hither still; by maine force hither:
Either I must give over to professe humanity,
Or I must speak for him.
Duke 'Tis here agen:
No marvaile 'twas so pleasing, 'tis delight
And worth it selfe, now it appeares unclouded.
Sham. My Lord——
He turnes away from mee: by this hand
I am ill-us'd of all sides; 'tis a fault
That fortune ever had, t'abuse a goodnesse.
Duke Methought it you were saying somewhat.
Sham. Marke the Language,
As coy as fate; I see 'twill nere be granted.
Du. We little look'd in troth to see you here yet.
Sham. Not till the day after my brothers death, I think.
Du. Sure some great businesse drew you.
Sha. No insooth, sir,
Onely to come to see a brother dye sir,
That I may learne to goe too; and if he deceive me not,
I think he will doe well in't of a souldier,
Manly, and honestly: and if he weep then,
I shall not think the worse on's man-hood for't,
Because hee's leaving of that part that has it.
Duk. Has slaine a noble gentleman, thinke on't, sir.
Sham. I would I could not sir.
Duk. Our Kinsman too.
Sham. All this is but worse sir.
Du. When 'tis at worst,
Yet seeing thee, he lives.
Sham. My Lord——
Du. He lives,
Believe it as thy blisse, he dyes not for't:
Will this make satisfaction for things past?
Sham. Oh my Lord——
Du. Will it? speak.
Sh. With greater shame to my unworthinesse.
Du. Rise then, wee're ev'n: I never found it harder
To keep just with a man: my great work's ended.
I knew your brothers pardon was your suit, sir,
How ever your nice modestie held it back.
Sham. I take a joy now, to confesse it, sir.
Enter 1. Gen.
1 Gent. My Lord——
Du. Heare me first, sir, what e're your newes be:
Set free the Souldier instantly.
1 Gen. Tis done, my Lord.
Du. How?
1 Gen. In effect: 'twas part of my newes too,
There's faire hope of your noble kinsmans life sir.
Du. What saist thou?
1 Gen. And the most admired change
That living flesh e're had; he's not the man my Lord;
Death cannot be more free from passions, sir,
Then he is at this instant: hee's so meek now,
He makes those seem passionate, was never thought of:
And for he feares his moods have oft disturb'd you sir,
Hee's onely hasty now for his forgivenesse,
And here behold him sir.
Enter Passion, the Cupid, and two brothers.
Du. Let me give thanks first: our worthy Cousen——
Pas. Your unworthy trouble sir;
For which, with all acknowledg'd reverence,
I aske your pardon; and for injurie
More knowne and wilfull, I have chose a wife,
Without your counsell, or consent, my Lord.
Duke A wife? where is she sir?
Pas. This noble Gentlewoman.
Duk. How?
Pas. Whose honour my forgetfull times much wrong'd.
Du. Hee's madder then he was.
1 Gen. I would ha' sworne for him.
Du. The Cupid, cousen?
Pas. Yes, this worthy Lady, sir,
Du. Still worse and worse.
1 Bro. Our sister under pardon, my Lord.
Du. What?
2 Bro. Which shape Love taught her to assume.
Du. Is't truth then?
1 Ge. It appears plainly now below the waste my Lord.
Du. Shamont, didst ever read of a she-Cupid?
Sham. Never in fiction yet: but it might hold sir;
For Desire is of both Genders.
Enter the Dukes sister.
Du. Make that good here: He joyns Shamonts hand
I take thee at thy word, sir. and his Sisters.
Sham. O my Lord,
Love would appeare too bold, and rude from me,

Honour

Honour and admiration are her rights,
Her goodnesse is my Saint, my Lord.
Duke I see,
Y'are both too modest to bestow your selves:
Ile save that vertue still; 'tis but my paines: come,
It shall be so.
Sham. This gift does but set forth my poverty.
Lady Sir, that which you complaine of 'is my riches.
Enter Shamonts brother the Souldier. (come.
Du. Soldier, now every noise sounds peace, th'art welcome.
Sol. Sir my repentance sues for your blest favour,
Which once obtain'd, no injury shall lose it;
Ile suffer mightier wrongs.
Duk. Rise, lov'd and pardon'd;
For where hope fail'd, my Art it selfe resign'd,
Thou'st wrought that cure, which skil could never find;
Not did there cease, but to our peace extend;
Never could wrongs boast of a nobler end. Exeunt.

The Prologue at the reviving of this Play.

IT's growne in fash'on of late in these dayes,
To come and beg a sufferance to our Playes;
Faith Gentlemen our Poet ever writ
Language so good, mixt with such sprightly wit,
He made the Theatre so soveraigne
With his rare Scenes, he scorn'd this crowching veine:
We stabb'd him with keene daggers when we pray'd
Him write a Preface to a Play well made.
He could not write these toyes; 'twas easier farre,
To bring a Felon to appeare at th' Barre,
So much he hated basenesse; which this day,
His Scenes will best convince you of in's Play.

The Epilogue.

OUr Poet bid us say for his owne part,
He cannot lay too much forth of his Art:
But feares our over-ruling passions may,
As not alone, deface his labour'd Play:
Yet still he is resolute for what is writ
Of Nicer valour, and assumes the wit:
But for the Love-Scenes which he ever hates,
Cupid in's Petticoat should represent,
Hee'l stand no shock of censure; the Plot's good,
He sayes in knowne it is, (if well understood,)
But we (blinde god) begge, if thou art diviner,
Thou'lt shoot thy Arrowes round, this Play was thine.

M. Francis Beaumonts Letter to Ben Johnson, written before he and Maſter Fletcher came to London, with two of the precedent Comedies then not finiſht, which deferred their merry meetings at the Mermaid.

THE Sun which doth the greateſt comfort bring
To abſent friends, becauſe the ſelf-ſame thing
They know they ſee, however abſent is,
(Here our beſt Hay-maker forgive me this,
It is our Countries ſtile) In this warme ſhine,
I lye and dreame of your full Mermaid wine.
O we have water mixt with Claret Lees,
Drinke apt to bring in dryer hereſies,
Then heere, good only for the Sonnets ſtraine,
With fuſtian metaphors to ſtuffe the braine,
So mixt, that given to the thirſtieſt one,
'Twill not prove almes, unleſſe he have the ſtone:
I thinke with one draught mans invention fades,
Two Cups had quite ſpoil'd Homers Illiades;
'Tis liquor that will find out Sutcliffs wit,
Lye where he will, and make him write worſe yet;
Fil'd with ſuch moiſture in moſt grievous qualmes,
Did Robert Wiſdome write his ſinging Pſalmes;
And ſo muſt I doe this, and yet I thinke
It is a potion ſent us downe to drinke,
By ſpeciall Providence, keeps us from fights,
Makes us not laugh, when we make leggs to Knights.
'Tis this that keeps our minds fit for our States,
A Medicine to obey our Magiſtrates:
For we doe live more free then you, no hate,
No envy at one anothers happy ſtate
Moves us, we are all equall every whit:
Of Land that God gives men here is their wit:
If we conſider fully, for our beſt,
And graveſt men will with his maine houſe jeſt,
Scarſe pleaſe you; we want ſubtilty to doe
The Citie tricks, lye, hate, and flatter too:
Here are none that can beare a painted ſhow,
Strike when you winch, and then lament the blow:
Who like Mils ſet the right way for to grinde,
Can make their gaines alike with every winde:

Only

Only ſome fellows with the ſubtil'ſt pate
Amongſt us, may perchance aquivocate
At ſelling of a horſe, and thats the moſt.
Methinks the little wit I had is loſt
Since I ſaw you, for wit is like a reſt
Held up at Tennis, which men doe the beſt,
With the beſt gameſters: What things have we ſeen
Done at the Mermaid! heard words that have been
So nimble, and ſo full of ſubtill flame,
As if that every one from whence they came,
Had meant to put his whole wit in a jeſt,
And had reſolv'd to live a foole the reſt
Of his dull life; then when there hath been throwne
Wit able enough to juſtifie the Towne
For three dayes paſt, wit that might warrant be
For the whole City to talke fooliſhly
Till that were cancel'd, and when that was gone,
We left an aire behind us, which alone,
Was able to make the two next companies
Right witty; though but downright fools, more wiſe.
When I remember this, and ſee that now
The Country gentlemen begin to allow
My wit for dry bobbs, then I needs muſt cry,
I ſee my days of ballating grow nigh;
I can already riddle, and can ſing
Catches, ſell bargains, and I feare ſhall bring
My ſelf to ſpeak the hardeſt words I find,
Over as oft as any, with one wind,
That takes no medicines: But one thought of thee
Makes me remember all theſe things to be
The wit of our young men, fellows that ſhow
No part of good, yet utter all they know:
Who like trees of the Guard, have growing ſoules.
Only ſtrong deſtiny, which all controules,
I hope hath left a better fate in ſtore,
For me thy friend, then to live ever poore,
Baniſht unto this home, fate once againe
Bring me to thee, who canſt make ſmooth & plain
The way of Knowledge for me, and then I,
Who have no good but in thy company,
Proteſt it will my greateſt comfort be
To acknowledge all I have to flow from thee.
Ben, when theſe Scænes are perfect wee'l taſte wine;
Ile drink thy Muſes health, thou ſhalt quaff mine.

FINIS.

THE MAID IN THE MILL.

Actus primus. Scæna prima.

Enter Lisauro, Tarso, Ismena, and Aminta.

Lis. Let the Coach go round, wee'l walk along these Meadows:
And meet at Port again: Come my fair Sister,
These cool shades will delight ye.

Am. Pray be merry,
The Birds sing as they meant to entertain ye,
Every thing smiles abroad: me thinks the River
(As he steals by) curles up his head, to view ye:
Every thing is in Love.

Ism. You would have it so.
You that are fair, are easie of belief, Cosen,
The Theame slides from your Tongue.

Am. I fair, I thank ye:
Mine's but shadow when your Sun shines by me.

Ism. No more of this, you know your worth (Aminta)
Where are we now?

Am. Hard by the Town (Ismene)

Ter. Close by the Gates:

Ism. 'Tis a fine Ayre.

Lis. A delicate;
The way so sweet and even, that the Coach
Would be a tumbling trouble to our pleasures,
Methinks I am very merry:

Ism. I am sad:

Am. You are ever so when we entreat ye (Cosen)

Ism. I have no reason: such a trembling here
Over my heart methinks:

Am. Sure you are fasting,
Or not slept well to night; some dream (Ismena) (cent,

Ism. My dreams are like my thoughts, honest, and inno-
Yours are unhappy; who are these that coast us? Enter
You told me the walk was private. Antonio & Martin.

Ter. 'Tis most commonly:

Ism. Two proper men: it seems they have some business,
With me none sure; I do not like their faces;
They are not of our Company:

Ter. No Cosen:
Lisauro, we are dog'd.

Lis. I find it (Cosen)

Ant. What handsome Lady?

Mar. Yes, shee's very handsom.
They are handsome both,

Ant. Martin, stay we are observed.

Mar. I will go up; a woman is no wild-fire,

Ant. Now by my life she is sweet: Stay good Martin,
They are of our enemies; the Houle of Belides,
Our mortal enemies:

Mar. Let 'em be devils,
They appear so handsomly, I will go forward;
If these be enemies, I'le ne'er seek friends more.

Ant. Prethee forbear; the Gentlewomen.

Mar. That's it (man)
That mopes me like a Gin.
'Pray ye stand off Ladies:

Lis. They are both our enemies; both hate us equally;
By this fair day our mortal foes.

Ter. I know'em,
And come here to affront; how they gape at us?
They shall have gaping-work.

Ism. Why your swords, Gentlemen?

Ter. Pray ye stand you off, Cosen,
And good now leave your whistling; we are aboard all,
Back, back I say:

Lis. Go back.

Ant. We are no dogs Sir,
To run back on command.

Ter. Wee'l make ye run, Sir,

Ant. Having a civil charge of handsom Ladies,
We are your servants: pray ye no quarrel Gentlemen,
There's Way enough for both.

Lis. Wee'l make it wider.

Ant. If you will fight arm'd, from this Saint; have at ye,

Ism. O me unhappy, are ye Gentlemen?
Discreet, and Civil, and in open view thus?

Am. What will men think of us? nay you may kill us;
Mercy o'me through my petticoat; what bloody gentleme!

Ism. Make way through me, ye had best, and kill an inno-
Brother, why Cosen, by this light He die too: (cent;
This Gentleman is temperate; be you merciful,
Alas, the Swords.

Am. You had best run me through the belly,
'Twill be a valiant thrust.

Ism. I faint amongst ye.

Ant. Pray ye be not fearful; I have done (sweet Lady)
My sword's already sav'd, and shall obey ye:
I come not here to violate sweet beauty,
I bow to that.

Ism. Brother, you see this Gentleman,
This Noble Gentleman,

Lis. Let him avoid then,
And leave our Walk.

Ant. The Lady may command Sir,
She bears an eye more dreadful then your weapon.

Ism. What a sweet nature this man has? dear brother,
Put up your sword.

Ter. Let them put up and walk then: (just

Ant. No more loud words: there's time enough before
For shame put up, do honour to these beauties;

Mar. Our way is this,
We will not be denyde it.

Ter. And ours is this, we will not be cross'd in it.

Ant. What ere your way is (Lady) 'tis a fair one;
And may it never meet with rude hands more,
Nor rough uncivil Tongues. Exeunt.
Ism. I thank ye Sir,
Indeed I thank ye nobly: A brave Enemie,
Here's a sweet temper now: This is a man (Brother)
This Gentleman's anger is so nobly seated,
That it becomes him: Yours proclaim ye Monsters.
What if he be our House-Foe? we may brag on't:
We have ne'er a friend in all our House so honourable:
I had rather from an Enemie, my Brother,
Learn worthy distances and modest difference,
Then from a race of empty friends, loud nothings:
I am hurt between ye.
Am. So am I, I fear too: (sen
I am sure their swords were between my leggs; dear Co.
Why look ye pale? where are ye hurt?
Ism. I know not,
But here me-thinks.
Lis. Unlace her gentle Cosen.
Ism. My heart, my heart, and yet I blesse the Hurter.
Am. Is it so dangerous?
Ism. Nay, nay, I faint not.
Am. Here is no blood that I find, sure 'tis inward:
Ism. Yes, yes, 'tis inward: 'twas a subtle weapon,
The hurt not to be cur'd I fear.
Lis. The Coach there.
Am. May be affright.
Ism. Aminta, 'twas a sweet one,
And yet a cruel.
Am. Now I find the wound plain:
A wondrous handsome Gentleman.
Ism. Oh no deeper;
Prethee be silent (wench) it may be thy cause.
Am. You must be searched: the wound will rancle, Cosen
And of so sweet a nature.
Ism. Deer Aminta:
Make it not sorer.
Am. And on my life admires ye.
Ism. Call the Coach, Cosen.
Am. The Coach, the Coach.
Ter. 'Tis ready, bring the Coach there.
Lis. Well my brave enemies, we shall yet meet ye,
And our old hate shall testifie.
Ter. It shall (Cosen.) Exeunt.

Scæna secunda.

Enter Antonio and Martine.

Ant. Their swords, alas, I weigh'em not (deer Friend)
The indiscretion of the Owners blunts'em;
The fury of the House affrights not me,
It spends it self in words: (Oh me Martine)
There was a two edg'd eye, a Lady carried
A weapon that no valour can avoyd,
Nor Art (the hand of Spirit) put aside.
O Friend, it broke out on me like a bullet
Wrapt in a cloud of fire: that point (Martine)
Dazled my sence, and was too subtle for me,
Shot like a Comet in my face, and wounded
(To my eternal ruine) my hearts valour.
Mar. Methinks she was no such peece,
Ant. Blaspheme not Sir,
She is so far beyond weak commendation,
That impudence will blush to think ill of her.
Mar. I see it not, and yet I have both eies open:
And I could judge, I know there is no beauty
Till our eies give it 'em, and make 'em bonsom;
What's red and white, unles we do allow 'em?
A green face else; and me-thinks such an other.
Ant. Peace thou leud Heretick; Thou judge of beauties?
Thou hast an excellent sense for a signe-post (Friend)
Dost thou not see? Ile swear thou art soon blind else,
As blind as ignorance; when she appear'd first
Aurora breaking in the east, and through her face,
As if the Hours and Graces had strew'd Roses,
A blush of wonder flying; when she was frighted
At our uncivil swords, didst thou not mark
How far beyond the purity of snow
The soft wind drives whitenes of innocence,
Or any thing that bears Celestial palenes,
She appear'd o'th'sodain? Didst thou see her tears
When she intreated? O thou Reprobate!
Didst thou not see those orient tears flow'd from her,
The little Worlds of Love? A sett (Martine)
Of such sanctified Beads, and a holy heart to love
I could live ever a Religious Hermite.
Mar. I do beleeve a little, and yet me-thinks
She was of the lowest stature.
Ant. A rich Diamond
Set neat and deep; Natures chief Art (Martine)
Is to reserve her Modells curious,
Not cumbersome and great; and such a one
For fear she should exceed, upon her matter
Has she fram'd this; Oh 'tis a spark of beauty,
And where they appear so excellent in little,
They will but flame in great; Extention spoils 'em:
Martine learn this, the narrower that our eies
Keep way unto our object, still the sweeter
That comes unto us: Great bodies are like Countries,
Discovering still, toyle and no pleasure finds 'em.
Mar. A rare Cosmographer for a small Island.
Now I believe she is handsom.
Ant. Belive heartily,
Let thy belief, though long a coming, save thee.
Mar. She was (certain) fair.
Ant. But hark ye (Friend Martine)
Do not believe your self too far before me,
For then you may wrong me, Sir.
Mar. Who bid ye teach me?
Do you show me meat, and stitch my lips (Antonio!)
Is that fair play?
Ant. Now if thou shouldst abuse me,
And yet I know thee for an arrant Wencher,
A most immoderate thing; thou canst not love long.
Mar. A little serves my turn, I fly at all games,
But I believe.
Ant. How if we never see her more?
Shee is our enemie.
Mar. Why are you jealous then?
As far as I conceive she hates our whole House.
Ant. Yet (good Martine)
Mar. Come, come, I have mercy on ye:
You shall enjoy her in your dream (Antonio)
And I'll not hinder: though now I perswade my self.

Enter Aminta with a Letter.

Ant. Sit with perswasion down, and you deal honestly:
I will look better on her.
Mar. Stay, who's this, Friend?
Ant. Is't not the other Gentlewoman?
Mar. Yes, a Letter.

She

She brings no challenge sure: if she do (Antonio)
I hope shee'l be a Second too; I am for her.
Am. A good houre Gentlemen.
Ant. You are welcom Lady;
'Tis like our late rude passage has powr'd on us
Some reprehension.
Am. No, I bring no anger,
Though some deserv'd it.
Ant. Sure we were all too blame, Lady;
But for my part (in all humility
And with no little shame) I ask your pardons,
Indeed I wear no sword to fright sweet beauties.
Am. You have it, and this Letter; pray ye Sir view it,
And my Commission's done.
Mar. Have ye none for me Lady?
Am. Not at this time.
Mar. I am sorry for't; I can read too.
Am. I am glad: but Sir, to keep you in your exercise,
You may chance meet with one ill written.
Mar. Thank ye,
So it be a womans, I can pick the meaning,
For likely they have but one end.
Am. You say true Sir. Exit.
Ant. Martine, my wishes are come home and loaden,
Loaden with brave return: most happy, happy:
I am a blessed man: where's the Gentlewoman?
Mar. Gone, the spirit's gone: what news?
Ant. 'Tis from the Lady;
From her we saw: from that same miracle,
I know her Name now: read but these three lines;
Read with devotion, friend, the lines are holy.

Martine reads.

I dare not chide ye in my Letter (Sir)
'Twill be too gentle: If you please to look me
In the West-street, and find a fair Stone window,
Carved with white Cupids; there Ile entertain ye:
Night and discretion guide ye.

Call me Ismena.

Ant. Give it me again: Come, come, fly, fly, I am all fire.
Mar. There may be danger.
Ant. So there is to drink
When men are thirsty, to eat hastily
When we are hungry: so there is in sleep, Friend,
Obstructions then may rise, and smother us,
We may die laughing, choked, even at devotions:
An Apoplexie, or a sodain Palsey
May strike us down.
Mar. May be a train to catch ye.
Ant. Then I am caught: and let Love answer for it.
'Tis not my folly, but his infamy:
And if he be adored, and dare do vild things,
Mar. Well, I will go.
Ant. She is a Lady, Sir,
A Maid, I think, and where that holy spell
Is flung about me, I ne're fear a villany,
'Tis almost night: away friend.
Mar. I am ready,
I think I know the house too.
Ant. Then we are happy. Exeunt.

Scæna Tertia.

Enter Ismena and Aminta.

Ism. Did you meet him?
Am. Yes.
Ism. And did you give my Letter?
Am. To what end went I?
Ism. Are ye sure it was he?
Was it that Gentleman?
Am. Do you think I was blind?
I went to seek no Carrier, nor no Midwife.
Ism. What kind of man was he? thou maist be deceived Friend.
Am. A man with a nose on's face: I think he had eies too,
And hands: for sure he took it.
Ism. What an answer?
Am. What questions are these to one that's hot and troubled?
Do you think me a Babe? am I not able (Cosen)
At my years and discretion, to deliver
A Letter handsomly! is that such a hard thing?
Why every wafer-woman will undertake it:
A Sempsters girle, or a Taylors wife will not misse it:
A Puritane Hostesse (Cosen) would scorn these questions.
My legges are weary.
Ism. I'll make'em well again.
Am. Are they at Supper?
Ism. Yes, and I am not well,
Nor desire no company: look out, 'tis darkish.
Am. I see nothing yet: assure your self, Ismena,
If he be a man he will not misse.
Ism. It may be he is modest,
And that may pull him back from seeing me;
Or has made some wild construction of my easinesse:
I blush to think what I writ.
Am. What should ye blush at? (em;
Blush when you act your thoughts, not when you write
Blush soft between a pair of sheets, sweet Cosen,
Though he be a curious carried Gentleman, I cannot think
He's so unnatural to leave a woman,
A young, a noble, and a beauteous woman,
Leave her in her desires: Men of this age
Are rather prone to come before they are sent for.
Hark, I hear something: up to th'Chamber, Cosen,
You may spoil all else.

Enter Antonio and Martine.

Ism. Let me see, they are Gentlemen;
It may be they.
Am. They are they: get ye up,
And like a Land-star draw him.
Ism. I am shamefac'd. Exit.
Ant. This is the street.
Mar. I am looking for the house:
Close, close, pray ye close here.
Ant. No, this is a Merchants;
I know the man well:
Mar. And this a Pothecaries: I have lain here many (times.
For a loosenes in my Hilts.
Ant. Have ye not past it?
Mar. No sure:
There is no house of mark that we have scaped yet.
Ant. What place is this?
Mar. Speak softer: 'may be spies;
If any, this, a goodly window too,
Garv'd far above, that I perceive: 'tis dark,
But she has such a lustre.

Enter Ismena and Aminta above with a Taper.

Ant. Yes Martine,
So radiant she appears.
Mar. Else we may misse, Sir:

The night growes vengeance black, 'pray heaven ſhe
ſhine clear:
Hark, hark, a window, and a candle too.
Ant. Step cloſe, 'tis ſhe: I ſee the cloud diſperſe,
And now the beautious Planet.
Mar. Hah, 'tis indeed,
Now by the ſoul of love a divine Creature.
Iſm. Sir, Sir,
Ant. Moſt bleſſed Lady.
Iſm. 'Pray ye ſtand out.
Am. You need not fear, there's no body now ſtirring.
Mar. Beyond his commendation I am taken,
Infinite ſtrangely taken.
Am. I love that Gentleman,
Methinks he has a dainty nimble body:
I love him heartily.
Iſm. 'Tis the right Gentleman:
But what to ſay to him, Sir.
Am. Speak.
Ant. I wait ſtill,
And will do till I grow an other Pillar,
To propt this houſe, ſo it pleaſe you.
Iſm. Speak ſoftly,
And 'pray ye ſpeak truly too.
Ant, I never lyde, Lady,
Iſm. And don't think me impudent to ask ye,
I know ye are an Enemie, ſpeak low,
But I would make ye a friend.
Ant. I am friend to beauty;
Ther's no handſomneſſe I dare be foe too.
Iſm. Are ye married?
Ant. No.
Iſm. Are ye betrothed?
Ant. No, neither.
Iſm. Indeed (fair Sir.)
Ant. Indeed (fair ſweet) I am not.
Moſt beauteous Virgin, I am free as you are.
Iſm. That may be Sir, then ye are miſerable,
For I am bound.
Ant. Happy the bonds that hold ye;
Or do you put them on your ſelf for pleaſure?
Sure they be ſweeter far then libertie:
There is no bleſſedneſſe but in ſuch bondage:
Give me that freedom (Madam) I beſeech ye,
(Since you have queſtion'd me ſo cunningly)
To ask you whom you are bound to, he muſt be certain
More then humane, that bounds in ſuch a beauty:
Happy that happy chain, ſuch links are heavenly.
Iſm. Pray ye do not mock me, Sir.
Ant. Pray ye (Lady) tell me.
Iſm. Will ye beleeve, and will ye keep it to ye?
And not ſcorn what I ſpeak?
Ant. I dare not (Madam)
As Oracle what you ſay, I dare ſwear to.
Iſm. I'll ſet the candle by: for I ſhall bluſh now;
Fy, how it doubles in my mouth? it muſt out,
'Tis you I am bound to.
Ant. Speak that word again,
I underſtand ye not.
Iſm. 'Tis you I am bound to.
Ant. Here is another gentleman.
Iſm. 'Tis you Sir.
Am. He may be lov'd too.
Mar. Not by thee, firſt curſe me.
Iſm. And if I knew your name.
Ant. Antonio (Madam)
Iſm. Antonio, take this kiſſe, 'tis you I am bound to.
Ant. And when I ſet ye free, may heaven forſake me,
Iſmena.
Iſm. Yes, now I perceive ye love me,
You have learnd my name.
Ant. Hear but ſome vows I make to ye:
Hear but the proteſtations of a true love.
Iſm. No, no, not now: vowes ſhould be cheerful things,
Done in the cleereſt light, and nobleſt teſtimony:
No vow (deer Sir) tye not my fair belief
To ſuch ſtrict termes: thoſe men have broken credits,
Looſe and diſmembred faiths (my deer Antonio)
That ſplinter'em with vows: am I not too bold?
Correct me when you pleaſe.
Ant. I had rather hear ye,
For ſo ſweet Muſick never ſtruck mine eares yet:
Will you believe now?
Iſm. Yes.
Ant. I am yours.
Iſm. Speak lowder,
If ye anſwer the Prieſt ſo low, you will loſe your wedding
Mar. Would I might ſpeak, I would hollow.
Ant. Take my heart,
And if it be not firm and honeſt to you,
Heaven.
Iſm. Peace, no more: I'll keep your heart, and credit it.
Keep you your word: when will you come again
(Friend?)
For this time we have wooed indifferently,
I would fain ſee ye, when I dare be bolder.
Ant. Why any night: onely (deer noble Miſtris)
Pardon three daies: my Uncle Julio
Has bound me to attend him upon promiſe,
Upon expectation too: we have rare ſports there,
Rare Country ſports, I would you could but ſee'em.
Dare ye ſo honour me?
Iſm. I dare not be there,
You know I dare not, no, I muſt not (friend)
Where I may come with honourable freedom:
Alas, I am ill too; wee in love.
Ant, You flowt me.
Iſm. Truſt me I do not: I ſpeak truth, I am ſickly,
And am in Love: but you muſt be Phyſician.
Ant. I'll make a plaiſter of my beſt affection.
Iſm. Be gone, we have ſupp'd, I hear the people ſtir,
Take my beſt wiſhes: give me no cauſe (Antonio)
To curſe this happy night.
Ant. I'll loſe my life firſt,
A thouſand kiſſes.
Iſm. Take ten thouſand back again.
Mar. I am dumb with admiration: ſhall we goe
Sir? Exeunt.
Iſm. Doſt thou know his Uncle?
Am. No, but I can ask, Coſen.
Iſm. I'll tell thee more of that, come let's to bed both,
And give me handſom dreams, Love, I beſeech thee.
Am. 'Has given ye a handſom ſubject.
Iſm. Pluck to the windows. Exeunt.

Six Chaires placed at the Arras.

Actus Secundus.

Scæna Prima.

Enter Buſtofa.

Buſt. The thundring Seas, whoſe watry fire waſhes
The whiting mops:
The gentle Whale whoſe feet ſo fell
Flies ore the Mountains tops. within Franio.
Fra. Boy.
Buſt. The thundring.
Fra. Why boy Buſtofa.
Buſt. Here I am, the gentle whale. Ent. Franio.
Fra. Oh, are you here Sir? where's your ſiſter?
Buſt. The gentle whale flies ore the mountain tops.
Fra. Where's your ſiſter (man)
Buſt. Waſhes the whiting-Mops.
Fr. Thou ly'ſt, ſhe has none to waſh mops?
The boy is half way out of his wits, ſure:
Sirrha, who am I?
Buſt. The thundring Seas.
Fra. Mad, ſtark mad.
Buſt. Will you not give a man leave to con?
Fra. Yes, and teſte too, ere I have done with you Sirrha,
Am I your father?
Buſt. The queſtion is too hard for a child, ask me any thing
That I have learn'd, and I'll anſwer you.
Fra. Is that a hard queſtion? Sirrha, am not I your Father?
Buſt. If I had my mother-wit I could tell you.
Fra. Are you a thief?
Buſt. So far forth as the ſon of a Miller.
Fra. Will you be hang'd?
Buſt. Let it go by elderſhip. The gentle Whale.
Fra. Sirrha, lay by your fooliſh ſtudy there,
And beat your brains about your owne affairs: or——
Buſt. I thank you; you'ld have me goe under the ſails
And beat my brains about your mill? a naturall
Father you are.——
Fran. I charge you go not to the ſports to day:
Laſt night I gave you leave, now I recant.
Buſt. Is the wind turn'd ſince laſt night?
Fra. Marry is it Sir, go no farther then my Mill;
There's my command upon you.
Buſt. I may go round about then as your Mill does?
I will ſee your Mill gelded, and his Stones fryde in ſteaks,
Ere I deceive the Countrey ſo: have I not my part to ſtu-dy?
How ſhall the ſports go forward, if I be not there?
Fra. They'll want their fool indeed, if thou bee'ſt not there.
Buſt. Conſider that, and go your ſelf.
Fra. I have fears (Sir) that I cannot utter,
You go not, nor your Siſter: there's my charge.
Buſt. The price of your golden thumb cannot hold me.
Fra. I, this was ſport that I have tightly lov'd,
I could have kept company with the Hounds.
Buſt. You are fit for no other company yet. (yfaith:
Fra. Run with the Hare; and bin in the whore's tayl
Buſt. That was before I was born, Ent. Otrante and Geraſto.
I did ever miſtruſt I was a Baſtard,
Becauſe Lapis is in the ſingular number with me.
Otr. Leave thou that gun (Geraſto) and chaſe here,
Do thou but follow it with my deſires,
Thou'lt not return home emptie.
Ger. I am prepard
(My Lord) with advantages: and ſee
Yonder's the ſubject I muſt work upon:
Otr. Her Brother? 'tis, methinks it ſhould be eaſie:
That groſſe compound cannot but diffuſe
The ſoul in ſuch a latitude of eaſe,
As to make dull her faculties, and lazie:
What wit above the leaſt can be in him,
That Reaſon ties together?
Ger. I have prov'd it, Sir,
And know the depth of it: I have the way
To make him follow me a hackney-pace,
With all that fleſh about him; yea, and dragge
His Siſter after him: This baytes the old one,
Rid you him, and leave me to the other. Exit
Otr. 'Tis well: O Franio, the good day to you;
You were not wont to hear this muſick ſtanding:
The Beagle and the Bugle ye have lov'd,
In the firſt rank of Huntſmen.
Buſt. The doggs cry out of him now.
Fra. Sirrha, leave your barking, I'll bite you elſe:
Buſt. Curre, Curre.
Fra. Slave, do'ſt call me dog?
Otr. Oh fie Sir, he ſpeaks Latine to you,
He would know why you'll bite him.
Buſt. Reſponde cur; You ſee his underſtanding (my Lord)
Fra. I ſhall have a time to curry you for this:
But (my Lord) to anſwer you, the daies have been
I muſt have footed it before this Horn-pipe,
Though I had hazarded my Mill a fire,
And let the ſtones grinde empty: but thoſe dancings
Are done with me: I have good will to it ſtill.
And that's the beſt I can do.
Otr. Come, come, you ſhall be hors'd:
Your company deſerves him, though you kil him,
Run him blind, I care not.
Buſt. Hee'll do't o'purpoſe (my Lord) to bring him up to the Mill.
Fra. Do not tempt me too far (my Lord)
Otr. There's a foot i'th' ſtirrop: I'll not leave you now:
You ſhall ſee the Game fall once again:
Fra. Well (my Lord) I'll make ready my legge for you,
And try 'em once a horſback: ſirra: my charge, keep it. Exit.
Buſt. Yes, when you pare down your diſh for conſcience ſake.
When your thumb's coyn'd into bene & legaliè,
When you are a true man-Miller.
Otr. What's the matter Buſtofa? (the ſtaggers,
Buſt. My Lord; if you have ere a drunken Jade that has

Into his owne Countrey with him; the firſt Moor he met,
Cut his throat for Complexions ſake: there's as deadly feud between
A Moor and a Miller, as between black and white.
Otr. Fie, fie, this is unnaturall Buſtofa,
Unleſſe on ſome ſtrong cauſe.
Buſt. Be Judge (my Lord)
I am ſtudied in my part: the Julian-Feaſt is to day:

Buſt. I, and for mine own grace too.
Ot. Yes, and being ſtudied too: and the main Speaker too.
Buſt. The main? why all my Speech lies in the main,
And the dry ground together: The thundring ſeas, elſe,

Otr. Nay, then thou muſt go, thou'lt be much condemn'd
But then o'th' other ſide, obedience.
Buſt. Obedience?
But ſpeak your conſcience now (my Lord)
Am not I paſt asking bleſſing at theſe yeers?
Speak as you're a Lord, if you had a Miller to your father.
Otr. I muſt yeeld to you (Buſtofa), your reaſons

If you go, your ſiſter ought to go along with you.
Buſt. There I ſtumble now: ſhee is not at age.
Otr. Why? ſhee's fifteen, and upwards.
Buſt. Thereabouts.
Otr. That's womans ripe age; as full as thou art
At one and twenty: ſhee's manable, is ſhe not?
Buſt. I think not: poor heart, ſhe was never tryde in my conſcience.
'Tis a coy thing; ſhe will not kiſſe you a clown, not if he
Would kiſſe her.
Otr. What man?
Buſt. Not if he would kiſſe her, I ſay.
Otr. Oh, 'twas cleanlier then I expected: well Sir.
I'll leave you to your own, but my opinion is,
You may take her along; this is half way:
The reſt (Geraſto) and I hunt my prey.— Exit.
Buſt. Away with the old Miller (my Lord) and the mill
Strikes ſail preſently.

Enter Pedro, with Geraſto blind, ſinging.

Song.

Ger. Come follow me (you Country-Laſſes)
And you ſhall ſee ſuch ſport as paſſes:
You ſhall dance, and I will ſing;
Pedro hee ſhall rub the ſtring:
Each ſhall have a looſe-bodied gown
Of green; and laugh till you lie down.
Come follow me, come follow, &c.

Enter Florimell.

Buſt. O ſweet Diego, the ſweeteſt Diego, ſtay: Siſter Florimell.
Flo. What's that, Brother?
Buſt. Didſt not hear Diego? Hear him, and thou'lt be raviſh'd.
Flo. I have heard him ſing, yet unraviſh'd, Brother.
Buſt. You had the better luck (Siſter.) I was raviſh'd
By mine own conſent: Come away: for the Sports.
Flo. I have the fear of a Father on me (Brother.)
Buſt. Out: the theef is as ſafe as in his mill; hee's hunting with our
Great Land-lord, the Don Otrante. Strike up Diego.
Flo. But ſay he return before us, Where's our excuſe?
Buſt. Strike up Diego. Haſt no ſtrings to thy apron?
Flo. Well, the fault lie upon your head (Brother).
Bu. My faults never mount ſo high (girl) they riſe but to My middle at moſt. Strike up Diego.
Ger. Follow me by the ear, I'll lead thee on (Buſtofa) and Pretty Florimell thy Siſter: oh that I could ſee her.
Buſt. Oh Diego, there's two pities upon thee; great pi-
tie thou art blinde;
And as great a pitie thou canſt not ſee.

Song.

Ger. You ſhall have Crowns of Roſes, Daiſies,
Buds, where the honey-maker gazes:
You ſhall taſte the golden thighs,
Such as in Wax-Chamber lies.
What fruit pleaſe you, taſte, freely pull,
Till you have all your bellies full.
Come follow me, &c.

Buſt. O Diego, the Don was not ſo ſweet when hee perfum'd the Steeple. Exeunt.

Scæna Secunda.

Enter Antonio and Martine.

Mar. Why, how now (Friend) thou art not loſt agen?
Ant. Not loſt? why, all the world's a wilderneſſe:
Some places peopled more by braver beaſts
Then others are: But faces, faces (man)
May a man be caught with faces?
Mar. Without wonder.
'Tis odds againſt him: May not a good face
Lead a man about by the noſe? 'las,
The noſe is but a part againſt the whole.
Ant. But is it poſſible that two faces
Should be ſo twin'd in form, complexion,
The table of the brow, the eyes luſtre,
The lips cherry; neither the bluſh nor ſmile
Should give the one diſtinction from the other?
Do's Nature work in molds?
Mar. Altogether.
We are all one mold, one duſt.
Ant. Thy reaſon's moldie.
I ſpeak from the Form, thou the Matter.
Why? was't not ever one of Natures Glories,
Nay, her great peece of wonder, that amongſt
So many millions millons of her works
Shee left the eye diſtinction, to cull out
The one from other; yet all one name, the face?
Mar. You muſt compare 'em by ſome other part
Of the body, if the face cannot do't.
Ant. Didſt ask her name?
Mar. Yes, and who gave it her,
And what they promiſ'd more, beſides a ſpoon,
And what Apoſtles picture; ſhe is chriſtend too,
In token wherefore ſhe is call'd Iſabella,
The daughter of a Country plow-ſwain by:
If this be not true, ſhee lyes.
Ant. She cannot;
It would be ſeen a bliſter on her lip,
Should falſhod touch it, it is ſo tender:
Had her name held, 't had been Iſmenia,
And not another of her name.
Mar. Shall I ſpeak?
Ant. Yes, if thou'lt ſpeak truth: Is ſhe not wondrous like?
Mar. As two garments of the ſame faſhion,
Cut from the ſame piece: yet if any excell,
This has the firſt; and in my judgement 'tis ſo.
Ant. 'Tis my opinion.
Mar. Were it the face
Where mine eye ſhould dwell, I would pleaſe both
With this, as ſoon as one with the other.
Ant. And yet the other is the caſe of this.
Had I not look'd upon Iſmenia,
I nere had ſtaid beyond good-morrows time

In view of this.
